"But you understand about my mother and father and me? They were so young. And I was, too. So we all grew up together. And I thought they were all the family I'd ever have and they were enough—

"I was goin' with another boy and he introduced me to Ronni. I thought he was awful good lookin' and dignified. And he asked me if I would go out with him and I said 'yes' and then he never took me out!

"Late in October, two years ago, he gave a dinner party. Six couples. He took Rochelle Hudson and I went with the other boy. When we danced, he asked me again to go out and I said 'yes' but he'd asked me before and then never done it. And he said he didn't think I meant it. I was in movies and all that sort of thing. But I told him I always meant what I said. And I do.

"I was working and somehow we couldn't get together. Until one night, at ten o'clock and just for awhile.

"My father was in Europe and, of course, I couldn't see too much of Ronni, anyway, until I knew what father thought about it. When he came home, I mentioned Ronni and father said, 'Oh, yes, I remember him. A nice person. I liked him.' So that was all right. But I was still working and we didn't get together.

THEN father and mother decided to take me to Agua Caliente for New Year's Eve to get me away. I'd been working awful hard. The only thing Ronni worries about now is I work so hard. He's afraid I can't stand it. But I have the constitution of an ox for which I am very thankful. (She knocked on wood.)

"And father said, 'Why don't you ask that nice young chap, Ronni Burla (and please spell his name right. It isn't Burlap) to go along.' And Ronni and I talked a lot going down and sort of decided we'd like to get married the next spring. And we wondered how we could tell father. And then, at five minutes of twelve—er, oh, I forgot. We changed our plans and went to Coronado. Father said, 'Now, your mother and I can see you two want to get married. Why don't you help us celebrate our wedding anniversary and do it?'

"'And wait a whole year?' I asked him.

"'It will be our wedding anniversary in five minutes. I mean tomorrow.'

"So we did. In Tia Juana. And Ronni said it looked like a shot-gun wedding with three Merkels on the wedding license. Because, of course, my mother and father were witnesses. And it was sort of funny. We had a bungalow at Coronado and mother and I had one room and father and Ronni the other. And when we came back from Tia Juana we had to change our luggage all around. And mother and father were right there to help us celebrate our honeymoon. Only we didn't have much time. We had to come back to Hollywood the next day and an agent came in that evening down there and tried to sign me up. And I was so busy talkin' to him, Ronni didn't have much chance to talk to me.

"And we thought we would keep it a secret. But we stopped on the way back to buy some fruit and we read it in the newspapers.

"And then, you see, after we were married, we sort of started going together. And we still are. (She knocked on wood.)

"Oh, I forgot. When we read it in the newspaper, Ronni and I were awful worried because we hadn't told his mother and father. We went right up to see them and explained we'd intended to keep it a secret from everyone but them. And we had! I just hate tea. I can't stand it. But when Ronni's mother served us tea, I just shut my eyes and swallowed hard. I was just determined to make a good impression on her.

"In a week, we had bought a big house and all moved into it. I love it.

"Oh, no, it's nice having two families. I can't keep house and work all the time. And my mother and father just love Ronni. They take his part. That's a good thing. I would get awfully indignant if they didn't.

"He always falls upstairs. And I'm always getting awfully mad at him for that. He was an aviator, you know, and he's always goin' around with his head sort of in the clouds.

"Oh, yes, he went to college. Several. I don't quite understand whether he changed his mind or was kicked out or what. You see, he went to Stanford and then to some college in Oregon to take aviation and right away he was almost teachin' aviation. He was in Mexico City for two years; head of an aviation field. Then he was in a smash-up and the oil burned his eyes and he's color blind so now he's with a steel company and they're training him to be a junior engineer.

CERTAINLY we are going to have children. My father is German and my mother is French and Irish, from New Orleans. Ronni's mother and father were Swedish, Spanish and French. His grandfather was really a Basque. So I don't know what our children will be. Probably explosions! And Ronni says we've got to have triplets so there'll be one left over for us. My mother and father will have to have one, and his mother and father. So I've just got to have triplets, but not until I can give them a little personal attention.

"Oh, no, he doesn't have a thing to do with taking care of my money. Nor my mother or father, either. I do that. I have little books—they cost a nickel—and I have every cent I ever earned in them. From the first five dollars I made posing. And until just a little while ago I had every cent I ever spent in them, too. Now, I don't put in every little item that I spend but I do put in everything I make. And nobody else takes care of anything for me. And they never interfere.

"Oh, yes, I posed. I posed because I thought I might meet some theatrical people that way. You see, I didn't know anybody. But so many had started by posing. So I posed for pictures for the true story magazines and I always tried to get the serials because they lasted longer. I was 'the little country girl betrayed by the big city man.' I've been betrayed more times!

"I've always worked awful hard. Even at bein' betrayed. But I guess I'd work until my legs crumpled beneath me. But when I complain to my mother and father and Ronni, they say, 'If the studio didn't call you for three days, you'd be telephoning the casting office to see what is the matter.' I guess they're right. They usually are. Although I don't always admit it like this. Not when I'm talking to them.

"And I don't see why he married me. Because he just loves to swim and play golf and ride polo ponies and tennis. And I just hate them. Oh, I like to swim. Ronni would laugh at that. I went in once last summer.

"And he's a wonderful dancer. At least, they tell me he is. I don't care for it much and I'm not good on a dance floor. I guess I'll rent him around to the girls who like dancing. So you see, we don't fit, exactly, as people are supposed to who stay married. But if I weren't so superstitious I'd bet we are going to stay married even though I am a motion picture actress. He really doesn't mind that. And I don't either."

Should Brunettes use Brunette Powder?

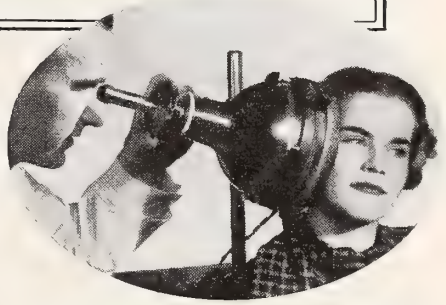
Optical Machine Gives Surprising Answer

Yes and No!

Nothing could be more foolish than for a girl to choose her face powder by the color of her hair! Some of the blackest hair is found with very white skin. Some girls with brown-black hair have a muddy skin which needs to be cleared up. Others are pale. Their skin needs to be warmed up.

With an optical machine Pond's color-tested the skin of over 200 girls. They found that blonde skin owes its transparent beauty to hidden notes of brilliant blue in it—brunette skin owes its allure to hidden tints of bright green. They blended these tints invisibly in the new Pond's shades. Now every girl can find the powder that will give her skin the lively look it lacks.

If you are dissatisfied with your skin, try these new Pond's shades—



Rose Cream—lovely on many clear-skinned brunettes

Brunette—a wholly new brunette shade—gives a velvety look

Rose Brunette—gives a warm glow to dull skins

Light Cream—lightens the skin.

So that you may try Pond's new powder shades free of charge—we will send you absolutely free generous samples of 5 different shades—enough of each to last five days so that you may test this powder thoroughly on the three points most important in a face powder—smoothness, staying quality and, above all, flattering color.

Over 200 girls' skin color-analyzed—to find the hidden beauty tints in skin, now blended invisibly in Pond's new powder shades.

New!
AN EMOLLIENT MASCARA
that gives lashes new glamour

If you don't agree on these three superiorities, your money back without question. Louise Ross

THIS introduces my final achievement in cake mascara, my new emollient Winx. I bring women everywhere the finest lash beautifier my experience can produce—one with a new, soothing effect that solves old-time problems.

It has three virtues, this new emollient Winx.

(1) It has a greater spreading capacity, hence it hasn't the artificial look of an ordinary mascara.

(2) Its soothing, emollient oils keep lashes soft and silky with no danger of brittleness.

(3) It cannot smart or sting or cause discomfort. It is tear-proof, smudge-proof, absolutely harmless.

I'm so confident that I've won leadership in eye make-up that I can afford this offer.

Give your lashes a long, silky effect with Winx Mascara. Shape your brows with a Winx pencil. Shadow your lids with Winx Eye Shadow. The result will delight you, giving your face new charm.

Buy any or all of my Winx eye beautifiers. Make a trial. If you are not pleased, for any reason, return the box to me and I'll refund your full price, no questions asked.

A Little Child Shall Lead Them by the Nose

minute intervals she made her reports to the worried train crew. "It's still breathing," Gracie would whisper through the door and the word traveled like lightning from baggage coach to club room. "It made a funny noise." "It yawned." "It hissed in Ohio," went out the reports.

Waiting in New York was George and a reception committee including Jack Benny, the baby's new nurse, everyone, in fact, but Gracie's brother who couldn't pry the handcuffs off in time to make it.

Grandly, Gracie descended the train steps with Sandy in the basket over her arm. And then, a terrible thing happened.

The baby sneezed.

"Oh, now it's ruined," Gracie moaned while everyone tried to locate Sandy in her size four coat.

From that moment on, life for the Burnses became one long, sad trek in search of food. Where once cozy breakfasts and tasty dinners had been prepared in the Burnses kitchenette, only milk bottles were now prepared. "Out," the nurse would command the cook. "I need this kitchenette for Sandy's milk bottles." And George and Gracie would creep out to the nearest tea room.

When Sandy had reached the ripe old age of six months, the Burnses arrived in Hollywood to make "Love in Bloom," which Gracie insisted be called "Love in Rubber Bloomers" for Sandy. Suddenly, George and Gracie found Sandy the center of attraction, while they were invited to take a back seat. "Is Sandy receiving today?" friends would ask over the phone. And, if Sandy felt like receiving, the Burnses saw their friends. If instead, Sandy wanted to "spit" up her milk alone and in peace, George and Gracie remained alone, completely ignored.

The nurse, to George's bewilderment, immediately became Sandy's mouthpiece. "And how are we feeling this morning?" George would ask Sandy each morning. "Oh, we're feeling fine, thank you," the nurse would say, which just mixed up George more than ever.

"And how did you sleep, honey?" George would ask Sandy, taking hold of her little pink toe.

"Oh, we slept fine and don't play with our tootsies," would come from the nurse, while George would reel out of the room in a stupor.

"Why, Sandy, you didn't drink all your milk," Gracie said one day. "You won't grow nice and fat if you don't drink your milk."

"I know we won't," the nurse pipes up. "That's just what I've been telling her. If we don't take our bottle we won't grow up to be rosy like W. C. Fields. I'll bet he always takes his bottle." And even Gracie felt that somewhere, something was wrong. But what?

A LOUD clamor in the hallway of their very exclusive apartment greeted George and Gracie one day on their return from the studio. "I'll have you know we're Sandy Burns, that's who I'll have you know we are," the nurse's angry voice cried.

"What is this? What's going on here?" George asked.

"Him," the nurse pointed to the assistant manager of the apartment house who stood by nervously wiping his forehead. "Wanting Sandy and me to go down the service elevator in our baby buggy. We're paying guests, I'll have him know, and we'll go down no freight elevator or out no back door. If dogs ride in these elevators and walk out the front door, so do we. Come on, Sandy," and into the elevator popped Miss Sandy Burns in her carriage, with her indignant nurse.

Then came George's birthday with the cake and the presents and the invited guests. All dressed up, with a blue ribbon tied around her six little hairs, Sandy made her appearance. She eyed George curiously. "Da, da, da, da, da," she gurgled and that was enough. Like a mad man George tore through the apartment house rapping on doors and calling through transoms. "It's my birthday and she called me 'da da.' She knows me," he yelped. "She called me 'da da.'" It took days for him to calm down while, in the meantime, twenty-seven guests and thirteen Pekingese moved right out.

Every gag that Burns and Allen flip over the radio or from a movie screen, is first tried out on Sandy. If Sandy laughs, or even smiles, the gag is in. If Sandy fails to laugh or ups with the coddled egg and throws it at papa's head, the gag is out. Many a priceless quip is thus lost to a waiting world simply because Sandy didn't think it so hot. One day production was actually held up while George and Gracie went over their gags before Sandy. There wasn't a smile. In fact, there wasn't even a slight yawn, and in the midst of the funniest gag Sandy simply rolled over and went to sleep.

Carefully, the nurse carried her into the bedroom. The door had scarcely closed when, suddenly, a loud baby chuckle followed by a long, loud raspberry reached George and Gracie in the other room.

They still can't make it out.

It's the regular evening game with the Burnses to hide in the room and listen to Sandy's baby gurgling. If Sandy sees anyone about, smart girl that she is, she refuses to talk, but left to herself Sandy will babble for dear life.

The Burnses had promised an interview to a prominent English writer, and when he arrived he was ushered into what seemed a room devoid of anyone. As he sat waiting, his attention was attracted by a loud "ssss-sss-sss" from under the davenport. Gracie's black, curly head popped out. "Hide. Get back of the chair. We're listening to Sandy." An equally loud hiss came from George behind the drapes. "Hide, hide," George cried. Bewildered, but convinced the two were as nutty off screen as on, the dignified Englishman hid behind the chair. And Sandy, from her carriage in the corner, babbled on.

THE jealousy that goes on these days among Hollywood parents is one for the book and, have no fear, Gracie is top-notch among them all. "Poor Bing Crosby," Gracie will say, "even when his new baby came with a stand-in, he couldn't get a girl. And anyhow our Sandy is twice as smart as the Crosby twins."

"Quiet, Gracie," George will say, "you don't know anything about the Crosby twins."

"Ah, I know, George, but I'm just getting in practice for my sister-in-law, wait till I tell her how much smarter our baby is than hers."

Of course, Hollywood will never get over the day a frantic message came to the studio for George and Gracie to come Gracie Allen thought "Lives of a Bengal Lancer" was about doctors until she and George Burns saw the première!

at once, Sandy had a tooth. "Upper or lower?" George kept gasping over the phone, "Upper or lower?"

"What's the difference?" Gracie cried, "I can't sleep on a train anyhow. Let's take a taxi."

Gracie, dressed in a Fatima costume for a scene in her picture, tore from the studio to the apartment. Guests swooned at the sight of a harem skirt swishing through the lobby with a wild-eyed man in pursuit.

"It is. It's a tooth. A real tooth. Now what do we do?" they cried.

"Bring on a newsreel camera," George phoned the studio, "we'll take a newsreel of it."

"No, I want it in technicolor," Gracie cried. "If they can make 'La Cucaracha' in color they can take Sandy's tooth in color."

They're still trying to figure out a way to take a technicolor newsreel of Sandy's tooth with music and a part written in for Charles Laughton.

Oh dear!

If this happened just once in a lifetime a body could accept it as one of life's many crosses and go on. But no. It's going to happen all over again, for one fine day very soon, George and Gracie are planning on a little baby brother for Sandy. Gracie is busy now saving coupons. And true to form she's got the name long before the baby.

It's to be Alan Burns. "Short," Gracie says, "for Burns and Allen."

visits to Queen's Crawley she had appeared quite captivated by the blonde governess.

Becky did not suspect that it was her guileful scheming which intrigued the redoubtable spinster. That Miss Julia was wickedly amused by her mendacious charm.

"The girl hasn't a principle to bless herself with," Miss Crawley chuckled to her outraged elderly companion, Briggs. "That's why I like her!" And, indifferent to the protests of Sir Pitt, she carried Becky off with her to London.

Becky was delighted. Though it was no easy task to cater to the whims of the elderly aristocrat, she felt sure that she had won her heart. Joyously she visioned herself and Rawdon spending Aunt Julia's money. And one evening, after giving the matter careful thought, Becky slipped out with Rawdon—and they were married!

Rawdon, too, felt sure that Aunt Julia would smile on their romance. But when next day he came to ask her approval, she disillusioned him with cruel firmness, before he even could break the news to her!

"Did you hope to find Becky Sharp at home?" She thrust her cane at him with sinister emphasis. "She's out—gone when I want her! But I won't have you look at Becky," she went on. "I won't have her twist you around her little finger as she did that fat Joseph Sedley!"

"Aunt Julia—I assure you—" Rawdon stammered nervously.

"Don't assure me! I'll assure you! I have been generous with you. I have paid your card debts. And I have been amused at your extravagance. But I will not have you ensnared by any calculating little snip of a menial! The woman you marry will be a lady of quality."

Rawdon's brow creased with anxiety. Like one in an unhappy dream, he heard the fateful words:

"Disobey me and not a penny of mine will you get! I'll disinherit you!"

And before he could find words to frame a plea, other visitors had come—Amelia Sedley, George Osborne, Captain Dobbin. And then Briggs burst in to report that Becky had not come back. Her closets were empty and a trunk was standing in her room.

Rawdon paled as his aunt demanded to see the contents of the trunk. But he dared not assert his rights, as Becky's husband, to forbid it. Unhappily he watched the rifling of the trunk.

How bitter life could be, Becky thought passionately, when you were an underling! That Miss Crawley should dare to open her trunk! To pass from hand to curious hand its treasured contents! She had opened the door unobserved upon this extraordinary scene. Had heard Amelia exclaim, over a pair of sequin-spangled tights, "Her mother must have been a French dancer!" Heard Captain Dobbin, "Her father was a third-rate painter fellow—brought her up in poverty." Heard Rawdon's outraged protest, "I don't believe a word of it."

BELIEVE it, Captain Crawley!" With icy dignity Becky advanced toward the group. "Believe anything—everything!" Her eyes blazed. "But these relics—they are mine! No hands are to touch them but my own!" She sighed with tragic grief. "Yes, my mother was a dancer. But she was an aristocrat. The finest blood of France. Exiled. Her fortune taken from her. Yes, she danced to feed her baby—her only child!" She stole a glance at her audience, observing beneath their hostile curiosity a grudging willingness to believe. "Do you wonder," her voice shook with suppressed sobs, "why I treasure these things that remind me of my sainted mother?"

Touched, Miss Crawley and Amelia moved toward her. But as if unaware of them, her eyes glazed with tears, Becky walked past them out of the room, closing the door behind her.

As she mounted the long staircase, Rawdon overtook her. "Becky!" He clasped her in his arms. "Becky, sweet! Do you suppose I would have cared?"

She looked at him tensely. He had been so impressed with her story of aristocratic lineage! "Don't pity me! Perhaps I'm lying, inventing the story."

"I don't care," he said doggedly. "I still love you!"

Her expression softened. "That is what I wanted to hear," she said tenderly. "Love me, Rawdon! Love me! I've had so little love in my life! Take me away from here," she went on passionately. "Let's not care what happens. That's why I had my trunk packed. We're going away."

He looked confused. How could they live? He had no income save what Miss Crawley provided. No skill, save at cards and dice, and that not always! If Aunt Julia should disinherit him . . .

But she clung to him. "Get a hackney coach. Come for me when it's dark. Oh, Rawdon, kiss me! Never stop kissing me!" She held him away from her, after a moment. "I could have married others. Why did I want you, my silly? What have you but your flashing eyes? Not a penny! Not a plan! Not an ambition!" She ran her hand fondly through his hair. "But we'll make out, my Rawdon. Life owes me many things, but one can get everything, if one has wit. She laughed. "Don't look so disturbed. I don't expect you to supply the wit. That's my dowry to you."

But that evening, as she stole softly down the staircase on her way to Rawdon, the opening of the outer door checked her secret flight.

"Ah, there you are, my pretty!" Old Sir Pitt gazed up at her fatuously. Lady Crawley, he explained, had died, and he wanted her. "To make short o' long, Becky," he finished, "you must come back!" And he took her hand in his gnarled old one.

She gazed at him, astonished. "Come as—as what, sir?"

"Dang it, come as Lady Crawley!"

Becky's eyes widened. As Lady Crawley! She bit her lips. "It's too late," she said in a shaken voice. "I'm already married."

"Married? Who's it to you're married?"

"Oh, why didn't you come a day sooner? Oh, dear Sir Pitt—" she clung to his hand, "if I can't be your wife, let me be your daughter!"

At the foot of the stairs the drawing-room door had opened, framing the startled faces of Julia Crawley and Briggs.

"Daughter!" Miss Crawley echoed in a shocked whisper. Then, with an inarticulate groan, she tottered. Fell fainting as Becky, with a frightened cry, sped down the stairs and out of the door.

THE door, closing softly behind her, closed, as Becky soon learned, on many fond hopes that now never would be realized. Miss Crawley disinherited her nephew and discontinued his allowance. Sir Pitt was implacable. The younger Pitt presently married a distant cousin, Lady Jane, but he thought of Becky frequently, and with charity, as he believed.

But charity did not pay bills. And for Becky and Rawdon now there were only his gift for gambling and her wit and charm. But Becky was not dissatisfied with her bargain. As much as it was in her to love anyone other than herself, she loved Rawdon. He was always amiable. Always impressed with her superior intelligence. Whatever she wanted to do was right in his eyes. And one day, Becky felt sure, they would win the position and fortune that should be theirs.

To their apartment in Mayfair, Rawdon's fellow officers came often, delighted to play at dice or cards so long as Becky was there to smile upon them. George Osborne came, too. He was married to Amelia now. And Becky set herself to be especially charming to him.

Amelia came one day to beg her not to let George play with Rawdon, since he so invariably lost. "He already is in debt," she pleaded. "I am afraid . . ."

"Debt?" Becky laughed sagely. "We must owe money to every shopkeeper in London. Let them do the worrying." She patted Amelia's cheek. "You make life happy for your George."

"That is my only dream!" Amelia looked at her wistfully. She could not confess to Becky how it hurt that George should come here, evening after evening, while she sat at home in lonely despair.

But this interlude ended suddenly. Napoleon escaped from Elba. And Rawdon's regiment was ordered into Belgium. He was not sorry. His winnings were a drop in the bucket, and debtors threatened prison. And besides, Becky somehow had acquired a pair of silver dice which with great glee she had shown Rawdon. They were loaded! If she should ever use them . . . He shivered.

Becky openly exulted at the news. "What dazzling luck!"

"Are you out of your mind?"

"I'm crazy for joy! Belgium—a new start. Officers, their wives, the best people, the richest people! Society, Rawdon! A new life!"

And as always, Rawdon felt that Becky must be right.

It did seem so, at first. Life in Belgium was a series of gay and glittering events, with no hint of the enemy creeping closer, closer . . . Color and gaiety. Dancing and laughter and wine. And gambling . . .

With superb aplomb, Becky moved always to the front. Who knew how she contrived to be at the Duchess of Richmond's ball? Let Lady Southdown look down her nose at a mere ex-governess. Let Lady Bareacres offer her ineffectual snubs. Lord Bareacres asked her to dance. Lord Tarquin and Prince Peterwaradin vied for her favors. Even the Duke of Wellington asked her for a waltz!

Becky was intoxicated with her triumph. She could scorn Joseph Sedley now, returned from India, trying pompously to seem important—a mere civilian amid dazzling soldiery and glittering nobility. Smiling, she drifted away on the dance floor with George Osborne.

Followed by the faithful Dobbin, Amelia fled to the garden. "She is trying to take him away from me," she sobbed. "William, how long is this to go on?"

NAPOLEON is not likely to attack for another fortnight," Captain Dobbin kept his eyes resolutely on the ground. He longed to take her in his arms. But she thought only of George.

As we go to press the fickle Mr. Bert Wheeler is beauing about the attractive Miss Sally Haines, above with him.

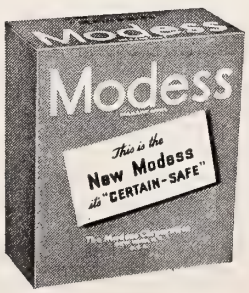
"CERTAIN-SAFE" MODESS

Here's news! REAL NEWS!

. . . more startling than the invention that made sanitary napkins disposable. . . . more important than the improvements that have made napkins soft and comfortable.

Now—at last—comes a napkin that gives complete protection from embarrassing "accidents!"

It is the new "Certain-Safe" Modess—only recently perfected in the Modess research laboratories.



The secret? It lies in a combination of THREE special features. Two of these features may sometimes be found in other brands of napkins. But the third is absolutely new—and exclusive with Modess. It is the combination of all three features that gives complete protection.

Test this three-way protection!

Just do this. Get a box of the new "Certain-Safe" Modess. (You won't risk a penny . . . see Money Back guarantee below.) Read the printed slip that you'll find in the box. Look at the diagrams shown on the slip and compare them with the napkin itself. See and feel the three new features that bring you dependable protection against (1) striking through; (2) tearing away; (3) incomplete absorption.

Then wear the new Modess! You'll never again feel safe or satisfied with any other napkin!

YOUR MONEY BACK IF YOU'RE NOT CONVINCED!

Here's a challenge! We'll refund your money if you try the new Modess and don't like it! Get a box. Wear as many napkins as you need to make a thorough test. If you aren't completely satisfied, return the box and the remaining napkins to The Modess Corporation, 500 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y. We'll send you every penny you paid, plus postage!

And George, dancing with Becky, whispered fiercely, "Why didn't you answer my letter?"

"Because," Becky said calmly, "only madmen put such things in writing. What if Rawdon read it? What if Amelia found out?"

"I can't be concerned with them. You and I are going away . . ."

"I love Rawdon," she declared. "Always remember that!"

"I remember it daily," he said bitterly, "when I lose to him. Ten pounds. Fifty pounds. I tell myself this will buy silk for Becky. Champagne for her. You've been expensive, Becky. But I lost willingly. But now I've no more. I'm in debt."

"Have you tried to borrow?"

"There's no one left to borrow from. But it doesn't matter, does it? It changes nothing between us?"

The moonlight softly flooded her lovely face. But her eyes were cold.

"Oh, you're silent. Perhaps it does alter things. Is there bigger game in the offing?" His eyes followed hers, which turned away from him to the foot of the great staircase, where the Marquis of Steyne was standing. Then he laughed hoarsely. "How perfect your instincts are. Is the millionaire Marquis of Steyne distinguished enough, rich enough, to meet with your approval? Perhaps he also is fond of dicing!"

Her lips parted as if to say something withering. But without a word she turned and left him. Anguished, he watched her dancing presently with Steyne.

Suddenly a flare brighter than the mellow moonlight lit the sky. It was followed by a low, ominous rumble. Stricken, the dancers paused.

"Cannon!" a hushed voice exclaimed.

And now the sound increased in volume. The sky seemed seared with racing meteors of fire. "The French! Artillery! Bonaparte!" terrified voices babbled.

The lights in the ballroom dimmed. Outside a bugler sounded a summoning call. Hurriedly soldiers gathered. Women cried out for their husbands and rushed, panicky, to the exits.

"Wait for me," Steyne said quickly to Becky. "I'll take you home. You will wait?" And, as she nodded eagerly, he hurried off.

Amelia's arms were about George's neck. "I won't let you go!" she cried.

But he disengaged her clinging arms. "I must look for—someone."

"You'll never come back to me," she wept. "I'll never see you alive again. George . . . George!" But he was gone.

"Becky!" He hurried up to her breathlessly. "You're coming with me!" His voice was shaken with passion. "I'll desert, Becky! We'll go somewhere—anywhere—"

She laughed. Drew him back to the forlorn Amelia. "George, here's your little wife! Take good care of my poor Emmy." And she swept away.

Rawdon came hurrying toward her.

"Where have you been?" Becky flung her arms about him.

"Wellington's orders . . ." He was breathless. "I dashed back for a moment. There's so much to tell you before I go . . ." He gazed tensely at her. "Becky, I've been happy with you. I want you to know that. I love you!" His voice broke. "We understand each other, don't we?"

"We've always understood each other," she said softly.

"Take this—" he drew some money from his pocket. "Not much. Not enough. But I shan't need it. If I catch a bullet, I'll need even less. Sell my rings. My watch. My horses. Oh, we've so many debts! All I want to keep is your locket."

"Don't think about money," Becky urged, genuinely touched. "I'll get on, Rawdon. And I'll pray for you! I've never loved anyone else! I want you back!" She held him close. Her lips were warm on his.

"I must go!" Regretfully he loosed that dear embrace. "But—never forget—I worship you, Becky!" He kissed her again. Then, obedient to the summoning bugle, he hurried off.

"Rawdon!" She was weeping now. Rawdon! I love you!" Slowly she moved across the deserted ballroom to a window. Pushing aside the portières, she looked down into the street. Torches flared. To the shrill sound of the fife, the mutter of the drum, lines of men marched.

There was a sound behind her. The Marquis of Steyne stood there, watching her thoughtfully. She turned to him, eyes shining. "There they go," she murmured. "In an hour they'll be dying for their country!" For a moment her eyes were far away, as if visioning that brave sacrifice. Then she laughed. "Well, I'm dying for my breakfast!"

And the Marquis of Steyne came forward and took her arm.

THE Duke of Wellington won his famous victory, and the men returned from the battlefields. But George Osborne was not among them. A tablet in a London church was inscribed to his memory, and Amelia went in tragic black, her face wan with weeping. The faithful Dobbin continued unobtrusively to serve her, and his eyes worshiped her with a love that seemed destined always to be denied. For Amelia, lost in the dream of a love that never had been real, could not recognize the reality that might be hers.

Becky's apartment in Mayfair now was gayer than ever before. And if underneath the gayety lay a threat, only Rawdon, perhaps, was keenly aware of it. There were whispers about Becky. And there were debts he could not pay. But Becky was concerned only with their new position in society, their new friends. Beau Brummel. Count D'Orsay. Even, though incognito, the Prince of Wales, to whom she had been presented at Court. And the Marquis of Steyne. . . .

No warning of the price she was paying for this gratifying position troubled Becky's complacent thoughts. They would manage somehow. Perhaps Rawdon's brother, now Sir Pitt since their father's death, would help him. . . .

Joseph Sedley frequented the gay gatherings, losing at dice with the complacency of those who saw Becky adorned with the winnings. Though one evening he complained to her, "I say, Becky, every time I enter this house it costs me money."

"Have you ever considered stopping your visits?" she retorted.

He looked at her languishingly. "You know I couldn't do that."

And then the absent Rawdon returned. Greeting him joyously, Becky dismissed Joseph. Rawdon's face was lined.

"What's happened, Rawdon?"

"Nothing. . . . Everything!" He turned toward her desperately. "I had a nasty night of it at the club—almost came to blows with Deuceace. He threatened me—demanded immediate payment of the four hundred pounds I owe him."

"A pretty time he picked!" Becky frowned. "We haven't a penny!"

"I know. That's the devil of it!" He sighed. "After the argument—it became a matter for the club. A debt of honor. I was instructed to pay—or be expelled. Captain Dobbin is in charge of collecting it."

"Deuceace . . ." Becky muttered savagely. "He was here only last week, and never even mentioned the debt. He and I gambled while you played billiards with the boys."

"Gambled . . ." Rawdon looked at her with sudden doubt. "What did you play?"

"Dice . . ."

"For heaven's sake! You didn't by chance——"

"The loaded dice?" She had herself in hand now. "I promised you I never would." She laughed. "I don't even know where they are. I seem to have lost them." She drew him down beside her on a sofa. "Why do you look at me like that? What do you see? A cheat? A liar?"

"No, no!" he protested, longing as always to believe her. "But I'm worried, Becky. Where is all this leading us?"

"Who knows? Who cares? We live elegantly on nothing a year."

"We're paying heavily—little bits of ourselves!" He sighed.

"It's worth the price! Women who cut me last year would give their eyes to be where I am now. They envy me. This is what I've worked for. Oh, darling, enjoy it with me!"

"I can't get Deuceace out of my mind," he said gloomily.

"I could borrow the money, from——"

"Steyne?" He stiffened. "You won't! Not from him! I won't have all London thinking that . . ."

"You don't trust me? Is that what you wish to believe?"

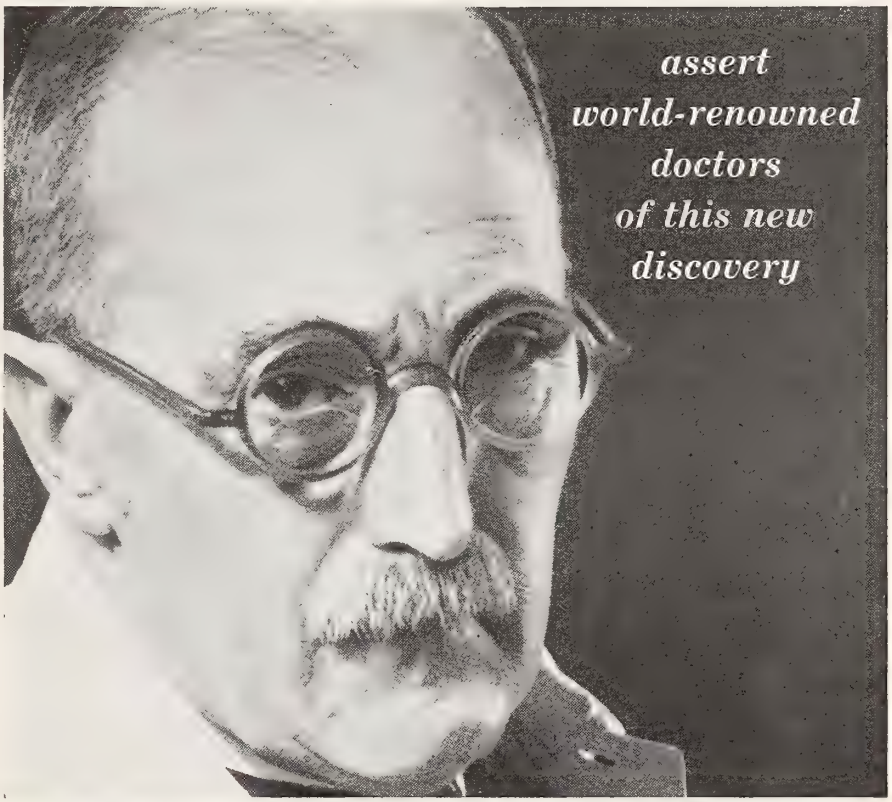
"No! I'll believe only what you tell me and nothing that you deny."

She leaned close to him. "Then believe that I'm your Becky and that I love you. And that nothing else matters. Perhaps Dobbin can be persuaded to wait. . . ."

It would be better to go to see Dobbin, she decided. Desperate with anxiety she planned her campaign. As yet her self-confidence was unimpaired. She would bring it off somehow. She had one trump card, she thought complacently. If nothing else would serve, that would win him.



Rawdon, sitting wearily beside her had no suspicion of her devious plans. If he had said that he did not trust her, things might have been very different for them both. But so long as nothing disturbed his confidence in her, Becky continued her arrogant scheming, unperturbed by the thought of a reckoning day.

Still, as she sat in Dobbin's apartment the next day, she felt faintly nervous. He was so cold, so unyielding. Her smile

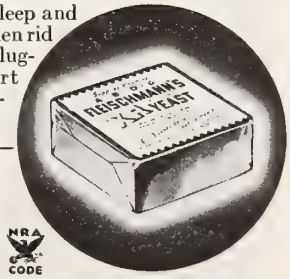
"_can end the cathartic habit for millions of people"

"BIGGEST STEP IN YEARS in the treatment of constipation and related ills such as indigestion, skin troubles and run-down condition," says Dr. Richard von Stenitzer, chief medical consultant at the famous Consular Academy in Vienna.

Constipation chiefly due to lack of certain substances in the diet. This food abundantly supplies them!

TODAY, in clinics everywhere, remarkable results are being obtained in cases of chronic constipation by a new food recently developed—the new Fleischmann's fresh Yeast. It is the richest known source of certain "protective substances" the stomach and bowels need to work right.



Why people get Constipated

Unless your stomach and intestines obtain from your diet a sufficient supply of these "protective substances," your food doesn't digest fast enough and wastes collect. Constipation usually results, and you suffer from colds, skin troubles and poor digestion.

No diet—not even those containing leafy vegetables and fruits—contains enough of these substances. No laxatives supply them. But this new fresh yeast is so rich in them that it "conditions" the entire digestive tract. In one great eastern hospital, this new Fleischmann's Yeast overcame 93% of constipation cases—an amazing percentage!

Begin today to overcome constipation by eating 3 or more cakes of the new Fleischmann's Yeast daily, a half-hour before meals—plain, or dissolved in water. At grocers, restaurants, soda fountains.

You'll eat, sleep and work better when rid of digestive sluggishness. Start eating Fleischmann's Yeast!

TAKING CATHARTICS? Cut down on them gradually as Fleischmann's new Yeast corrects your constipation. No other food is as rich in Vitamins A, B, D, G and other protective substances needed for health. Get this new fresh yeast today!

grew fixed as he told her the debt must be paid.

"Where do you propose I turn for the four hundred pounds?" she demanded.

"I have no suggestions to make," his voice was icy, "save this—you will have to raise five hundred, not four."

"Really!" Becky gasped. "A hundred pounds added for interest? Or for damages to Deuceace's wounded feelings?"

Quietly, coldly Dobbin explained, "Mr. Deuceace came to me privately. He was too much the gentleman to charge this before the club." He paused. "It seems," he went on, "he played dice with you last week and he lost a hundred pounds. You used a pair of silver dice." He put his hand in his pocket and brought out the fateful dice. "Loaded dice! He managed to take them with him, after the game." His eyes were dark with contempt as he looked at Becky.

For a moment her lips parted soundlessly. "Really!" she managed at last. "I've never seen them before! You've always hated me. And now I'm in your power!"

"You're not in my power. And I'm trying to help Rawdon."

OH, Rawdon, of course." She seized at a straw. "You would lend the money?" Then, as he stared at her fixedly, sternly, without replying, she reached for her last card. "Well, I didn't think you would. That's why I came prepared—I have something to sell—something you might be interested in buying. By the way, I was broken-hearted to hear that Amelia had rejected you again!" Fumbling in her bag she brought out George's letter. "He proposed that we elope," she explained. "Do you remember the Duchess of Richmond's ball, before Waterloo? We were to go away that night. It would be invaluable in your courtship of Amelia," she urged insinuatingly. "It's for sale—five hundred pounds!"

"Mrs. Crawley!" he gasped. "Women like you——"

She drew herself up haughtily. "How much time have I to pay," she asked.

"Till tomorrow morning."

"Oh, generous! You'll have the money. I can get it elsewhere, most easily!" She smiled confidently as she departed.

But in her heart was a growing fear. Whom should she turn to now? Rawdon had forbidden her to ask Steyne. And while that alone would not have checked her, she was troubled by an uneasy sense of probable consequences. She must get it elsewhere.

She found herself walking up and down before Pitt Crawley's hotel. At last, with sudden resolution, she went in.

He was just as always, she thought with bitter contempt, as she listened to his sanctimonious words. He would help her—yes—but on condition that she give up her "unholy and imprudent connection" with the Marquis of Steyne.

That Becky could have promised. Promises never disturbed her. But as Pitt proposed to compensate her for the loss of the Marquis' company by having her come to read sermons with him, she drew back.

Pitt kissed her hand, babbling of conscience and brotherly love.

A shudder of distaste shook Becky. "At least," she murmured as if to herself, "the Marquis of Steyne has no conscience! And as for brotherly love—not an ounce of it!" She laughed, as once more she went out.

Lord Steyne promised the money readily. But there was in his manner, in his words, indeed, a hint that payment of a sort would be expected. "Perhaps," he suggested, "you would consider granting me that—er—little supper which you have promised so long now?"

Becky temporized. Rawdon, she said, would be entertaining some friends that evening.

Lord Steyne's eyes held hers. Rawdon, he suggested, would be hurrying to the club, to pay that unfortunate debt.

And so it was the Marquis of Steyne's money with which Becky presently surprised Rawdon.

"Where did you get it?" he asked.

"Young Southdown—he just paid me five hundred he owed me."

"You never told me Southdown owed you money."

DIDN'T I?" She laughed nervously. "Well, he did! Now you must be off with it. There's no time to lose! Our last debt, Rawdon! Once this debt is paid——" her voice broke. "Why don't you stay at the club this evening and play billiards," she added. "You need amusement."

Rawdon looked at her narrowly. Then he smiled, a thin, bitter smile, and went out.

It was midnight when Steyne called. Becky was alone, but she received him confidently. Invited him to sit at a little table before the fire and have some strawberries with her. Rawdon, she thought contentedly, would be back at any moment.

But Rawdon, it appeared, would not be back at any moment. Lord Steyne explained that he had arranged for that! Rawdon had been arrested as he left the house. In the morning it would be explained as a practical joke. Till then . . .

Becky tried to rally all her resources. There still must be some way. . . . She attempted casual conversation. Lord Steyne smiled.

"I suppose," Becky chattered, "our friends would hold up their hands in horror at this innocent little feast."

"This innocent little feast!" The Marquis smiled again. He rose. Bending over her, he fastened a string of priceless pearls about her neck. Then his arms went about her.

"My lord!" Becky gasped.

But he held her close. "How do you do it, eh? How the devil did you ever catch my fancy?" Despite her struggles he held her firmly. "There's not an ounce of goodness and sweetness about you! That's your attraction! There's the sting to it!"

Becky trembled violently. "Didn't you hear something?"

He laughed. "You heard your own wicked little heart!"

But she was listening for another sound. Her frightened eyes observed the latch of the door, pressed slowly downward.

The door opened.

"Rawdon!" Becky's smile was ghastly. "My lord and I are just . . . We're having a little . . . Won't you—join us?"

Rawdon stood on the threshold, trembling, silent.

It was Lord Steyne who spoke first. "So, this is a trap!" His voice vibrated with fury. "Timed to the minute! Well, sir, how much am I blackmailed for?"

"Rawdon, I've done nothing!" Becky pleaded frantically. "I'm innocent!" She turned to Steyne. "My lord, tell him I am innocent!"

But Steyne checked her contemptuously. Again he faced Rawdon. "Come, let me hear the amount. I've already given you five hundred——"

"You lie!" Rawdon's voice rasped hoarsely. His fist shot out, striking Lord Steyne savagely in the face. And as the Marquis staggered, he struck him again, laughing grimly as he fell, unconscious.

"Rawdon!" Becky screamed. "Rawdon!"

"Come here!" He stared at her. "Those pearls . . ."

She had forgotten them! Instinctively her hands flew to her neck as if to cover them. "I'll explain," she stammered, trembling.

"Take them off!"

She tried, but her nervous fingers failed to find the catch. And with an angry movement he seized them. Broke the string.

"Yes, let them go!" Becky sobbed. "I don't want them! I want only you! Rawdon!" She tried to seize his arm, but he turned as if he had not heard her.

"Rawdon!" She rushed after him. "I won't let you go! I won't be flung off!"

But the door banged shut between them. He was gone.

Becky's arms fell limply to her sides. She shuddered. "They'll laugh——" she murmured brokenly. "How they'll laugh!"

Such a long way to go. . . . Such a little way! From that glittering Mayfair apartment to a drab pension in Germany. From lords and dukes and princes to shabby college students with scarcely a banknote between them. No more jewels and silks and Lucullan feasts. Only a worn black dress. Only a dingy room.

The furnishings of the Mayfair apartment had been sold for the benefit of creditors. Captain Crawley's name had been stricken from the membership rolls of his club. And Rawdon himself had gone—where, Becky could not learn. She had written him frantic letters, which came back to her unopened. She had written to Pitt. She even had written to Amelia. And waited despairingly for an answering word.

But one day visitors came to the sorry inn. Sir Pitt and Lady Jane! Becky's face glowed with new, incredible hope. Hope that faded to hopelessness, when they said that she could go back with them to Queen's Crawley to help with the accounts, to read sermons with Pitt, to teach the children. . . .

"It would be a new start for you," Pitt said unctuously.

"Not a new start!" Becky's voice was harsh with despair. "The same start all over again. But not the same prospects ahead."

They would come back later, they said, and take her to church with them. In the meantime, she must pray for guidance.

"For guidance," Becky murmured bitterly. And under her breath she whispered, "And for escape!"

But as she lay weeping on her wretched bed, more visitors came. Amelia! And Joseph! Captain Dobbin, Amelia explained, flushing, was waiting below.

"He wouldn't come up?" Becky's face was hard with malice. "He still remembers things? Well, so do I!"

"Don't!" Amelia said gently. "The past must be forgotten." She sat down beside Becky. "Dear, you can't stay in this place. You are coming to live with me. Jos," she turned to her brother, "go down and stay with Dobbin. I want to talk with Becky."

"Do you know what you're saying?" Becky gasped as Joseph went out. "That I am saved from Queen's Crawley! From those miserable children! From Pitt's clammy hands! Oh, I'm so happy! For the first time, I'm happy again!"

A knock at the door checked her raptures. Dobbin entered. His face was stern. He ignored Becky's outstretched hand. Joseph, he said to Amelia, had told him of her invitation to Becky.

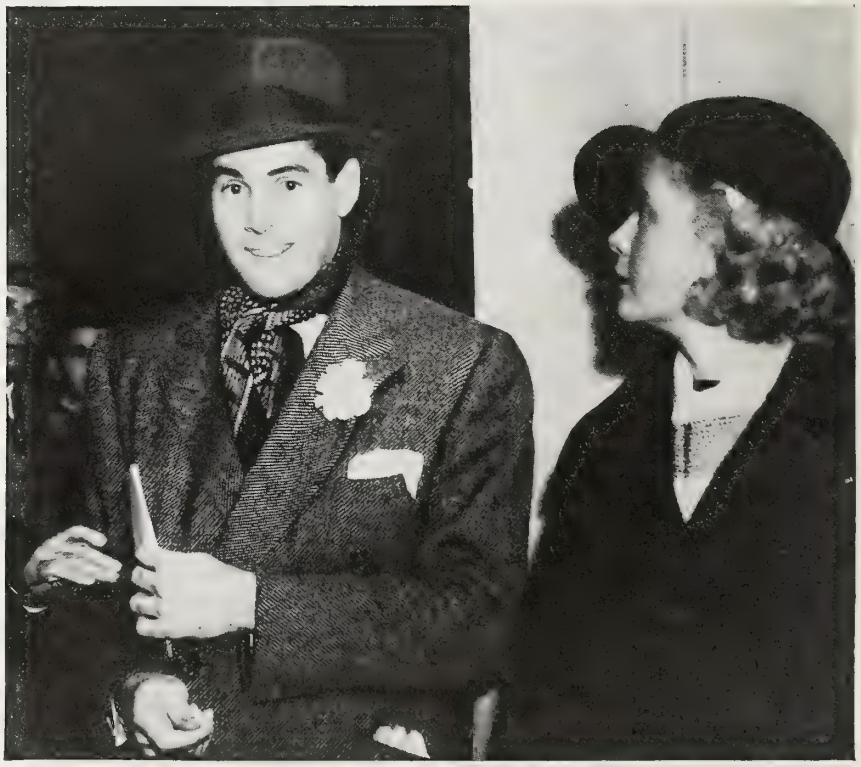
"Yes, I have asked my oldest friend to live with me," she said.

"She was not always a friend to you!"

"I don't care to remember that," Amelia said proudly. "Becky needs my help."

"Even if it should mean the end of our friendship?"

Amelia trembled. "William, I must do what is right!"



Stunned, Dobbin gazed at her. Then he bowed, and went out.

Becky drew a long, relieved breath. "Now he is out of your life!" she exulted. "We're alone together, you and I! What are you crying about?" she demanded, as Amelia covered her face with her hands. "You're in love with the man! You can't live without him!" She laughed scornfully. "And there go my hopes!"

"No, no!" Amelia protested.

"Oh, yes! It's just as well. . . . I know what it would come to. . . . Go, get back your Dobbin. Marry him. Be happy!"

"I couldn't—forget George!"

Jean Muir may claim she's a wallflower but Scotty caught her out with her current best, Phillip Reed.

"George!" Becky rummaged in a table drawer for the letter kept as a weapon or a tool. "Here, read this, he made love to me a week after he married you! He wrote this to me! Your husband! Now you know!"

She stood in the doorway watching Amelia, as, still sobbing, she stumbled down the stairs. Well, she had done one good deed for Amelia! Now there was nothing left for her but—Pitt!

"What's this?" Joseph came hurrying up to Becky. "Emmy going to marry Dobbin? Why, that's beautiful!"

Becky went close to him. "Would you like to be as happy?" she ventured. She urged him to sit down. Brought crackers, cheese and brandy. "Do you like brandy, Joseph?" she asked, with all the air of the old, beguiling Becky.

"How would it sit with the beer in me?" Joseph giggled. What a woman, he thought. What a marvellous woman, to be merry in a place like this! He was glad he had done something for her. "Becky," he leaned toward her, "your bills are paid! Joseph Sedley is no miser!"

"Dear Jos!" This was unexpected.

"Come closer," he urged, his arm about her. "Oh, Becky, maybe you're a widow! Let's go back to England and find out—and then—I'll make you my widow next!"

"Jos! You frighten me!" She was becoming coy. Then she tensed. Footsteps on the stairs. "It's Sir Pitt and Lady Jane"! she gasped. "They've come to take me to church!"

"Lock the door!" Joseph cried.

"What shall I do with you?" She flew to lock it.

"Lock me up, too!" He grinned rapturously. "Forever!"

"You delightful man!" Becky thrust him behind a screen. "Wait for me! I'll get the money from Sir Pitt. Then you and I . . ."

"I'll wait!" Joseph kissed her warm, red lips. "Forever!"

"We thought there was someone with you," Pitt said as she opened the door. "Are you quite alone?"

"Oh, quite!" Becky sighed mournfully. "Always alone."

"Come, we shall be late for the service." Lady Jane and Pitt stepped out through the door.

Becky turned toward the screen. "Oh, the joy of it," she said loudly. "I know that a new life is about to begin for me. The happiness of those who——"

Joseph's head appeared above the screen. He threw her a kiss.

"——wait patiently!" Becky gave him a roguish, adoring glance.

Then she flew out the door.

IF your physical let-down is caused by a lowered red-blood-cell and hemo-glo-bin content in the blood—then S.S.S. is waiting to help you . . . though, if you suspect an organic trouble, you will, of course, want to consult a physician or surgeon.

S.S.S. is not just a so-called tonic. It is a tonic specially designed to stimulate gastric secretions, and also has the mineral elements so very, very necessary in rebuilding the oxygen-carrying hemo-glo-bin of the blood.

This two-fold purpose is important. Digestion is improved . . . food is better utilized . . . and thus you are enabled to better "carry on" without exhaustion—as you should.

You may have the will-power to be "up and doing" but unless your blood is in top notch form you are not fully yourself and you may remark, "I wonder why I tire so easily."

Let S.S.S. help build back your blood tone . . . if your case is not exceptional, you should soon enjoy again the satisfaction of appetizing food . . . sound sleep . . . steady nerves . . . a good complexion . . . and renewed strength.

S.S.S. is sold by all drug stores in two convenient sizes. The $2 economy size is twice as large as the $1.25 regular size and is sufficient for two weeks treatment. Begin on the uproad today.

Do not be blinded by the efforts of a few unethical dealers who may suggest that you gamble with substitutes. You have a right to insist that S.S.S. be supplied you on request. Its long years of preference is your guarantee of satisfaction.

Makes you feel like yourself again

young-man-about-Hollywood. My social life is practically nil. It has to be. Hollywood is a factory! Your whole life is wrapped up in work from early morning until late at night. The little time there is for recreation is spent "talking shop"—everyone does, you have to join in, regardless of how tired of it all you may be.

"Why, you wouldn't believe it, if I described to you a typical evening of relaxation in Hollywood. It goes something like this. You've been invited to a dinner party. You race home from the studio, dog-tired—you manage to get a shower, get into a dinner jacket and sprint to your hostess' house before the butler announces dinner. If you arrive in time for a cocktail, you down two or three to get yourself into a slightly festive frame of mind. Dinner is announced and you sneak your cocktail to the table with you in the hope of sustaining the little animation you now feel. The minute you are seated, your partner asks you how production is going on your new picture. Wearily you tell her, then politely ask her how are tricks on her set. In no time, everyone (they've all been waiting for their turn) is launched into their own song and dance on work.

"As the dinner wears on, your glow wears off—and so does that of everyone else. By the end of dinner conversation is at a standstill so the hostess hurries you into her projection room to show you the rushes on her newest picture—or someone else's newest picture. This starts Hollywood's conversational ball rolling again. After you've seen the picture, you return to the living-room and sit about discussing its merit or lack of it. Your hostess serves highballs and soon everyone starts saying good-night because he or she has to be at the studio in the morning."

"But what of romantic interests for the eligible Hollywood bachelor, such as you?" I asked. Gene has been rumored interested in this one and that one, but never seems to get himself committed seriously.

"Hollywood ruins friendships! You can't be seen with a girl more than a few times before every gossip column has you headed for Yuma. You never get to find out," he continued, "whether or not you might feel romantic about any particular person because you or she are scared off before you have had two dates together. There were several girls that I liked tremendously and would like to have felt free to call up now and then, but after I had gone out with them a few times, everybody was calling it a match. Then when I called back, they began to be very busy. They didn't want to be linked romantically with me anymore than I did with them. They would have enjoyed a good average friendship but Hollywood never gave us a break!"

I remembered how often Janet Gaynor's name had been linked with Gene's and I wondered if she was another good friendship gone Hollywood!

"Don't you miss the stage?" I asked.

"Yes, very much. In fact, I have had a play in mind for sometime that I have wanted to do but no opportunity has presented itself as yet. Perhaps next year, at least, I hope so."

NO amount of picture success will ever wean Gene from his first love, the stage. And it is quite understandable when you realize that he had been on the stage ever since he was five years old, up to the time he went out to Hollywood. His first work was with a stock company.

His first important stage appearance did not occur until 1924 when he appeared in "The Potters." This play ran for two years in New York and on the road, and by the end of its run, Raymond Guion's name was known. He played parts in a number of hits between the closing of "The Potters" and the opening of "Young Sinners." The latter was his play; for the first time he didn't have to share the spotlight with any veterans of the stage, he was a full-fledged star and he made the most of his chance. It was during the two years that this ran along, that Hollywood noticed him.

Gene has turned in consistently good performances in his past few years in Hollywood; he's one of the most popular of the leading men. However, he has some interesting viewpoints on his career.

"The reason I want to get back to the stage soon is because I don't want to lose ambition. Hollywood does that to young stars. You see, the psychology is all wrong. You make, say, a hundred thousand dollars for a year, but instead of returning to the stage for awhile, you figure that you better wait until next year, when you can probably make two hundred thousand dollars. That would leave you in better shape to take a flop on Broadway, should it turn out that way.

YOU know," Gene continued, "an actor needs to get away from his work at the studio when a picture is finished. It's bad business to hang around Hollywood when you're at leisure. You have to get away to get some perspective on yourself. You know a chap who manages to do it to perfection? That's Clark Gable. Clark finishes a picture, goes home and packs his stuff for a trip. He doesn't linger around, he gets just as far away as he can and I tell you, he is one of the most regular people in the industry.

"I'll never forget the riot he let Ria, his wife, and me in for on a trip West one time. I was returning to the Coast and discovered that Clark and Mrs. Gable were on the same train. They were going to stop off in St. Louis for a personal appearance that was scheduled for Clark. I kidded Clark all the way out about having to interrupt a vacation with stuffy personal appearances. He just grinned good-naturedly.

"And then, when we reached St. Louis, I discovered that my baggage was following theirs. Clark had quietly arranged for me to be shanghaied into an appearance with him!

"After St. Louis had been treated to a personal appearance of two stars for the price of one, Clark was mobbed by the fans. So in going back to the train, Mrs. Gable and I walked nonchalantly along with one policeman as guard, while a whole force was trying to quell the riot around Clark. Ria and I were chuckling at his discomfort and in no way trying to aid him. Well, everything was swell, until the fans and police had pushed Clark safely inside the train gates. Then, in turning around, they recognized me. With shouts of "There's Gene Raymond and his wife!" The gang turned on us and our one lone police escort. The last glimpse we had of Clark was a hand gingerly raised to the nose, as he loped down the platform and into our car, leaving us to fight our way after him with no help from his departed police guard!"

Gene was dashing off to see Leslie Howard in "The Petrified Forest," so we gulped down the last of our lunch and raced for a cab. "Good-bye and I hope to heaven that I haven't sounded like the earnest young actor or something. It was great seeing you again and let's be sure to get together on my next trip back. Maybe I'll be sending you orchestra seats to my playing opening by then, who knows?"

Modern Screen Dramatic School

dramatic school. Discover for yourself—and you must use your ingenuity to do so—where are the summer stock companies or first-rate Little Theatres near you and try to get work—no matter in how small a role—with them.

Naturalness is the keynote of good acting, it is true, but you must know the mechanics of acting first. A very great actor once told me that the best rule was "Learn all the rules, all the tricks, all the technique—and then forget them." Now why, you ask, should one learn the tricks? Because they give you a background, a basis upon which to work, upon which to develop your own technique, a technique which will give the effect of naturalness.

If you are fortunate enough to connect with some Little Theatre or stock company you will meet people, make contacts with the directors, who will be able to advise you about real professional work. These contacts are valuable. They open the door for you.

TO SHOW you that there are no absolute rules concerning the journey to success let me tell you the various ways in which the big stars broke into pictures.

If ever there were an inspiration to those who are discouraged, Clark Gable is that inspiration. How he studied! How he worked with his voice! How many bitter heartaches he has known! One evening he saw a performance of a certain play. He knew, that night, that he must become an actor. He applied for work numberless times before he finally got a small role. He was in and out of the theatre a dozen times. And when, at last, he came to Hollywood he was ignored for years. He had innumerable tests for roles which he didn't get. He played many, many roles—and played them badly. And then he did one role which caught on. He gave a few moments to the screen which excited the public and he was a success.

And there are other routes not so arduous. Take little Betty Furness, for instance. In summer, during her school holidays, she posed for commercial advertising. One of the artists for whom she worked thought she was picture material. He had a friend who worked for a studio. He got a test for Betty. She looked charming in the test and showed the vital spark. So she got a Hollywood contract.

Narrowed down, the elements of success are: natural ability and technical knowledge, plus someone who knows someone who puts you on the right road to making theatrical contacts, plus enormous talent, energy, will power and good health and ambition to forge ahead and make the most of the first break.

I cannot tell you how all this is done. No one can tell you. You must work out your own salvation. You must use your ingenuity and you must steel yourself to expects failure.

Don't forget that I am ready to answer your personal problems. Please tell me what you want included in these pages which will help you to gain a knowledge of dramatic art. And more power to the dramatic clubs. Tell me how you're getting on and let me help you with your productions whenever you need me. WHAT EVERY WOMAN SHOULD KNOW

—yet 8 out of 10 don't

EVERY woman should recognize this fact: Nothing ages the face more than the wrong powder, crudely put on. Often it adds 5 to 10 years.

Every woman should know how to powder, yet many don't. And all should know about one ultra-modern powder that actually subtracts years, giving the complexion a youthful, fresh glow that is adorable—natural. It is superior because of an exclusive process—it's stratified (rolled into tiny, clinging wafers). Hence no grit. Its delicate texture blends softly into the skin, lasts infinitely longer—conceals pores, but cannot enlarge them.

The name of this sensational new powder that is being welcomed all over the country is SOFT-TONE Mello-glo, so flattering and youthifying.

It meets the latest French vogue of powdering to look un-powdered, now widely advocated by American beauty experts. It stands the severest "close-up" inspection—flat and shineless—as your mirror will agree.

The new SOFT-TONE Mello-glo is presented in five flattering shades, caressingly perfumed, 50c and $1. Buy a box today. See how quickly this super-powder makes you look younger, more natural.

NOTE: To obtain the new SOFT-TONE Mello-glo, you must ask for the gold box with the blue edge, which distinguishes it from our Facial-tone Mello-glo (Heavy) in gold box with white edge.

THE NEW VOGUE IN POWDERING

Free

The first and only book on powdering, entitled "The New Vogue in Powdering." It shows how to look your best. The Beauty Editor of Vogue calls it, "An utterly new technique of powdering called Mello-glo Modeling." How to attain the complexion effect all men adore. How to accent or reduce the nose or chin, etc. How to mold your face. You can become the mistress of the fine art of proper powdering. Merely mail coupon for free book.

part a healthy circulation plays in the acquiring of a glowing, petal-smooth skin. I asked Madge what she used for cleansing her skin, and I kept my fingers crossed until she said cleansing cream and soap and a complexion brush. Her skin was so radiant that I would almost have been willing to wager that she used all three of the cleansing aids, with especial stress on the complexion brush in the interests of a vital, vigorous circulation. She uses a small brush with a rotary motion which gives her grand facial exercise. Of course, she gets plenty of sunshine and fresh air tonic, and outdoor exercise, too. She loves to swim and ride, and the beaches and bridle paths see her often. Perfect health always reflects itself in one's complexion.

Most of us aren't fortunate enough to have the California sunshine, and the opportunity for swimming and riding. However, now that spring is here, we can all plan some sort of definite exercise program, even if it's only walking and "a daily dozen" exercising. I'll help you if you'll write me. The exercises I give you are selected from those recommended by the finest physical culture authorities in this country.

DEAR Miss Biddle: I'm desperate. What CAN I do about my complexion?" That's the theme song of many a letter that you write me. I think that in some cases the best possible complexion aid that I could suggest would be an electric shock every time you reach for candy, or another piece of cake, or any form of heavy pastry. Or maybe a more sugar-coated method would be to pretend you're a Madge Evans who honestly doesn't care for sweets of any kind. She really doesn't. Even as a child, she wasn't susceptible to candy bribes. And if you're susceptible to a good complexion bribe, you'll swear off too many sweets.

Madge is fortunate enough to have been born with naturally curly hair, but she has worked hard at keeping it lovely. That's a mighty valuable point for mothers to consider. As a matter of fact, the rules for children's hair health and beauty are the same as for grown-ups: plenty of sunshine and fresh air, frequent shampooing, and brushing, brushing, brushing. If more children acquired the hairbrush habit along with the toothbrush habit, there'd be a lot more crowning glories all along the line. Brushing helps to cultivate the natural wave in one's hair. Oh, I know you've heard that before but I doubt whether you've tried it. If you or your daughter have a tendency to naturally wavy hair, you can brush that tendency right into a stubborn curling streak. I've found the very hairbrush to do it, which I'll be glad to tell you about upon your request.

The other day I received a letter from a reader saying that she had naturally wavy hair on top, but that the ends and the back part refused to curl. She wanted to know if she should resort to a permanent. Well, if she did, she might ruin her natural wave; and it seems to me that with the many excellent waving lotions we have on the market, and the type of curlers that are not only effective, but comfortable to sleep on at night, we have the right solution for the treatment of partially wavy hair.

I have set myself to work to outline some common sense, strictly practical advice for you on "what to do about your hair." I've gone over my experiences and studies of the past years; I've interviewed outstanding hair and scalp specialists; and I've put down in black and white the gist of what you can do for your hair if it's too oily or too dry or too drab . . . or you name it! What's your trouble? I have this information available for you in multigraphed form, and it's yours for the asking and a stamped, self-addressed envelope. And, as usual, I'm at your service to help you with any other beauty problems that confront you. And a Happy Easter to you!

The Woman in His Life

break apart. But my religion forbids divorce. Marriage, I have been taught, is a holy thing. That is why, in Europe, we frown upon divorce and yet you will find that love is given full opportunity despite the restrictions of marriage and convention."

I saw a strange cloud pass across his face. Written upon his features was a curious emotion which I was then unable to read. There was a long silence.

At last he said, "I know what it is to love and to find that love handicapped because convention looks askance upon romance when the loved one is married."

And then the story—or as much of the story as Tullio could tell—poured out. And I realized the greatness of that love, or Tullio could not be so content with the few crumbs tossed him.

He met her many years ago. She was beautiful, gracious, charming. At that time Tullio was in the throes of discouragements and disappointments. He thought his career was going badly. He was afraid that he would never be the actor his ambition told him he might be. It was during that troubled time that he met her, and she with her great woman's wisdom helped him over his doubts and fears, advised him and helped him with his career. And he fell in love with her.

KNOWING she was married, Tullio was determined that he would not mention his love to her. And then he began to know—not through words, but through those slight gestures, the turn of her head, the interest in her eyes, all those mystic encounters apparent only to the lover—that she loved him, too.

For months they did not speak, but when they met their eyes told each other what they dared not say. And then at last they could refrain from a declaration of love no longer.

When this tremendous fact was at last shared by them they talked it over as calmly as two people desperately in love can talk to each other. Her religion and Tullio's forbade divorce. They were destined, they knew, to be victimized by unrequited love. There was no other way, but their affection is so great that it lasts on and on.

She is of high birth. Her name and reputation must remain beyond reproach. So when, for a few brief moments, they meet there is always a chaperon present.

"Occasionally I write to her. And sometimes, she will reply," Tullio said. "I see her when I am abroad or when she is here. But at all times I know and realize that she loves me and that some day, some time, I will be able to go to her, to acknowledge to the world that she is the one woman I love.

"And this explains why I am content to live here, alone, happy in those few days when she comes to America or when I can go to Europe to see her."

Although I cannot tell you her name I can reveal this much. She has a title. Her husband is an important dignitary and she is widely known abroad for her kindness and her many charities.

This calm acceptance of the marriage code on Tullio's part, this bowing to a convention when he is so obviously and deeply in love amazed me. He is a fiery, vivid Dalmatian. How is it possible, then, for him to sit back quietly knowing that the woman he loves is married to another?

CONVENTION forbids a divorce. In certain European circles, you see, society will condone an occasional indiscretion, but it will not forgive divorce. Yet here society will forgive divorce and chastise the indiscreet.

"That is why I cannot understand Hollywood. I feel that divorce is too free, much too easy. Somehow, despite an occasional slip from the path of convention, I feel that marriage is too beautiful a thing to be broken easily.

"And my personal case has nothing to do with my views. A marriage, perhaps, may be easily broken when there are no children or close ties, other than the enforced intimacy of living together. But when there are children, the family becomes important.

"Unless the parents are so temperamentally unbalanced as to make their lives together most difficult they should forget occasional differences and adjust themselves to furthering the happiness of their children. That, to me, is most important. If they then wish to find love elsewhere, they can do so. They can still be happy in their home life and find the need for romance satisfied elsewhere. That is not indiscretion—that is common sense."

"And this woman you love? When will you see her again?" I asked

He shrugged his shoulders. His is a great patience. "I do not know," he said, "but when I do we will know what we have always known. She will still love me and I will feel toward her exactly as I did when I first met her."

So, even though they meet so seldom, even though there are only occasional letters, she is a part of his life. She is the keeper of his heart. He can go on year after year alone because he knows that they have a love which "passeth understanding."

And I wonder if, when Tullio enfolds some glamorous screen star in his arms as the cameras click before them, the star ceases to exist and in her stead he imagines that he is holding the beautiful, titled, glamorous woman he loves.

Six Months in Hell

maestro and throat specialist for the Metropolitan. Grace had always dreamed of coming under the tutelage of this man who had coached Caruso, Scotti, Mary Garden, and so many other great ones. And now this country girl waited in his office with a voice that couldn't speak.

But her eyes begged. There was nothing, the girl informed her, that she could do. The doctor's time was completely booked. He couldn't spare a moment for the next three days.

Three days! Grace scrawled a note to ask if she could wait in the outer office. He might have just one spare moment for her.

The girl tapped her on the shoulder. It was time to close the office. Grace clutched the collar of her coat about her throat and trudged home.

Next morning she was back. Another long weary day of waiting. But she was more resigned now. She didn't jump nervously every time footsteps approached close to the door inside of the studio office. The doctor, she was told, always came and went by another entrance.

On the afternoon of the third day, the information girl did something that almost cost her her job. New to the position, she was naturally fearful lest she do something to cause the disfavor of her temperamental boss. The sight of that silent young lady sitting there hour after hour finally became too much. She marched into the studio and asked Dr. Marafioti to see the persistent woman.

Afterwards, Dr. Marafioti upbraided her mercilessly for not telling him about her before.

There is nothing so touching as eyes lifted up to receive a verdict that may mean life or death. Dr. Marafioti's wooden expression didn't relax. He stared for long minutes into her throat. Then he straightened up, took off his headlight, carefully laid aside the laryngeal mirror, and drew up a chair and sat down.

THERE is just one chance in a thousand," he growled, "that you can ever sing again."

A clock ticked in the cold silence. The brave smile that suddenly froze on Grace's lips was more tragic than a flood of tears.

"One chance in a thousand," the accented voice droned on. "And you'll never take it."

Grace had no need of language to ask the next question. The reply was brief.

"Absolute silence. You must not even whisper for the next six months."

Gretchen Smidt was the faithful companion and housekeeper for a courageous young lady who didn't utter a sound for six long months. These two women lived alone on Petite Beouf Island, one of the Thousand Islands in the St. Lawrence River.

It is there that Grace Moore went on the second day after leaving the doctor's studio. Her gypsy feet insisted that she go some place where she had never been before. She wired home for funds, secured a housekeeper, packed a few things, and caught the train.

It was a lonely spot. But for Grace it is rich in memories. It is there that she made the acquaintance of one who, for lack of a better term, we might call her spiritual affinity. But this is getting ahead of our story.

IT was bitterly cold. At night she would lie in her bed listening to the gentle lapping of water against the pebbles on the shore and the symphony of the wind in the pines. It was the language of nature that her sensitive ear understood. But at first, on those nights, she would suddenly start up in a cold sweat. One chance in a thousand! What if she never regained her voice? What if this sacrifice proved in vain?

Dr. Marafioti had pronounced it a temporary paralysis brought on by overstraining her vocal cords. She had been singing the wrong sort of way. The question was, would they ever come back to normal?

This uncertainty constantly plagued her mind and clutched icy fingers about her heart, but she became accustomed even to that. So she played the piano, and trudged about her tiny domain in the snow, studied her French, and read the novels she had brought along.

It was in a French novel that she met her—that phantom creature from long ago who was thereafter destined to be her intimate companion in so many solitary moments of her life. Philomela was the daughter of a legendary king of ancient Greece. Her beauty and charm made her beloved by every young man of the kingdom. Her sisters, in a fit of jealousy, poked out her eyes. But this did not alter her disposition and the magic of her voice still held sway over the hearts of men. The sisters hired slaves to tear out her tongue. Zeus, looking down from Olympus, took pity on the girl and changed her into a nightingale. Thereafter she sang to lovers as they whispered at night.

Back in the deafening rush and roar of New York, Grace Moore sped to the studio of Dr. Marafioti. Her first words were: "I did it." Then she wept.

"I knew immediately," Dr. Marafioti told me a few days ago, "that anyone who had the courage and determination to go through an ordeal like that was bound to be famous."

Grace was overjoyed when the great maestro insisted that she become his pupil. They worked easily. He had her sing naturally, without effort. The luminous carpet of fame gradually unfolded before her feet to lead from triumph to triumph. The crown of thorns was changed for a crown of laurel.

But there, high up at her penthouse party, that look of tragic amusement brought back, I fancy, the shades of that princess from long ago. She seems to smile when people are happy.

You Ought To Be in Pictures

to meet the director of the picture. What a cinch I thought. Is this all there is to breaking into the movies? Two days in Hollywood and already on my way to big things. Why didn't I come out here sooner?

But (my first but) when I met the director I was not the type he was looking for. This staggered me a bit, but I took it on the chin—there were other jobs. There were, no doubt, but I was never quite the type. Naturally, after a time, when the agent found he couldn't sell me, he forgot all about me.

"Oh, well," I thought, "I can find another." I did, but when they found that I had but little experience, they did not wish to handle me. It did not take me long to find out that the only reason the one agent even bothered with me at first was as a favor to my father. All right! Since no reputable agent wanted me, I'd get to the studio casting directors direct. I'd stand on my own feet. The only satisfaction I got was "I'll keep you in mind, Paul." What a poor memory those guys must have.

As one hope after another dwindled and faded, my fine resolve to ask no favors collapsed like a pricked balloon. I began clutching at straws.

I had the entrée—through my father—to almost anyone in Hollywood I wanted to see. Not only casting directors but writers, directors, producers. A lot of good it did me. I've almost come to the conclusion that "pull" hinders more than it helps.

Finally, against Dad's advice, I managed to secure some extra work. I was convinced, in my own mind, that if I watched every scene being made, instead of playing bridge or gossiping as most extras do, the directors would notice me and wonder who the boy was who was so determined to learn the technique of picture-making and acting. It didn't take me long, however, to discover that although I learned something by watching

"Don't look now, but who is that?" Maybe that's what Elsa Lanchester Laughton is saying to husband, Charles!

- - - - - - - - THAT CAN DO WONDERS FOR YOUR HAIR!

Here is the new great sensation of the world, EVANS ELECTRIC COMB, the "Live" Comb which has such a remarkable power of stimulating the hair—in fact, of giving new life to the hair roots. The gentle electric current in the Evans Comb acts upon the hair as water on parched plants, thus stimulating the hair roots to renewed activity.

Here are the results reported by delighted users:

IN MANY CASES OF PREMATURE BALD SPOTS the condition has improved as through a miracle.

DRY, DULL HAIR GAINED NEW LIFE; became wonderfully lustrous.

STRAIGHT AND THIN HAIR gets thick . . . glistening . . . soft . . . wavy. . . .

DANDRUFF AND FALLING HAIR have been checked in a few days. You and your friends will be equally surprised at the health and beauty of your hair.

TOO GOOD TO BE TRUE! This is perhaps your comment on reading the above claims, but we have received thousands of letters which prove that Evans Comb really has worked wonders. European specialists explain this miraculous phenomena thus:—that the gentle, shockless electric current passing from the battery through the teeth of the comb to your hair and scalp is able to reach the weakened hair roots—literally pouring its life-giving energy over them, waking them up and stimulating them. Over one million Evans Electric Combs are now being used by men and women all over the world. The electric current is generated by a battery concealed in the handle of the comb. NO SHOCKS—NO SPARKS. You cannot feel the current, but if you put a pocket lamp bulb against the teeth you will see it light up. The battery lasts several months—spare battery costs only a few cents. Thus at a cost of only about 5c a month you get a hair treatment which otherwise would cost you hundreds of dollars per year.

Some women still suffer regularly; martyrs to the time of month.

Others have put this martyrdom behind them. The days they used to dread are just a memory. They approach this time without any fear. They pass it without the old discomfort.

Midol has made periodic pain a thing of the past for many, many women.

"Oh, yes," say some who have read about it, and heard about it, "but my suffering is so severe, and I've tried so many things that didn't help! Midol may not end all the pain for me."

True, there are women who are not relieved of every trace of pain when they take these tablets. But they get such a large measure of relief that they are quite comfortable in comparison. And the comfort is not momentary, not an interlude, but sustained comfort from the start.

The best time to begin with Midol is before any discomfort is felt. You may escape all pain. You are sure to have an easier time. The action of this medicine is effective for hours, and two tablets should see you through your worst day.

Why postpone this comfort another month? One reason some women still hesitate to try Midol is their doubt of its being as effective as advertised. Doubters should just ask anyone who has tried it! Another reason for hesitating to take these tablets is the fear that Midol may be a narcotic. It is not.

The next time you are in a drug store, pick up a package of Midol. You'll find it on the counter. If not, just ask for Midol.

the stars work, the directors were also busy watching them and never even knew I was on the lot.

I had been told, over and over again, to "get into a show, let 'em see what you can do, that's the only chance a beginner has to land a movie job." There are plenty of shows produced both in Hollywood and Los Angeles and they are considered the ideal "show windows" for movie engagements. I was off on a new track. I didn't overlook a chance. Dramatic agents, leads from friends, rumors, ads from papers. And it was here my fun really began. Ten cheap rackets to one legitimate proposition.

"Casting for Musical Comedy. Wanted: actors, singers and dancers." From a local newspaper.

I WENT to the address designated. Their well-furnished offices were staffed with courteous attendants to disarm the "suckers." The agent was sure I was just the type they were looking for—I have since found out that everybody is. The salary was satisfactory. He also informed me they were negotiating with a prominent movie star for the leading role.

Later, when I returned to meet the producer of the show, I found them making the selections for show girls. There must have been at least seventy-five of them. Many were pretty enough for any musical but some were not so hot. I noticed, however, that none of them were rejected.

My interview with the producer was most satisfactory. The job was mine. He now explained to the entire cast of at least one hundred, that the show was a patriotic musical extravaganza, backed by an angel with unlimited money and sanctioned by the United States government as propaganda for the Naval Air Corps. Rehearsals would start in two weeks.

We were warned, under no conditions, to speak of the show to anyone. They wanted no publicity until they were ready to release their own. I couldn't quite see the reason of this secrecy, but the mention of the U. S. Naval Air Corps gave it an authentic ring. I had a job.

The two weeks finally dragged by, and I received my rehearsal call on the phone and would I please come down that evening to sign the contract. Would I? Rather.

In relays of six, we were ushered into the presence of the producer and the agent. The agent had given up his office and had become business manager for the show. Swell, I thought. If a man will give up a well-established business to manage a show, it must be going places.

We were told that the show would open in Seattle in six weeks, but (our old friend "but") the "angel" had died since our last interview. The producer's own funds were in liquidation and, rather than postpone the opening or allow an outsider to buy into a sure gold mine, and so on; here was his proposition: For $10.00 we could each buy a share in the show. This money was to be used to finance the rehearsals and fares to the opening, and which would be returned to us after that opening. In other words the show was ours until it made money.

A number fell for it. I didn't commit myself, but when I got home and figured that at $10.00 a throw for, say, one hundred people he'd realize approximately a "grand," I took off my hat to his pretty little racket but kept my hand in my pocket.

The show never opened. Later I met the "prominent movie star." She had never heard of it. But a month later I saw another ad of theirs with a new address and the ball no doubt started rolling again.

A LITTLE more suspicious and, like Oliver Twist ready to come back for more, I started off again. A friend told me that a certain manager was casting a new show and looking for a juvenile. Hot on the scent, I lost no time in getting to the manager's office. I was welcomed into the gentleman's private office and, maybe you've guessed it, proved to be the type he was looking for. In fact, the job was mine, but, "would I mind returning later to read the part for the backer?" Of course, I had no objection.

The following evening I returned, but discovered it was a general reading and I was not the only one to read "my part." My surprised look was answered with the whispered reassurance that this was only a matter of form. I read "satisfactorily" and the job was mine.

On being told to report for rehearsals the next week I asked if I could have a copy of my part so as to study it meanwhile. Gladly, only a few minor changes were being made in the manuscript and the clean copies wouldn't be ready for awhile.

I accepted the explanation and reported for rehearsals when called. I found the room crowded with aspirants, surely the cast wasn't that large. I soon found out. There were at least six for each role, and before being given our typed "parts" it was explained that they had lost so many copies in the past that it was necessary to charge a nominal sum for them. Not much, just $2.50 to cover the cost of paper and typing. When you figure one hundred applicants at $2.50 each it means $250. Chicken feed, maybe, but not bad for five days work. Racket Number 2.

So much for the alleged producer. How about the shyster agent? He also comes in for his cuts. He is entitled to 10 percent of your salary as a commission. On small jobs this naturally wouldn't net him much but he has his ace in the hole, too. He confidentially informs you that he knows of a certain job that so and so (another agent) is filling, but that that agent has no one on his list of actors suitable for the part. Now, "I'll land it for you, but, of course, so and so (the other agent) must have his 10 percent, too." You fall because you want the job.

Of course, there is no other agent involved at all and he quietly takes 20 per cent. There are cases I've met where more than two supposed agents are involved and though the job pays $25.00 per day, by the time you've paid three or four 10 per cents, car fare is about all you have left. But the eternal hope that it will "lead to something better" always brings you up smiling and ready for more.

And how about the cheap movie producer? Well—here's one racket I encountered. I heard that a small independent motion picture company was interviewing young people for a series of Collegiate Shorts. Being somewhat of the accepted "collegiate" type I figured here was a job up my alley. I went to their offices which looked to be more or less of a temporary nature. There was no difficulty about seeing the casting director. Oh, yes! I was the type all right. Would I bring a few photos of myself to show the producer? Yes indeed I would —and did.

He thought them "quite fair BUT," but he was most anxious that I get the part, and to clinch it with the producer, advised my having new ones taken in poses characteristic of the part wanted. It was very fortunate that they had on their lot a photographer who knew just what was needed. He could get him at a very cheap price, since he would take them in the evening outside of his regular hours, at $8.00 a dozen.

I did some rapid thinking. Why jeopardize my chances of landing the job for want of proper photos? I made the appointment for the following evening and thanked him for putting me wise.

WHEN I got on to the studio stage, where the pictures were to be taken, I found a mob of collegians and co-eds there, in fact, it looked like a sophomore prom. I did some calculation (I was always figuring)—75 sophomores at $8.00 per throw, not bad. I decided to wait for the senior prom!

Later, I had a chance to compare notes with one of the fair co-eds, who had fallen for it, and all she had to show for her eight dollars were twelve "photomaton" pictures—but no job. The company "postponed production."

One day a friend of mine suggested that there was still one avenue open to me which in many cases had led right up to and through the studio doors—it was radio! An idea! I had often been told and I believed it, that I had a good speaking voice. I took up the scent. Again the old ad appeared in the paper. "Wanted. Talented young radio performers. Must be exceptionally good."

We all know that we are exceptionally good. My first interview with the casting director was most cordial, almost gushing. I wasn't told "just the type" but a variation of the gag—"A radio personality if I ever saw one."

He outlined the proposition to me: "We are organizing a company of talented players to present thirty-minute sketches over a coast network. These programs will be sponsored by (here he mentioned the name of a reputable manufacturing concern) and the first three are in the nature of a trial. If satisfactory to the sponsor, they will contract the program for a year. Naturally, we are not paid for these preliminary broadcasts; but I can tell you that with the plays we have outlined, that contract is as good as signed now. I have you in mind for the juvenile lead."

The company was to be made up of "new voices" (that's what is wanted) and the lack of experience was no handicap since he had engaged a well-known radio dramatic director to rehearse the people. But—this director was a high-priced man, and so he was obliged to charge each applicant $2.50 a rehearsal. This rehearsal period was to last from three to five weeks. When I asked him if he would give me a contract, he replied that there was no question in his mind that of all the applicants I was the man he wanted, still as a matter of form he would have to allow a few others to rehearse. Here was the same old game. I bowed out.

I heard the sequel to this a few months later. They did rehearse—some thirty of them. They did have an audition on some small, out-of-the-way station. The time probably had been only too gladly given the producer to break the monotony of the regular twelve-hour phonograph record broadcasts. Whether the "sponsor" listened in will always be in doubt, but the producer announced that the contract was pending. It still is. I got my trusty pencil again—thirty people, two rehearsals a week at $2.50 per for five weeks equals $750. Not big but not bad.

The count on me by this time was somewhere around nine but I came up for one more blow before my knees buckled. This ad merely said, "Wanted. Radio Performers." The very brevity of it seemed to guarantee professional stability. I was

Pay no attention to them ..get the real facts yourself

JUST as though it were about something of slight importance, this tossing back and forth of hearsay goes on and on—among women. "Hearsay" or "misinformation," which is it? The two words are really synonymous when this most serious subject of feminine hygiene is being discussed. Don't pay any attention to all the worthless talk. Here are the real facts.

There has been a sweeping change in the whole idea of feminine hygiene. Many women, otherwise modern, are surprisingly unaware of this. The change is in the antiseptic.

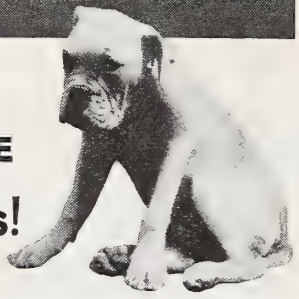
Zonite is safe and strong

In the field of antiseptics there is an improvement which is breath-taking in its benefit to women. Do you know Zonite? This remarkable antiseptic-germicide is as gentle as pure water upon the human tissues. And it is far more powerful than any dilution of carbolic acid that may be safely allowed on the human body.

A generation ago it would have seemed incredible that an antiseptic like Zonite could exist. In those days the only germicides powerful enough for feminine hygiene were caustic and poisonous. Yet here is this marvelous Zonite now available to every woman in America!

Zonite is strong and Zonite is safe. Zonite will never harm any woman, never cause any damage to sensitive tissues, never leave an area of scar tissue. On the contrary, Zonite is gentle and soothing in its action. Sold at all drug stores, in bottles, at 30¢, 60¢ and $1.00.

Zonite Suppositories Also Sold



Zonite also comes in semi-solid forms called Zonite Suppositories and your druggist has these for sale, at $1.00 for a box of a dozen. Zonite Suppositories are dainty, white and greaseless. Each is hygienically sealed in its own glass vial.

given a short audition, which was satisfactory enough to warrant a more extended one. This was to be an electrical transcription to present me to a producer assembling a program sponsored by a nationally known product. This "electrical transcription"—you've guessed it—cost $5.00. The finished article—a 25 cent phonograph record. When I came to, the arena was empty.

What am I doing now? I'll tell you. I know I have the "sesame" to open those mysterious studio gates. I am writing a movie scenario. There is a part in it (and one that can't be cut) the physical counterpart of myself—even to the extracted right molar and the plot depends on that cavity. There is only one "BUT" to this—But will they buy it? The script, I mean. They should. They can get me with it at a very small additional cost or maybe no extra cost at all. And I ought to be in pictures, oughtn't I? My friends all told me so.

Very Different, Off Screen

'Go away, go away, I'm too tall.' Of course, I'm still too tall but here I am."

Obviously these people, whoever they were (and probably they were the most important executives, didn't go away, for Kitty had a screen test.

"I screamed when I saw it," she said. "I mean I screamed with laughter. It was all too fantastic, my going to Hollywood. My mother. . . ."

Ah, I thought, here comes the parental objection story. It was, too, and because it had happened to Kitty it had a different angle.

They knew a lot of musicians in Paris. Kitty thought she had a voice. She took lessons with Connelli and it suddenly occurred to her that she would like to sing on the stage. She made an appointment with an impressario.

Her mother was in Paris at the time. She picked up her dainty boudoir telephone and got the impressario on the wire. "I'm calling about my daughter, Kitty," she announced. "She's conceived the most fantastic notion. She thinks she wants to go on the stage. Now when you hear her sing this morning you will, of course, tell her that she hasn't a voice and that it's quite stupid of her to persist in this bizarre idea. I can trust you?"

I'M afraid not," the voice over the wire came back. "You see, madame, your daughter has just sung for me. And I have told her the truth—as I should have told her in any case—that hers will be a marvelous professional career."

"Poor mother," Kitty sighed, "she didn't know, of course, that all that would lead to Hollywood. She simply doesn't understand it. And it's really awfully embarrassing when she comes to the studio and my director or someone is kind enough to introduce her to the stars and she looks them straight in the face and repeats their names—sometimes incorrectly because she doesn't know who they are at all for she doesn't go to the movies."

Kitty's mother looked at the divine Marlene and said, "It is so nice to meet you, Miss Deetman," without at all meaning to be rude, but honestly not getting the name.

In Paris, on the Riviera, at St. Moritz, in Switzerland they knew plenty of celebrities, mostly great musicians. But these people, whose faces were not projected from thousands of silver screens could walk the boulevards or stroll along the beach without ever being followed by autograph seekers, without ever being mobbed by fans, yet they were great artists. Why then, both Kitty and her mother wonder, must picture people disguise themselves if they are to accomplish an hour's quiet shopping?

Kitty has slightly more ideas about it than her mother. She was born in New Orleans and went to school there for a time and, perhaps, in school got something of the "fan" feeling.

Kitty loved watching movies and used to go in Paris, but she saw them only when they were two or three years old and only the films which could be appreciated and understood by a foreign audience. Her mother never went at all.

In Hollywood Kitty is a complete anachronism. In a town where boys and girls, men and women have struggled, have sacrificed, have worked to attain their ambitions, in Hollywood where the heart of almost every star is scarred by the pain of defeat and bitterness and disappointment—here in Hollywood is Kitty Carlisle who never had to struggle to achieve a goal and to whom stardom is not important.

SHE did work hard at her singing lessons. She studied with the best and most difficult taskmasters. And then, when she thought she was ready, she came to New York and got an agent who got her a job singing in a miniature version of "Rio Rita." It was as simple as that. And when that show closed the agent got her a job in "Champagne Sec," where she was a great success and where people were always saying, "You ought to go into pictures." Then she had a test made. Paramount gave her a contract to sign. It was as simple as that.

No struggle, no heartache, no defeats.

She giggled. Her giggle is the herald which announces her entrance on the set. "Oh, I do wish I'd been in a railroad accident, in an awful fire, where I just barely escaped with my life. I wish something had happened to me."

You see? I told you she was a nut because she thinks winters in Paris, summers on the Riviera and Paramount contracts are nothing.

"I work—oh, don't make me laugh. Honestly, I work twice as hard as if it had been difficult for me to get jobs. I feel as if I should make up for not having had to struggle for jobs. I do work at my singing—that's important. I think that's more important than pictures, don't you?"

But I didn't have a chance to answer. She was giggling again. Such a nutty giggle.

"I'm worried," but she didn't look it. "You've got me worried. Do you suppose people really want me to write my name in their autograph books? I thought it was just a joke. Maybe it was wrong of me to run away.

"But I don't know. Someone told me once that anything could happen in Hollywood."

Anything can and does happen in Hollywood. And I believe it, since Kitty Carlisle came to town. If she is bewildered by Hollywood, just imagine what Hollywood must be!

you feel that way about it, we'll just forget it.' But he wouldn't forget it. He kept looking around and saying things and one remark led to another until finally he stood up and made a pass at me. I grabbed his arms and made him sit down. By this time people were looking at us and the people next to me moved away.

(I could see exactly how they felt about it!)

"Then," George continued, "he came around and sat down beside me, making more unpleasant remarks. I was getting pretty tired of him by this time and I suggested that we might step outside and settle the matter. But he wouldn't do that.

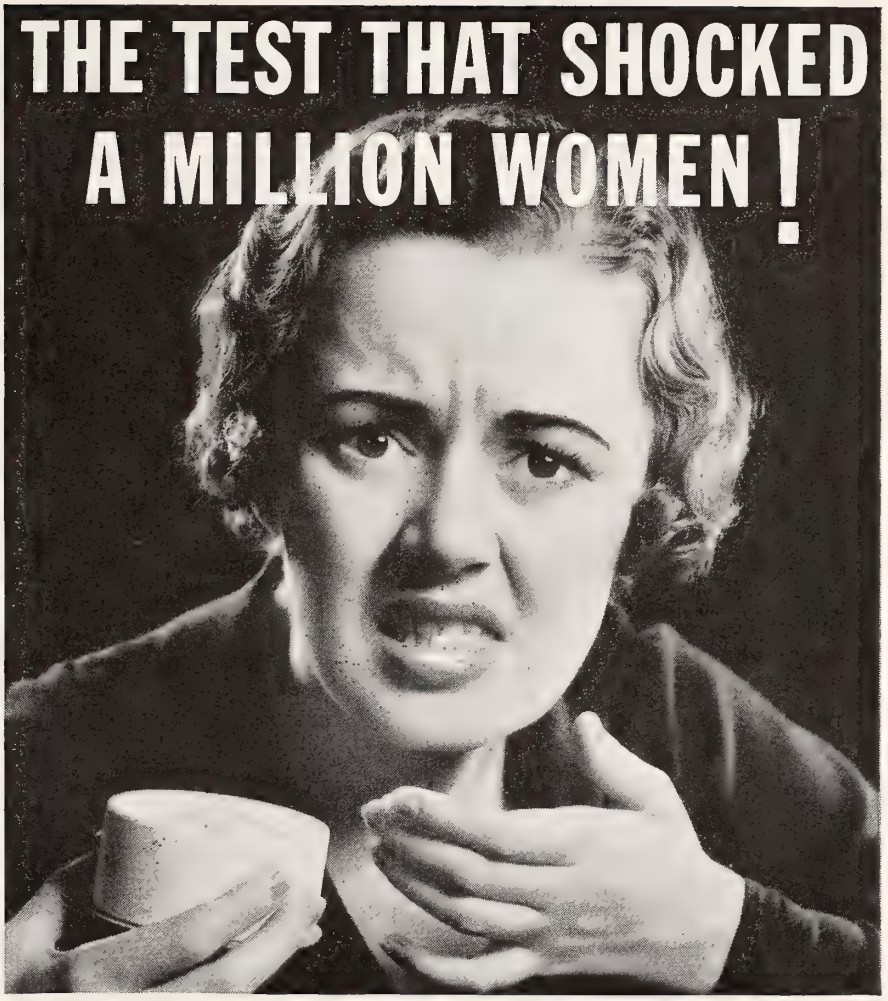
"Mac was beginning to get excited by this time and that worried me. I said to this stranger, 'Now, I never saw you before. I don't care if I never see you again! Why don't you be a good guy and just go away and keep quiet before something happens?' I was pleading with him.

AT that he made a pass at me, and before I could do anything, somebody grabbed him and the next thing I knew a lot of people were shoving each other and swinging and I wasn't even in it! The only part I managed to have in it was that I did pull his shirt out!"

That last item of accomplishment apparently still gives George a small and wistful satisfaction. But the morning papers had him swinging like a windmill in the midst of the fray.

Then there was the more recent occurrence in the Brown Derby.

"I had just given Mac, here, a little birthday present," related George, indicating "The Killer." "We'd had his nose fixed up a little bit for him. And I had had a scar on my ear fixed. This had taken place at ten that morning and at noon we went into the Derby for lunch. Mac had bandages and tape on his face.



"Now, there was a chap there whom I had seen before in a night club. I don't drink and I usually hear things better than the people who do. I had thought that I heard this chap pass a remark about me in the club. I'd never seen him before so I couldn't be sure it was meant for me. But I remembered it. . . .

"This day at the Derby he passed another remark . . . not to me. I heard him say something about, 'There go a couple of bums, trying to make themselves look pretty!' Even then I let it pass, although I was beginning to simmer inside. I suppose that it would have been better to pay no attention to him at all, but when we went to get our car from the parking station, he was standing in the middle of the drive and he wouldn't move out of the way when the car was brought.

"I stepped up to him and said, 'Look! If you have any remarks to make about me, you make them to me because if I have anything to say about you, you will hear it directly from me!' He was wearing glasses and I told him to take them off. I was pretty mad by then.

"Just then Mac stepped in between us and they began shoving one another and I was afraid that Mac would be hit on his new, sore nose, so I tried to separate them. By this time a lot of people had gathered and they separated everybody.

"I wanted very much," George concluded, mournfully, "to hit that one!"

Sensational "Bite-Test" Exposes GRITTY FACE POWDERS!

"I Dropped the Box, I was so Horrified", Writes One Woman!

BEHIND many a case of sore and irritated skin, behind many a case of dry and coarse skin, lies gritty face powder!

That face powder that looks so smooth to your eye and feels so smooth to your skin, it may be full of grit—tiny, sharp particles that are invisible to the eye but instantly detectable to the teeth.

You can't go on rubbing a gritty face powder into your skin without paying for it in some way. Maybe some of the blemishes with which you are wrestling now are due to nothing less than a gritty face powder. Find out! Ascertain whether the powder you are now using is grit-free or not.

Make This Telling Test!

Take a pinch of your powder and place it between your front teeth. Bring your teeth down on it and grind firmly. If there is any trace of grit in the powder it will be as instantly detectable as sand in spinach.

More than a million women have made this test in the past year as advised by Lady Esther. And thousands of them have written in in righteous indignation over their findings. One woman was so horrified she dropped the powder, box and all, on the floor!

There is one face powder you can be sure contains no grit. That is Lady Esther Face Powder. But satisfy yourself as to that—and at Lady Esther's expense! Your name and address will bring you a liberal supply of all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder. Put it to the "bite-test". Let your teeth convince you that it is absolutely grit-free, the smoothest powder ever touched to cheek.

Make Shade Test, Too!

When you receive the five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder try them all for shade, too. Did you know that the wrong shade of face powder can make you look five to ten years older?

Ask any stage director. He will tell you that one type of woman has to have one light while another has to have another or else each will look years older. The same holds for face powder shades. One of five shades is the perfect shade for every woman. Lady Esther offers you the five shades for you to find out which is the one for you!

We can't decide whether its the "pro" football game or Mr. Raft's company that is making Virginia Pine look so bitter. Mr. Raft, however, looks placid and interested in the game. This romantic team is still keeping Hollywood guessing.

PERSONALLY, if I were a belligerent male, I shouldn't "choose" George without thinking the matter over rather carefully beforehand. His apparent slightness belies the strength of the wiry, fight-trained, dancing-trained body. He grew up in circles where fists were important, where they were almost necessary to survival. He keeps himself in excellent physical trim and he can move with the swift agility of the well-known cat, if he chooses. Despite his customary patience, his Latin temper boils abruptly upon occasion. I should use discretion about making untoward remarks to George!

There was a third encounter of which I had not heard before and George thinks it was the most amusing of all. It happened a few weeks ago while he was in Chicago.

"I had been invited to a late party at a night club with some people whom I did not know very well," he related. "When I arrived they had been there some little time and I could see that they were a little bit tight. I had a young lady with me and we spoke to our host and hostess and met the other guests and then we danced. The dance floor was rather crowded.

"The second number, after our arrival, was a tango and one of the men at the table leaned over to me and said, 'I wish you would dance with my wife.' I told him that I should be very happy to dance with her as soon as some other people got up to dance.

"I am like that, you know. Even if I weren't sort of in the public eye, I shouldn't like to get up alone on a dance floor. People might think that I was trying to show off, they might think that I was conceited about my dancing. I don't want to appear to be conceited!"

George's shyness . . . again.

WELL . . . the man insisted. He said 'I want you to get up and dance with her now!' I said, 'I'm sorry. I don't feel like dancing now, if you will excuse me. A little later. . . .

"I didn't dance again that evening. When we were waiting for our cars in front of the place, I said to the lady, 'Goodnight. I am happy to have met you.'

"She said, 'I don't want to say goodnight to you!'

"I said, 'I am very sorry about that.' And I turned to her husband, held out my hand and said, 'Goodnight.'

"He just looked at me and said, 'Scram!'

"Now," said George in real bewilderment, "what would you make of that? I hadn't insulted her, had I? It was simply that I didn't want to make either of us conspicuous. I won't get up in a place like that when it looks as if I am trying to show off. I won't do it for anybody. And that's that.

"He made some more remarks and I stood as much as I could, and then I said, 'Listen! I don't have to take remarks like that from anyone. I'm not one of the pretty Hollywood actors who has to be careful of his face. I'm not good looking and I don't have to be afraid to tangle with anyone. I asked him to step over to the parking lot and settle the matter. But he wouldn't come and people came between us and finally took him away. I didn't start this argument and I wasn't allowed to finish it!

"It just happened!"

I think it is downright discouraging, the difficulty that George has in persuading his adversaries to step outside and let him deal with them in person. People are willing and ready to make unpleasant remarks to him, apparently, but no one has the courage to follow the matter with a real encounter. I earnestly hope that the next time anyone gets fresh with him, the bystanders will mind their own business. I think it is high time that George had the opportunity to take a good poke at one of these belligerent boys. I'll wager that they would not be quite so free with their language again!

can tint your underwear to the desired shade and it gives it a new lease on smartness. Colored neckwear and gloves are going to be very big in fashion, too. So get out some of your white collars and cuffs along with some of your white, washable gloves and dip them into the dye. Be sure to read my dyeing chart offer at the end of this article.

I have picked four evening gowns that I thought you would love. They express the special fashion fads of the stars who wear them. And all of them are perfect for spring and summer dates.

THERE'S Wendy Barrie's quilted black crepe evening coat on page 64. Wendy, you know, is the lovely young English star who has just arrived here to make pictures for Paramount. Already, she is one of the belles of Hollywood's younger set, having a crew of young blades begging her for dates. This evening coat is a grand summer wrap—it is worn for cool nights yet light enough for warm ones. The short puffed sleeves and the wide stitched collar are trick details. Those big lozenge-looking buttons are rhinestone.

Marina Schubert is another newcomer, and isn't she sweet? You will see her in "All the King's Horses." Her printed crepe gown, shown next to Wendy's evening wrap, is a gem. The all-over pattern is in a variety of flower tones on a navy background. The dress is simple with the skirt fullness concentrated at the back so that Marina has a graceful billow follow her as she dances about the floor.

The cape is shirred at the shoulders with emerald velvet used for the tie. Marina, you see, wears the high, fluffy bang I mentioned earlier.

Then on the bottom row, same page, you see Wendy in the evening gown she wears beneath her quilted coat. Here's the sort of half-way sophistication that you can attempt safely. Wendy's dress is a unique ribbed satin with a tricky collar that makes shoulder caps. Isn't that gold kid belt pretty swish?

Next to her, is Maureen O'Sullivan in a sweet, cross-barred organza. Pleated ruffles of the material provide most of the trimming, being used to edge the hem, the brief sleeves and the V neckline. Kingfisher blue velvet for the belt and the bow that ties her dark hair back from her face. That little nosegay of field flowers, pinned at her neckline, is just perfect. You will be wearing flowers, like these, tucked into the belts of your dresses, worn at the necks of your blouses, or pinned to the lapels of your jackets.

MAUREEN'S string of pearls is the nicest jewelry she could have picked. Pearls are in again for all times of the day; you may wear them even over the neckline of your sweaters, if you like.

Next, look at the daytime clothes on page 65. You could picture yourself in any of them, couldn't you? Especially Wendy's woolen ensemble. She bought this to wear out to Santa Anita to the races—the most exciting date in Hollywood these days is one that takes you out to watch the horses run. The jacket is one of those new finger-tip length ones in a plaid that can be worn with both dresses and skirts. This one of Wendy's

AND SHE WAS!

BETTY: What's the matter?

BABS: (in tears) Tom's mother told him I was careless! And I did so want to make a good impression.

BETTY: I don't like to say it but I'm afraid I agree with her.

BABS: Just because I had that little bit of a stain under my arm?

BETTY: Yes! Your dress will never be really fresh and new-looking again.

BABS: But everybody has trouble sometimes with perspiration.

BETTY: Of course! That's just why you shouldn't risk a dress even once without Kleinert's Dress Shields.

BABS: I'll sew some in this very day! Then my dresses will last longer, too!

is lined with the gold jersey of the blouse. The colors in the jacket are repeated in the gold, yellow, black and white flecked tweed of the skirt. The combining of three different types of woolens is a clever thought.

Besides this type of jacket, everyone is wearing the short jacket with belted back and shirring under a shoulder yoke that is known as the "Clark Gable" jacket, dubbed, of course, for that well-known heart throbber of the same name. This you wear with your skirts and it is usually in either a plaid, checked, monotone or tweed woolen.

Maureen O'Sullivan wears a Norfolk jacket in a gray check with a plain gray skirt when she flys. Since all of you are so air-minded these days, it is a good idea to know what to wear. So many of the stars have to fly back and forth from coast to coast, that they have air-travel clothes down to a fine point. Usually a suit is the choice with either a warm topcoat or fur coat worn over it.

I was tremendously interested, not long ago, to find Lilian Harvey wearing one of the new divided or trouser skirts as an air costume. Lilian was returning to England and I went down to the boat to bid her goodbye. There she sat, looking incredibly young with her golden hair falling loosely, almost to her shoulders. She scorns much off-screen make-up and consequently, she has a very childish look. I noticed that she seemed to be wearing a beautifully cut tweed suit under her mink coat, but when I commented upon it, she laughed and stretched her feet out to show me the divided skirt.

"Oh, I love it," she said. "It is the most perfect costume for flying because it is so warm around the legs. It doesn't make any difference how de luxe the airline is, it is sure to be cold when you get up a ways. This skirt was a wonderful protection and the nice part of it is, no one guesses unless I show them, like this, that the skirt isn't just a nice plain one with an inverted pleat."

I asked her if she liked divided skirts better than the slacks that she and all Hollywood stars adore so.

"Oh, no," she said. "The divided skirts are grand for travel and for sports, but give me my comfortable slacks for wear to the studio and around home."

LILIAN wore a simple tailored blouse with this, also a cardigan sweater under her suit jacket. She said that she suffered so from the cold that she piled on clothing regardless of whether she looked stuffed or not.

When you see her with Tullio Carminati in "Let's Live Tonight," you will see the sort of soft, feminine costumes that she likes best. She likes slightly more ingenue things than many stars. All of her evening dresses, for instance, are made with high waistlines and soft, billowing fullness in the skirts. Lilian is very smart in that she sticks to the type of costume she feels happiest in, regardless of whether it is the last gasp in fashion or not.

But back to our own fashion gallery. Next to Wendy Barrie's ensemble is Toby Wing's knitted jacket costume. It is three-piece with skirt and cape in yellow knit, the blouse in a rose and yellow stripe. Toby, and she is a cute trick, wears a woolen hat with wired brim to match.

Capes in every form are good and they are just made for slender young figures like yours and Toby's. Try one of the cape suits or coats for early spring.

Taffeta rustles through both daytime and evening fashions. And the one of Anne Shirley's is a darling. Red, white and black plaid, it is made in the favorite shirtwaist manner with short sleeves and a turnover collar. The bright red velvet bow makes a gay splash.

Again Wendy crashes through with a grand suggestion, this time for the classic printed dress we all wear every spring and summer. The design of hers is delightfully cock-eyed, being made of plaid squares printed in a patch-work quilt effect on a white background. Her collar is gathered around the throat, tying with velvet ribbon.

WE'LL have to start galloping over the last page in order to have time to squeeze the hats in. Most of you with unfurrowed young brows are shouting with delight at the return of the off-the-face hats and such whimsies as bonnets—but don't indulge in either unless they really suit your type. I've picked four distinctly different types that you can wear with nonchalance.

There's Maureen O'Sullivan's cute polka-dotted affair to match her silk shirtwaist dress. It's casual, sporty and generally becoming to all types of faces. Then there's Virginia Reid's Chinese coolie hat with the brim turned up like a Breton sailor. Sounds as if I had my countries mixed a bit, doesn't it? But it's the best way I can think to describe it. This style is always becoming to youthful faces.

The broad-brimmed hat turned up at back is nice for soft silk dresses. Marjorie Reid wears one in a navy blue straw with the brim faced in white felt and the trimming of white felt, too. The gardenias close to her face are fascinating.

And last, but by no means least, the beloved off-the-face straw hat. Marjorie Reid wears this, too. The draping back of the brim, almost as if it were fabric, is clever. An enamel flower nestles under the brim fold at one side.

If you will send your name and address to me, I will send you immediately a marvelous spring dyeing chart that gives you every imaginable color combination to make things look new and smart. And it is so easy to accomplish that you will find it fun. If you want added help on your fashion problems, include a stamped, self-addressed envelope also. The Man from Dead Pan Alley

"Where'd you hear that?" He was looking right through me as he said it. But I was beyond quivering. Betsy Ann had shown me the light.

"I read it in a newspaper."

"That's trash," he said, and just to prove that that's what he thought of it, he handed me back my letter, and I saw that he had scrawled the word, "trash," in no uncertain manner right across the page. (It happens to be one of his favorite words, I soon discovered.)

"You want to tell people that the Ned Sparks they see on the screen is the result of a physical ailment, when Ned Sparks is really a mental creation that I've worked over for twenty years! Oh, come now, have a heart. There's a well-thought-out reason for Ned Sparks. I met him first years ago in the character of a night clerk at a small mid-western hotel, one of the grouchiest, grumpiest, most inhospitable persons that I have ever seen, inside or outside a hotel. He stared at me belligerently when I went up to to the desk to register. I said 'How do you do?' and instead of answering he came out from behind the desk and peered at my luggage critically. Then he went back again, and as I was about to reach for the register, he took it away from me, looked at it himself for a while, and when he thought that he had annoyed me sufficiently he returned it to me. But he didn't annoy me, he amused me. Everything he did, or didn't do, was like that. I later put his character into a show on Broadway called 'Little Miss Brown.' Madge Kennedy was in it, too. Believe it or not, the newspapers actually wrote editorials about my night clerk. The theatre had never seen a character like that before—gruff, grim, and belligerent, but funny. I've met Ned Sparks a hundred times since . . . a backwoods fisherman who'd rather die than tell you where was the best place to fish . . . an undertaker who'd growl at you even while he was burying you . . . a Puritan farmer who thought it was a sin to smile . . . Everyone knows a Ned Sparks. There's one in every town and often in every family."

YES, I've got an uncle like that," I said.

"And you like him, don't you? I mean he's not terribly pleasant to have around, but you tolerate him, even think he's funny sometimes, don't you?"

I agreed.

"Well, then please don't print any trash about me. Tell 'em the truth. Ned Sparks is my own conscious creation. I created him because he is a character that everyone knows, but doesn't understand, until I showed him up as somebody to be laughed at. Most of the stories that get around about me are ridiculous. About my chauffeur, for example. I am supposed to have a chauffeur just so I can be irritated at him and thus keep myself in an irritable frame of mind. Trash, plain trash. I have a chauffeur because I need someone to drive my car. What else would anybody have a chauffeur for?"

"Well, isn't it true that you have a clause in your contract that the studio can't make you laugh, or even smile in a picture, unless you agree to it?"

he didn't even have to say it to let me know what he was thinking. Trash, rubbish, and nonsense. "It's true, though, that I do have a clause in my contract which permits me to write or re-write my dialogue, and to originate my own lines. So I suppose it amounts to about the same thing. I've always written my own lines, even years ago on the stage, like the time I wrote in the part of the night clerk for myself."

"Haven't you ever wanted to go back to the stage?"

"What should I want to go back to the stage for? This movie work suits me fine."

I gasped. For once an actor hadn't gone off into a discussion of his first and last love, the theatre, at the drop of a hat.

"There are only two things I want to do now," he went on. "I want to make less pictures, so people won't get fed up with my dead pan. I made eleven pictures last year and next year I'm only going to make four. Then in a couple of years I want to retire, and spend the rest of my life fishing and hunting. I like that better than anything in the world."

I had already judged that was the case since there were several stacks of outdoor magazines piled around the room. That room, incidentally, was as cheery and cozy and friendly as Mr. Sparks isn't on the screen. It was lined with books—not the kind that haven't been off the shelf since a distant relative willed them to you—but the kind that are new and modern and show signs of having been read several times. There was a cheery little cuckoo clock ticking on the wall. A busy-looking desk in the corner, behind which Ned sat and looked as though he were quite used to sitting and working there. And there were at least half a dozen small rubber animals around which I guessed were Betsy Ann's own personal possessions.

INCIDENTALLY, Betsy Ann's bed is an exact replica of Mr. Sparks, only miniature, of course. It has sheets and pillows just like a real person's bed. "Why not?" said Mr. Sparks. "She is a real person to me, why shouldn't I treat her as one. We have long talks together. She's the best audience and the best company I've ever had. I used to think she was sort of a nuisance, till that time she saved my life. I've looked upon her with new respect ever since. We were walking in the mountains and I was day dreaming, as usual, when Betsy Ann suddenly dashed in front of me, barking like a half dozen dogs rolled into one. I stopped and looked down, and there was a big diamond-back lying right in the middle of the path. I would certainly have stepped on it if it hadn't been for Betsy Ann.

"When we got home I rewarded her with a bit of filet mignon, her favorite dish. Oh, yes, my dog has very highbrow tastes. The only thing that worries me is that she displays a deplorable tendency toward strong drink, and likes (and usually gets) a nip of sherry before dinner. Another thing which disturbs me, but which I tolerate, is that she snores most roisterously, and also has nightmares. She whines and carries on like a spoiled débutante till I have to get up and walk the floor with her. Perhaps I spoil her, I don't know, but she did her best to make the world safe for comedy, so I really should return the favor.

"A funny thing," he went on, "most people are usually afraid of me, the first time they meet me. I have many friends who admit they were once scared to death of me. Strange, isn't it, because my fans, the people who write to me, seem to know more about me than the people I know personally. Look at this letter, for example."

Dear Mr. Sparks:

I am in desperate circumstances and need your aid. I have been in a charity hospital for three months, laid up by an automobile accident. My wife and four children have had nothing to eat for two days now. I would go out and beg, borrow, or steal, if I were able. Won't you please send them some money, so they can buy groceries? I am writing you because you look so mean and tough on the surface that you must have a heart of gold underneath. I have often been told that if you need anything to always go to the man who looks most as though he wouldn't give you anything. I will pay you back when I am able to work again. I am so sure you will send it that I am enclosing my I. O. U. for $25. Thanks a lot.

"You see?" said Ned. "They're on to me. I give away thousands of dollars every year. I haven't got much of a family of my own, just me and Betsy Ann, and we've got everything we need, so why shouldn't I be generous? It isn't really generosity. It gives me a sort of selfish pleasure."

I SUSPECT that Ned has traveled many times with only a quarter or two in his pocket, and that is one of the reasons now why he so enjoys giving money away to poor unfortunates. As a boy, Ned left his home in Ontario, Canada, and followed the gold rush to Alaska, but as a prospector, Ned was a good singer. Eventually he wandered from mining camp to mining camp, as a sort of a one-man show. He had a fine voice then, and still has, though Ned hasn't yet had a chance to display it on the screen. He made his début on the stage at Dawson City, in the Yukon Territory. Later he hopped a freighter and came down to Seattle. Then he began his wandering theatrical career through the West and Middle West. From one little town to the next, sleeping in cheap hotels, dining regally on 15c a throw. They were hard days but at last, in 1913, he landed on Broadway in "Little Miss Brown" and from then on Ned was famous as "The Man Who Never Smiles." After that he was a feature comedian with such stars as Madge Kennedy, Alice Brady, Effie Shannon and William Collier. In 1919 he made a silent film in New York, with Constance Talmadge. Ned came to Hollywood eleven years ago with a contract to make forty pictures (in those days they turned out that many in a few months). But he was in a bad accident, and laid up for so long that his contract was canceled and when at last he was well, it was just like starting all over again.

The story of his success may be summed up briefly by the fact that today Ned is one of the highest priced actors in the film colony. Few fans realize that many character actors receive more money than most of the stars. People like Ned Sparks are also able to hang on to their money more easily than the stars. They may live simply, entertain modestly, have only one car, without anyone thinking anything about it. If Clark Gable should live in a small two-room apartment and spend accordingly, the film colony would call him a miser, yet I doubt if Clark is a wealthier man today than Ned is. It's just one of the many quirks in the Hollywood "system."

Lovable Genius

fore. He brought to this an understanding almost uncanny, and an unforgettable emotion.

In and around Warminster, Freddie became the star performer at parties and charity concerts. There always was feverish applause when he stepped out on the platform, not much more than a baby, his head covered with dark ringlets, his dress one of the pastel linen smocks his "Cis" made for him.

There was the evening he sang the song that goes, "Oh, she's sweet. See her coming down the street . . ." Fittingly enough, he addressed this song to a little girl he knew in the front row, a little blonde girl named Jennifer.

She became confused, she turned scarlet. Freddie was only four but her dismay worried him. He stopped his song. He walked over to the edge of the platform. "Don't be shy, Jennifer," he told her gently. "Don't be shy!" Then he stepped back to continue, as if there had been no interruption whatever.

Contrary to what you might expect Freddie never seems to lose himself in what he is doing. At those concerts, for instance, he always was aware of everything that went on, and conscious of the different people in his audience.

Cissie Bartholomew noticed him wink as he stood on the platform during one performance.

"Who were you winking at, Freddie?" she asked him later. "Did you see someone you knew?"

"Oh, no," said Freddie, "I just saw a friend in the audience, a man of about forty, I should judge, with fine gray hair."

Anyone Freddie likes he calls a friend.

Most people he likes. People are of the greatest importance to him, irrespective of their age. He will stand beside a baby carriage, gazing rapturously at a sleeping baby, or entertaining a baby that is awake with funny faces and noises for as long as the nurse will linger. And time after time, during visits to London, he has waited to help an old lady or an old gentleman off a bus and guide them to the sidewalk.

WHEN he and his darling "Cis" came to America, last summer, they hoped in their hearts that Freddie would be chosen for "Copperfield." But if he wasn't, they were satisfied to call it a holiday. Freddie was concerned, however, at leaving his grandmother for she seems to be none too well these days.

"Dear God," Cissie Bartholomew heard him pray the night before they left home, "do help Granny to get about while I'm gone. And please don't ever have Grandpa's eyes fail him. It would be too frightful to have no more cricket on the lawn. Grandpa does enjoy it so. And so do I, I must say."

God, you see, is not vague or awesome to him, but a friend, and what could be more blessed?

He turned to God again when he faced a difficulty in California. On the morning the scene where he says good-bye to his nurse, Peggotty, was to be filmed.

"Dear God," he prayed hurriedly while his aunt and governess, Miss Murphy, called that the car was waiting, "today I must laugh and cry at the same time, when I say good-bye to good old Peggotty. It's going to be hard. I'm afraid, so I'll need a little extra help."

"But," Cissie Bartholomew told me, "I mustn't give you the impression that Freddie is any goody-goody. For nothing could be further from the truth." She gathered up a bag of marbles, some rubber bands and a little crotch of wood, which looked suspiciously like the makings of a sling-shot. "Put a knife in his hands and he's none too careful what he carves. The furniture isn't any too safe. And his pockets!" She gave a slight shiver. "I've pulled frightful things out of them."

That afternoon, after Freddie had finished with his French and geography, he joined us in the living-room before the fire. At first, until he got his bearings he sat with his aunt on her chair. She is small enough so she leaves a little wedge of room. And a little wedge of room is all Freddie needs.

I asked if, when Freddie was making "Copperfield," he had thought about the things he was going to do while he was away from the studios. I wondered if bits of action hadn't popped into his mind when he was doing his lessons, as he was about to go off to sleep, or even when he was riding horseback with Elizabeth Allan. Riding he counts the greatest fun in the world. And he loves Elizabeth Allan.

"That happened at first," he said. His charming inflections give all he says a faint poignance. "But I found it better not to let this happen, not to think about my work at all when I was away from the studios, except to go over my lines with my aunt.

"In the studios, you see, Mr. Cukor, the director, would explain the set-up to me and tell me how he wanted things done.

"One very funny thing happened when we were making 'Copperfield,'" he said, appreciatively. "Remember the scene where I come down the stairs in my nightshirt, looking for my mother? Well, when we did that scene, I was truly frightened. My knees shook together. There was no sound for several minutes, you'll remember.

"'There's no one there!' Mr. Cukor whispered. 'There's no one there, David! No . . . one . . . there!'

"But," and now Freddie's eyes were bright with amusement, "but when I got down into the hall and looked into the door of the room that was supposed to be empty, while Mr. Cukor kept whispering, 'There's . . . no . . . one . . . there!' I found myself face to face with a great crowd of people who were watching that scene being filmed."

HE thought the saddest scene of all was the one he played at the foot of the staircase with Peggotty. When she stood before him and said, "The Treasure, she . . ." And he, as David, asked, "Dead, Peggotty?"

He would have liked it if the wreck could have been in his part of the picture, for that he found exciting.

He didn't sit quiet for long. Before many minutes he was lying on the floor, in a typical little boy position, flat on his back, making a tent of his knees.

"Have you been homesick for England?" I asked him.

"Yes, at Christmas," he said, taking aim at a lamp shade with the particular elastic garter which he insists is lucky for his marksmanship. "You see Peter always comes for Christmas when we're home. (Peter is his cousin, a year or two his senior, and his idol.) And we have great fun. We run a string from his room to mine, tie one end of it to his big toe and the other end to my big toe. And on each end we attach a little bell."

Now excitement made his eyes sparkle.

"That," he explained, "is so whoever moves will awaken the other. And we can creep down and see our presents.

"Once," with a quick little look at his Aunt Cissie, "once we went downstairs at two o'clock in the morning!"

"That," Cissie Bartholomew interrupted, "was a little too much."

"Yes," Freddie agreed, "we were punished."

Always he turns to his aunt. The bond between them is great. He can tell, for instance, when she arrives at the studios, even before he sees her. And when you ask him how he does this, he says, "It's mental!"

It's more than simply mental, of course. There's actually a psychic quality between them. One night recently they both dreamed the same dream, Cissie Bartholomew dreamed the first half of it, Freddie the second.

Cissie Bartholomew dreamed she was in the garden of a house in which she had lived, when she was a little girl, pleading with her father to save Freddie from being shot. While her father refused to do anything about it, insisting that Freddie, who had killed a man, must suffer the consequences.

The dream was so vivid it depressed her. She was still trying to shake it off when she went into Freddie's room the next morning.

"I'm in a bath of perspiration," Freddie announced at once, "because of a dream I had. It was horrible. I dreamed I was in a garden, an English garden, it seemed. All the family sat in a row watching while I faced a firing squad. I had murdered a man."

"Since in England we do not shoot murderers but hang them," said Cissie Bartholomew, "it seemed especially strange."

You gather that she and Freddie are not at all upset by evidences of the bond which lives between them. But that they think it great fun. There it is. And for whatever it is, they accept it.

More than a dozen people who have seen Freddie as "David Copperfield" have said the same thing to me. In substance, "He's sure to be unhappy." Adding with a little sigh, "He's so sensitive, too sensitive for his own good."

That seems logical, too, until you know Freddie and watch him. However, I doubt it to be true.

Undoubtedly, because of Freddie's intense sensitivity, he will react more keenly to things, be more acutely conscious of the sorrow in the world. But, by the very same token, he will be more aware of the beauty in the world, too. And reacting more keenly to this, he will know a keener happiness. So there the scales will balance.

Besides, because of his unfathomable wisdom and understanding, Freddie already, at ten years of age, sees life and people with a perspective seldom acquired before adult years. Therefore he runs an excellent chance of being spared that crucifying upheaval of readjustment which most of us face in the late 'teens or early twenties and from which too few emerge with unscarred eyes.

Freddie, prematurely, if not actually psychically wise, reacts to all he observes and all he feels with the sublime faith and acceptance of childhood. Life he finds perpetually exciting. People are of paramount importance to him. And all of it is wonderfully worth while.

What is it that makes him the way he is? That's the question!

Perhaps it is in his instinctive love for people which he inherits from his Irish grandmother Bartholomew that the germ of his genius lies? He may be the reincarnation of some actor who was famous in his own time? Or it may be that he never has lost that wisdom with which some hold we all are born?

I wouldn't attempt to say. Only this I know, that I'll always remember his eyes. In them there lies something sublime.

Was It Right to Film the Hauptmann Trial?

in the court library and the one that was on the balcony. Everybody could see it—they could even see the inch-thick electric cable connecting the microphone to the sound recording equipment.

"If anybody was in a position to tell us to stop, it was the Sheriff, in charge of the courtroom. He didn't bother us at all. Incidentally, anyone who says he was paid to let this recording go on is telling an untruth. He was just a regular fellow.

"Of course they knew we were taking pictures! Don't you remember the newspaper headlines when the lights all over the building went out during the early part of the trial? Well, that was because big Photoflood lights had been installed throughout the courtroom. When they blew the fuses, they were taken out and 300-watt bulbs substituted."

THAT'S the story, exactly as I got it from the lips of men who should know. But it's not all. I got some more data from Jim Cunningham, star reporter of the Motion Picture Herald, the "Bible" of the movie trade.

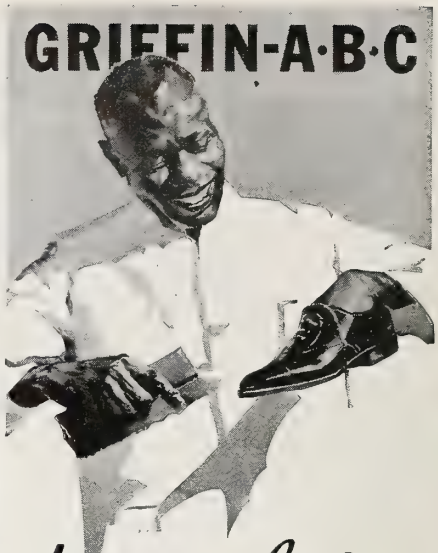
The Hauptmann film, as you know, made its first appearance on January 31. But in the Herald of January 19, Cunningham said, "Actual photographing and recording in the courtroom is confined, by order of Judge Trenchard, to incidents taking place only when he is not sitting on the bench. The judge ruled that he will hold in contempt any person or company responsible for the making of pictures while he is sitting."

This would seem to indicate that the movie men misunderstood the judge's orders.

But here's another point which Mr. Cunningham told me. By the order of the court, all the special photographic electric lights in the courtroom were extinguished and the shades pulled part way down when Bruno Hauptmann took the witness stand. If this was an effort to insure against the taking of pictures, it failed. According to Cunningham, the camera was equipped with an ultra-fast lens, and special "super-super speed" movie film was made to order, that the pictures might be taken.

Further, Mr. Cunningham says that the operator did NOT stand next to the camera. He left the camera switched on and sat inconspicuously by the batteries, some ten feet away, starting and stopping the camera by connecting the battery wires. I have heard this same story from other authoritative sources.

But, whichever version is true, the main question is, "What is the value of these pictures? Should they have been taken?"



Everybody you ask has a different answer.

Here are what a few authorities say, together with the opinions of some people I queried in theatre lobbies.

To get the opinion of an unbiased prosecutor—one not connected, in any way, with the Hauptmann trial, I interviewed District Attorney William Copeland Dodge. He is the brilliant, fiery lawyer who, by his forceful and accurate presentations of the evidence against law breakers, protects the people of New York against criminals.

Mr. Dodge, with his trained legal mind, looked at both sides of the question and then spoke.

"On the whole," he said, "I condemn any pictures, be they newsreels or straight dramas, which feature the activities of criminals or even of people suspected of crimes. In my opinion, such films tend to teach children, and even adults with immature minds, the false theory that there is glamor connected with crime.

"The Hauptmann Trial film, showing the prisoner faltering and miserable under the lashing tongue of the able New Jersey Attorney General, David Wilentz, is not so bad. It shows that the way of the man arrested for a crime is, by no means, a pleasant path to tread. Perhaps it may lead some imaginative persons to picture themselves gasping and trembling in the witness chair—but others may see only that this, hitherto unknown, German carpenter is now receiving nation-wide publicity.

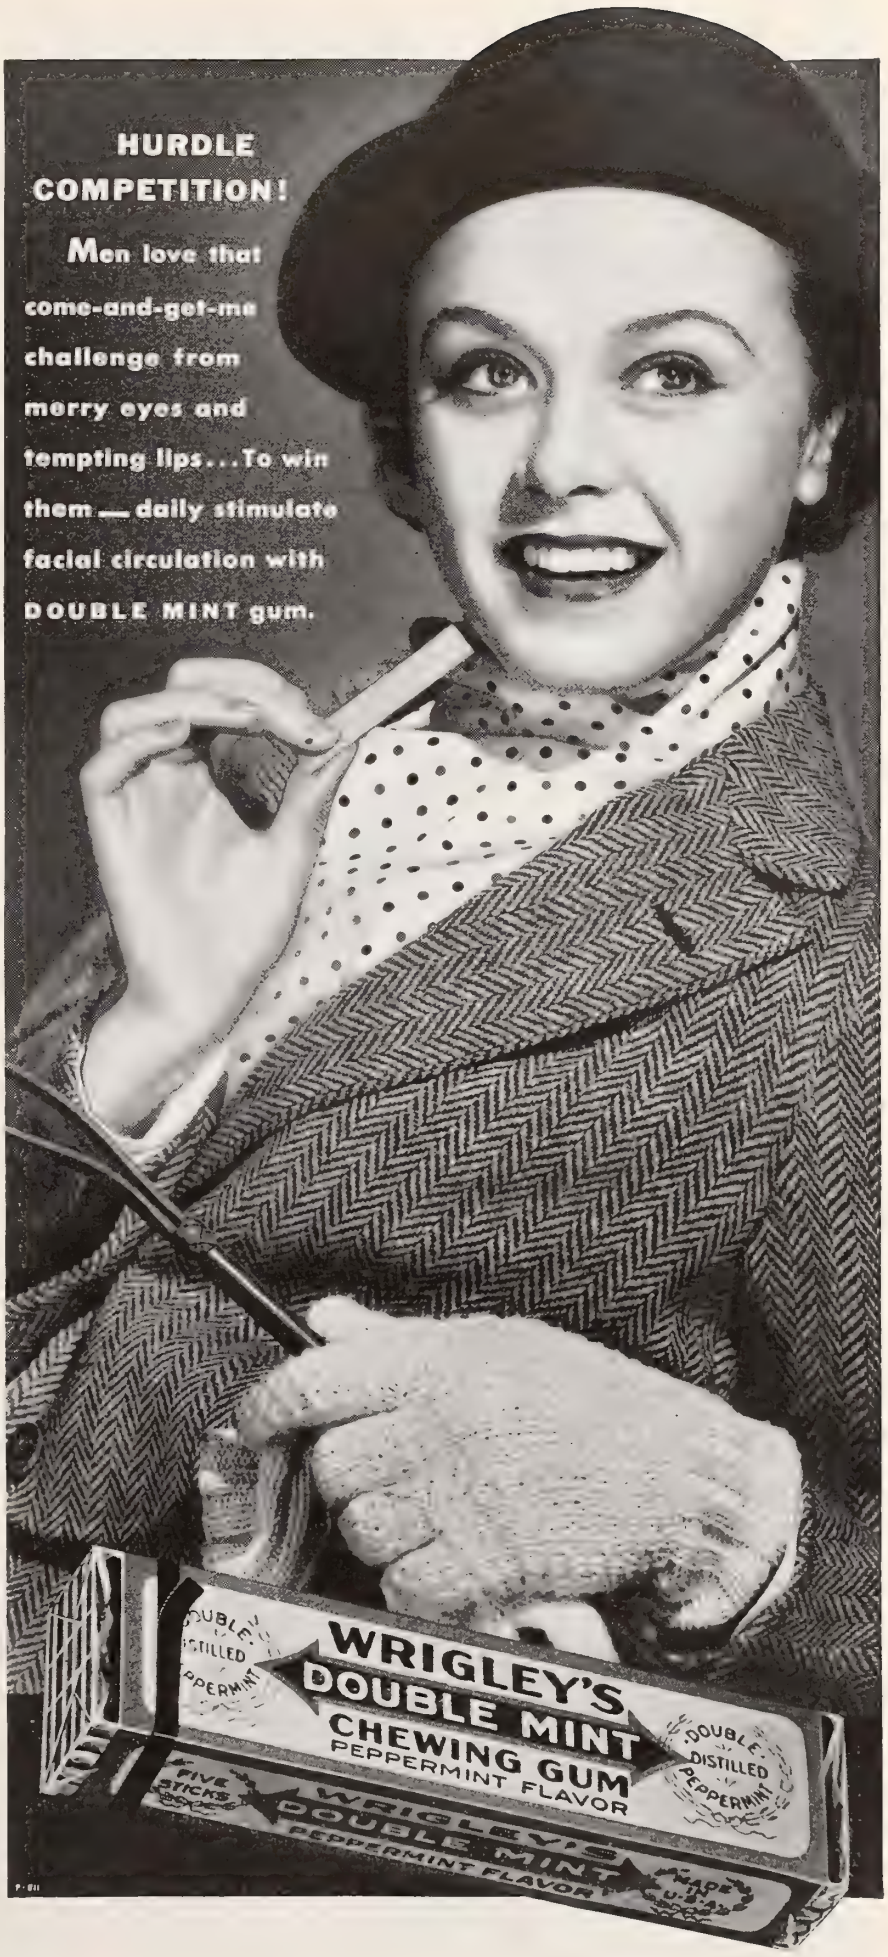
"At all events, I do not think the picture should have been released until after the verdict was given by the jury."

So speaks a prosecutor, his opinion typical of that of States' Attorneys everywhere. Now let's see what the most famous, the most brilliant defense attorney, of the present day, thinks about that scoop of the century, the film made at the Hauptmann trial. Samuel S. Leibowitz, whose duty it is to defend prisoners at the bar of justice, thinks very much as does District Attorney Dodge.

"You won't want to print my opinion," said this great lawyer, "because I'm going to tell you that I have not seen the picture and I do not think anybody should go to see it.

"I am opposed strongly to all this fanfare of publicity which surrounds sensational criminal trials in these United States. However, I think, if we are going to have an army of newspaper sob sisters and fiction writers in the courtroom to give us their personal impressions and reactions to the witnesses, we may as well let the newsreels in, too, and get a really true reproduction of what goes on—with sight and sound. This is a much clearer report than when one newspaper reporter tells you that the defendant looked worried and near the breaking point, while another reporter writes that he seemed calm, and more confident than ever.

"We would be a thousand times better off if we followed the English system more closely. There, trials are dignified legal proceedings, not three-ring circuses.



"I condemn any breach of faith which the newsreel companies may have committed, for the breach of a promise given to such a sterling jurist as Judge Trenchard cannot be too heartily censured. He should, I think, give the severest possible sentences to those who broke their word to him; they are certainly guilty of contempt of court.

"I have not been to see the pictures, for courtroom proceedings are no novelty to me. I urge the public to stay away likewise, for their support of these films will encourage the tendency to make a mockery of justice and a theatre of our courts.

"If we are to have trial pictures (and they are no worse than sensational newspapers' 'color' stories), let us have them taken openly and only with the permission of the presiding justice, rather than in stealthy defiance of his orders. The newsreel men, if they want to make such pictures, should take off their false whiskers and come out into the open."

LET us now get an opinion from the editor of a great daily newspaper. We'll ask Harry T. Saylor, who holds the most responsible position on the New York Evening Post.

"It was," he said, "a great piece of reporting. What if it isn't in good taste? The whole tenor of this trial was that of a circus and not of a judicial proceeding. So, as long as the newspapers and radio went to such lengths, I don't see why anyone should object to the newsreels getting as much as possible.

"You can't convince me that those cameramen didn't get in without, at least, the tacit or implied approval of certain court officials, though it is obvious that Judge Trenchard did not want the courtroom pictures to be taken and perhaps was not even aware that they were being filmed.

"Their influence on increasing or discouraging crime? I think it's nil. Pictures of that sort do not teach any lesson; they're just exceptionally interesting pictures for an audience to watch. Rather on the macabre side, though, and in bad taste with a human life at stake.

"We newspaper men, as well as the newsreel men and the radio commentators, have overstepped the bounds of propriety in this case. The cameramen are no worse than we are, so why blame them for trying to get their share of the news? After all, they are simply reporters who use a microphone and camera instead of a pencil and paper; their stories are printed on celluloid instead of in ink. Fundamentally, we're all in the same profession, and they are to be complimented on doing a good, workman-like job of getting the news—the reporters' first commandment.

"If their pictures are interesting to moviegoers—and all those I have spoken to found them extremely interesting— they are to be congratulated on doing a good, thorough job of reporting a case which has enthralled people throughout the United States."

When an editor, like Mr. Saylor, talks about this picture as a feat of reporting, there is nothing for me to do but talk to the greatest reporter of them all—Floyd Gibbons, ace correspondent of the World War, feature writer for the Hearst Syndicate, and premier newscaster.

FLOYD said, "I think the whole case should have been filmed and made public as an unimpeachable record of the trial. The film is a good idea; the only trouble with it is, it didn't go far enough.

"If judges object to the cameramen making the courtroom pictures, it is because they have ideas that date back to the Civil War. They might as well object to electric lights and insist that the courtroom be lighted with candles, or that the testimony be taken in long-hand instead of being typewritten.

"When a man, accused of a crime, is taken into court, he is supposed to be given a public trial. The newsreel made this the first truly public trial in our history. It did not limit the audience to the few dozen or hundred people able to squeeze into the courtroom through their influence or other means. It made the trial public to thousands of men and women all over the country. I am sure that everybody is interested in it, not only because of the prominence of some of the principals, but also because the crime of kidnapping is one which strikes terror into the hearts of every mother and father in the land.

"The picture was illuminating. It gave sidelights that the public could gain in no other way. When I saw the film I was particularly shocked by what I believed to be the contempt which Hauptmann seemed to have for the prosecutor, Attorney General Wilentz, as manifested by his thrusting out his arm, like a traffic cop, and ordering, 'Stop dat! You, stop dat!'

"I would like to see a film of the entire trial—all the testimony of all the witnesses; close-ups of all the exhibits. Not only would it be interesting and educational as to courtroom procedure, it would be a valuable historical document of the most sensational trial in this generation."

An exactly opposite view was taken by H. V. Kaltenborn, also a radio news commentator and, for more than forty years, an outstanding newspaper man.

Says Mr. Kaltenborn, "It was highly unethical for the newsreel companies to defy Judge Trenchard's decision that motion pictures not be made of courtroom proceedings, and that the cameras might be operated only during recesses and before and after court. There is no reason why any specific type of corporation should be permitted to make a profit out of sensationalizing this already sensational trial; the dictum of the presiding justice very definitely should have been respected.

"Catering, for the sake of profit, to that class of the public which craves sensationalism is cheap commercialism, and that goes for newspapers or broadcasters who may find it applicable, as well as newsreel producers."

But how do movie people themselves feel about the Hauptmann Trial newsreel?

THE stars are scared to death to say a word about it! They're afraid to say one word either way, for fear it would hurt their box office appeal. They won't talk. And, even if they wanted to, their press agents wouldn't let them! I know this to be a fact.

I could quote you a dozen critics, who say that it was "gripping," or "fascinating," or "unbelievably horrible"—that Hauptmann "gave the impression of an innocent man, fighting against damning circumstances," or that he was "the very symbol of guilt"—that Wilentz was "the most forceful figure in the present American court" or that he was "too dramatic, more like a prosecutor in a play." But, instead, let's go right to the home folks who saw it and ask them. I stood in the lobbies of a half-dozen theatres, to see what you and you and you thought of the film. And I made it a point to keep on asking until I had answers from people whose homes were in various parts of the country. Here's the result:

Mrs. J. S. V., Kansas City, Mo.: "My God, I don't see how his poor wife can stand seeing him squirm like that! It is pitiful."

Mr. T. O'R., Livingston, Mont.: "Why did they want to waste money trying a guy like that? You can see he's guilty just looking at him."

Miss R. J. K., Picher, Okla.: "That poor man! Who wouldn't be confused, getting shouted at like that? I still think he didn't do it."

Mr. H. F., Ranger, Tex.: "I'd like to meet that prosecutor. He did a real job. I'm a lawyer and I know."

Mrs. H. F., Ranger, Tex.: "I'm sorry I went. I'll be worried about my children every minute 'til I get home."

Mr. and Mrs. L. G. J., Rochester, Pa.: "We wouldn't have missed it for anything. It isn't a picture; it's an experience we'll never forget."

And the funny part of the whole story is that this picture was never intended to be released as a single reel. The producers planned to make a ten-reel feature out of it. But then The March of Time announced its first picture—a sort of news review. This was competition for the newsreels!

The newsreel outfits decided to put out a film that would make people forget all about The March of Time's first release. So they gave you the Hauptmann Trial.

And that is how the "Scoop of the Century" reached the screen.

EAGLE BRAND CHOCOLATE REFRIGERATOR CAKE

2 squares unsweetened chocolate
1⅓ cups (1 can) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
½ cup water
Vanilla wafers

Melt chocolate in top of double boiler. Add Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk and stir over boiling water five minutes or until mixture thickens. Add water. Line oblong loaf pan with wax paper and cover bottom of pan with thin layer of chocolate. Then add layer of vanilla wafers. Repeat until chocolate mixture is all used. Top with layer of wafers. Chill in refrigerator for 24 hours. To serve, turn out on small platter and carefully remove wax paper. Cut in slices. May be garnished with whipped cream. Serves eight.

● With only 5 minutes' cooking, you get a wonderfully smooth, rich chocolate mixture that can't fail. It's never too thin—never too thick—never grainy! And what a dessert it makes! ● But remember—Evaporated Milk won't—can't—succeed in this recipe. You must use Sweetened Condensed Milk. Just remember the name Eagle Brand.

Is It a Dream?

going to send for you and tell you that. You're a good boy but you don't belong here. You have a God-given voice. Go out and try to do something with it."

JOE stayed around home for a year or so after that. First he got a job "tonking" in the railroad yards.

After a time he got a job in a filling station. But his stepmother always felt it was not a nice job for him. When he was seventeen she suggested that he go to Chicago and see if he could get a job there. He landed in Chicago with about ten dollars in his pocket.

After about a month he finally got a job with the Boston Store, at $25 a week. That was in the boom days. He was sending home every cent he didn't actually need for himself. There was nothing left for movies or an occasional malted milk. To supplement his meager income, he used to go around to various neighborhood theatres on amateur nights and sing, hoping to win a prize.

A REPRESENTATIVE of a music publishing house heard him one night and offered him a job plugging songs for them. That meant an additional $25 a week. Joe should have taken one job and let the other go but he thought he could hold down both jobs.

"Get rich quick, Morrison!" He laughs about it now but it wasn't a laughing matter then. A seventeen-year-old kid putting in eight hours a day at a department store and then working until two or three o'clock every night plugging songs! He kept that up for months, averaging about four hours sleep a night. No human could possibly stand up under such a grind indefinitely. He had to give up one job. He stuck to the music firm.

Devoting all his time to song plugging, he met a lot of actors and theatre managers. One he heard of had a new vaudeville act that was being organized. He applied for the job and got it.

The act rehearsed four weeks and started out on a route that Joe can still spiel off for you without a moment's hesitation. After a few months he landed in Los Angeles. One night he found himself in a café run by Carl and Lil Mueller, retired vaudevillians. It was a theatrical hangout. A vaudevillian, named Eddie Vine, who was doing a single, happened to be in there that night.

The proprietors of the café would call on the customers to sing. Joe was called one night. Eddie heard him and it is to Eddie's everlasting credit that he recognized talent when he saw it. He sent a note to Joe and asked him over to his table. When the usual questions had been exchanged and answered, Eddie said, "I'm doing a single. Would you like to come with me?"

"I can't come for two weeks," answered Joe. "I've got to give my act notice."

During the next week, Joe's act miraculously got a booking at the Westlake Theatre. Eddie went out to catch it. After the performance he went backstage. He knew the other boy who was appearing with Joe and who was also acting as manager. As is not uncommon with actor-directors, this chap was hogging the show himself. The others were getting what was left, and precious little it was. Eddie minced no words with him.

"Why don't you give this boy," indicating Joe, "a chance to show what he can do? He's a damned sight better than you are." This indication of Eddie's real friendship was borne out on future occasions.

JOE finished out the week and handed in his two weeks' notice. Eddie had to leave town before then, but before he left he gave Joe his instructions and handed him a signed blank check which would enable him to pay off the debts he had contracted around Los Angeles and buy himself some badly needed clothes.

Joe joined him in Salt Lake City. At the end of his act, Eddie took a bow and, instead of the customary encore, said, "Folks, my kid brother is here to visit me. I think if you coax him a little he'll come out and sing for you."

They coaxed and Joe sang. He and Eddie still laugh about his costume. It was characteristic of Joe that he filled out the check for no more than he actually needed and the clothes Eddie had instructed him to buy consisted of only what he absolutely had to have.

Eddie notified his booking office that he had changed his act to a double and from the reports the office had received of Joe's initial appearance it was all right with them. By the time they had completed Eddie's booking and returned to New York, Eddie had built Joe's part up in the act to about eighteen minutes and shortened his own to two.

They got a twenty weeks' booking and thought they were sitting on top of the world. But Joe contracted bronchial pneumonia and the bookings had to be cancelled.

The talkies had arrived and vaudeville was breathing its last gasp. They presently found themselves back in Los Angeles with no bookings and no money.

They asked every agent in town whom they knew to give them a few days' booking so they could eat. But nobody wanted them. When things looked bleakest Joe got a job in "The Nine O'clock Revue" at the Hollywood Music Box. The notices he got in that show are something to remember, but it didn't help them.

WHEN that show folded they managed to get another short engagement. And, after that, they decided to try their luck in New York.

They spent some more lean weeks in New York. On Thanksgiving Day they played a theatre in New Jersey, known in the vernacular as "a can"—a small theatre on a cheap circuit. They were so broke they couldn't even go over to New York for Thanksgiving dinner. They had to eat in a small restaurant near the theatre. By the time they had finished their show, the restaurant had nothing left but herring!

How they lived from Thanksgiving to Christmas I don't know. But during the holidays an agent 'phoned Eddie and asked if he would have Joe sing at an Elks' Benefit at the Commodore. And that is still another of life's ironies. They couldn't get bookings—except for benefits which paid them nothing. However, Joe was the sensation of that particular evening and his appearance there led to his being booked by WOR for a commercial program. He couldn't believe it. It was while he was singing over the radio that George Olsen heard him and engaged him as soloist with his orchestra.

Shortly after this he went on the Oldsmobile hour with Olsen and Ethel Shutta. Following that he sang for a year on the air with Olsen and Fanny Brice on a commercial broadcast.

It was after this, while he was still with Olsen, that he introduced "The Last Roundup," the song that made him famous and which led to his Paramount contract. Then he was sure he was dreaming.

His initial appearance in pictures was with W. C. Fields in "The Old Fashioned Way." His second is "One Hour Late." Paramount has picked up their option for a third picture this year, "Love in Bloom" and, at the same time, has notified him that he will be with them for three pictures next year.

So, Joe, never mind, if you do wake up. It isn't a dream—it's true.

Glamor Is Not a Gift

"we women do well to hold on to our interest in men. It keeps us from letting down."

Fair enough. Rules two and three:

> Don't dam yourself up all the time.
> Get a thrill out of life.
> Hold on to your interest in men.

This will keep you from letting down.

THERE'S no more popular girl in Hollywood's younger set than Anita Louise. The other girls consult her about their activities. They always are eager for her company at tea and on shopping excursions. And if Anita isn't squired by a different young man every time she goes out, it's because that Tom Brown's a determined young blood. And it's common knowledge that because of Anita, for years now, Tom's walked around wiith his head in the clouds.

All of which I offer as incontestable proof of Anita's glamor.

Anita imparts something of the same lovely excitement which Norma Shearer gives out. Her voice has a breathless quality—as if she was so fascinated by what she had to say, that she hardly could wait to say it.

She's pretty, goodness knows. With her smoothly chiselled face, her eyes as blue as far away hills, and the soft shine of her golden hair. No one, however, ever has resented Anita's beauty. Because no one, attracted by her beauty, ever has felt let down, the way you do with some pretty girls.

Anita has spirit and interests and understanding. She's warm and she's human. She's the antithesis of a girl from New York whom the younger set admitted to their Puppets Club not long ago. This girl, who for the sake of kindness shall be nameless, was pretty, too. Very pretty. But she counteracted any attraction her looks might have carried by her tricks and affectations. She said such stuffy things as, "We don't do it that way on Park Avenue," and "You can't know people who live on the wrong side of the railroad tracks." She primped constantly. She always was ridiculously late for any appointment.

There are, of course, some great personalities who have glamor in spite of stupid and inconsiderate actions. They are the exceptions to whom no rules ever apply. All we can do about such people is to marvel at them and then leave them out of all calculations. So, rule four:

> Be warm and human. Have spirit and interests. And above everything else, try to be understanding.

Kitty Carlisle offered practical advice on the subject of glamor. Kitty, as you doubtless have read, was brought up in Rome. In Italy, everywhere in Europe, in fact, they have a different approach to life than we have in America. They're less reserved, franker about many things.

"I was pretty unattractive as a young girl," Kitty announces with her startling honesty. "I was sallow. I was painfully shy. I preferred to sit in a corner and read to anything else. My mother, undoubtedly, had qualms about my future. For I can remember her trying to save me the hurt feelings she believed were ahead of me, by saying that it wasn't important to be popular with the boys."

Kitty laughed. "When I landed in a boarding school in Rome the attitude was very different. There it was considered darn important to get on socially, to be attractive, and to have the boys like you. And you were trained to make these grades.

"I'm grateful to that school. There I was taught there always is one place in a room, usually by a column, where wallflowers congregate. It was made clear to me that when I found myself alone for a minute it would be my tendency to draw into that group since there I would have someone to stand with, someone to talk to.

"'DON'T!' I was admonished. And I pass that admonition along. In fact, I urge anyone, who accidentally finds herself cornered in such a group, to break away. Irrespective of how difficult it may be to do so. We're known by the company we keep. And it's downright stupid to place ourselves with the unattractive group.

"I was, doubtless, schooled in what amounts to insincerity, but that's all right. It's harmless insincerity, after all, and better than unhappiness, that miserable unhappiness you experience when you have no social armor.

"I'm in favor of set rules for behavior such as I was taught at that Italian school. I think whoever incorporated them in the training was very wise. Those set rules saved many of us heartaches. They gave us a routine behavior which saved us from standing around, floundering and working ourselves into such a state that our evening was ruined. They gave us a chance to appear superficially attractive until we got our bearings and more at ease than we otherwise could have been." Now then, rules five and six:

> Stay away from the wall-flowers at a party at any cost, irrespective of how tempted you may be to join their little group.
> Give yourself a little set of rules which will govern your behavior if you're inclined to be self-conscious. A little set of rules which will, when put into effect, indicate that you're having a good time and not a dud.

LET'S go back to the idea that beauty isn't necessary to glamor for a minute. Long enough for me to report May Robson's comments. Sweet May Robson with her silver hair, roses in her cheeks, and a little velvet band about her throat.

"Beauty," she says, "can be a horrible menace to happiness and adjustment and glamor. In fact, I believe the very best thing a beautiful girl can do is to forget she is beautiful. Women who trade on their beauty become vain and selfish, until there's no warmth left in them, until their smile goes brittle and their eyes turn hard.

"I tell you when a beautiful woman is glamorous it is in spite of her beauty, not because of it. Beauty tricks women by carrying them so far without any effort on their part. Then it deserts them while they're still comparatively young but too old and too inclined to indolence, usually, to find the interests and enthusiasms or the point of view which makes women attractive and glamorous at any age." Whereupon rule seven comes to light:

> If you have beauty, do not depend upon it. If you haven't beauty, don't for one second feel that you're barred from having glamor.

"Men," said Ann Sothern, "fall for intense sirens but they never stick to them.

"Men adore to be comfortable. It's the girl who is easy and natural, the girl who has warmth and humor, who exerts the greatest glamor in the long run.

"Look at Constance Talmadge. Constance no longer is a celebrity in Hollywood. There are dozens of girls in town younger and prettier. But it's on the sand in front of the Netcher (Netcher is Connie's married name) beach house that men gather, in the Netcher box at tennis, around the Netcher table at the Grove.

"She is gay. She makes men forget their troubles, temporary at any rate.

"She is warm. She makes you feel that she gives you sympathy and understanding, that she knows what you're going through, so to speak.

"She is good-natured. She never gives the impression that she's mentally taking people apart or that she's super-critical. And I'm sure she'd rather be found dead than nagging."

Always in her description of Connie, mentioning the qualities she felt contributed towards Connie's glamor, she said the very same things I would say describing Ann, marking the causes for her glamor. So we come to rule number eight:

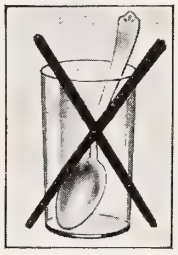
> Be easy and natural. Have warmth and humor. For, above everything else, men adore to be comfortable and they won't stop long enough to find you glamorous unless they are.

THEN there's Karen Morley. Karen and I were driving up into one of Beverly Hills' canyons. I asked her if she had done anything toward becoming a more colorful individual.

"I did plenty," Karen said slowing down, appreciably, just beyond the Harold Lloyd's estate where the road curves about the flank of a foothill. "I hoped fervently at this time to be as thrilling and glamorous to other people as certain stage and screen stars were to me.

"For instance, when Ruth Chatterton first came to California to do stage and picture work, I went to see her whenever possible. I studied her, I mimicked her inflections and her mannerisms.

"I know," she continued, "I know lots of people say it's dangerous to imitate. But I don't agree with them at all. In fact, I think everyone, as they grow older, mimics those who catch their imagination.



"The only thing is," she warned, "that we must have sense enough to imitate someone who is our own type. It would, for instance, be ridiculous for me to imitate someone who is active and athletic, for I'm not any of these things and never could be. In other words, I'd remember to get up and jump about one minute and the next I'd go off in a corner and sit quietly. Then I'd remember my new act and get up and jump about again."

A new point of view about mimicry this of Karen's, and a convincing one, too, convincing enough to become rule nine:

> Study and imitate those people you admire, if they are your type, for, eventually, some part of the inflections and mannerisms you will adopt will be assimulated by your own personality and you'll be more colorful.

Now then if you aren't one of those fortunate souls born with that warm magic, that brilliant charm, that sense of excitement which makes for glamor remember there's no need for you to go through life without it. If you do, you'll be poorer by far as a personality. And it will be your own fault.

RELIEVE ACID INDIGESTION WITHOUT HARSH, RAW ALKALIES!

Millions Have Found Faster, Surer Relief In New-Type Mint

HEARTBURN is distressing. But there's no longer any need to resort to harsh alkalies in order to relieve a sour stomach, gas, or after-eating distress.

Strong, water-soluble alkalies taken in excess may change the stomach juices completely—slowing up digestion instead of helping it.

The new, advanced, most effective and safe relief for acid stomach is TUMS. TUMS contain no soda or any other water-soluble alkali—instead this candy-like mint contains an unusual antacid soluble only in the presence of acid. When the excess acid in the stomach is neutralized, the remainder passes on undissolved and inert. No danger of alkalosis or kidney poisoning from TUMS.

Try TUMS—3 or 4 after meals, when distressed. Eat them just like candy. You'll be grateful for the wonderful relief. 10c a roll at all drug stores. 3-roll carrier package, only 25c.

Maddening Hues

FOR LIPS AND CHEEKS

A NEW KIND OF LIPSTICK . . . A NEW KIND OF DRY ROUGE WORK MIRACLES IN RED

Maddening hues, yes! Colors that thrill, taunt and tempt! Truly enough (and you'll know it the instant you try them) such rapturous, wicked reds have never been used in lipstick or rouge before. But there's more reason than that for the soul-stirring madness so generously imparted by SAVAGE Lipstick and the new SAVAGE Rouge.

SAVAGE Lipstick works differently from ordinary lipstick. Its gorgeous color separates from the cosmetic after application to become an actual part of the skin. Wipe the cosmetic away and see your lips teasingly, savagely red . . . but without the usual discouraging pastiness. Imagine a lipstick like that! Better yet, experience its magic on your own lips. One or more of the four luscious SAVAGE shades is sure to be exactly yours.

SAVAGE Rouge . . . an utterly new kind of dry rouge . . . so much finer in texture than any other that it blends right into the skin itself . . . to stay, with full color intensity, throughout the exciting hours it invites, instead of quickly fading away as ordinary rouge does. You'll love it, and the shades are identical to those of SAVAGE Lipstick so that your cheeks and lips will be a thrilling, perfect symphony of maddening, meaningful red.

Then . . . SAVAGE Face Powder

And what a different face powder this is; so fine, soft, smooth and so surprisingly different in the results it gives. Apply it, and it seems to vanish . . . but the skin-shine, too, has gone. Imagine it! Everything you want from powder, but no "powdered" look; just caressing soft smoothness that is a feast for eyes and a tingle for finger tips it makes so eager. Four lovely shades.

EVERY woman knows what wonders a smile can work . . . what a flaunting little banner of loveliness it can be.

But do you realize what a shock of disappointment follows a smile that gives a glimpse of dingy teeth and tender gums — of the damage that neglect of "pink tooth brush" can lead to?

DON'T IGNORE "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

You can't afford to take chances — to ignore a warning that threatens your smile and your dental health. Dental science has explained and stressed that warning—"pink tooth brush." Foods that rob our gums of exercise — soft and creamy dishes that tempt our palates but lull our gums to sleep—those are the reasons for the modern plague of tender, ailing gums.

If your tooth brush even occasionally shows "pink"— do the sensible thing. Don't let yourself in for serious gum troubles — for gingivitis, Vincent's disease or pyorrhea. Get a tube of Ipana Tooth Paste today and follow regularly this healthful routine. Start today!

Brush your teeth regularly. But—care for your gums with Ipana, too. Each time, massage a little extra Ipana into your lazy, tender gums. Ipana with massage helps speed circulation, aids in toning the gum tissue and in bringing back necessary firmness.

Your teeth will be whiter—your gums healthier — and your smile will be lovelier with Ipana and massage.

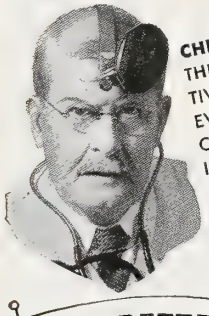
LET'S GO "RECKLESS"!

Thrill to the tap, tap, tap of her dancing feet in "The Trocadero". See her sell kisses for $500 each. Cruise with her on "The Honeymoon ship". Romp with her in "The Dormitory Pajama Party". Hear her sing the blues. Gorgeous Jean Harlow teamed with William Powell is heading your way in the biggest musical show of the century with a throbbing love story as exciting as its title.



I was sallow and sort of logy

• Everything I ate seemed to give me gas—I just couldn't get my system regulated properly. My little boy suffered from constipation, too, and didn't like the taste of castor oil. His teacher advised me to give him FEEN-A-MINT. He thought it was just nice chewing gum and took it without the usual fuss. It gave him such a prompt and complete movement that I chewed one myself. That was over a year ago and I want to tell you that FEEN-A-MINT has been a welcome friend in relieving constipation. I wouldn't have any other laxative in the house.

Used by over 15,000,000 people

Our files are full of letters telling what FEEN-A-MINT does for people. Doctors know that FEEN-A-MINT does a more thorough job, and does it gently, because you must chew it—and chewing spreads the laxative evenly through the intestines so that more complete relief comes without straining and griping. Try FEEN-A-MINT yourself—you'll join the 15,000,000 people who are boosters for FEEN-A-MINT—15 and 25¢ at any druggist's.

CHEW YOUR LAXATIVE... THEN IT MIXES WITH DIGESTIVE JUICES AND SPREADS EVENLY THROUGH THE CLOGGED SYSTEM. THAT IS WHY FEEN-A-MINT GIVES MORE THOROUGH RELIEF. ESPECIALLY ADVISABLE FOR WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

BETWEEN YOU AND ME

Pardoned

Please excuse me when I say I'm in love! It's all because of a sweet-voiced, charming and lovable personality and altogether a grand sweetheart—Dick Powell. In my estimation he is the best male star of 1935 and will be for a few years to come. The moment he appears on the screen, my heart melts and I just seem to forget everything.—Sonny Ray, Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The Kitten's Whiskers

I am the mother of a trio of movie fans but seldom visit the movies myself. Today, however, attracted by the usual stir that the first showing of a picture with Ginger Rogers creates in my movie-mad household, I made up my mind that unbeknownst to them I'd visit "Romance in Manhattan" and see what it was all about.

I can truthfully say I have never seen anyone so naturally charming, so delightfully unaffected as this little actress. Half the qualms and doubts about the wisdom of my brood's frequent movie-going are removed if they are getting anything as clean and charming as this film.

"Gee, Ma, ain't she the kitten's whiskers?" breathed my eldest, as I confessed my afternoon's visit at the dinner table. If this is published and my brood see me bursting into print, I'll be the "cat's meow," I suppose.—Mrs. J. Senson, New York, N. Y.

Re: "Lives . . ."

Have just come home from seeing "Lives of a Bengal Lancer," and had to sit down and write this little note of praise, as such a picture is worth every bit of praise it gets.

I'll admit I never did care for pictures with an all-male cast, but this one is superb. Gary Cooper, Franchot Tone and Richard Cromwell have never been better.—Verna Hollerock, Newark, N. J.

Has your letter been published in this corner? If it hasn't, get busy and join the rest of the folks who have things to say about the movies. Address your letters to: Between You and Me, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

This and That

Just a thank-you for:

The refreshing, vivid performances of Richard Dix and Martha Sleeper in "West of the Pecos."

That delightful, fairy-tale fantasy, "Babes in Toyland."

The fascinating Oriental setting, the fine sincerity of Herbert Marshall, and the delicacy and thoughtfulness of Garbo in "The Painted Veil."

The vivaciousness, lilt, laughter and spontaneity of "College Rhythm."

Gabled to Death!

There isn't enough "star variety" in our movies these days. It is a mistake to think that one star can give us all the variety we want. For instance, no matter what part he plays Clark Gable is still Clark Gable and we are being Gabled to death. Give a few other players a break.

I can't see much in a picture like "Flirtation Walk." It is boring to have to sit through half a picture listening to a couple of not-too-clever singers drone and drag a monotonous, elongated song. Give us more drama and less of these school-boy-and-girl singing classes.

Give us more of Jack LaRue (pictured) and give him the break he has earned.—E. Sommers, Lynn, Mass.

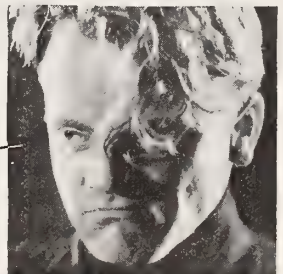
Hollywood's Most Famous Bad Man Joins the "G-MEN" and Halts the March of Crime!

Leave it to Warner Bros. to make the first big picture of America's greatest battle in the war on crime!

The producers of "The Public Enemy" have trained their cameras on the men who trained their guns on the craftiest killers of this gang-ridden day and age.



They've brought the G-MEN, mighty man-hunters of the Department of Justice, out of the shadows of secrecy into the brilliant glare of the picture screen.

Yesterday's screaming headlines are a feeble whisper compared to the sensational revelations in this shot-by-shot dramatization of gangland's Waterloo — the last stand of the underworld!

It's all here! . . . every graphic detail of how the deadly trap was set — and sprung — on the Mad Dog of the Mobs, and of how the Big Shot no jail could hold kept his rendezvous with death!

"G-Men" is easily the stand-out for this month's highest honors. Our advice is to see it yourself before your friends begin to rave about it!

The Modern Hostess

Dixie Lee Crosby and her grand cook, Blanche, have a conspiracy to make Bing eat the vegetables he doesn't like. Result, the smiling, healthy Mr. Crosby, above. And also, Gary Crosby getting a preview of a vegetable casserole!

there's a new game being played in the Bing Crosby household! No, it does not boast of any strange name such as "Backgammon," "Bagatelle," or "Towie"—in fact it has no name at all unless you'd choose to call it "Vegetable Masquerade." But it's being played daily with great regularity and secrecy by Bing's blonde, pretty little wife, Dixie Lee, with the assistance of the family cook, Galveston-born Blanche.

The rules of the game are very simple. You start out with a question: "When's a carrot not a carrot?" You then proceed to answer this question in as many ways and with as much originality as possible. For instance, a carrot is not a carrot when it's inundated with a savory gravy, when it's disguised as part of a meat dish, or when it's topped with fluffy biscuits!

After you have become proficient in these first steps you go on to other vegetables, according to the season of the year, the family exchequer and the preferences of the cook. It's a great little game and many's the harassed housewife who would profit by taking it up in a serious way.

You see, Bing Crosby, Crown Prince of Croon, has one failing in common with many mere males and almost all youngsters. He doesn't like vegetables! Yes, like most food-loving men Bing is violently opposed to the inclusion of the lowly onion, the caloried carrot or the luscious tomato in his daily diet. If he had his way he'd eat nothing but flaky apple pie, sun-colored lemon pie, scalloped oysters, thick juicy steaks, ice cream and a mysterious, delectable frozen concoction known in the Crosby menage as "Mississippi Special."

You too, undoubtedly, have the same trouble with your family, so I am going to let you in on the workings of the mighty plot that originated in Dixie Crosby's upstairs sitting room and is carried out under Blanche's watchful eye in the Crosby kitchen.

BING, of course, doesn't realize that petite Dixie and their efficient cook are in league to keep down his proteins and lessen the consumption of his beloved starches and sugars by means of this "Vegetable Masquerade" of which we were speaking. But in this way they see to it that Bing's vitamin scales (A, B, C, D,) are as righteously regarded as his vocal scales.

So the game progresses with Bing daily sitting down to an endless procession of vegetables, steaming and palatable, disguised in gravies, baked with fish, cooked in stews, en casserole, under puffy, fluffy biscuits

Here's how Bing Crosby is tempted to eat vegetables!

—skillfully prepared. And Bing eats them contentedly, little dreaming that he is the victim of a gigantic kitchen conspiracy! It was Blanche, the Crosby cook, who supplied me with details on how this little plot is carried out.

"Mr. Crosby never says what he wants for dinner," that efficient colored girl informed me. "Breakfast, though, is different. Sometimes Mr. Crosby, when he isn't working, wants hot cakes, bacon and coffee. When he is going to the studio he usually orders only toast and coffee. So I never prepare breakfast for either Mr. or Mrs. Crosby until I hear what their orders are.

"For the evening meal it is Mrs. Crosby's idea to try to include a wide variety of vegetables in the main dinner dish. Often I cook the vegetables right along with the meat and serve them saturated with the meat juices so that Mr. Crosby won't realize that he's eating them. Sometimes, if he has been deep-sea fishing and brings home his own catch, I make a Baked Fish à la Constantinople which calls for a lot of vegetables, cooked with the fish. It's very popular both with the family and with their guests.

"Once in a while I fix up a simple New England Boiled Dinner. Or I use a left-over roast and gravy in a casserole with vegetables and cover it with sour-milk biscuits. Mr. Crosby likes sauerkraut, too, with spareribs. He likes only a few ribs cooked with the vegetable. The other spareribs he likes to have baked in the oven so that they are crisp and crunchy to bite into."

PERHAPS the greatest favorite in the Crosby dinner repertory, I learned, is that famed and proletarian dish, Mulligan Stew. It has a nostalgic quality, that stew. It belongs among Bing's childhood memories and its appetizing aroma takes him right back to his Spokane school days when the seven Crosby kids gathered at the parental board for heaping servings of a dish that is as Irish as Paddy's pig!

"We topped it off then with a great big apple pie!" says Bing with a gleam of gustatory appreciation in his blue eyes.

Today, Blanche makes Mulligan frequently in the kitchen of the Crosby's English-style home in the wooded Toluca Lake section of Hollywood. She buys three or four pounds of lean brisket (sometimes she varies it by using veal), pops the meat into hot water and lets it boil until the meat is almost tender (about an hour and a half). She then adds salt and pepper to taste and small, scraped (Continued on page 80)

Fels-Naptha is safer, too—gentle as can be to daintiest things. And it's kind to hands—there's soothing glycerine in every golden bar.

The stars recommend their special diets and exercises

Well, girls, how do your measurements tally with those of Venus? As you can see, Carole Lombard is modern perfection. Wotta figure!

Did you know that seeing a Mickey Mouse comedy is a regular beauty treatment in itself for you? Laughing helps to stimulate the circulation, and it also helps to develop a beautiful throat. Singing, too, is grand for developing the kind of a throat and chest that Grace Moore has, and hers is the most perfect in Hollywood.

You may have a neater figure for the bathing beach, or the dance floor, if you sit upon the seat of a bicycle that requires a lot of busy pedaling to keep it going. When you want to build up the calf of your leg, and skinny legs are enough to give anyone an inferiority complex on the beach, take your bicycle riding easy and ride slowly. Don't ride too long the first time; half a mile will probably be far enough. You can go a little farther the second day, and so on. If you want to reduce your legs and hips, however, go in for bicycling in a strenuous way. Ride as though you were going to a fire. You may even wear a pair of rubber bathing trunks and flannel shorts if you want to reduce in double-quick time.

If you haven't a bicycle, you can't use that as an excuse for not getting into action. The bicycle exercise is a good substitute, though not as much fun as the real thing, we admit. Lie on the floor flat on your back. Now raise both legs straight up in the air until you are almost lying on your neck, and, supporting your waist with your hands, make your legs go through the motions of riding a bicycle upside down.

Swimming is the finest developing exercise in the world. Golfing on the green keeps you (Continued on page 99)

La Wing lunches on orange juice and pineapple.

Ann Dvorak recommends the daily dozen.

Ginger Rogers says golf keeps her in trim.

fare we have to endure! Hollywood is doing a swell job of cleaning up the feature pictures, but why do we have to continue sitting through reel after reel of inane comedy? The headache is that they aren't funny at all. All we see is a lot of worn-out gags dumped into a senseless plot and run under a loony name, while we yawn and fume inwardly. Laugh? If we do, it's because we're tired of frowning or because the boy friend happens to be cutting capers. Eighty per cent of the shorts shown, need a hearty "boo" from us long-suffering movie-goers. Can't something be done about it?

Let us have more "Our Gang" and Laurel and Hardy pictures and the priceless Walt Disney cartoons. Or else treat us to more shorts of educational interest. But, in the name of the Canadian and American public, deliver us from such pictures as those that Clark and McCullough and their ilk make.

Here's to it, and to the best and cleanest screen magazine in circulation, MODERN SCREEN.—Barbara M., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The Westian Era

Mae West is probably the very last person in the cinema colony who needs someone to defend her but I'm here to tell "Just a Dreamer," from Gallion, Ala., that the criticism he or she wrote about Miss West was absolutely unnecessary. Mae writes and acts exactly as she believes and if American mothers become as frank with their daughters about love and sex as Mae seems to be they won't have to worry about their daughters when womanhood approaches.

We are living in a dangerous period and being frank to both boys and girls about love is going to help many of them to avoid going down for the count when they meet a real problem in life, especially that problem we can't avoid, which is sex.

I probably sound as if I've had plenty of experience—well, it may surprise you to know that you've been reading the advice of a sixteen-year-old girl who has seen two of her girl friends condemned because they went wrong and the villain in both cases was nothing but Ignorance.

We need your advice Mae West, so keep on writing about the subject our nation should know about.—Ruth Bush, Detroit, Mich.

Likes and Dislikes

I would like to see more sane people like Gable, Baxter and Cantor who do not try and force down the necks of the public the fact that they are "tired of it all," and though their pictures are not always good, they always give sterling performances.

I'd like to see Norma Shearer without benefit of husband, Adrian and the pick of leading men try to fight her own battle like other artists. (Continued on page 116)

Don't choose your laxative blindly!

BLIND Man's Buff is no game to play... in any matter pertaining to your health.

When you need a laxative, you must know beforehand how it will act on you.

Harsh laxatives will cause stomach pains, upset you, leave you weak. Laxatives whose sole virtue is gentleness may fail to be thorough.

You must have both thoroughness and gentleness...you must have pleasant, painless, complete relief from constipation. Never be satisfied with less from a laxative.

Why America uses more Ex-Lax than any other laxative

Ex-Lax is as thorough as any laxative you can take. Yet its action is so gentle ... so completely without stomach pains. Ex-Lax doesn't leave you feeling weak, doesn't upset you. Ex-Lax is not habit-forming—you don't have to keep on increasing the dose to get results. And Ex-Lax is not a punishment—it's a pleasure to take. It tastes just like delicious chocolate. Ex-Lax has no unpleasant after-taste and no bad after-effects.

Millions of people have found this out. And last year alone, 46 million boxes of Ex-Lax were bought!

And...that "Certain Something"

So many imitators have tried to produce a chocolated laxative that would equal Ex-Lax. But they couldn't. Why? Because Ex-Lax is more than just a chocolated laxative. Because the exclusive Ex-Lax process gives Ex-Lax a "certain something"—a certain ideal action that words just can't explain and that no other laxative has. But once you try Ex-Lax, you'll know what we mean, and nothing else will ever do for you.

Ex-Lax comes in 10c and 25c boxes at any drug store. If you would like a free sample, mail the coupon.

Preview flashes from SHIRLEY'S greatest picture.. "OUR LITTLE GIRL"

by Jerry Halliday

"COME ON OVER AND SEE MY STATUE!"

Forgotten (for the moment anyway) are Shirley's dolls and pretty dishes. Shirley is still telling friends about the nice, fat man . . . (Irvin S. Cobb to you) . . . who traded a bee-you-tee-ful statue for a hug and kiss! Dear little girl, I wonder if you'll ever know the happiness you bring to millions of people. Special Academy Award? That's nothing to the good wishes the whole world sends you!

She plays at being happy to rebuild a shattered dream!

CONGRATULATIONS, FANS, here comes Shirley! How you'll thrill to this human story of a child and her parents whose happiness is suddenly threatened! And how the tense, dramatic climax will stir the heart of everyone from Granddad to Junior as Shirley's love triumphs over a family crisis. A "must-see" picture!

Rosemary Ames and Joel McCrea give true-to-life performances as the parents who grope in the dark shadows of misunderstanding.

Gary Cooper hates verbal posies about his looks. Finishing "Wedding Night," he dashed off with the missus to Bermuda.

Edward Everett Horton is adept at playing benign, fumbling nit-wits. He's at his hilarious best in "$10 Raise."

For gusty, robust humor, Wally Beery is the tops. "China Seas" with Harlow and Gable sounds like a lusty role to his taste.

two Blondes

Picture of two pretty stars who aren't worrying their light-thatched pates about all this to-do of redheads and brunettes in the ascendency. To wit, Alice Faye and Joan Blondell. Both have more than a share of brains, vivacity and acting ability. Alice deftly staged a New York reunion with Rudy Vallee between "George White's Scandals" and "Argentina," the picture that brings another radio star, Tito Guizar, to the screen. Joan manages to leave Norman Scott Barnes cooing serenely in his crib while she reels off one picture after another for the Brothers Warner. "Traveling Saleslady" is the intriguing title of her latest—any good jokes, Joan?

So popular a team are Kay Francis and George Brent that they are scheduled for two pictures together, "The Goose and the Gander" and "Stranded." Kay still goes places with M. Chevalier, too!

Strange beauty

Erratic, gay Kate Hepburn, she's back in a modern role again for "Break of Hearts." Charles Boyer, who breaks hearts on both continents, shares the male lead with the newly popular, John Beal.

SHIRLEY TEMPLE'S first SIX YEARS

BY ADELE WHITELY FLETCHER

HE WALKED the length of that corridor and back again. Up and down. Up and down. Against those white walls the first faint wail of life had sounded, and life's last faint cry, too. He became acutely conscious of small cracks in the stone floor. And on the wall there was a water mark which looked like a duck.

Now he heard the elevator starting down from the floor above and again this sound which, sooner or later, must precede the word he awaited, acted like a vise on his nerves. What, he wondered, had possessed him and his wife to have another baby, to risk the happy security which they already had with their two boys, with John, thirteen now, and George, just ten.

A nurse came off the elevator. "Mr. Temple," she said. With a bound he was at her side. "You have a daughter. She weighs six and a half pounds. And," smiling, "until I can get a tag on her wrist you'd better be on your guard. For there's an interne upstairs ready to steal her. He's entranced with her dimples."

"Mrs. Temple?" he asked. "She's . . ."

"She's splendid now," the nurse assured him. "In a few minutes they'll have her in her room and you may see her."

A breeze soft as spring rustled the leaves of a calendar pad on the floor nurse's desk and caught his attention. Unconsciously he noticed the year, 1929. And the day, April twenty-third.

It wasn't until Mrs. Temple and the baby came home that the men in the family felt Shirley really belonged to them.

"Gee Whiz," complained young George Temple on the way home from the hospital one night, "the way those nurses act you'd think they owned Shirley. You'd never know she was our baby. They give me a pain!"

It was this feeling on the part of both boys, their attitude that Shirley was their baby too, which helped immeasurably when the five-room Temple house was further crowded to accommodate her crib on wheels, the little chest of drawers in which her tiny clothes were kept, her perambulator and all the infant bathing equipment.

A different attitude and this overcrowding would have resulted in sharpening everybody's nerves. So that, inevitably, beginning life in an atmosphere of querulous bickering, Shirley would have become a nervous baby, unable to digest her food, and been poorer for this all her life.

WITH THE Temples, however, always it had been a question of all for one and one for all. And now they were all for Shirley. To John and George, too, she was "our baby."

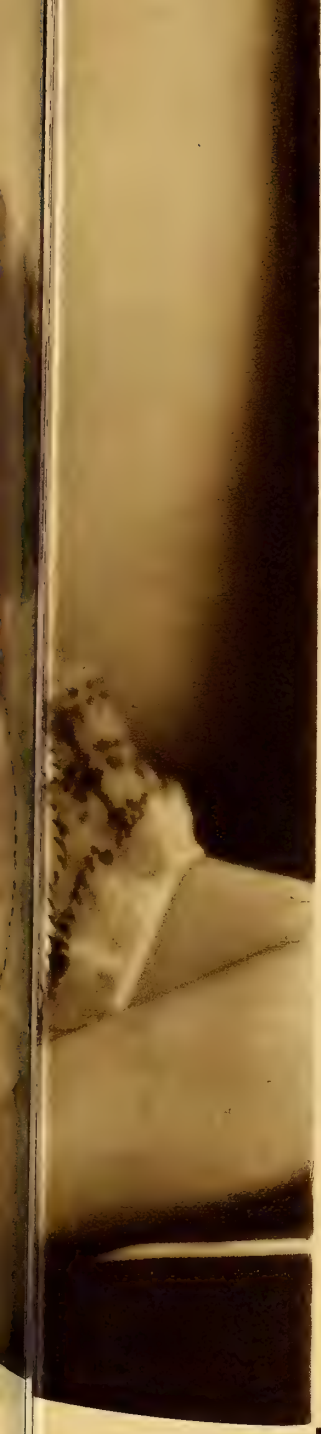
When she had her bath it was an event. John would offer one of his big fingers for her to clutch at with eager hands. And George adored to twist into a ridiculous Kewpie curl, the soft gold which covered her head.

When she had her sun bath in the garden the boys would leave their batting practice or the important business of patching a bike tire to watch her stretch and gurgle. And to marvel, silently, as she grew strong on the diet and routine prescribed by Doctor Sands, a Santa Monica baby specialist, and rigidly adhered to by Mrs. Temple.

Shirley began life surrounded by love. In the Temple household happiness was the rule. Consequently, it was natural for her to grow up imbued with a strong love of living, an innate love of life. And this is probably the most important quality she possesses today, the most important quality anyone can possess.

"When Shirley became old enough," Gertrude Temple says, "we used to go to the Santa Monica Athletic Club on Saturdays. It gave Mr. Temple, confined in the bank all week, a chance to have the sun and to swim. And, of course, the boys loved it.

"We had a fenced-in crib we used to put up on the sand. And the most important item of Shirley's clothing on such occasions was a big sunbonnet which protected her head and hair from the sun and her eyes from the glare."



A happy American family spending Sunday on the beach. A young mother and father anxious to give their three children every chance to grow up straight and strong. Never suspecting that within an unbelievably few years the speck of humanity under the big sunbonnet, intent upon sifting warm sand between her sturdy fingers, would cause them to be one of the most famous families in the land while she, herself, would be one of the greatest of all stars on the motion picture screen.

"Hey Mom," George Temple called one Sunday. "Mom, look at Shirley. She's trying to stand up!"

SURE ENOUGH there was Shirley pulling herself up on her feet, clutching feverishly to the crib railing. Her pink mouth was twisted with effort but her eyes shone with excitement.

"Shh-h-h," Mrs. Temple cautioned her husband and the boys, "let her alone. Don't let her think she's doing anything unusual."

Now Shirley was actually on her feet. She kicked out one small brown foot and at the same time tilted her head, turning to her family, laughing with pleasure. Then she flopped back onto the sand.

"She tried to dance," her big brother John insisted. "Did you see that? She really tried to dance!"

George Temple turned to his wife. "See that?" he asked, just as if they all hadn't been standing there staring.

MRS. TEMPLE nodded and smiled as women will when men turn proud. And hoped no one would notice the tears brimming in her eyes. She felt a little foolish, turning weepy. But she found something valiant in her baby trying to dance before she could stand. Also, it was as if a dream which she long since had put away—her busy life leaving her no time for dancing except in a casual, social way—had not died after all.

When Shirley was three she had her first dancing lesson.

The floor of that dancing class shone like a big piece of yellow satin. Prim chairs lined the walls. Grouped here and there were a few half-hearted potted palms. In one corner stood the piano.

"Children!" called the teacher, "Children, I want you to meet little Shirley Temple."

The girls curtsied. The boys stopped sliding across the floor long enough to bow stiffly, their hands in the approximate direction of their hearts.

Shirley stood in the doorway. Her dress of pale blue handkerchief linen tied on her round shoulders in two perky bows. She dropped her eyes and there was warm confusion in her cheeks.

The girls all watched her speculatively. They were ridiculously like women watching the new woman in any gathering. There was something faintly competitive in their eyes as they marked her dress and the soft longitudinal curl which ran across the top of her head.

The boys went back to their sliding. One boy, who wore a white sailor suit and had a whistle on a red cord about his neck which he wore tucked in his pocket, took Shirley's eye. It was this boy who finally slid clear across that floor, whereupon he blew his whistle in sheer triumph. Shirley talked about him all the way home. And always he was her very favorite.

"Your little girl is sure to love this class," one of the mothers assured Mrs. Temple politely that afternoon. "My daughter can't wait for Tuesdays. And Shirley is so pretty, such a dainty little lady, I imagine . . ."

Mrs. Temple looked up to make sure Shirley was not within earshot and discovered her out on the middle of the floor, surrounded by boys, her pretty shyness forgotten, she was sliding, too. Her arms outstretched like sails, doing her utmost to make better distance, and celebrating with a joyous "Whee," when she was partly successful.

A Message to Girls who "Help Out"

Ann says, "I honestly believe that having responsibilities makes one a better person."

Ann scored another hit in "Folies Bergere." Now she's in "Eight Bells" with John Buckler.

BY KATHERINE ALBERT

I have a message to all girls who "help out at home," to all girls and boys, too, who feel too keenly the burden of family responsibility and who cry out at the injustice of it saying, "If I were only on my own. If I could only have all my money. If I didn't need to stick at this miserable job. If, with not so many dependent upon me, I could take the chance of finding something else. If . . ." So futiley.

If you are one of the great horde of noble youngsters who contribute a part, or all, of your earnings to the support of your mother or father, brothers or sisters, you probably look with envy upon the picture stars—those gay and glamorous creatures who apparently haven't a care in the world. Well, don't do it. And particularly don't envy Ann Sothern, for she has been through what you're going through now. She knows your every problem—and knows it from experience. And how she has coped with it is, to me, one of the truly inspirational, truly great stories of Hollywood.

Anne has walked along the boulevards of Hollywood, up and down Broadway, with these words ringing in her ears, "If I don't get a job, my family doesn't eat! If I don't get a job my family doesn't eat!" Do you know how she felt? Have you ever known that same desperation? You can believe me when I say that nothing you secretly have thought or felt about this circumstance isn't known to Ann Sothern.

One day she said to me, "I honestly believe that having responsibilities is a good thing. I think it makes one a better person. Perhaps that is scant comfort. But it is the truth."

I looked at her beautiful, young face, her clear, intelligent eyes and I thought, "Is it possible that such a lovely girl, one whose face is so free from care-lines, could have known tremendous responsibility?"

That's when I began to work on this story. I did not get it from Ann. A few people who knew her well, who knew how courageous she had been, told it to me. I think that you thousands of brave girls like her should not be denied hearing it. (Continued on page 120)

Ann Sothern has had her share of family burdens, too

DO YOU BELIEVE THIS STORY?

"This house," I said to Bela Lugosi, "is it—is it—?" "It is haunted," said Lugosi. "Yes, please . . ." I hadn't heard that the house was haunted or I wouldn't have gone there.

I had approached it and, at first sight, it really looked harmless enough. A low, dull, red brick house crouched close to the earth on the edge of a precipice, shrouded in ivy, dark with trees.

The gates were locked. A "Beware of Dogs!" sign greeted me. From within came the baying of hounds.

I was admitted, finally, by a tall young person with a pale face and a pale mouth. Bela Lugosi's fourth wife.

I awaited him in the living-room—or could one call it a living room? There was a portrait of Lugosi on the walls—that too pallid face, those pale eyes, those bloodless lips, those predatory white hands . . .

There were other pictures on the walls—of Lugosi as "Dracula" . . . pictures of women with wild faces and distraught black hair and bared breasts and wild hands . . . the Lugosi coat of arms hung over the cold hearth . . . taking up one side of the room was a mammoth couch covered with a heavy rug. There were two indentations in that rug, concealing, or so it seemed, three separate boxes. Long narrow boxes—were they coffins?

I began to feel chilled and goose-fleshy. I remembered that Lugosi had had three wives. One stayed with him for a mere twenty-four hours. Where were they now?

I recalled, too, that he had come from the black mountains of Hungary, from the little mountain town of Lugos. The black mountains where dwelt Bram Stokers' dread hero, "Dracula" . . .

There came to my mind talks I have had with Lugosi in the past . . . the tales he told me of those vampires in the black mountains who kiss human beings into the semblance of death. Lugosi believes these stories.

All sorts of pale and monstrous thoughts crowded in on me as I waited for him. I thought of mouldering graveyards and shrieks in the night . . . the drip, drip, drip of blood—death . . . I looked up at the portrait of the man with the pale green face and the stretching hands and there was something in the atmosphere of that room that made the little, lonely human spirit whine in its thin envelope. . . .

I told myself I was ridiculous. There are no such things as vampire bats and spirits of the dead . . . that those three things over there covered with the heavy rug were couches, of course . . . the man Lugosi was a charming Hungarian gentleman who had played "Dracula" . . . and yet I can swear to you that there was something about that house, something in that room, something in the face of that young fourth wife that is not as you or I . . .

You who read can laugh this off, mockingly. My only answer can be to wish you, too, could stand in that room.

At last, Lugosi appeared. He has a beautiful courtesy. But I thought, his eyes are slightly sunken as with dreadful thoughts . . . he looks as though he never sleeps . . . his hair is dead against the thinness of his skull . . .

I said to him, trying to be casual and offhand, "My goodness, Mr. Lugosi, this house—is it haunted?"

"It is haunted," said Bela Lugosi. "Yes, please . . ."

I sat down in the nearest chair. I said, with another attempt at being conversational, "That huge couch over there—would there be coffins under that rug?"

I wished I had not asked that question, for Lugosi did not answer me. He smiled that strangely smileless smile of his—and did not answer. (Continued on page 89)

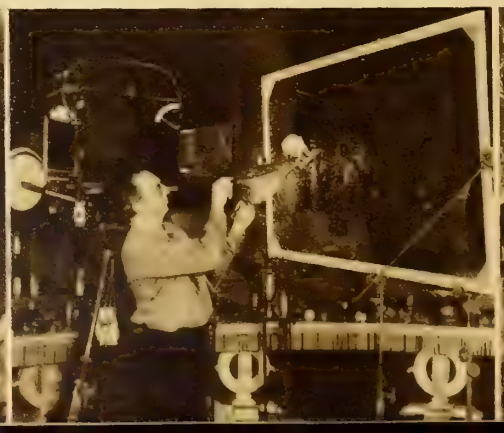
A DREAM COMES TRUE

BY WILLIAM FRENCH

You'll ask, "How did they do it?" when you see "A Mid-

They say Shakespeare wrote "A Midsummer Night's Dream" with his tongue in his cheek. The simple theatre of his day could not, of course, even approximate the elaborate scenes called for by the play. And the bard, so scholars tell us, took a wicked delight in writing just about the most fantastic drama theatre-goers have ever seen from his day to ours. However, the Elizabethan audiences were quite easy to please, where scenery and props and such were concerned. A simple placard on a badly lighted stage, saying "This is a forest," and—lo!—it was a forest, to them.



Lest we sound pretty patronizing to those easily satisfied—but highly imaginative audiences—let us hasten to add that the staging of the "Dream," even in our day of mechanical wizardry, is no child's play. Which brings us to the Warner Brothers lot, where Shakespeare's "Dream" has been filmed and where a whole department of "special effects men" are wont to regard William the Great as "just another of them writers."

When Shakespeare planned his special brand of grief for "swaggering, homespun players," he hadn't figured on being aided by our local "props." He knew nothing of Max Reinhardt, of Nijinska, of Hollywood jealousies, nor of the fact that the whole country would be waiting for the screen to stub its toe on one of his tidbits.

He couldn't have anticipated that, when the movies engaged the great German maestro to interpret his work, filmdom's hat would automatically be thrown into the ring, and that the American public would polish its critical "specs."

Nor could he know that his movie future would depend, not upon the verdict of the great Shakespearean authorities and critics, but upon the reception of his plays by the average American working-girl—that warm-hearted patron of flickering art, whose dimes and nickels have built movie palaces and made super-super productions possible. Girls who could find neither the time nor the patience to wade through hundreds of pages of fine print in search of hidden gems of thought. But the producers knew whom they must please, and were determined to give these girls a thrill of beauty and fantasy, with plenty of romance and color thrown in.

The "Dream" was going to be a super-colossal production, to include everything from electrical research to slapstick comedy.

So, while the lovers of unadulterated Shakespeare were sadly shaking their heads in dismay at the casting of ultramodern, two-fisted, gum-chewing Jimmy Cagney as Bottom, the smart boys at the studio were capitalizing on what they had learned from the success of the colored cartoons and animated "Mother Goose" rhymes.

They had discovered that American audiences loved fantasies (as proved by the popularity of "Mickey Mouse" and the "Silly Symphonies") and were going to make the "impossible" scenes of the "Dream"—such as fairies popping out of falling stars and sliding down moonbeams and humans changing into animals—into a symphony of mystery and beauty, (Continued on page 106)

Bob Montgomery holds forth on what to do in case of fire

An Amusing Story About Robert . . .

BY KAY OSBORN

It was the day before Christmas and Bob Montgomery was in no mood to be serious. Since Bob usually takes his interviewing very seriously, he was in no mood to be interviewed either. I could see that the moment I walked into his attractive new dressing-room, (pine panneled and decorated in excellent early American). His secretary was tying red satin bows on fifty (at least) imposing bottles of Scotch — and Bob was seated on the floor examining the contents of a large basket full of expensive-looking bottles — champagne, brandy, sparkling burgundy and so on. I went "Oh!" and "Ah!" and Bob said, "Do you like it? It's for Ray June, my cameraman, because he likes nice things."

And then because I could think of nothing as smart as that to say back to him, I didn't say anything.

"Sit down and have a glass of sherry, and don't ask me a single question unless you want to get thrown out! And don't cry about it either, 'cause I'll give you a story some other time, I promise. In the meantime, it's Christmas, or practically, and I haven't yet decided what to give the fire department."

A sip of the sherry had already loosened my tongue and tightened up my brain cell. "Why don't you give them some of that fire-water?" I suggested.

"YOU KNOW what I really should give them?" he said. "I should give them a swift kick in the pants for having spoiled one of the most peaceful, comfortable evenings that I ever contemplated. And also for having punctured my ego in a very cruel fashion. A lot of people have respect for us movie stars. Wouldn't you think a fire department would? Didn't I tell you about the fire I had up at my place last month?"

"I haven't been to a good fire in ages," I said. "Tell me about it. Christmas is so depressing. Maybe a good fire will cheer us up."

"Well, it was this way," said Bob.

And this is the way it was, in Mr. Montgomery's own inimitable manner of speaking:

One evening, Mrs. Montgomery's sister, Martha Bryan, was visiting us. They were downstairs in the living-room chattering—you know how women chatter—and I just had to get away from it. I went into my library upstairs. How calm and still it was there —a man's haven. I was reading peacefully, luxuriously, when the house phone beside me buzzed. I picked it up. "Yes?" I said cooly.

It was Betty. I had known it would be Betty. "Bob, dear, don't you think you had better come downstairs?"

"Betty, I said, "I am reading." My tone was very definitely final, and so was the click of the receiver as I put it down. That'd show them! I went back to my book. But the buzzer sounded again in less than a half hour. That would be Betty again, or maybe Martha. It was Martha. "Oh, Bob, why don't you come downstairs? Please hurry."

"My dear sister-in-law," I said. "I am reading!" Still controlling myself nobly, I put the receiver down again, very softly. The softness and gentleness of my refusals would impress them much more than any belligerence.

Well, this went on for at least two hours, and all through it, I somehow managed to keep my dignity intact, "No, Betty, I am reading. No, Martha, I am reading." It was like a

Jean Harlow's "reading in bed" divorce from Hal Rosson was granted without protest. Here is Jean in court with her mother, Mrs. Bello.

Well, an enjoyable time must have been had by someone at the elaborate party Kay Francis threw recently, but we doubt if that someone was the hostess. Miss F. suffered a cold in the "doze" and, after the ball was over, repaired to a hospital. Next day she rated a berating from the Health Department, which inquired as to how she could be so selfish as to spread flu germs among her guests who, in turn, would doubtless pass 'em to all and sundry. But before Kay departed for the sanatorium, she had a few words with a newspaperman whom she claimed had been uninvited by her. She even went so far as to accuse a friend of bringing the representative of the Fourth Estate. The friend was duly peeved, demanded an apology for being responsible for a "crasher" and, having received a retraction, turned on her satin, spike heel and departed in high dudgeon. Then, the writing fraternity went into a huddle and claimed it had befriended the hostess in times of stress and accident and it was a heck of a way to reciprocate favors received; that is, by insulting one of their members. Well, the whole business was fraught with "the nerve of you" and "how dare you" and what-have-youse! We'll venture to predict that Miss Francis will think a long time before she stages another pah-ty, or else, she'll curb her temper or cure her cold or do just about everything she didn't do the last time.

Speaking of the lady known as Kay, she and Maurice Chevalier are thataway—or, more accurately, are still thataway. Just before the Frenchman departed this land of equal rights and unequal fights, the pair enjoyed a three-hour dinner at the Café Roxy, after which the young woman saw the object of her affections off on the train. This romance is sorta recurrent—say, like hay fever.

M-G-M is mighty proud of Robert Taylor, the youth who is going places cinematically at a rapid pace. He seems to be going in the same direction socially, too, for Bob is seen here, there and almost everywhere with the town's most pulchritudinous. Immediately before she departed for Europe, he squired Isabel Jewell to a cocktail party, from which he took her to the choo-choo and then dated Jean Parker at the King's Club for the evening. What? No Virginia Bruce?

Since Isabel Jewell's name is up for discussion, the poor child was on the verge of tears at leaving Hollywood. Her romance with Lee Tracy seems definitely and permanently over and, those in the know claim that Isabel is taking a broken heart to mend in foreign ports. The gal is a great favorite. Even the hard-boiled columnists go out of their way to put in a word for her. Just as she was about to leave, one of 'em remarked, "I read in a contemporary's column that you were out with Tracy

To which Miss Jewell sobbingly replied, "That's just the trouble—I wasn't with him."

Tullio Carminati and Mary Ellis also are said to "care." Anna-hoo, the pair are as inseparable these days as ham and eggs, pork and beans or Crawford and Tone. Incidentally, Tullio button-holed a cameraman t'other evening and reprimanded, "That picture you took of me was horrible. You should have had it retouched. Remember, I am an arteest and must have protection." Tch, tch, as if a mere photographer would have a sense of values!

"The Call of the Wild" company was in a dreadful dilemma—in fact, it threatened to be a major calamity. Though Clark Gable, Loretta Young, Jack Oakie and several others were in the cast, one important role was not filled. The story called for a jack-rabbit, but one could not be found for love or money! Finally, after much brow-beating and heavy thinking, the director hit upon the solution. Taking a meek old tabby cat, he tied on some floppy paper ears—and it looked as wild as any jack-rabbit you'd ever hope to see! After all, "The show must go on!"

Will Rogers and Will Hays have something else in common. They're both ardent standard-bearers for the white flag of purity! The gum-chewing Will was passing on the rushes of his latest picture, "Doubting Thomas," not long ago, and looked very doubtful indeed at some shots of Helen Flint, Fox's newest import from the New York stage. The upshot was that Miss Flint was recalled for retakes—with a good inch added to the décolleté of her gowns!

But in spite of the turmoil and titters that the decency squad and their ilk have stirred up in Hollywood, it's been proved to be good business. The public these days are just as enraptured with "little women" as they were with the gay, fallen ladies of yesterday.

Though she doesn't appear in many pictures, still statistics show that practically every member of the stronger sex who sees her, has a weak moment and writes to tell Toby how irresistibly cute she is. But there's always the tragic side to even the happiest situations, and in this case it's that Toby writhes at the thought of being "cute." She wants to be intensely dramatic and emotional!

You see, his fond parents gave him a small bank awhile ago, with the idea that every time there were loose pennies around, they should be dropped into it, thereby building up a neat little nest egg for the offspring. But the other day, curiosity got the best of them after Sally bet Harry that there was at least twenty dollars in it. So in the dark of night, they hastily pried it open—and found just $1.73! That's the way with banks these days.

Gene Raymond is back in Hollywood, slightly the worse for wear and tear, but grinning happily. He's just completed his first personal appearance tour—and did his fans turn out in a big way! In Chicago, the theatre door was shattered by a stampede and in Detroit sixteen girls "rushed" his dressing-room and departed with every detachable item in the place for a souvenir—including Gene's tie. "But, really," Gene assured us, "it was all the most hectic, happy time of my life!"

Frances Dee has never put much stock in these fortune tellers who do such a thriving business in Hollywood. But one afternoon, at the insistence of a friend, she succumbed to the lure of a crystal gazer. The seer looked long and hard into the glass ball, then said in a hushed tone, "I see a man in uniform . . . he is near your automobile . . . something will happen that will cost you money . . ."

Frances paid the required money, and chuckling over her gullibility, went out to her car. There, leaning against it, was a copper—who gave her a ticket for parking too long!

Paul Kelly has for years had a suppressed desire for—of all things —a part in a "Western"! Most actors wrinkle their Grecian profiles in disdain at the mere mention of such things, but Paul jumped at the chance to be in "When a Man's a Man," and ride a bucking broncho across the sage-brush. You see, Paul was brought up in Manhattan and horseback riding is the height of luxury to him.

For nonchalance you can't beat Fred Keating. After the big apartment fire in Hollywood the other day, in which several film folks lost valuable property, the actor and a friend were talking over what they would do had they been caught in the burning building. His friend said he'd grab his purse and account book and run, but Fred said all he'd grab would be his cane, without which he is lost. Imagine the debonair appearance that would make—Fred sauntering out of the flames, clad in polka-dotted pajamas and swinging a cane!

Tullio Carminati has always admired Charlie Chaplin, considering him the most gifted of any actor on the screen. It was beyond his wildest dreams, though, that he would ever meet the famous man—but lo! on his arrival in Hollywood from Italy, Tullio found himself in the same party as Chaplin. Later that evening, Chaplin sat next to him on the long drive home in their hostess' car, and chatted glibly all the way. But Tullio didn't understand one word of English!

It's a long climb from a coal miner to a movie star, but that's what George Murphy has accomplished—and his pals back in Portage, Pennsylvania, are prouder of the fact than he is. George was a mining engineer, but worked for a long time in the soft coal mines at Portage, then suddenly decided to give acting a try for an avocation. Now it's his vacation, and coal mining's his avocation.

Marguerite Churchill and George O'Brien are Hollywood's Happiest once again. Since they lost their baby a while back, this happy-go-lucky couple suddenly changed into heavy-hearted people. But now they're almost their former joyous selves because—of course!—and sometime in the early summer.

Garbo seems the name of a myth, doesn't it? But now it's the name of a social butterfly! Greta is finally listening to the pleas of her few close friends who have been urging her to get out and around and have a good time. The Garbo legend is dissolving into thin air as a result, for though she isn't exactly kicking her heels and giving vent to gutteral hotchas, yet she is being seen around at favorite nite spots, laughing and talking and evidently having a swell time. What next? First Garbo Talks—then Garbo Laughs, and now—Garbo Laughs in Public!

Mebbe you've heard rumors of "the power of love?" But this happens to be a fact about Ruby Keeler and how the emotion reacts on her. When her little sister had to go to the hospital for a tonsil operation, Ruby decided she'd have an operation, too, just to keep her company! So she had a bone fixed in her foot, but before it was healed (no pun) hubby Al Jolson remarked that he'd like to take in the races out at Santa Anita, but not having Ruby along made it kinda lonesome. So what? Ruby calls for an ambulance, a wheel-chair and a pair of crutches and goes right along with Al to keep him company!

Jean Harlow and Bill Powell are really thataway, in spite of all Hollywood's supercilious, cynical sneers. In fact, that grand sense of humor which so attracted them to each other, simply thrives on their neighbors' attitude toward their romance. We'll betcha wedding bells will soon be clanging! Of course, the fact that Jean's divorce from Hal Rosson isn't final in California until next year, may delay things.

Anita Page has always been known as "mamma and papa's girl" in Hollywood, as she is the most closely watched over gal in town. But she gave the family the slip not long ago, and dashed down to old Mexico with Nacio Herb Brown, where she not only married him but divorced him—not on the same trip, though. Well, Anita's sudden spurt of independence surprised her as much as anyone, and she also found that it was rather fun. The result is a new Page gal—and that mind of her own has added charm to her other attractive features, so much so, in fact, that local seers are prophesying a bigger and better screen future for her.

From being one of the town's most ardent and indefatigable night-clubbers, Glenda Farrell has suddenly developed into a home-body that can't be budged from her fireside by anything less than the homestead burning down around her ears. You see, Glenda's just had her new house completed, which she helped to design, and which she furnished all by herself. "There's no place like home," is not just an idle rumor she claims.

Movie actors and boy scouts both should have "Be Prepared" for a motto. Consider the case of Jean Dixon, for instance. In the picture "Mister Dynamite," she suddenly learned that it was necessary for her to play the piano in a scene that had to do with the solving of a baffling murder mystery. The scene could not be "faked," either—with the result that Jean spent an entire day and night with a music instructor learning the necessary movements and timing.

But Esther Ralston proved that no boy scout had anything on her. It was in the same picture, and she was required to jump off a balcony railing. Esther surprised everyone by doing the perilous jump without a moment's hesitation, but with grace and agility. You see, when just a little girl, she toured all over the country in a vaudeville act with her family, who were known as "The Seven Ralstons," an acrobatic troupe. Esther, by the by, is seen constantly in the company of one Bill Morgan, and the gossips have it that you'll hear wedding bells any day now.

Station KFWB, the Warner Brothers broadcasting station, had its tenth birthday party recently. All the Warner stars and officials turned out en masse to celebrate. Dolores Costello Barrymore and Monte Blue, who opened the station ten years ago, were there to say a few words.

Dolores looked beautiful but sad, and it is known among her friends that she is very unhappy about John continuing to absent himself from home. It is quite evident that the separation is more than a business one, especially since Dolores did not rush to his bedside in New York when he was ill upon his arrival from England. It is really sad that this marriage seems headed for the rocks but perhaps it may yet be smoothed out.

PERSONAL ITEM: Myrna Loy, please come back to the screen soon. All your fans are waiting eagerly for that promised sequel to "The Thin Man" and you've never been a holder-outer before. Where are you anyway, huh?

For a young man who vehemently says that he has no time for romance, Gene Raymond certainly gets himself talked about plenty! Just as Hollywood was getting all steamed up about his beauing Ann Sothern around, Gene quietly appears the other evening with Janet Gaynor, thus throwing everyone into a state. However, there might be a bit of publicity coincidence about two-soming with Ann in that they are doing "Hooray for Love." What do you think? It's a good old Hollywood publicity gag, you know.

Mary Ellis paused only long enough in New York en route to England, to see a few dozen interviewers and to have an over-zealous press agent pull a fast one on her. We were sitting in her apartment when the phone rang. Mary hopped up and ran for the phone in the next room. We couldn't help hearing her rather astonished answers to questions being put to her at the other end of the wire. When she came back, she sat down and giggled. "That is the most premature arrangement for a houseparty I ever have had made for me," she exclaimed. "My English agent wants to know when I can entertain members of the English press for the week-end in my Sussex country home—and I don't even sail until tomorrow!" And they say English picture methods are behind ours!

Rarely has there been such regret at completing a picture, as was evidenced on the "Midsummer Night's Dream" set. All the gang seemed to hate to put away their Shakespearean togs and more than one felt it would be a great loss not to be able to caper about in the beautiful woodland setting.

Joe E. Brown, Jim Cagney and Dick Powell are such Shakespeare hounds that they are planning to form a "Midsummer Night's Dream" club, the purpose of which is to do a stage version of the drama each year. All the cast members and the technical crew have promised to join it.

Even screen stars get bitten by the Shakespearean bug—it used to be reserved for the climax to a stage career!

Jessie Matthews, who made such a hit with her dancing in "Evergreen" must have been hearing all the American suggestions that she be teamed with Fred Astaire. Anyhow, Jessie is stalling Gaumont-British on re-signing for more pictures over there, and is said to be listening to more than one bid from Hollywood. Astaire and she would make a grand dancing pair. And 'tis said that RKO realizes it and has offered the highest bid so far.

It's not likely that you will be seeing Lilian Harvey in American films soon again. La Harvey, despite her pleasure at doing her last picture with Columbia, is slated for a good contract with her old love, UFA. She will return to them upon completion of her present London engagement. No doubt Willy Frisch had more than a little influence upon her re-signing for German pictures.

Marlene Dietrich told the New York press that she wouldn't wear trousers while she was in town because she thought it might shock everyone. Little did she think what a jolt she gave the same members of the press with her bizarre, white-faced make-up and heavy, lacquered lashes. She's much too good-looking to affect such a radically different cosmetic mask.

Speaking of the Dietrich, this amusing comment was heard at a luncheon of fashion editors and publicity women. Dietrich was expected to be one of the guests of honor but did not show up. However, midway of the luncheon, Irene Dunne appeared and was introduced by the inimitable Elsa Maxwell. One member whispered audibly, "How thrilling. It's much more exciting to have Irene Dunne than Dietrich!" RKO's "Roberta" had put Irene in the "glamor" group as far as this fashion expert was concerned!

Those rumors of a possible reconciliation between Cary Grant and Virginia Cherrill can be checked off permanently. Virginia received a California decree on March 26th. Virginia, pleading illness, had only a brief session with the judge, just long enough to list some of her grievances against Cary. Cary, meanwhile, has been beauing several local beauties about town. (Continued on page 123)

The opening of the new Café Roxy found Jack LaRue and Renee Torres in a smiling tête-à-tête. The girls all smile like that at Jack, he's a real charmer!

You don't have to guess who this smiling lady is at the right—of course, the nimble Mr. Fred Astaire's mother. Fred is showing her the town.

HOW "SEQUOIA" WAS MADE

BY CAROLINE SOMERS HOYT

Once Malibu, the deer, and Gato, the puma, were on friendly terms, it was up to Jean Parker to work her way into their hearts. Feeding them religiously every day did it.

The day after the preview of "Sequoia" in Hollywood a friend of Russell Hardie met him at the studio.

"I saw you in the picture last night," his friend said.

"Did you?" asked Russell, genuinely amazed. "How could anyone even notice the human actors in that picture? I didn't even see myself. I was too busy watching Gato and Malibu."

If you've seen "Sequoia"—and if you haven't you're missing one of the rare treats of the cinema —you know that Russell Hardie is one actor who speaks the truth.

In fact, "Sequoia" is one picture about which the truth may be told. I was disappointed when that marvelous film of the love between a puma and a deer—the deadliest of natural enemies—was released that M-G-M did not give us a little introduction, telling how the picture was made. For the story of its making is almost as beautiful as the story in the film itself. In fact, it's the same story.

WHEN Vance Hoyt's book "Malibu," from which "Sequoia" was taken, was first bought, the studio planned to do its usual faking. The shooting schedule was twenty-one days. In order to live up to that schedule, trick camera shots would have to be used, for the story required that a baby puma nuzzle its dead mother; that a puma and a deer become friends; that a deer stamp out the life of a snake with his front feet.

Obviously, if no trickery were used, these things could not be accomplished in twenty-one days. So they planned to resort to the split-screen shot, a process whereby one-half the film is masked, a fence is placed lengthwise (Continued on page 96)

There were no "fake" shots in this remarkable film

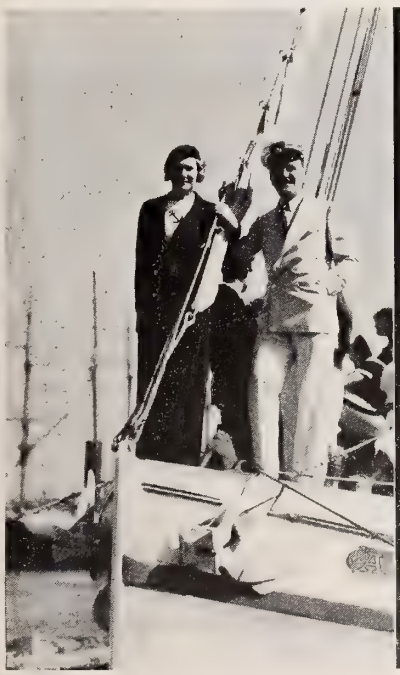
A BEAUTIFUL ROMANCE

Frank Morgan's love has withstood every possible test



Frank Morgan said it might be a good idea if I didn't call him and his wife "the happiest married couple in Hollywood." So many couples have been called that just before the divorce papers were filed. Not that Frank is afraid. He is afraid of nothing concerning his romance. He knows that the beauty and depth of his marriage is something which cannot be shaken. For their tremendous relationship is built upon a firm rock, hewn out by suffering and heartache.

You see them in Hollywood today, living in a charming house across the street from Freddie March's home. They're just rounding the twenty-one-year mark of marriage and yet every small trip they make together, every week-end spent in the country is a second honeymoon. You know that they adore each other. But what you don't know is the amazing story of the early days of their romance. For Frank Morgan has never told it before. MODERN SCREEN feels proud to be able to give you this real-life romance.

Alma and Frank met the night she was graduated from a private school in New York. At the party at Sherry's after the graduation exercises, Frank asked her for a dance. "Just cut in any time," she said. He didn't like that. It was as if someone had said, "Come to see us any time you're passing by." So he didn't dance with her.

A FEW WEEKS later they were at a party together. And in spite of the fact that he thought she was a snippy kid and she thought he was pretty proud of himself some mysterious destiny drew them together. They sat out a dance, wandered onto the porch steps of a house whose occupants they didn't know. While they were talking, a little boy rounded the corner of the house, and said, "Come look, Mummy and Dad." And then he realized that the couple to whom he had spoken were not his mother and father. He apologized. The young couple laughed. "Do you suppose that's an omen?" Frank asked. It was.

They saw a lot of each other after that and they knew almost without (Continued on page 121)

You heard a press agent's story of these film scandals

If publicity men had handled the Arbuckle case, Fatty would have been cleared.

Bebe Daniels, jailed for speeding, had the incident turned into a farce by press agent.

Valentino's marriage to Rambova caused trouble but his press agent saved the day!

WHAT REALLY HAPPENED

BY ALAN ST. JAMES

IF A motion picture star kills her husband tomorrow morning, a five-dollar bet will get you fifty that one of the first three people on the scene will be the studio publicity trouble-shooter.

Unheralded and unsung—and darned glad of it—are the members of this small band of laborers in the vineyard of Cinemaland. To the rest of the motion picture industry their work is almost as mysterious as the real-life mysteries in which they are involved. To the men themselves it is a hybrid cross between a swell game and a confounded nuisance.

Don't get the idea that these industrious gentlemen are paid their salaries by the Hollywood studios to obstruct the course of justice. Not at all. But motion picture personalities, the stars and starlets, represent enormous financial investments to the producers. Nothing is so fragile as a Hollywood reputation; compared to it gossamer has the textile strength of sailcloth. The newspaper-reading world is always ready to believe the worst about any screen player, and, even if the subsequent evidence establishes the complete innocence of the victim, there is still a large percentage of the skeptical public that will stick its tongue in cheek and murmur something about "where there is smoke there must be fire."

It is better to avoid unfavorable publicity at the outset than to try to establish innocence afterward. Hence, the afore-mentioned trouble-shooters. Every big producing organization has one or more of them on the payroll and there have been busy seasons when they earned many times as much as they were paid.

The requirements for the profession are many and exacting. First of all, it goes without saying that the candidate must have brains. Next, and almost as important, he must have personality. Thirdly, he must know everybody of importance—and many who are not—in Hollywood and Los Angeles newspaper, screen, civic and political circles. He must have had practical experience both in swaying public opinion and in the ways of moviedom. He must be able to keep his mouth shut, drunk or sober. And he must be available twenty-four hours a day.

POLICE captains and managing editors are the play-day pals of these lads; criminal lawyers and mayors' secretaries answer to their first names. Even the bosses of the film industry are shrewd enough to fraternize with these men—for who knows where (Continued on page 84)

The Lowdown on Hollywood Chorines

Here's a perfect Hollywood chorus lovely, Ethelreda Leopold from Warner's "Go Into Your Dance."

A line-up on Warner's lot of the fairest chorines from nearly every state. Pretty, wot?

BY HAMMEL SCHMIDT

"ALL ready girls! In your places!" The scene is the huge barn-like dancing stage at Warner Bros. studio. The shouting is that of dance director Bobby Connelly's assistant. The occasion was the "call" for dancing girls to be used in the musical numbers of Rudy Vallee's latest picture "Sweet Music."

A disillusioned pianist (all studio pianists have that "What a life!" Ned Sparkian expression on their faces) puffs away on a perennial cigarette, barely allowing his weary fingers to brush over the keys for the necessary notes.

Feminine robes, fur coats, wrap-arounds, start flying in the general direction of a row of chairs along the side of the wall. A half-hundred of the most breath-taking examples of feminine pulchritude walk, glide and wiggle their ways saucily to the center of the dance stage. Among them, beauty queens who have won every beauty contest from the sun-tanned shores of Alabama to the snow-covered villages of Alaska. An array of luscious loveliness that would cause any Sultan to hock his kingdom for the privilege of having them in his harem. They are seductively bedecked in scanty gingham rompers, bathing suits, or a dozen and one what-cha-ma-callits designed especially by the wearer for rehearsal wear.

. . . A TOUR OF

Alert, up-to-the-minute reviews of the screen's latest offerings

★★★★ Private Worlds
(Walter Wanger-Paramount)

Whether this picture is a tribute to Mr. Wanger's business sagacity or not is beside the point, for its production proves that the gentleman is serious about bringing "better things" to the screen.

The theme deals with the idea that each and every one of us lives in a little private world of his own, crowded with inhibitions, frustrations, secret loves, etc., with the story itself unreeled in a hospital housing mental defectives. Thanks to Director Gregory La Cava, there is nothing morbid about the characters or situations, and the picture is studded with such fine performances that it is difficult to decide who rates the first gold star. Suffice it to say that you are going to be enthralled by Charles Boyer—charming, debonaire, suave and sincere. Once again Claudette Colbert comes through with a beautiful, simply delineated characterization. Then there are Helen Vinson, Esther Dale, Jean Rouverol, Sam Hinds and Big Boy Williams —all excellent. The tale abounds in love, intrigue and suspense and rips the veil from us poor mortals, showing how petty we can be.

★★★ Go Into Your Dance
(Warners)

If you're a Jolson-Keeler fan, you're going to go for this celluloider in a big way, for when Al isn't doing his mammy-singing, Ruby is hard at it with her buck-and-wing routines and then, just for good measure, they do their stuff together. The backstage story and other characters are sacrificed for Ruby and Al, with a double-dealing, jealous torch singer and a pair of gangsters left up in the air. Maybe beautiful girls, pretty tunes and clever dance routines, expertly created by Bobby Connelly, are more interesting than plot in this instance. First-rate acting performances are given by Glenda Farrell and Patsy Kelly, who appear all too infrequently. Helen Morgan is literally and figuratively the "heavy," and is permitted to lilt only one indigo tune. The picture itself is fast-moving, wise-cracking and elaborately mounted and should prove a money-maker for the Brothers Warner and the Jolson family.

★★★ LADDIE
(RKO)

You won't regret seeing this picture, though there's not a thrilling or breathless moment in it. The story is as quiet and simple as its scene—a rambling old farm in Indiana, where Laddie's God-fearing but gentle parents have brought up their large family.

John Beal is "Laddie," but does not live up to the reputation which he acquired from his film début in "The Little Minister." Gloria Stuart is appealing in crinolines and poke-bonnets and gives a convincing performance as the distraught damsel, while Dorothy Peterson, as the mother, is splendid in her role. But the biggest applause goes to the littlest player, six-year-old Virginia Weidler, who is going to make Miss Temple look to her laurels from now on. Personality-plus is in every action of hers, and written all over her serious, small face with its twinkling black eyes.

(Paramount)

This picture deserves mention for one small (as to stature) reason —Dixie Lee. For the rest of it, we regret to say, is just too, too bad —and this in spite of the fact that Joe Morrison, erstwhile heart-throbber, and Gracie Allen and George Burns, famous giggle-getters, are among those present.

The plot, if any, has to do with a wrong-side-of-the-track gal aiming to marry the judge's son. The suspense, as you can imagine, is something terrific.

Well, it was nice to meet Dixie Lee, anyhow. If she isn't going places in pictures, the industry must be nearsighted.

TODAY'S TALKIES

BY REGINA CANNON

Read MODERN SCREEN'S Movie Scoreboard, page 42, for famous critics' ratings of current pictures.

★★★ Princess O'Hara

While this picture is not particularly potent as either a laugh or a tear-inducer, it has sufficient of each to put it in the above-average-entertainment class. There's the Sweet Young Thing (Jean Parker) who would rather be independent than comfortable, the racketeer who in reality is a softie (Chester Morris) and Henry Armetta playing H. A. in his usual gay, inimitable manner.

The story itself is reminiscent of "Little Miss Marker," that is if lit-tul Missy had been permitted to live long enough to grow up, for the heroine is purer than that highly-advertised brand of soap. Although the idea seems stereotyped, the tale itself is an "original," the originality asserting itself in an unexpected finish, which will surprise and delight you. You'll like Chester Morris in this tale. Miss Parker, too, does a creditable piece of work and Mr. Armetta—well, you know Mr. Armetta—he just couldn't be anything but good.

(Warners)

Even Frank Borzage's direction could not save this stupid story of a woman who loves a ne'er-do-well and marries him to help him stand on his own feet. It's all very noble of Kay Francis to sit alone, silently weeping, as George Brent reels through the reels. He's just a lit-tul rascal is Georgie, what with busting up "V" formations in aerial shows and running a roadster into a crowded amusement park! Of course, an awful lot of his antics could be charged to arrested mental development, but for purposes of "characterization," he is checked off as the Peck's Bad Boy type; you know, the mischievous prank-player. Well, let it be said that it would take someone with a deal more charm than Brent to put it over. As to Miss Francis, she is indeed the popular conception of a socialite plus the valedictorian of a diction school. And her little backless bungalow aprons are something to attract at least the iceman! Warren William plays the benevolent friend who is a hound for punishment and rates almost as much of it as does—say, the audience.

★★ Let's Live Tonight
(Columbia)

If you're shopping for some pure, unadulterated romance, this picture will be worth the price. Lilian Harvey is the essence of love's young dream, fragile and lovely in diaphanous chiffon with diamonds aglitter in her golden curls. The suave Tullio Carminati is the cause of her girlish heart going pitter-patter, wooing her as he does with his devastating accent. 'Tis true, he loves her and leaves her, but that is only to prove that the course of true love never runs smooth—or something.

Monte Carlo, fragrant gardens and yachts adrift on moonlit waters—the setting is completely there. And if you're not subject to attacks of nostalgia or sea-sickness, you should find it all highly agreeable entertainment.

(Paramount)

If you have good strong ribs, you'll be safe at this show, for we give you fair warning the picture is a strain on 'em. It's packed with hilarious situations, quite a few wise-cracks and competent comedy performances by every player. In fact, you'll find yourself laughing right through the dry spots of the story from force of habit.

Patricia Ellis surprises with an intelligently played dumb heiress, who has cost her poor papa, George Barbier, many a dollar and not a few gray hairs because of her susceptibility to any man in any uniform—be it doorman, postman or policeman. Cesar Romero causes the biggest rumpus, though, when he dazzles Pat with a rented aviation suit, then leaves his distraught "gang" (Continued on page 118)

I could have loved these other five men, too! says Norma Shearer, one of Hollywood's happily married stars

Norma was a flame the other day.

Every exciting woman is half a dozen other women combined in one. Sometimes one mood is uppermost, sometimes another.

I have seen Norma in many moods . . . as the vital and efficient star preparing for a new production . . . as the gracious hostess . . . as small Irving's competent mother . . . as a girl lazing on the beach. . . .

The other day the actress was uppermost in Norma. She wore a tea-gown of some incredible shade of pale flame, gold ornaments at the throat, gold-girdled, gold-sandalled. Her lovely, rich brown hair hung loosely to her shoulders. We talked together in her new dressing-room on the M-G-M lot . . . a dressing-room all crystal and strange green, pervaded with that same pale flame shade . . . there was something in the atmosphere that day that suggested the perfumes of applause and roses, romance and strange adventuring.

Norma said, suddenly, "I shall always find men attractive. An actress, an artist should live colorfully and dangerously in his or her imagination. And, if one is in love with one man, loves deeply, that should make all men seem more attractive.

"The same is true of children. Very often children, as a whole, may

"I first fell in love when I was eight. I have been in love with someone ever since. . . ."

Adrian appeared at this revealing moment to show Norma some of the dramatic sketches he has made for the elaborate costumes of "Marie Antoinette" which is to be Norma's next picture. And for which she is having headdresses made, sketches drawn, materials carefully selected.

When he had gone, Norma poured sherry into two tiny jewelled glasses and said, "I remember when I was in the second grade at school . . . there I met the first object of my affections. He had red hair and didn't know that I was on earth. And then, a little later, a soft young cheek held close enough to mine for me to feel the warmth . . . asking eyes and tender goodbyes and funny little twisted gold rings worn on the 'right finger'. And still later, in New York, a little more grown-up, getting my first thrills when I was taken out by a young sophisticate, terribly impressive, with shiny black hair and dancing feet, he was a Wall Street boy. Then, hot summer nights on the Biltmore roof, Park Avenue and a rich man's spoiled son with football games and tête-à-tête teas at the Ritz . . . more farewells and promises 'never to forget' . . . and then, Hollywood!

"Hollywood with men who have been chosen from all parts of the world for their charm, their appeal.

"I have been fortunate. I can think easily of five men whom I have found attractive, each in a different way. Five men with whom it was easy to pretend that I was in love . . .

"There was Leslie Howard . . . Leslie, true spiritual, who can wear the lace frills and bend the knee with such grace (Continued on page 95)

Claudette Colbert is fighting for her life—her individual life, her private life

THE PRIVATE LIFE OF Claudette

CLAUDETTE COLBERT is fighting for her very life these days. Not for her physical life. But, just as important, or even more important in the long run, for her individual life, her private life.

Some girls in Hollywood ask nothing beyond their stardom; they're entirely satisfied to live for their careers. Others keep right on living their own lives, doing whatever they want to do without any regard for the way the spotlight in which they live distorts their actions. They have thick skins. They can take it.

Claudette belongs in neither of these groups. Away from the studios she is temperamentally unsuited to everything a movie star should be. Stardom in itself never would satisfy her. She needs many real and warm interests. But it is with difficulty that she maintains these interests. For when the things she does, while living her own life, remaining true to old friends, and indulging in simple pleasures are misconstrued and falsely colored, it concerns her.

Not long after Claudette had finished "The Gilded Lily" and before she started work in "Private Worlds," Daisy and Paul Lukas suggested that she drive to San Francisco with them. They had to meet Daisy's brother who was arriving from Hungary.

Claudette was delighted to go along. She felt the need of a few days' holiday with such congenial friends and she looked forward to a change of scene after weeks of intensive work in the studios.

On their way home they were stopped for speeding. The officer took Paul's name and then learned that the car he was driving was Claudette's. They had taken her car because it offered better luggage accommodations.

"I'M CLAUDETTE COLBERT," Claudette offered in explanation from the rear seat where she and Daisy Lukas were riding. The officer smiled. The fine was paid. And they went on to Del Monte where they stayed for the night and continued on to Hollywood the next day. When they arrived the newsboys were shouting headlines: "Colbert and Lukas caught speeding; movie stars returning from San Francisco caught near Del Monte."

The story went on to say that Mr. Lukas had been driving Miss Colbert's car and that, unfortunately, the names of the other couple were not learned.

"It was pretty!" Claudette said, laughing and trying to be a good sport. "Very pretty! Well, the next time I'm in a car and we're stopped I'll know what to do. I'll introduce every last member of the party to the policeman. And hope for the best."

This may sound amusing and fairly unimportant. But it is neither of these things. It happens too often in the first place. Besides, the impression it creates is decidedly unpleasant from a personal viewpoint, as well as unfavorable professionally.

As Claudette went on to say, "The real danger about such things is that after a time you become afraid to move. You realize the unbelievable complications which can arise from the most casual expeditions and they cease to be worth the difficulties they're likely to occasion.

"Whereupon you take what recreation you must have within motion picture circles where you have some protection. You cut yourself off, bit by bit, from the life that should be your reward after you've worked hard. And, worst of all, you alienate yourself from the very life you're jolly well going to need when your career is over."

It was this experience and a dozen others, too similar, which brought Claudette to New York this spring. She came eager for an interlude of life as it used to be. She wanted to see her old friends. She wanted to go to the theatre. She wanted to go to the new night clubs.

WE SAT in her suite high above Fifth Avenue. The rooms were filled with flowers and more arriving all the time. Two telephones never stopped ringing. Claudette had won the Motion Picture Academy Award for her outstanding performance in "It Happened One Night" and everyone wanted to interview her and photograph her. Shops wanted to send up models of their new summer clothes. There was a stream of messengers arriving with de luxe catalogues extolling the pipe organs and tennis courts and eighteenth-century antiques it was hoped she would order for the new home she is building. There were long telegrams telling her how enthusiastic Hollywood was over her work in "Private Worlds" previewed the night before.

Claudette stood in the middle of the floor and brushed her hair behind her ears. With the light behind her she looked very dramatic, in spite of the fact that she wore simple, dark blue lounging pajamas and her only make-up was lipstick.

"And," she said, laughing, directing the maid to place in a corner a flowering shrub which had just arrived while the two telephones rang and she slit the yellow envelope of still another wire, "and I came East to get away from it all." It seemed ironical that she could not.

The lighting accentuated the reddish tones in her hair. She always insisted upon (Continued on page 75)

WOMEN SHOULD BE WEAK

Gloria Stuart, once a free-thinker and independent spirit, finds happiness in dependence and desire for protection

BY RUTH BIERY

"At some climax in our lives, we revert to type, that is to the type of person we were born to be. Always remember this in writing a novel."

This observation came from a brilliant woman who is on the editorial board of one of the most conservative book publishing houses in America. And even though several psychologists have given me the same thought, I don't think I actually believed it. I didn't grasp the meaning of it until recently, after a talk with Gloria Stuart. And I don't suppose that I'd have believed it even then, if I hadn't known Gloria Stuart long enough to realize that she was speaking the truth when she said to me, "I have decided what I really want in life is to be a weak woman!"

Gloria Stuart—a weak woman! Even now I smile as I phrase that expression in relation to Gloria. For Gloria, in the past, has been about as weak as a cactus thrusting itself sharply through the stubborn desert sand. And yet as a little girl—and that's where we have to begin in order to understand the amazing change in the Gloria of today.

Until Gloria was nine years of age, she lived with her mother and father in the country—for Santa Monica, California, was then "the country." It had not donned its sophisticated smartness yet as a fashionable suburb of Hollywood. It's small, farm-type houses rambled helter-skelter among wheat fields and untenanted beaches.

"Our family was beautifully happy. Close to the earth. My mother and father were idealists, living life fully because it was a sheer joy for them to live it together. I can remember my father saying, again and again, 'There are only three things in life that make it worth while: Happiness, health and consideration for others.' He didn't speak about money because he never thought about it. He didn't have much. He worked for a living and that was all sufficient. There were many, many families in those days like my mother and father; many homes in which children were reared upon love rather than upon ambition.

"Then—" Gloria paused to sigh, "father died." Another long hesitation. "I wonder if anyone can understand. Mother had been just mother to me. The family had been just the family. Now the head of all this was gone. I entered high school at twelve. Too young. I joined a fashionable sorority and at fourteen I was smoking incessantly. I could and would sit and spout about free souls by the hour. I knew more about it, to hear me talk, than Judge Ben Lindsey in person. I didn't know what I was talking about but I thought I did. Philosophy became a passion with me and when I went to the University of California in Berkeley, I majored in it."

A DAUGHTER of the new school. A girl who would have headed a suffrage parade, waving a striped flag, thinking she had found the reason for woman's existence. A modern, self-sustained, independent free-thinker at the time when free-thinking had become one of the bywords among women.

She could have graduated with high honors. She was considered one of the most brilliant youthful philosophers at the University of California. But Gloria decided, in her second year, she didn't care about graduating with scholastic honors. So she joined the Bohemian group, that we-live-as-we-please and think-as-we-please contingency that adds color and excitement to the routine of any large campus.

Her ideas of freedom had deepened, rather than lessened, since her high school days. Love, she thought, held too important a place in the lives of most women. It made them weak, dependent upon male beings. A woman's place was not in the home, protected by broad, selfish shoulders but in the world of action and emancipation. Gloria's declamations against weak women, in those days, reverberated around that campus and were quoted on other campuses. Marriage was as certain slavery for the female as ownership had been for the blacks before Abraham Lincoln had freed them.

"I only married my first husband as a concession to my family and its traditions." Her eyes twinkled briefly as she says it. "And I didn't want children. I had an actual physical fear at the very thought of them. I epitomized, to myself, what I considered a strong woman."

GLORIA'S theories were consistent, as consistent as a truly shrewd intelligence could make them. They reached even to the economic side of life, where so many theorists become practical. She and her young sculptor-husband went to Carmel-by-the-Sea to live because that was, and is, the Utopia for free spirits. They had no money but they didn't care about money. They both worked. He on his sculptoring and she on her writing, and acting. She (Continued on page 104)

THE INTERVIEWER'S dilemma

BY REGINA CANNON

FRED ASTAIRE is privately known among the Hollywood writing fraternity as "the interviewer's dilemma" —for reasons which I hope will be made obvious. Fred is quiet and conservative, yet he is neither dull nor priggish. His home life is peaceful and contented, yet neither humdrum nor dreary. Fred likes to attend parties, though he arrives late and leaves early. He doesn't smoke, he doesn't drink, he doesn't "play around" —unless the camera is grinding and the sound track registering his verbal "passes." He has danced before the crowned heads of Europe and the bald heads of America. He remains unimpressed, but not at all blasé. He has played "command performances" and the honky-tonks and, if the audience is attentive and appreciative, he has neither complaint nor preference.

Fred Astaire distinctly "isn't the type," yet he is the latest contender for highest box office honors. He isn't handsome by any standards of male beauty, but he's got "it." He isn't romantic, yet the "come hither" is there in large and potent doses. Poor Fred Astaire! All he can do is dance and act—and there aren't many, standing way up thar on the celluloid platform, who can do either, let alone both.

IT WAS written, somewhere, that he is shy. He isn't. He has too much savoir-faire to you, and "perze" to me, for that. He's been around, you see. Everywhere. A lot. So, as a male shrinking violet, he's a great, big flop. He likes people unless they sit in Row B when he is dancing and give him that "Go on now, I dare you to be good" across the footlights. Instead of that attitude summoning an incentive to please, it merely brings on an "And nerts to you, too" mood, which he can't or won't shake off.

Fred Astaire's a genial guy but very short on small talk

The day I saw Fred Astaire he was in a particularly gay mood. The exhibitors' reports on "Roberta" had just come in and he had had a letter from his sister, Adele, all the way from London. They were dancing partners for years, if you recall. Fred read excerpts aloud and timed them for chuckles. They came all right—I mean the chuckles. He touched lightly on the temperament of co-workers who had tripped the light fantastic with him. The suggestion was made that, of all of them, Miss Astaire must have been the most tractable and pliable. Fred, who adores her, emitted a hoarse laugh that might have emanated from the sleek throat of a prize entry at the Santa Anita race track—say, Spark Plug. At any rate, the general idea gleaned was that most women are difficult when on the ballroom floor, professionally.

FRED had what is known as a hard life during his early youth. He was never hungry; he was never cold. But he knew work, gruelling practice, with himself as his brutal taskmaster—and he was on intimate terms with disappointment. He danced because he couldn't help it. He never sat down and thoughtfully figured it out as a profitable career, nor as the open sesame to fame and its attendant adulation.

It all began years ago when he tagged along after Adele to dancing school. Most of the pupils, like Barkis, were willing, but showed little (Continued on page 103)

And that's why he's become a trial to most interviewers

Miriam Hopkins, above, says, "Forget yourself when conversing and talk only of those things in which you're interested." Sylvia Sidney, below, proffers this bit of advice, "Say what you have to say without allowing your listeners to get ahead of your story."

"If you can't think of anything to say, listen; there's no surer route to popularity. Once people take a liking to you, you'll talk," says Harlow, above. "Shy people," advises Myrna Loy, below, "should accustom themselves to talking to one person at a time."

The stars have had to learn ways to

YOU CAN LEARN HOW TO TALK WELL

BY ADELE WHITELY FLETCHER

TO TALK well is very important. To be able to relate things so that you hold your listeners' interest. To be articulate concerning your own ideas and your individual emotions. To have your conversation fluent and provocative, not halting and dull. And, as a result, to be an infinitely more attractive personality. Surely all this is greatly to be desired.

Greatly to be desired and within everyone's grasp. That's the marvellous part of it. Within everyone's grasp if only they'll take the trouble to grasp it.

"The sound of your own voice in a room full of people can be so horrible," Myrna Loy says, with an understanding which proves Myrna didn't always talk as easily as she does today. "But it does help some, I think, to know that a great many people have been obliged to overcome this fright."

Myrna is naturally quiet. She isn't the life-of-the-party type. She isn't one of those people who feels it her duty to avoid even a momentary silence. However, when Myrna talks she talks well. She flavors even her most casual comments with her point of view. In other words Myrna isn't inhibited about peppering her conversation with personal reactions and observations.

I LUNCHED with Myrna the other day in the M-G-M studio commissary. Next to our table was the long table at which the directors gather at noon. It was very nice to mark the warmth and fellowship with which these men, many of whom have worked with Myrna, greeted her. And to mark the ease with which she returned their greetings.

"You must have known difficulty in talking to people once," I taxed her that day. "Otherwise you couldn't possibly know that horrible sinking feeling which comes at the sound of your own voice when everyone in an entire room suddenly seems to stop everything he is doing or saying to gimlet you with his eyes."

"I did indeed know that horrible sinking feeling," she said. "Even now remembering certain experiences, I feel a little ill.

"As a matter of fact," she went on, "it was when I began to resent the unhappiness my self-consciousness was causing me that I was prodded into action, that I determined to do something about myself.

"I trained myself. Step by step. First I talked to one person only. Then I ventured to talk when I was one of a group of three. Then when I was in a group of four. And so on. Until I defeated that frightful fear I had known.

"And as it began to disappear I found myself thinking more of what I wanted to say and less of myself or my audience. As a consequence I began to say whatever I had to say to better effect. And this assurance did me a world of good."

Smart Myrna! Smart because she admitted to herself the disadvantage she was at, took herself in hand intelligently, and didn't expect to accomplish a miracle overnight.

Rule one, then, if you would learn how to talk:

If you're prone to self-consciousness don't attempt to entertain a room full of people. Accustom yourself first to talking to one person at a time, then to two people at a time, and so on and on.

COMING AWAY from Hollywood this last time I feel, as always, that I have been visiting in the most inspiring place in the whole world. Hollywood has no ancient wonders such as the catacombs of Rome. And I'm not prepared to compare the modest California Sierra Nevadas with the Swiss Alps. It isn't because of any sights that I find Hollywood so inspiring. It's because of the people, the film people. Mentally and physically they stand at a high point of development. They are a group of people who have made the most of themselves as human beings. They have developed and improved themselves in a way which must give anyone observing them pause.

And because, among many other things, the film people have taught themselves to talk well, realizing this to be a darn important part of the business of being a personality, they're able to offer invaluable pointers.

Miriam Hopkins was lying on the sunny beach in front of the Santa Monica Beach Club. Her swimming suit showed her to be at absolutely the right weight for her. Under her beach parasol lay a French book. That morning she and her French teacher had spent a couple of hours in French conversation. There also was a telegram from a firm of decorators pertinent to the New York house, previously belonging to the late Elizabeth Marbury, which Miriam bought. (Cont'd on page 78)

MEET NELSON EDDY

BY DOROTHY SPENSLEY

Unnoticed for two years, he's a wow in "Naughty Marietta"

The preview audience expected to heap new laurels on Jeanette MacDonald in "Naughty Marietta" (which they did) but to their surprise they found a new star—Nelson Eddy.

Over at Culver City's Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios they are wondering if they have a singing prophet, a tin god or an actor with "high ideals" under contract. The enigma's name is Nelson Eddy. He is blond, blue-eyed, stands at least six feet tall, has a round, robust baritone voice that wows the ladies and their gents, and for six months of the conventional twelve he hies himself to the hinterlands to sing for doting thousands.

On the night of February sixteen, after almost two years of waiting around Hollywood, killing time, eating noonday meals in the busy studio commissary, wondering when he'd really start to work (he had minor singing roles in "Dancing Lady" and "Student Tour"), being photographed variously, reported engaged and married to at least two blondes (neither of whom he had ever taken out socially), chafing at idleness like any ambitious, forceful fellow in his thirties (born 1901), he gave Hollywood the jolt of the month by wowing the Grauman's Chinese Theatre preview audience with the excellence of his performance as the melodious hero of Victor Herbert's "Naughty Marietta."

The distinguished audience, made up of fellow stars, executives, directors, and press dignitaries, had come to the preview prepared to applaud loudly the efforts of their favorite, Jeanette MacDonald (who came through with a beautiful performance) as "Marietta," and to cheer the expert work of Director W. S. Van Dyke, who filmed the picture with his customary gusto. What they remained to do, was to marvel at the performance of this "dark horse" among baritones who had been knocking about the studio so long that he had twice been mistaken for a desk.

Well known in the concert world, on the radio (Firestone Hour), in operatic circles, but unknown to insular Hollywood, the ovation that Eddy's performance invoked on the night of the formal preview of his first important film appearance was not one of (Continued on page 93)

THE STORIES BEHIND THE SONG HITS

BY DENA REED

Harry Warren and Al Dubin turn out the hits for most of Warner's musicals. They've got the song-writing formula down pat.

Ruby inspired Al and Harry to write "An Old-Fashioned Cocktail With an Old-Fashioned Girl" for the Jolson-Keeler "Go Into Your Dance."

Your boy friend's waiting to take you to the movies, and you're busy dolling up. You're happily humming a hit tune from a recent musical picture while you're slipping the new print over your head, but have you ever wondered how that number came to be written? Who or what inspired the composers of the ditty? How did they think up the tune's tricky title?

Well, Boopa Snoop, our musical fly on the wall whose business it is to investigate such matters, buzzed back the following reports from some of our better known composers, among whom must be included Harry Warren and Al Dubin, the Siamese twins of songland, who turn out hits faster than Childs does wheat-cakes. They are responsible for such infectious numbers as "Lullaby of Broadway," from "Gold Diggers of 1935," "I'm Going Shopping With You," from the same picture, and "She's A Latin From Manhattan," from the Jolson-Keeler opus, "Go Into Your Dance."

Harry, or maybe it was Al (everyone gets them mixed up), says that it's all really very simple. "Sometimes the story of the picture suggests a song. Sometimes the title or an incident suggests it. Sometimes an idea will come out of thin air, but very often it's a funny story that the song writers have heard or maybe a bit of sentiment which they share.

"Now take 'Lullaby Of Broadway' for example," said Harry. "Al and I got a sudden longing for Broadway. It hit us right in the stomach. We were homesick for the white lights, the actors hanging outside the Palace Theatre, and the automats and the flea shows. We couldn't go home so we did the next best thing. We eased our hearts and lined our purses at one and the same time by writing what we chose to call

WHAT ARE YOUR Wedding PLANS?

Hollywood often marries in haste but it has grand ideas about weddings in the traditional manner

BY ADELIA BIRD

Hollywood stages the most glamorous weddings in the world . . . on the screen! But off-screen . . . the most casual! A real bride all done up in satin and a veil sets the town's heart aflutter, and the bride, literally is showered with more attention than a Princess Marina. The lack of more weddings in the traditional manner is not due to a lack of romantic interest in the idea. Quite the contrary, most of the unmarried stars I have talked to have indicated a sighing wish for all the pomp and music. It's that old bogey "production" that precipitates most of Hollywood's brides into a hasty flight to Yuma or some similar Western Gretna Green. No one has time for the trappings of a wedding, if you want to get married it has to be between "shots" on a picture or a short breathing spell between productions. Often as not, it's merely between dinner and breakfast next morning!

However, whether or not you are going to be one of those impetuous brides whose feet rush through the corridors of the municipal building to a justice of the peace, rather than wait to tread majestically down some church aisle, you must have more than a romantic interest in wedding plans.

What are your plans? Since I can't guess what sort of wedding each of you may be planning, I am going to talk about three types. There's the big church one with all the flowers and music, or the small home or church chapel one, and then, the aforementioned or Hollywood type at the justice of the peace. Don't dismiss the latter casually, either. It is just as important to look bride-like at a civil ceremony as it is at a church affair. After all, there is always the bridegroom to be considered and I have never met a husband yet who did not have an uncanny way of remembering every detail of his wife's wedding costume, years later.

The big church wedding calls for quite an elaborate outlay in costumes and decorations. It is for you who feel you can make a grand gesture on this great occasion. You have to have attendants, ushers, scads of flowers and, usually, a nice reception afterwards. You pick the loveliest of white gowns, wear the family's heirloom lace veil, and have your bridesmaids dressed so as to make a perfect setting for your dazzling whiteness.

ROSALIND RUSSELL, who was busy being a bride in M-G-M's "Reckless," took some time off to pose in a whole wedding wardrobe for you who are going to have a conventional church or home wedding. You see her in full wedding regalia on page 65. Adrian designed her gown, and it is a dream . . . romantic and yet quite simple enough to be in the best of taste.

Ice blue satin instead of the traditional white is Adrian's choice in fabric. The tulle veil is in this same cool shade. A straight peplum, giving the effect of a two-piece gown, is topped by a bodice which is trimmed with two flat, suspender-like bands of the satin. The neckline is cut high in a cowl effect and the sleeves are fitted and tucked.

The skirt, slender through the hips, flares out into a great train at the back. Rosalind's veil is held by a small coronet of pearls which is set so far back on her head that it is not visible in this picture. The shower arrangement of the lilies-of-the-valley in her bouquet is particularly charming, combined as it is with shiny dark green leaves.

Rosalind has posed on a stairway to show you how lovely this gown looks in a home setting. For a church wedding, she suggests that her bridesmaids be dressed either in soft old blue or the same ice blue as her gown. Possibly net, tulle or lace for the fabric. For a home wedding one attendant would suffice and she might wear a period gown in any of the stunning shades of the season, such as, coral, Mimosa yellow, Parma violet or dusty pink.

MISS DE MUMM'S TAILORED HOSTESS COAT BY HATTIE CARNEGIE DEMONSTRATES THE COOL ELEGANCE OF THE NEW PIQUÉS FOR SUMMER

"Camels certainly make a difference—"

SAYS

MISS MARY DE MUMM

IN NEWPORT, where she made her début, Miss de Mumm is one of the most popular of the smart summer colony, just as she is among the most fêted of the younger set during the New York season.

"Both in the enjoyment of smoking and in its effect, Camels certainly make a great difference," she says. "Their flavor is so smooth and mild that you enjoy the last one as much as the first. And I notice that Camels never affect my nerves. In fact, when I'm a bit tired from a round of gaieties, I find that smoking a Camel really rests me and gives me a new sense of energy. I'm sure that's one reason they are so extremely popular."

People do welcome the renewed energy they feel after smoking a Camel. By releasing your latent energy in a safe, natural way, Camels give you just enough "lift." And you can enjoy a Camel as often as you want, because they never affect your nerves.

Among the many distinguished women who prefer Camel's costlier tobaccos:

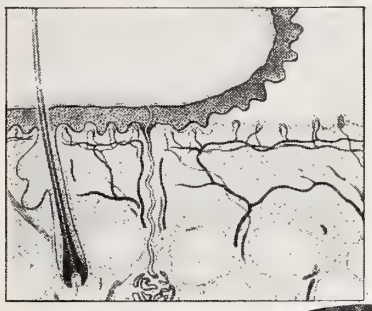
You, who remember the heyday of the Vernon Castles, will feel a nostalgic twinge upon looking at this arresting picture of the beautiful Del Rio. Irene Castle used to wear just such airy costumes and posed with similar moving gracefulness. Dolores wears this thrilling gown in "In Caliente." Yards of pleated chiffon form the great skirt, while the bodice is of heavy crêpe. It's the picture-of-the-month, don't you think?

TO AVOID THESE SKIN FAULTS



Keep your UNDER SKIN active

Not a line, not a pore, not a blemish—You can make your skin as clear and radiant—as enchanting as this!

Beauty's workshop is under your skin

Under your skin, tiny glands produce the oils to keep your outer skin clear, smooth. Blood vessels carry nourishment to cells and tissue. Nerve and muscle fibres keep lines away, contours firm—if you keep them all active!

DONNA DEGNA MARCONI
who inherits on her father's side a distinguished name, and on her mother's side is descended from ancient Irish Royalty, is extraordinarily beautiful. She has used Pond's Cold Cream for years, and says: "It wipes away little lines. I've never had a blemish since I began to use it."

PRACTICALLY every fault that mars the skin you see in your mirror had its start in the under layers of your skin! . . .

Blackheads come when pores are clogged by secretions from within. Lines form outside when under tissues begin to grow thin. Dryness comes when oil glands fail. Tissues sag when nerve and muscle fibres lose their snap.

Beauty's workshop is right there in those deep layers of the underskin, where tiny blood vessels and glands carry nourishment to cells and tissue all the time.

How to wake up a Slowing Underskin

When skin faults begin to spoil your looks, try the Pond's way of bringing back the under tissues to vigorous action.

Pond's Cold Cream, with its specially processed light oils, goes right down into your underskin. First, it floats out of your pores every particle of lingering grime and make-up. As you pat it on briskly, it stirs the lazy circulation. Stimulates laggard glands. Invigorates failing tissues.

One application alone will prove to you how effective this cream is. As you continue to use it, you will actually be able to watch little lines soften—blemishes and blackheads go. Coarseness—dryness will be relieved. A new freshness will glow in your skin and its texture will become fine and smooth.

Use Pond's Cold Cream every night to flush your pores clean of every single impurity, and stimulate your underskin. In the morning—often during the day—repeat this treatment. It will make your skin so smooth that your make-up will go on more evenly than ever before.

Try Deep-Skin Treatment

Pond's Cold Cream is absolutely pure and germ-free. It actually promotes the natural functioning of the underskin.

EYE IDEAS

by Jane Heath

So—YOU know some one who's planning a trip to the altar! Let's do a little missionary work for her—right away! Imagine what a fiery blush, or turning deathly pale, does to the most-carefully-made-up face! A bride simply must depend mostly upon her eyes alone for beauty. They'll be sparkling anyway—but no matter how busy she is, see that she takes the time to slip her lashes into Kurlash (just as you do!) so that they may curve back into the most enchanting frames that deepen and enhance her eyes. Kurlash costs only $1 at almost any store, so perhaps you'd better take her one.

Something Blue

Then—blue eyeshadow—because it's so lovely beneath white filmy veiling. Shadette, the eyeshadow in compact form, comes in a heavenly cerulean blue (as well as in violet, brown or green), $1. Pass it among the attendants, too, for a lovely ensemble effect.

Something New

A wedding is a dramatic event—so use blue mascara, also. Lashtint Compact may be carried right into the vestry, for it carries a little sponge to insure even application. Take it along in black, too, to touch the very tips of the bridesmaids' lashes after the blue. (It's a final, theatrical note of beauty.) Also in chestnut brown, at $1.

Kurlash

Jane Heath will gladly give you personal advice on eye beauty if you write her a note care of Department G-6. The Kurlash Company, Rochester, N. Y. The Kurlash Company of Canada, at Toronto, 3.

Carole Lombard today—a vivid, sparkling person with talent.

The same Carole, as she used to be—drab and wide-eyed.

Modern Screen Dramatic School

DIRECTED BY KATHERINE ALBERT

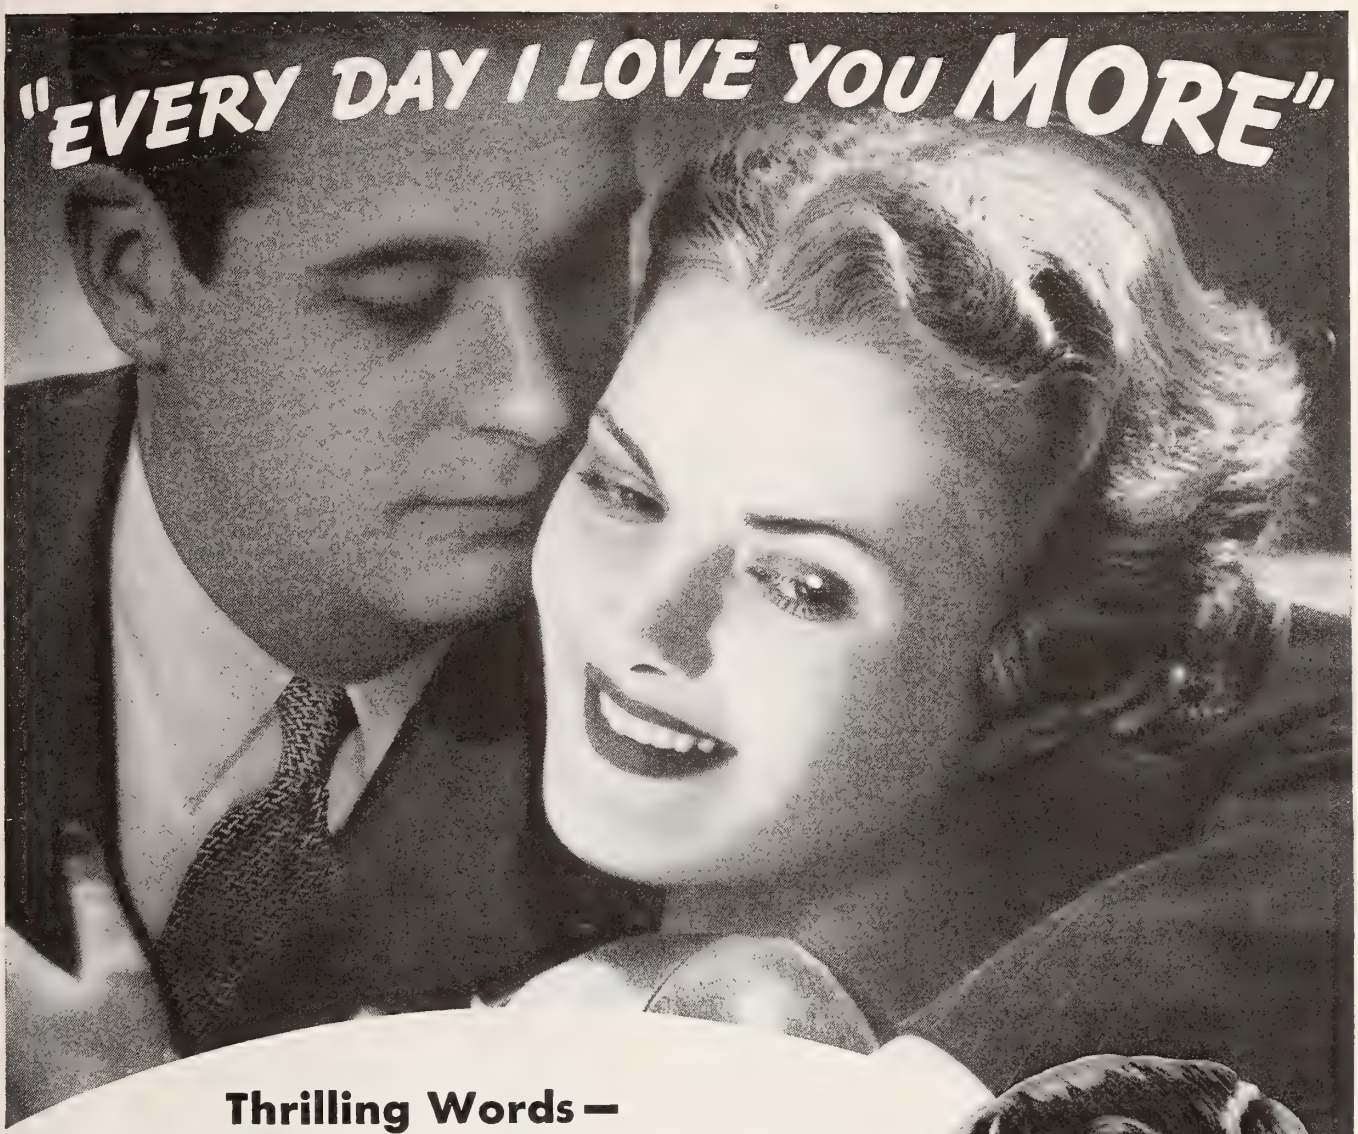
HOW CAN I make my personality a definite force? How can I feel at ease with people when I'm playing a role upon the stage, or when I'm called upon to speak publicly? How can I move gracefully? How can I acquire poise?

These are the questions most often asked by you Dramatic School pupils. And these are the questions that I'm going to try to answer for all of you—you who are doing amateur dramatics in school, you who have established dramatic clubs, you who intend to make acting your profession and you who want to acquire social grace.

I wish you could have seen many of the stars when they first came to Hollywood, as I have seen them. Those girls and boys who got their first lucky break (about which I talked to you last month) were, at one time, actually drab and colorless. They developed their personalities after they came to Hollywood. And if they did it, so can you.

Carole Lombard—that vivid, sparkling, brilliant personality—was once a shy little creature afraid of her own shadow, particularly her own shadow on the screen.

Joan Crawford—everything that Joan has today—her power, her forcefulness, her tremendous drive—she has developed herself.



Marlene Dietrich—and no matter what you think of her personality you must admit it's dominant and definite—was a timid little German girl afraid to ask for a telephone in her dressing-room. Look at her today. She is really a figment of her own imagination.

Clark Gable—if you had known him six years ago you could not possibly have imagined that one day he would be the screen's greatest lover.

How has this been done? In two ways. Mentally and physically. The physical tricks are definite and tangible. They consist of learning to walk, to stand, to move gracefully and to speak correctly (I've already spoken at length about speech). I'll tell you more about these tricks in a moment. But first I want to talk to you about the mental attitude of developing a personality. That is really most important.

The dictionary says that the noun "personality" means "the state of being a person; personal identity. That which constitutes distinction of person." So, if you are drab, colorless, meek and timid, decide that you will make yourself into a personality. First of all get a mental picture of what you want to be. Do you want to be strong and forceful and vital? Do you want to make people (Continued on page 98)

How to become a dramatic personality

Thrilling Words— but nobody says them to the girl who has COSMETIC SKIN . . .

IT'S WONDERFUL to win love—even more wonderful to hold it! So don't let unattractive Cosmetic Skin steal away your good looks. It is when stale make-up is left to choke the pores that the warning signals of this modern complexion trouble appear—tiny blemishes, dullness, blackheads, perhaps.

Cosmetics Harmless if removed this way

Lux Toilet Soap is especially made to remove cosmetics thoroughly. Its ACTIVE lather sinks deep into the pores, removes every trace of dust, dirt, stale cosmetics.

Use all the cosmetics you wish! But to protect your skin—keep it lovely—follow this simple rule: Use this gentle soap before you put on fresh make-up during the day—ALWAYS before you go to bed at night. Remember, 9 out of 10 lovely Hollywood stars use Lux Toilet Soap!

MILDRED NELSON, DOROTHEA ROTH, Chicago, Ill.; DOROTHY HUBER, New York City; JEANINE KIRKWOOD, Baltimore, Md.; MARGARET WHITE, Springfield, Ill.; VIRGINIA WILSON, Albany, N. Y.; A Robert Donat Fan, Boonville, N. Y. — Here's some super-special news for you! Soon after you read this, the object of your questions, Robert Donat, will be in our happy land ready to start work with Jean Muir on "Captain Blood," the first picture under his brand new Warner Brothers contract. At present Mr. Donat is in England making "The Thirty-Nine Steps" with Madeleine Carroll for GB Productions. This will be his third film—the first was "The Private Life of Henry VIII" in which he played the part of Thomas Culpepper; and the second was "The Count of Monte Cristo" which satellized him immediately. Robert Donat (pronounced Doan-at) is an Englishman, born in Withington, Manchester, on March 18, 1905. In 1921 he made his professional debut and spent several years in stock and repertory theatres, and just recently completed a seven months' engagement in London in "The Sleeping Clergyman." He has brown eyes and auburn hair, stands 6 feet tall, weighs 165 pounds, is modest, soft-spoken and has a grand sense of humor. His favorite foods are English roast beef, American ham and eggs, bean soup and apple pie. He is married and has two children. You can reach him at the Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Cal.

BYRON ERB, Jr., Buffalo, N. Y.—Victor Jory is 32 years old, and his next picture after "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will be "Party Wire," with Jean Arthur, for Columbia.

HELEN SHARPINSKI, Bronx, N. Y.; L. S., Buffalo, N. Y.; D. C. MILLER, Callery, Pa.; BLANCHE SHERWOOD, Flushing, N. Y.; R. H. ROSEN, Newark, N. J.—Myrna studied to be a sculptress. That was when she was still Myrna Williams. And if she hadn't been good enough to attract the attention of Rudolph Valentino, who gave her her first part in "What Price Beauty?" ten years ago, she wouldn't be Myrna Loy today. Aside from the fact that she was born on a ranch in Helena, Mont., on August 2, 1905, and studied at the Westlake School for Girls in Los Angeles, that was the real beginning of her career. Of course you remember her "vamp days" and have probably traced her evolution up to her present status of "ideal American female." She is 5 feet 5 inches tall, with dark hair and eyes, and weighs 125 pounds. She loves dancing, collects painting and sculpture, swims, plays tennis and rides. You can reach her at her contract studio, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, Culver City, Cal., where she plans to make a sequel to "The Thin Man" as yet untitled. Miss Loy has never been married, and her mother and brother, David, live with her in Beverly.

TWELVE VAGABONDS, Jamaica, N. Y.; FLORENCE MOIR, So. Ozone Park, N. Y.; ROSARA KASIR, Richmond Hill, N. Y.—The part of Oskie Berry, Dick Powell's room mate in "Flirtation Walk," was taken by Ross Alexander. It is not his first picture by any means, for he made his screen debut in 1930 in "The Wiser Sex" with Claudette Colbert. In 1934 he was in "Social Register" and "Gentlemen Are Born." His next will be "A Midsummer Night's Dream" for Warners, where he is under contract. He is married and will be 28 on July 27.

VIVIAN CROSBY, Toledo, Ohio—Colin Clive was also in "The Key" and "One More River" in 1934. His next will be "The Bride of Frankenstein." He is 35 years old and is married to a non-professional. Frances Dee's latest picture is "Becky Sharp" which will be all in technicolor. She will also be in "She" with Randy Scott. As far as I know, Lanny Ross will not be returning to Hollywood any time soon—if at all. Elizabeth Young is not scheduled for any picture at present. Nick Foran will be seen in "Ladies Love Danger," formerly entitled "Secret Lives." "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will follow the Shakespearean original very closely. You'd better read "A Dream Comes True" in this issue.

LILLIAN TRUTKO, Akron, Ohio; MRS. DANIEL J. BATES, Brooklyn, N. Y.; ESTHER LANDER, Detroit, Mich.; MARY RUSSO, New Haven, Conn.; JAMES R. GRAY; MARY BERKLEY—In an apartment over his father's saloon in New York City, James Cagney was born on July 17 in 1904. You have probably heard of Bill Cagney, too—well, he is Jim's brother, and there are three other children in the family, besides. After James graduated from public school, he entered Stuyvesant High School, at the same time earning his way in the world by being an office boy, then a bundle wrapper and finally a bell hop. Then he entered Columbia University and decided to become a caricaturist. However, his family reached a point where they had to have more money than he was making from his drawing, so he gave it up and began his stage career, first as a chorus boy, then in vaudeville, stock and finally Broadway. A Warner Brothers scout saw him and Joan Blondell in "Maggie the Magnificent" and signed them both to contracts to make the film version of that play, "Sinners' Holiday." That was only the beginning. Mr. Cagney likes to dance, play tennis and swim. He keeps fit by daily workouts in a gymnasium. He is happily married to Billie Vernon, who was his partner in his vaudeville days. True to form, he has red hair and blue eyes and is inclined to be freckled. He is 5 feet 9 inches tall and weighs 155 pounds. He, too, is under contract to Warner Brothers Studios, and after "A Midsummer Night's Dream" will be in "The G Men," with Ann Dvorak.

RUTH GREEN, Brooklyn, N. Y.—The part of Della Street, secretary to Warren William in "The Case of the Howling Dog," was taken by Helen Trenholme.

DOROTHY MILLER, Buffalo, N. Y.; PATRICIA LIND; "FANCY," Atlanta, Ga.; MYRTLE LARBOUR, Marlboro, Mass.; MARGARET ANDERSON, Oklahoma City, Okla.—James Dunn, who was skyrocketed to fame in "Bad Girl," was born in New York City on November 2, 1905, was educated in the public schools of New Rochelle, N. Y. and worked in a brokerage house for 3 years, after which he abandoned business for the stage. He toured "the sticks" with a stock company and a year later was back in business, selling automobiles. Then he took another stab at stock and made enough money to enable him to play the stock market. This sally was a hopeless failure, but fortunately for him, he landed the lead opposite Helen Morgan in "Sweet Adeline," which brought him his Fox contract. He is 6 feet tall, weighs 157 pounds, has dark brown hair and blue eyes. He is always on the go, is enthusiastic about automobile racing and is working to get his airplane pilot's license. He has never been married, and lives with his mother, to whom he is devoted. After "George White's 1935 Scandals" he will be in "Man Proposes" with Mae Clarke. His address is Fox Studios, Movietone City, Hollywood, Cal.

DOROTHY D. RICHARDSON, Lowell, Mass.—Otto Kruger was born in Toledo, Ohio, September 6. He is the son of Bernard Alben Kruger, an accountant, and Elizabeth Winers Kruger. He married Sue Mae MacManamy in 1919, and they have one daughter, Ottilie Ann.

ELIZABETH ALLISON, Adolphustown, Ont., Canada—No, a thousand times no. It was Robert Armstrong, not Nat Pendleton, who played the part of Dopey in "Sweet Music."

PHILIP MACY, Peru, Cal.—Arthur Byron played the role of the self-disappearing chief of state in "The President Vanishes," and a nice job he did of it, too. You can reach him at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal., where he recently completed a role in "The Casino Murder Case," and will be seen next in "Public Hero No. 1." He is also scheduled to appear in "Murder in the Fleet," which will be Frank Shields' first picture.

GERTRUDE SYLVIN, Fall River, Mass.—Yes, both Warren William and Warner Baxter are married. The former is 38 and the latter is 42. Clark Gable is 34.

phonograph record. At last Robert, our butler, appeared in the doorway.

"Mr. Montgomery, if you will forgive me, sir, the ladies say . . ."

"Robert! Can't you see I am reading!"

Now I like Robert but at that moment I could have killed him. He seemed to sense it. "Yassir!" he said, and began to retreat toward the doorway.

I returned to my book. Out of the corner of my eye I could see him still standing there, shifting nervously from one foot to the other. Then I heard him take a deep breath, as he prepared for the plunge. "Mr. Montgomery, there is something we all think you should know . . ."

"Robert! For the second time, can't you see . . ."

"But, Mr. Montgomery, if you will excuse me, sir. The house is on fire!"

I jumped to my feet. "You big idiot, you! Why didn't you tell me before!"

"Because, sir," he said, as he started running off down the hall, "because, sir, I could see—you were reading!"

I went down the stairs, three steps at a time, sniffing the air. I couldn't smell a thing. And the girls weren't around. I followed Robert out on the lawn. "It's the roof," he said.

AND sure enough it was the roof . . . our lovely roof, crackling and blazing and going up in smoke. I dashed back into the house to the phone. I remembered that on the front page of the phone book it tells you what to do in case of fire. Those instructions had always intrigued me. I opened the phone book, and read them again, carefully. (A movie star has to do everything strictly according to Hoyle, even when his roof is on fire.) There were the familiar, important sounding words, "In case of an emergency (as though any fire weren't an emergency), dial the operator and say, 'I want to report a fire.'"

Ah! As I picked up the phone, I felt a keen satisfaction, like a man who's been rehearsing a speech for years and at last gets a chance to speak it.

Still keeping my eye on that first page of the phone book, I dialed the operator. She answered and in my best voice-that-indicates-that-something-important-is-about to-be-said, I said, "I want to report a fire." I spoke very deliberately, using excellent diction.

"What did you say?" she asked.

"I said, 'I want to report a fire,'" between my teeth, this time.

"Oh, you want to report a fire. Oh, well! What's your address?"

I told her.

"And the name?"

"What difference does that make? I've given you the address. Can't you hurry, my house is on fire!"

"I'll have to have your name."

"Robert Montgomery."

"Oh, hello, Bob, how are you? I saw you in a swell picture the other night. Say, Bob, I've got a little sister and she's dying to have a picture of you. Do you suppose . . ."

"This is Bob Montgomery," I said frigidly, "and I want to report a fire."

"Okay, Bob, just a minute, Bob. Keep your shirt on, Bob." And then she gave me the fire department.

"Hello," said a sleepy voice.

"Hello. This is Bob Montgomery."

"Oh, hello, Bob, how are you?"

"I'm fine. How are you? Hey, what is this anyway? I want to report a fire."

"A fire? Really? Where?"

"Here, at my house!" I gave him the address, too."

"Oh, that one. Somebody up there already turned in an alarm about ten minutes ago. Don't worry, Bob. We'll be right up, we're just leaving now, as soon as the boys get dressed."

"Thanks, old fellow, that's mighty decent of you," I said. "But don't bother to make it formal. Black ties will do," and I hung up.

I went upstairs, climbed out on a balcony, and from there up on to the roof. I stood there looking at the fire, waiting for the fire engines. I had to admit it was a pretty fire, even if it was getting bigger. The row of crackling flames against the sky reminded me of the torch procession in Reinhardt's production of "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Very artistic.

At last they arrived. And you know how fire engines always affect you. I suddenly got very excited and wished I had a rubber coat and hat, too. They propped up the ladder, and I grabbed the ends of it and held it steady, while the first fireman climbed up. Reaching the top, he brushed me aside and said, "Hey, get out of the way, you."

THEY passed up the hose. I reached for that, too. But the second fireman nearly knocked me off the roof. "You're in the way," he said.

"Damn it," I said. "It's my fire."

But nobody paid any attention. They began "sprinkling" the fire with a stream of water that was about as powerful as a drip out of a leaking water faucet. "You never put it out that way," I said. "Can't you give it more water?"

"Do you want your house to get wet?" one of them snapped at me.

"Well, if you don't mind, I'd rather have it get wet than have no house."

So they gave it more water.

"Don't you think you'd better use a hatchet, around the edges, to keep the smouldering part from spreading?" I finally suggested. They couldn't fool me. Firemen had always used hatchets in every movie fire I'd seen.

"Not a bad idea," they said. And somebody passed up the hatchets.

At that moment I realized that not one of my neighbors had come to see my fire, the stuck-up so-and-so's. I guess it wasn't big enough for them. The only persons who seemed at all interested were Betty and Martha who were standing out at the front gate, looking up at us. I waved to them. Good old Betty and Martha. This would give them something interesting to talk about. I wished, too, that I could do something spectacular, but the roof showed no signs of caving in.

When the last spark had been smothered, we came down to the ground, and I saw that Betty and Martha were both wearing their mink coats, and that they carried something all bunched up in their arms, under their coats. The dears, they had been calm enough to carry out our valuables. I felt proud of them. Even if the house had burned to the ground they would have saved our jewelry and silver.

Then they opened their coats, and I could see that each girl carried two revolvers.

"Revolvers! Of all things that should have been carried out, you had to take the revolvers! What in the devil did you do that for?"

"Well, we were afraid that with all the smoke and heat and everything, they might accidentally go off!"

Disgusted I went back into the house . . . back to the library and my book. All through the house I could hear the firemen mopping up. They were at it for hours. I thought if we let them alone long enough, maybe they'd do the dinner dishes.

"Excuse me, sir," said Robert from the doorway, "but the fire chief . . . he asked if he could have your autograph."

I just looked at him.

"Yes, sir," he said, backing out. "I'll tell him, sir, that you're reading!"

BY this time I felt rosy and warm. It was the sherry or the fire, I couldn't tell which. I pulled myself together and reached for my hat.

"What do you want your hat now, for?" Bob asked.

"If that wasn't a 'story' you just told me, I'm going to eat it," I said.

"Oh, come now, I told you I'd give you a serious interview some time to make up for this one."

"Sorry, old fellow, I couldn't use it. Thanks just the same."

He was still mumbling about what to give the fire department as I went out.

The Private Life of Claudette

leaving it as black as it grew for years. But the cameramen fussed so about the shadows it threw upon her face and the difficulty of lighting her properly that at last she gave in and dyed it red.

Claudette's maid came in to say a Mary Whiteman was on the phone.

"Mary Whiteman!" Claudette looked worried. "Mary Whiteman? I wonder if she's that pretty little critic?"

On the phone while she tried to place Mary Whiteman she explained that she didn't have a minute to herself for the next several days. No, no, looking even more concerned now, she wasn't being high-hat.

"She seems to know me well," she said when the conversation ended. "She wanted me to lunch with her. Mary Whiteman? Who can she be? That name's familiar!"

It was an hour later before she remembered. "Ye Gods," she cried, "Mary Whiteman is a girl I've known for years. Whiteman is her married name. I had an announcement last autumn and sent her a present. She's one of the very people I've counted on seeing!"

She flew to the telephone. "Mary!" I heard her say. "This is Claudette. Yes, darling. I know. I'm so stupid! I didn't place your new name. Why didn't you say Mary Meredith?"

It was obvious enough that this old friend hadn't given her maiden name because she thought Claudette should have remembered who she was and that she had been only too quick to believe Claudette was being high-hat. The pity is that often it is a star's friends themselves who make the old relationships impossible.

"Remember," Claudette taxed me, "how when I went to Hollywood I boasted about the way I would run my life. Little did I know. . . ."

I remembered well. In fact all day I'd been remembering that afternoon in Claudette's dressing-room at the Long Island Studios.

"Even if I do have real success," she had told me that day, "outside of working hours I'm going to live my own life. Just as a stenographer does when she closes her desk at night."

"I'm going to keep my own friends. I'm going to do the things I've always done. I hope I've learned something from watching others. I'm not going to give up my very life and then be sunk when my career is over. I'm not going to allow myself to be forced into the regulation movie star mold."

SHE was so confident that day. But having seen other men and girls unable to live up to similar brave words I knew that she spoke with the voice of inexperience. Once you attain stardom in Hollywood a great deal is at stake. It becomes easier to meet unjust demands than to risk the publicity of lawsuits. To give up old friends, irrespective of how fond of them you may be, rather than keep on explaining why you can't always see them and protesting your friendship.

However, I must say Claudette is managing better than I thought she would. She hasn't given up by any means. She's still fighting. She's not resigned to the compromises she constantly is forced to make.

Recently she gave up a house in which she had lived for several years. And it is likely that being a star she was required to pay more rent for that property than anyone not in pictures would have been asked to pay.

The room she used for a bedroom she had had done over, very charmingly. It wasn't extreme. It was restrained in feeling even to the marble fireplace she had installed. However, the landlady insisted this room be put back as it was when the house was rented, that the walls be painted cream. Claudette called in the painters. Whereupon the landlady changed her mind and said she'd have the walls pale green.

"Certainly," Claudette agreed politely. She had been warned by her manager not to have any unpleasantness, whatever the cause or cost.

The painters started to work. The landlady called again. She wanted the walls cream, after all.

During the years the Colberts had lived in that house some dishes and glasses had been broken. It was only a natural breakage, but it was demanded that every last one be replaced. The glasses no longer could be bought in Los Angeles, so they sent to New York for them.

Then a small ink spot was discovered on a yellow damask chair in the library, a dreary room never used by the family. In fact I never remember seeing the door open. Claudette was asked to recover the entire chair.

"That was the last straw," she told me. "I told my manager I wouldn't do that chair over. 'Let her bring suit,' I insisted. 'I don't care if it does cost me more than the upholstery would. I must have some rights even if I do work in motion pictures.'"

It wasn't the cost a lawsuit would entail, her manager pointed out. It was the publicity it would receive. He reminded her what the headlines would be. "Movie Star Sued. Landlady Claims Claudette Colbert Destroyed Property."

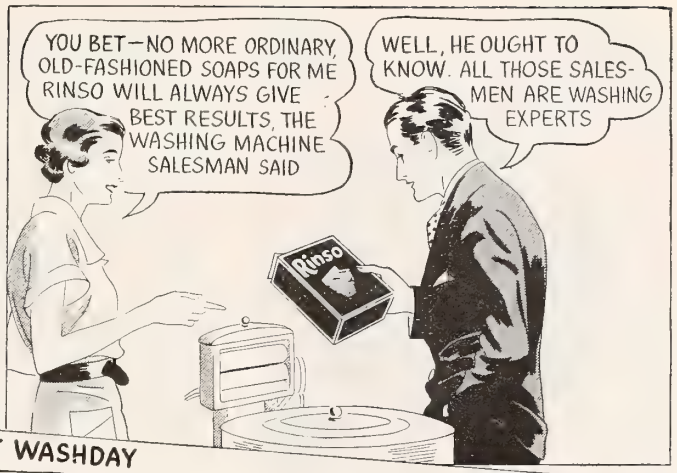
She gave in. She could see people reading those stories, shaking their heads, believing that it had been one of those proverbial wild Hollywood parties that had ruined a poor woman's house.

To make matters worse the landlady later told Claudette's secretary that Mrs. Colbert and Miss Colbert needn't have gone to all the trouble they went to replacing and repairing things. She hadn't expected them to do that at all—a check would have covered everything.

Nicely, no doubt!

TWO o'clock that afternoon, Claudette had an appointment to pose on the hotel roof while a well known columnist pointed out the skyline to her. She got dressed and at about fifteen minutes before two sat down to luncheon, which she had served in her suite. The photographer arrived before the columnist, left his equipment and went downstairs.

In the meantime the columnist was announced. "Pull up another chair," Claudette said. "Perhaps he'll have a cup of coffee with us."



The columnist didn't arrive. Ten or fifteen minutes later the photographer reappeared with the editor. They looked worried. The photographer, it developed, had met the columnist in the hall and explained that Claudette was at luncheon. Apparently he had given the columnist the impression that for the moment no one was welcome in her suite. In any event the columnist had gone away. A bellboy came up with a note from him later on. It read, "Sorry I had to run along."

I was curious to see what Claudette would do. It seemed to me it was her turn to become angry and temperamental. But she didn't. She went to the telephone and called the columnist's secretary. She explained to her exactly what had happened. Through no fault of her own she had been judged an up-stage, high-hat movie star, a pampered darling who couldn't be disturbed at luncheon. But she refused to remain in this unpleasant position. She saw to it that she was judged as an individual, not as a star. And as things turned out she was right. For instead of the unpleasant breach which might have resulted, the columnist sent her flowers.

"Come on," she said a little desperately later that afternoon, "let's get out of here. Let's take a taxi and see Katherine's baby."

Claudette, you see, will have much more than money left when her career is over. For, even more important than the generous portion of her salary which she saves every week, she is saving her friendships and her interest in simple pleasures against the day when she is through in the studios. It isn't proving easy to do this. But she's doing it nevertheless. She's fighting for her life, her individual life, her private life, for the life she knows she's going to need later on.

This New York house brings me to Miriam's flair for conversation. For here after the theatre at night Miriam's friends —artists, writers, scientists and theatrical people, for the most part—gather. Besides talking extremely well, keenly and colorfully and amusingly, Miriam also has the gift of bringing other people out. And these midnight gatherings in her house on the East River promise to develop into as brilliant a salon as existed there when Elizabeth Marbury, credited with having the only real salon in America, was alive.

ALL of which becomes twice as amazing when you realize that naturally, Miriam Hopkins is shy. Very shy.

"I think," she said thoughtfully, "that the mistake we're most likely to make is to talk about things we know little or nothing about and care even less about.

"For instance, there's no use in discussing the European situation unless you're sincerely interested in it and either have some personal experience pertinent to it to relate or else are so full of some observation you've made regarding it that you can't keep still. In which case you'll be interesting.

"Otherwise it's better, far better, to talk about rice pudding.

"Conversation, when you're really interested in what you're talking about, can be the greatest boon in the world, especially when you're shy. It can do for you what a role does for a player. It can offer you an opportunity to forget yourself."

Lying there in the sun Miriam was a perfect illustration of the very point she made. For as she became enthusiastic and intent upon what she was saying, the quick little mannerisms with which she invariably fights her shyness disappeared. She actually forgot herself in her interest in her subject. And while the manifestations of shyness with which Miriam is blessed happen to be charming, she undoubtedly has a better time when this shyness passes.

So! Rule two:

> Talk only of those things in which you're interested, remembering always that you're a hundred times more attractive talking about something you know about than you possibly could be talking about something you don't know about.

JEAN HARLOW is another Hollywood girl who learned how to talk entertainingly, without becoming muddled in self-consciousnesss.

"Always," Jean admits, "I've found it difficult to talk with the people I like a lot. Because I'm naturally an idol worshipper, I suppose."

That I count an enlightening remark. For, after all, if we weren't impressed with people, even if it's only subconsciously, we wouldn't mark what we said to them or how we said it or whether we were interesting. We wouldn't feel any obligation in the way of making conversation in their presence in the first place. We'd be as offhand and at ease and independent as we are in the midst of our families.

"I remember a party Gloria Swanson gave," Jean went on. "Gloria's someone I've always admired tremendously. She's so colorful and glamorous. So beautiful, too.

"Consequently at Gloria's party I couldn't open my mouth. I mean I literally couldn't open my mouth. It refused to obey my will. You've heard of the little fellow who asked his mother if his arms were sewed on or tacked on. Well, my mouth might as well have been sewed or tacked closed.

"And even if I could have forced sounds out of it I wouldn't have been able to think of one thing to say. I had stage fright at a dinner party!

Newlyweds! Helen Mack and her new husband, Charles Irwin, look over our favorite mag in the Ambassador Drug emporium!

"Well, I remember giving myself time. I didn't try to force myself. I just sat. And listened. Nodded at appropriate intervals. This saved me.

"Someone always will talk. And you always can listen. In this way you earn popularity. And then, warmed by the evidence of people liking you, you'll find something will melt or snap or come to life inside of you, and you'll talk without difficulty."

Rule three then:

Don't try to talk if you don't feel like it and can't think of anything to say. Let someone else talk. You listen. There's no surer route to popularity. And once you feel popular you'll talk all right. Never fear!

NORMA SHEARER also says "Listen!" But there's quite another reason behind Norma's admonition.

"I can think of nothing which has helped me more in learning to talk than my work in the studios," Norma told me. "For it taught me to listen. On the screen if you don't listen attentively it becomes very evident. And you give the undesirable impression of standing there waiting for your next line.

"The same thing applies socially, I think. If we will listen when someone is talking to us instead of thinking, 'Oh, what am I going to say when he's finished!' there's an excellent chance that something that's said will lead us to a natural comment."

"How else has your work helped you to talk?" I asked.

"Well," she said, "in the last several years I've learned thousands of lines. They've been colorful lines, amusing and gay, too. Certainly they have enlarged my vocabulary, helped me to acquire a nicer word sense.

"Those who aren't actresses can acquire the same results, however, by reading. While you may not actually memorize phrases or words by reading you do gain fluency. It also implants a greater variety of ideas and impressions in the mind. With the result that you have more to say in time and are likely to say it to better advantage."

Rules four and five:

Listen attentively when someone is talking instead of going into a twitch wondering what you're going to say next.

Read. In order to acquire ideas and impressions and a greater fluency with words and phrases.

AND now if I may be allowed a personal observation I'd like to talk about a woman I met in a shop the other day. Neither I nor the gentleman who was with me knew this woman more than slightly. She showed us some wooden plates and earthen bowls she was buying for a cellar tap room she was furnishing in her Rhode Island farm house. She commented in passing upon Austria where she had spent the last few years.

"What an interesting woman!" the gentleman I was with said, when we had made our way through the revolving doors and were in the street. "She certainly is getting a kick out of fixing up that tap room, isn't she? See her eyes shine?"

Actually it wasn't so much what this casual acquaintance had said which had made her interesting and a colorful talker. It was her animation. She was enriched by the radiance everyone has when they're keen about something they're doing, when they bring enthusiasm to whatever they are talking about.

All of which reminds one of Sylvia Sidney. Sylvia isn't at all a voluble person. She's quiet, usually, unless the conversation interests her. But when she's interested, she may be counted upon to enhance what she has to say by the warm timber of her voice, the impulsive little gestures she makes with her pretty hands, and the shine in her green eyes.

Another thing. Sylvia always gets to the point. She never is slow with her speech. She doesn't meander to establish a date if this date isn't important to her story. She isn't one of those people who say, "It was three years ago. No, it must have been four years ago. Because three years ago the baby had croup and we didn't go out during the holidays. Although, come to think of it, it wasn't during the holidays, it was later, after all."

Sylvia says what she has to say. She doesn't give her listeners time to get ahead of her story, to anticipate what she is going to tell them. Neither does she repeat herself so that she loses attention.

However, Sylvia didn't always talk with ease.

YOU know," Sylvia said, "how you can start a story, but then, after a sentence or two, there's a little 'awk' sound in your throat. . . .

"That used to happen to me. Whereupon I'd shut up like the old clam.

"But not forever. Only long enough to find fresh courage, when I'd force myself to say something else that I had to say. As time went on I got further and further along in my stories before that 'awk' happened in my throat. After a time, there were some evenings when it wouldn't overtake me at all. And finally it disappeared entirely."

Certainly if you're one of those people who has difficulty in talking because of self-consciousness, you have a fight on your hands and the sooner you begin to battle with it the better. You simply can't quit!

And this brings us to three more rules —six, seven and eight:

Bring enthusiasm to what you have to say, so the brightness in your eye and the timber of your speech and the impulsive gestures of your hands will enrich your conversation.

Say what you have to say without giving your listeners time to get ahead of your story or to turn in boredom to their own thoughts.

If you find an "awk" in your throat when you start to talk, because of self-consciousness, finish what you have to say the best you can. But don't let this experience stop you from talking the next time you want to say something.

It is so important to talk well. For being a good talker is likely to serve as a passport to success in both the business and the social world. And it is, after all, only by being able to express those things in which we're interested, those things we feel, and those things we think, that we give people a chance to know us. It isn't, certainly, because we happen to wear a green dress or part our hair on the side or have blue eyes or because of any other equally superficial thing, that people are drawn to us and seek to know us better.

carrots and very small peeled white onions. A little water (giving the vegetables a little longer to cook) and diced potatoes are added. The stew continues to cook until potatoes, vegetables and meat are tender. Dumplings are a delicious addition to an already succulent dish.

Another grand meat-and-vegetable combination is one that Blanche bakes in the oven, all at the same time. It consists of pork chops, with sage dressing cooked in the same pan with yams and apples, accompanied by baked tomatoes, stuffed and topped with some of the dressing. This is simply swell I discovered when I tried out Blanche's recipe in my own test kitchen. The sweetened juices of the apples and the yams season the chops, and the sage dressing imparts a delightfully original flavor to both chops and tomatoes.

Another recipe is one I have named in Bing's honor, "Crosby Casserole." This is Blanche's idea of a perfect way to combine thrift with nutrition. Like all good cooks she has her own pet ideas along these lines. So, when the Crosbys sit down to roast lamb (or roast beef, pork, veal) on Sunday, Monday's dinner will consist of the same meat, skillfully masquerading (with the ever-present vegetables) under a feathery crown of biscuits.

Even young Gary Crosby, two years old in June, is allowed to sample the vegetables of this dish. That is if he can tear himself away from the dilapidated fly-swatter (!) (that is his favorite toy of the moment) or from Duchess, the Crosby spaniel who lavishes her affection and kisses on everyone. Of course the twins, Dennis Michael and Philip Lang, crying lustily in their nursery, are too young for this thrifty delicacy.

Old-fashioned Pot Roast with Vegetables is a great favorite, in the Crosby household. Blanche's version calls for onions, carrots, tomatoes, celery and other things. You may recall that a couple of months ago I gave you a recipe for the kind of pot roast Clark Gable favors, which is cooked without vegetables of any kind. I'm not going to take sides in this controversy but I do advise you to send for the Crosby version, too, and see for yourself which you prefer!

In order to get the recipe for this Pot Roast all you have to do is to fill out and mail the coupon at the end of this article. The free leaflet this month includes, besides the Pot Roast, recipes for the Crosby Casserole and the Dixie Pork Chop combination. By sending in your coupon promptly you will also receive a recipe for "Mississippi Special"—a rich, toothsome dessert that rightly has no place in this treatise on lowly, healthful vegetables. However, as it is Bing's favorite sweet, I am going to throw discretion to the winds and include it in the leaflet.

As a fitting reward for consuming lots of vegetables, Bing's favorite sweet might be served as a Grand Prize to your own favorite male or adored youngster. But perhaps, if you follow some of the recipes for meat-and-vegetable combinations à la Crosby, no reward will be necessary since all are so appetizing in themselves. Anyway they're well worth the small amount of effort it takes for you to secure your own attractively printed set—FREE!

Here's the fish recipe:

BAKED FISH A LA CONSTANTINOPLE

3 to 4 pounds fresh fish (sea-bass, yellow tail or sword fish)
6 carrots
3 large potatoes
2 large onions
¼ cup olive oil
3 large tomatoes, sliced
½ cup chopped parsley
1½ teaspoons salt
¼ teaspoon pepper
¼ teaspoon paprika
2 lemons

Peel carrots and cut into quarters, lengthwise. Peel and dice potatoes. Cook together 10 minutes in boiling, salted water. Drain thoroughly. Meanwhile cook peeled and sliced onions in olive oil in a skillet to a deep golden brown. Place the fish in a deep baking pan. Sprinkle with ½ teaspoon salt and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Arrange onions and parboiled vegetables in pan around fish. Cover fish with tomatoes, sliced. Sprinkle with chopped parsley, remaining teaspoon salt, ⅛ teaspoon pepper and paprika. Over this lay thin slices of lemons. Bake, uncovered in hot oven (400°F.), 45 to 55 minutes or until fish is tender.

What Really Happened?

How do they work? Here are a few examples out of the now-harmless past:

All the world knows the tragic story of Wallace Reid, best beloved of the stars. After a long and valiant struggle, he succumbed to the ravages of drug addiction at the age of thirty-two, the world learned this at the time of his death. But if it had not been for the tireless efforts of a handful of studio publicity experts, the world would have known all about it at least two years before the tragic end. Reid would have been ruined professionally at the height of his career and his employers would have lost hundreds of thousands of dollars in potential revenue.

Many of Reid's studio friends suspected the true condition and a few of them really knew of his dope addiction at least two years before the end. But Reid denied it emphatically to studio authorities, and there was no proof.

Then one day a quietly-dressed young fellow presented himself at the studio gate and asked for Wally. Word was relayed to Reid and he okayed the stranger's admission to the set where the actor was at work. But he did not know that a group of State Narcotic Board detectives were following. When they closed in on the stranger, he tried to toss away a cigarette case filled with neat little bundles of heroin. Under cross-examination he admitted he was delivering them to Reid. And the latter admitted they were for him but insisted he was using them in "scientific experimentation."

THE dope peddler was hustled off to jail. In less than an hour a shifty-eyed lawyer called on Reid and informed the latter unless he raised five thousand dollars at once as a "defense fund" for the peddler, that gentleman would tell plenty.

Enter the publicity experts. A hurried search uncovered a friend of the incarcerated peddler. He was drafted as spokesman and dispatched to the jail house. He was instructed to tell the accused man that he would be released on bail and every effort made to defend him if he would get rid of his shyster attorney and place himself completely in the hands of the "suppress agent." Eventually he agreed.

The next move was to enlist the services of the best criminal lawyer in town. Through his efforts bail was reduced materially. Since Reid's name must be kept out of it, at all costs, a studio executive was persuaded to loan the necessary bonds which were posted.

Now arose an unexpected complication—the young wife of the peddler was about to become a mother and the father-to-be had no means of support. The press agent in charge called on Mrs. Reid (Dorothy Davenport) and explained. From her own household allowance, she supported the expectant mother and when it was necessary for the girl to go to a maternity hospital, Mrs. Reid paid all of the bills.

But the agent for all of the arrangements was the aforesaid press agent; the Reid name must not be linked with the case in any way. To this day the heads of a certain lying-in hospital in Los Angeles believe the child born there was the illegitimate offspring of the publicity man who conducted the negotiations and ostensibly paid the bill!

The case was scheduled to be heard by a Federal judge who was famous for the lengthy sentences he dealt out to drug distributors. An effort was made to soften him a bit by playing on his sympathies in this particular instance but without result. So it became necessary to pull a thousand strings and have the case transferred to an equally honest but more lenient judge.

Eventually, because it was the first offense and because of the young wife and child, the peddler received the extremely light sentence of only six months in a local jail (and a very comfortable one, as jails go). Deeply grateful for all that had been done for him, he protected Wallace Reid's name until the day of his death. And that came the day after Reid passed away; the peddler died a suicide twenty-four hours after the actor's death.

Fly-by-night publishers periodically have fattened on the troubles of the motion picture industry. But one offender was neatly halted in his tracks and effectually handcuffed for all time without a whisper of unfavorable publicity.

This "publisher" had accumulated a half-dozen of the more commonplace whispered tales of the Hollywood of a decade ago. These had been embellished imaginatively and the names of the principals thinly disguised by such childish subterfuges as the changing of "Betty" to "Letty."

This collection of obscenity was duly printed, bound and offered for sale on the newsstands of the country. Fortunately for the menaced film folk, an advance copy fell into friendly hands before the edition was actually in circulation.

The "suppress" agent went to work. The "publisher" was shrewd enough to ship his merchandise by railway express across the country, instead of using the parcel post. But he made one serious slip; he mailed a copy of it to the copyright bureau in Washington, D. C. That error laid him low.

The studio representative promptly got in touch with an old friend, an assistant in the office of the U. S. District Attorney. Here was a clear violation of the law covering the sending of obscene matter through the mails. Federal agents

Helen didn't mean to be CARELESS

MARY: Why does Helen have such a poor time at parties?

JANE: The men simply won't dance with her—it's a shame she's so careless.

HELEN: Just look, I've spoiled another dress under the arms! In spite of everything I do, I can never feel safe in a warm room.

MARY: Why don't you use Kleinert's Dress Shields? You'll never need to worry again—they're guaranteed to protect your dress.

(Next day)—

HELEN: What kind of Kleinert's Shields do you recommend?

SALESCLERK: They're all good but I think you would be especially pleased with their new Blue Label BOILABLE shields—hot soap suds get everything so sweet and clean.

HELEN: There! I've put Kleinert's Dress Shields in every dress I own. Mary says they will prevent friction and weakening of the fabric as well as perspiration stains.

JANE: I'm so glad you insisted on Kleinert's—it always seems silly to accept a substitute when genuine Kleinert's cost as little as 25c a pair. Well—I must run along home—be sure to come early tonight, it's going to be a good party.

Kleinert's

Regardless of anything else you may do, you still need Kleinert's Dress Shields to protect your dress. When genuine Kleinert's Dress Shields cost as little as 25c a pair, why should you risk your dress by even one careless wearing. Women who dress well have discovered that clothes last longer and look better if the underarms are protected from friction, staining, and weakening of the fabric by perspiration chemicals.

"WHEN I first saw Clopay 15c Window Shades, it was hard to believe they cost so little. They actually look many times their price. Dainty chintz-like patterns. Plain colors are exceptionally attractive."

Clopays are amazingly durable, too. Cannot crack, pinhole or ravel on the edges. Patented creped texture also makes them hang straight, roll straight, wear longer. Attach to old rollers in a jiffy without tacks or tools. Used daily in over a million homes. See CLOPAYS at your favorite "5 and 10" or neighborhood store. Send 3c for color samples to the

New FABRAY Out-does Oilcloth

"As much as I save on CLOPAY Shades—I am even more astonished by value in FABRAY! It looks and wears like oilcloth, yet costs ⅓ to ½ less. Better still, it will not crack or peel. The many designs are simply stunning and the colors and patterns in extremely good taste."

FABRAY is entirely new—has the same surface as oilcloth, yet can be creased or folded without cracking or peeling because its backing is solid, tough fibre instead of scrim. As easy to wash as tile. were dispatched to locate and confiscate the plates from which the book was printed.

But now arose another difficulty. If the case went to trial, all of the evidence would be part of the court records and as such available to every newspaper in the world. So this is how this problem was solved: The "publisher" was haled into the Federal building and the seriousness of his crime thoroughly explained to him. The plates were stored in the Federal archives as evidence. If one copy of his book was sold, out would come the plates and into jail he would go. That ended that.

Not always are the trouble shooters infallible. When word of the mysterious death of William Desmond Taylor was flashed to the studio where he had been an ace director, a studio representative galloped to the scene arriving neck and neck with the police and ahead of the newspapermen. Unfortunately for one of the two feminine stars whose names were dragged into the case the studio man did not know all the details of the household arrangements. True, he did manage to see that a certain group of letters reached the District Attorney without passing through the hands of the press but he overlooked an incriminating bit of apparel and other small items of evidence which later proved embarrassing. The authorities convinced themselves that neither of the ladies involved had killed Taylor but a great deal of damage was done.

There are veteran publicity trouble-shooters in Hollywood today who insist that, if the studio authorities and lawyers had acted on the publicity men's advice, Roscoe Arbuckle would have been cleared immediately of the ugly charge brought against him in connection with the death of a minor motion picture actress in his San Francisco hotel suite.

Here was no case of covering up anything; the tragedy had happened. But the press agents argued that Roscoe should be allowed to tell his side of the story. The lawyers insisted that he remain silent; that the case be tried in court. The press was hungry for news and an ambitious prosecuting attorney and his assistant saw that the news services received plenty of material. But it was all on one side. Arbuckle's silence, according to the publicity boys, convicted him in the public's mind, before the case ever went to trial.

As proof of their contention that public opinion could have been swayed, they cite the following very different but parallel case wherein a timely statement turned the tide:

AN interlocutory decree of divorce was granted to Rudolf Valentino and his first wife, Jean Acker. Under the California divorce laws, neither party may re-marry until the expiration of a year, when the decree becomes final.

Before the year was up, Valentino fell in love with Natacha Rambova and wished to marry her. After a series of consultations with his lawyer, the actor was advised that he could be married in Old Mexico without legal complications. So across the border the pair went and were duly married by a Mexican jefe. They returned to the U. S. and hied themselves to Palm Springs, California, for their honeymoon.

All might have been well but for the ambition of an assistant district attorney of Los Angeles County. Scenting headlines, he announced that Valentino had committed bigamy.

Valentino heard of this in the early hours of the morning and drove the rest of the night in order to be at the district attorney's office in the morning to clear himself. But again a lawyer, with characteristic professional caution, warned Valentino not to talk.

Immediately there was a terrific hue and cry! Valentino was a fugitive from justice, the assistant D. A. shouted in bold-face headlines. Valentino was nothing of the sort but his silence made it appear so.

Finally, the publicity trouble-shooter persuaded the studio authorities to let him take charge of the case. Here was the screen's great lover accused of bigamy. It looked simple enough to the press agent. So with the star's approval, the publicity man drafted a Valentino statement for the press which read as follows:

"I married Miss Rambova because I love her more than anything in life. I did it on the advice of my lawyers who told us we were violating no law. If we have done wrong, we will separate until my divorce becomes final and then be remarried. But right or wrong, whatever I have done, I have done for love."

That was too much for the Valentino fans. So he had done it for love! They welcomed him back, marriage and all. Public opinion made a martyr of Valentino; he was being persecuted for love! The case was quietly dropped.

OCCASIONALLY it has been possible to turn adverse winds into favorable breezes by ballyhooing the entire incident to the point of sheer farce. Bebe Daniels' brief sojourn in the bastille, some years ago, on a speeding charge serves as a perfect example of this technique.

Hollywood is in Los Angeles County which adjoins Orange County in Southern California. At the time this happened, the latter was famous for its war on reckless motorists. Speed traps dotted Orange County's fine highways and an honest and courageous judge handed out jail sentences to one and all, regardless of the business, social or political affiliations of the offender.

Touring across Orange County, Bebe made the grave mistake of bearing down a little too hard on the accelerator. Wheeeeee! And there was the charming Bebe face to face with a visit to the hoose-gow!

Once again the studio trouble-shooter moved into action. But there was precious little to be done. The judge snorted at the suggestion of a fine or a suspended sentence. Bebe Daniels or Jane Doe—they were all alike to him. Ten days in jail and no maybe about it was the final edict.

Then one of the publicity lads came up with the winning suggestion. Of course Bebe would serve her sentence! And every man, woman and child who could spell out simple English would read about it before, during and after her incarceration!

Bebe went to jail to the tune of the greatest publicity blast the motion picture industry had known up to that time. Friends, sympathizers and admirers from the four points of the compass deluged her jail quarters with flowers, books and candy. A friendly jailer even permitted her to have a phonograph. The press was flooded with photos of the star en route to jail, behind the bars, with the matron, eating prison fare, chatting with other traffic offenders, etcetera, etcetera. Her jail diary was featured in many newspapers throughout the country. Her stay in jail eventually developed most of the features of a three-ring circus. The studio even cashed in on this publicity avalanche, subsequently, by starring Miss Daniels in a picture called "The Speed Girl."

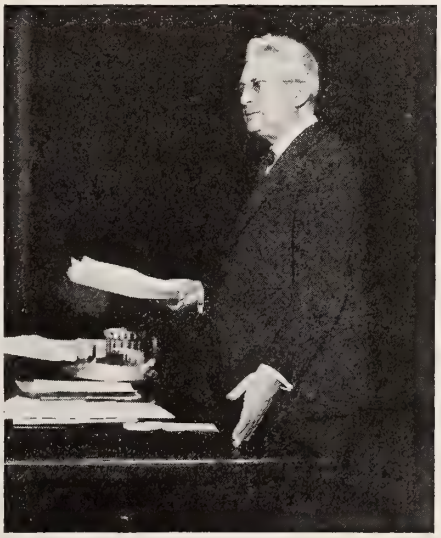
'Lullaby of Broadway.' In it you'll recognize (we hope you will, anyway) the milk wagons going through Times Square at dawning, the honking of taxis' horns, the ermine-coated and swallow-tailed gentry and you'll even recognize the hired silk hats that they wear when you sing, 'The rumble of a subway train, the rattle of the taxis, the daffydils who entertain at Angelo's and Maxie's . . .'"



"Yeah," put in Al, "and don't forget the swell looking theatre doormen. Gosh, please don't make us tell you any more about it. We're liable to break down and weep on your shoulder."

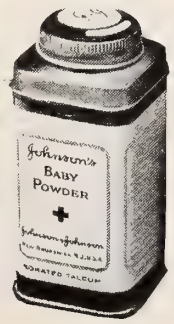
IT wasn't homesickness, however, that inspired these two prolific boys to spin another hit-no-errors, for "Gold Diggers of 1935." There's a tune from it called "I'm Goin' Shoppin' With You." But let Al, who has completely recovered, tell you about it.

"There's a scene in the picture between Alice Brady and Gloria Stuart in which Gloria puts up woman's eternal cry that she hasn't anything to wear. It looked like a good spot for a song, so Harry and I put our two curly heads together, but we couldn't think up an idea. One day Busby Berkeley, who directed the dancing, came in late for rehearsal. We asked him why he was tardy. Whereupon he excused himself by saying that he had been out shopping with his missus. You see," Al's voice took on an apologetic note, "he's been married only a few months and he's still foolish enough to go along on a shopping tour with a woman."

"So-o-o-o," it was Harry's turn, "Bus's tardiness was good for something. It gave us an idea for a song. We wrote 'I'm Goin' Shoppin' With You,' which goes like this: 'Whenever you go shoppin' to buy a dress that's new, Honey, I'll keep my eye on the dresses you try on, 'Cause I'm goin' shoppin' with you . . .'"

The songs which Al Jolson sings in "Go Into Your Dance" were inspired by the star. The boys just had to build the

Here is the man responsible for those lovely lyrics in "Roberta," Otto Harbach.



"Oh darn! Darn! Double-darn! Every time I get him part way up, he falls down again! I'd like to break his old ladder in a trillion pieces! I will not be quiet—and I won't be good! I'm mad!"

"Bath-time? . . . Oh . . . Well, that's different. Will you let me spank the water—and poke a hole in the soap? And do I get some soft, smooth Johnson's Baby Powder all over me afterward?"

"Hurray! When I'm under that dandy powder shower I could just squeal for joy. And I never have a rash or a prickle or a chafe, do I? What do I care if things go wrong in my work!"

"I'm Johnson's Baby Powder . . . and wherever I go, babies forget their troubles! For I keep their skins smooth and soft as satin—I'm satin-soft myself! I'm made of finest Italian talc—no gritty particles as in some powders. No zinc stearate or orris-root either. Your baby will appreciate Johnson's Baby Soap and Baby Cream, too!"

ODOR

A DEODORANT THAT'S EASY TO CARRY
IN YOUR PURSE

Here is something that will make your job of keeping sweet just twice as easy. It's a new kind of deodorant. No need to spread it on or rub it in with the fingers. No need to dig into a jar. No waiting for it to dry, and you can use it right after shaving.

This new deodorant is the size and shape of a lipstick—applied as easily as a lipstick. A few touches to the armpits and you are protected against odor for the day.

Its name? Perstik. And because it is the size and shape of a lipstick, it is easy to keep in your purse for use during the day or evening. If you have ever—even for a single moment—suspected the presence of under-arm odor when away from your boudoir, you will appreciate having a Perstik with you in your purse at all times.

numbers around Al's personality, which is a comparatively easy thing to do when the subject is someone like Jolson. All they had to do was to write a new kind of "Mammy" song for him called, "Mammy I'll Sing About You," and they let him do the rest, permitting him to change the lyrics when he thought they didn't suit him.

"But 'She's A Latin From Manhattan,' from the same picture, was inspired by Ruby Keeler, Al's missus," said Harry. "In the picture Ruby's supposed to dress up as a Spanish señorita. I visualized little Irish Ruby with her pert nose and Erin blue eyes all togged out in a colorful Spanish skirt and a mantilla. Somehow the two didn't mix, you know, like Irish potatoes and Spanish onions. And there, little children, was our idea for 'She's a Latin from Manhattan,' Tho' she does the rhumba from Tenth Avenue . . . Señorita Donahue.'"

"'A Good Old-Fashioned Cocktail With A Good Old-Fashioned Girl,' also sung by Ruby, was inspired by the way Ruby and Al used to hold hands between pictures. Can you imagine a husband and wife married as long as they are still showing affection in public? We thought Ruby was pretty old-fashioned, and it gave us an idea for this ditty: 'If you're feeling kind of lonely and you feel you need a pal, Have a good old-fashioned cocktail with a good old-fashioned gal . . .'"

SAM COSLOW turned out all the hits for Carl Brisson's initial starring picture, "All The King's Horses." There's a story behind one of the important numbers called "A Little White Gardenia," too. Evidently there are movie fans in England who are as violent as those we have in America. For Carl Brisson, while starring in British pictures, was the daily recipient of a white gardenia via florist delivery, sent by an unknown admirer. Carl happened to tell the incident to Coslow and, presto, the seed for "A Little White Gardenia," was sown, which starts out with "For I bring a little white gardenia, as refreshing as a day in May . . ."

"When My Prince Charming Comes Along," from the same picture, was Sam Coslow's nice way of paying a compliment to the star of "All The King's Horses." Brisson is Sam's idea of an airmail answer to a woman's prayer.

Otto Harbach, the grand old man who has been ringing the bell and bringing home the bacon for nigh on to twenty-seven years, gets his ideas from situations only. Otto needs no man, beast nor incident to inspire him, though he may need a couple of birds, as you'll discover if you read on. Otto inserts numbers for shows only when a musical number presents itself automatically.

"My songs are naturally produced. If you saw 'Roberta,' you'll recall the band of music which was part of the plot. With an orchestra right on the stage, a singing number is obviously necessary. I don't like this business of putting a scene in an office and suddenly having the boss open his mouth to yodel a love song to his stenographer. To me that's ridiculous and far-fetched. There may be rhyme to a situation like that but certainly no reason.

"People have asked me many times how I got the idea for 'Smoke Gets in Your Eyes.' They thought that my wife might have been learning to smoke and had got some in mine. No, I'm afraid that would have inspired a calling-down, not a title. The idea for the song came from the plot of the story. The Russian princess is in love with a man, who, she thinks, loves another. She is miserable. I said to myself, 'Let me see if I can't think of some expression that sounds like a Russian proverb and would fit a situation like that.' I thought hard and then I manufactured one, 'When Your Heart's On Fire, Smoke Gets In Your Eyes.'"

Harbach is a very thorough mechanic. He applies more of the technique of the business man to his songwriting than that of the artist. Many years ago he wrote "Love Nest" by simply comparing it to a dove nest. To make that scene stand out, he went to the director and asked him to train a couple of doves so they'd fly around the stage and come back to their nest.

"The director said he had enough to do to train the human birds, so I went to work and trained them myself. I got the idea of putting some food in the nest so that they'd always fly back there. It never failed to work. By the time the play was over, we had enough doves for ten road companies."

"Lovely To Look At," another hit song from "Roberta," was written especially for the picture by Dorothy Fields and Jimmy McHugh. These two tunesmiths conceived the idea for "Lovely To Look At" by watching the fashion show scene, one of the most beautiful in the picture. Both agreed that the mannequins, parading their clothes, were not only lovely to look at, but lovely enough to be loved. With that inspiration, they sat themselves down and wrote "Lovely to look at, Delightful to know and heaven to kiss . . ."

"HUNKA DOLA," written by Jack Yellen, Cliff Friend and Joseph Meyer for "Scandals of 1935" and which is sung by Alice Faye, Lyda Roberti and Jimmy Dunn, was inspired by a charming maid, aged two. The boys were having trouble. George White, who conceived both the names and steps of Black Bottom, Charleston and other dance routines, invented another dance for "Scandals," but he couldn't think of a name for it. The boys had written the music, the steps had been invented and practiced, but what were they to call it? They thought and thought and thought but no title could they think of. They decided if they couldn't feed their brains, they might as well feed their stomachs. So they went into a restaurant. A woman and a small girl sat opposite them. The former munched on a roll. "Wanta hunka dola," said the little one.

Jack turned to Cliff, Cliff turned to Joe and they raised one glorious "whoop." "Hunka Dola" was the perfect title for a dance number.

Sammy Fain and Irving Kahal, who composed the lyrics and music for "Goin' To Town," had as swell a time as a guy with binoculars at a nudist colony. Their subject was Mae West and all they had to do was to think of her and write a song around her. Nevertheless, "Now I'm A Lady" was inspired by the original title of the picture and by an incident which happened on the set.

"It was a blue Monday, and we were all in the dumps," said Sammy. "The censors (remember them?) had just banned 'Belle of the Nineties.' Everyone was discouraged except Mae who kept her good spirits. 'The Liberty Bell and I are very much alike,' said Mae. 'My Liberty's half cracked, too. But it means that from now on, I'm a lady.' That gave her the idea for a picture and gave us the idea for a song."

So you see how it is! An idea may come from the air, a personality or a situation. The next time you hum a tune, think of the poor writers who had to wrack their tired brains to get the inspiration. Think of them and give them a great big hand.

Do You Believe This Story?

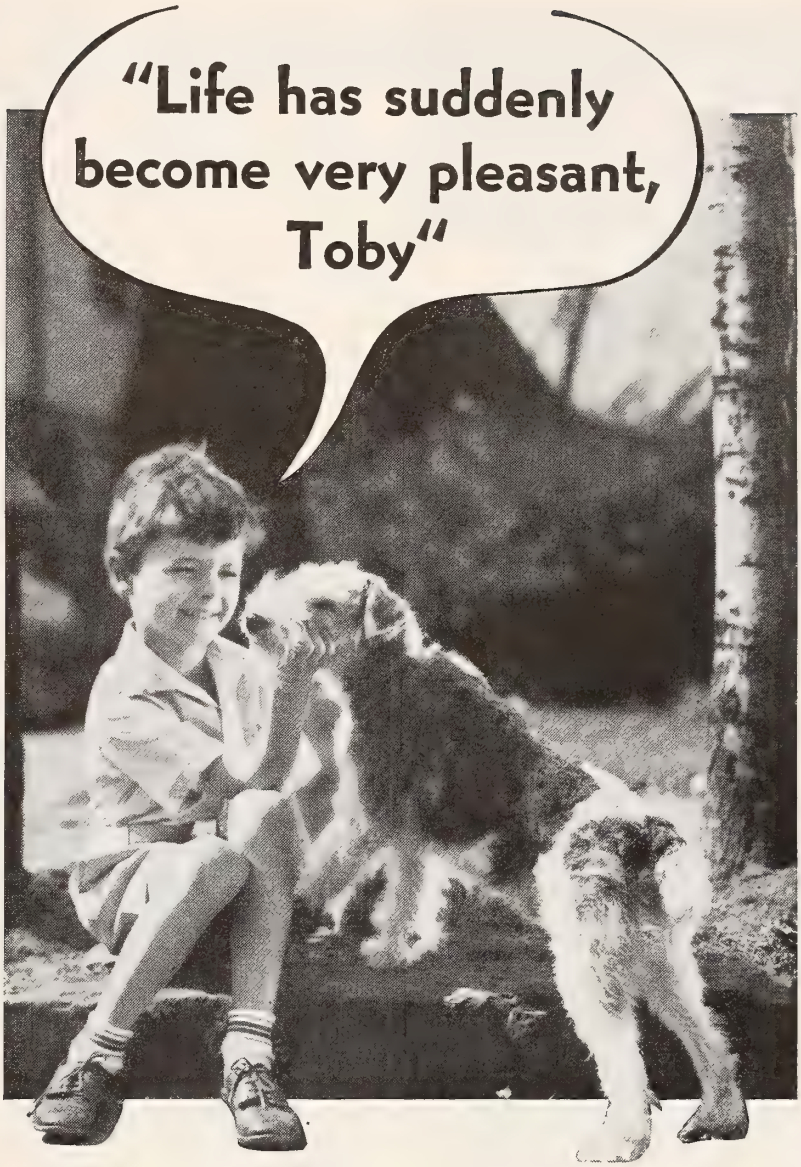
I said, "Tell me about . . . the house, please. . ."



He said, "Your fancy may crawl away from the telling of such a tale. Your readers may not believe. But in order to tell you about the house I must go back a little way. You know that I am married a fourth time. Yes, you know that. You have heard about my—my other wives. You know that I come from the black mountains of Hungary where, in the arms of my old nurse, I heard the tales of vampires and saw their victims. Ah, yes, as I grew older and could take notice of things about me I saw many a young man and young woman pale and sicken and seem to die with no cause given. I had a skeptical mind. I read widely. I made a brave attempt to laugh off such nonsense. Folklore gone mad, I told myself. I would shake off the charnel-house odors of such foul superstitions. . .

"And then, I met the woman. Her age was indeterminable. She was an actress. She was not outstandingly beautiful. Her hair was a pale brown. Her skin was deathly pale at times; at other times it was a blood, blood red—that was when she had been fed. Her mouth was thin and ravenous. Her teeth were tiny, and pointed. She had been married many times. There had been many lovers. One never asked what had become of them. Men feared her—and went to her at her command. Husbands left their wives because of her.

I HAD a wife, too, and two sons. Yes I have two sons of whom I have never spoken. They are grown boys now. I have never seen them since I—I left. I have never, from that day to this, sent so much as a picture postcard home. Nor have I had one. How should I? I burned all my bridges behind me when I left more than fifteen years ago. It was safer to have no communication of any earthly kind. I wish I could say that I did not care, that the thought of those two young men of mine did not matter to me. But I do care, it does matter. However, to get back. . . . At that time I was living the normal life of a young man of the town. I had played Romeo, with some success.

For this little citizen a sombre world has suddenly brightened.

His mother has given him his first taste of Fletcher's Castoria — the children's laxative. And did he love it!

That delicious taste is important. It means no more of the struggles that a bad-tasting laxative causes — that all too often upset a child's nerves, his digestion, his whole delicate little system.

That's why even the taste of Fletcher's Castoria is made especially for children!

It is also prepared just as carefully for a child's needs.

It contains only ingredients that are suitable for a child—no harsh, purging drugs that so many "grown-up" laxatives contain. Fletcher's Castoria will never cause griping pains. It is not habit-forming. It is completely, perfectly safe. It is very gentle—yet very thorough.

I was said to be of outstanding appearance. I had a genial disposition and a happy outlook on life.

"Then I met—her. The very first time I was introduced to her I broke out into a deathly cold sweat. My heart and pulse raced and then seemed to stop, dead. I lost control of my limbs and faltered in my speech. I was never happy in her presence. I felt always sick and dizzy and depleted. Yet I could not remain away from her. She never bade me come to her, not in words. There was never any of the conventional trapping of assignations. I simply went to her, at odd hours of the day and night, impelled by an agency I neither saw nor heard.

"I lost weight. I hardly slept. I had seen other young men fade and wither before my eyes and had heard the village folk whisper the dread cause. But when it came to me, I did not know it for what it was.

"It was my mother who forced me to flee the country and never to return to it again until that woman and every trace and memory of her vanished from the sight of men. . . ."

"This that I am telling you is the truth. It can be verified if you are curious or incredulous.

"I came to America. After a time, my health returned to me. I tried, on two other occasions, to find human love, to marry and have a home as other men have. You have heard the results. One marriage lasted twenty-four hours . . . The other . . I can only say that she, the faithful one, was there and gave me to understand that if ever I felt love again, attempted marriage, she would stand between me and fulfillment.

"For many months, for years I dared not think of love or of marriage. I was determined to stay alone.

AND then I met my present wife. She was my secretary. She, too, is of Hungarian descent. She was born here. She, too, was raised on the folklore of the country side, the tales of vampires and ghouls and unspeakable things.

"She loved me, she has told me, at first sight. Something in her ached for me. I did not love her—not at first. I had put love from me. Then, day after day, as she worked for me and with me, did little things for me I had not thought to ask her, a craving for companionship, for a woman in my heart and in my home once more took hold of my very vitals.

"But I wanted to put her to the test. For weeks before I dared to tell her that I loved her, wanted to marry her I—I tortured her. They were not nice things, the things I did to her. I cannot speak of them. Perhaps it was to test her . . . perhaps it was an attempt to placate that—that other one. Whatever it was and however shamed my heart, I caused her such suffering as made the tears stream down her face for hours and hours at a time . . . but she never faltered, never turned away from me.

"And so, nearly two years ago we were married and we found this house.

"We thought, 'We will make it safe against invasion of any kind. And so we have locks on all the doors, locks that cannot be unlocked by any hands but mine. And no one is admitted to this house unless that person is well known to us. No appointments are made over the phone. We have five hounds and one of them is white and his name is Bodri. He knows. The windows, as you can see, are screened and barred and locked. On the landing of each stairway is a large cushion upon which one of the hounds sleeps at night . . . no footstep, human or otherwise, can mount or descend these stairs without their knowing it.

"And there are times when they howl in the night . . . howl fearfully though no eye, not even mine, can see what they are howling at.

"And so, in spite of all these precautions which you, yourself, can see, the house is haunted.

"I knew it, first, when the dogs began to howl. I knew it when I first saw the white fur rise on Bodri's body, saw his ears flatten and his red eyes dilate.

"I knew it when, in the dead of night, there came the sound of something dragging around the house.

AND then, that first night in this house and every night thereafter the bat has come. The first night I saw that bat, monstrously big and with but one eye, flattened against the window. . .

"It began to be a monomania with both of us—to kill that bat. We had the feeling that if we ridded ourselves of that thing we would be free. We told Bodri to get it. We even hired exterminators to come up and watch for the creature and kill it. We had all kinds of men here lying in wait for it. They finally told us we were imagining it—there was no bat visible. We knew that they thought we were mad.

"Months went by and then, one night, Bodri got it. We heard him howling in the darkness. He came into the house and he had it in his mouth, limp, dead, hideous beyond words. With a sick heart and shuddering flesh I went into the garden and there, in the dead of night, I dug a grave for it. I dug a hole deep enough to bury the Giant of Tarsus. I went back to the house, and to bed.

"The next night came. We had a little festive dinner, my wife and I. We drank wine and were very gay. We even talked of the time when we might go back to Hungary, back to Lugos. In the midst of our happy talk, it happened.

"My wife heard it first. I could tell that she had heard it by the look on her face. I went to the window. The bat was back again. Not the same one, you say? But yes, it was.

"I went out into the garden with Bodri beside me. I dug up that deep pit again. The bat was gone. The ground was undisturbed but the bat—was—gone."

Lugosi rose and walked over to the hearth over which hangs his mother's coat of arms. He said, simply, "I swear that what I am telling you is the truth."

I rose to go. Mr. Lugosi walked with me to the door, unlatched it, took me through the garden, unlatched the gate. He said, "This is a strange tale to have told you. In the town of Lugos it would not be thought so strange, nor disbelieved. So often and so frightful is this sort of thing over there, even today, that the townspeople of Lugos often keep their dead for days and sometimes weeks to be sure they have died a Christian death and not the hideous, half-death of the vampires. But I hope," Lugosi said, with that slight bow from the waist of his, "I hope I have not frightened you . . ."

I drove away. I was grateful for the sunshine. I tried to think. What rot! What utter nonsense! I couldn't—not quite. I thought of this man who lives here, in Hollywood, who walks the streets and works in the studios and is charming and courteous and kind. But walks, always, with make-up or without, with that pallid face and those white, preternatural hands and smileless smile.

This, at any rate, is the story he told me. I have not exaggerated. I have not dramatized.

You may draw your own conclusions.

What Are Your Wedding Plans?

stitched fabric hat trimmed with a rhinestone ornament.

Another choice is a suit designed for her by Adrian. It is a two-piece beige suit with the jacket collarless and tucked in an unusual way. Adrian adds a wide brown suede belt over-laced with a rope of the beige woolen. A brown felt hat, brown gloves, shoes and bag complete this. For actual traveling, Rosalind tops this suit with a tan camel's hair coat trimmed with lynx. Be sure to make note of the smart lightweight airplane luggage which is piled up alongside this coat . . . a perfect selection for your trousseau luggage.

Rosalind suggested that we show her a stunning three-piece pajama ensemble rather than a fluffy bridal negligee because she thinks it is the sort of thing you would all like to have whether you are planning a trousseau or not. Heavy white silk crêpe for the Norfolk-type jacket and full trousers. The robe of the same material is made very tailored in double-breasted effect. Both the pajama jacket and the robe are piped and buttoned in a bright blue shade. Rosalind adds a polka dotted Ascot in the blue as an individual detail.

I have been thinking so much about weddings and trousseaux that everyone I see, I get talking on the subject. I had tea with Frances Drake, the other day and she only needed a slight prod to start off on plans for her own wedding. No, she isn't even engaged, but she would like to have a real wedding when she finally makes up her mind to be married.

"Of course," she said, "the very fact that there is a beautiful old lace veil that belonged to my grandmother in our family, will probably be the very reason that I shall join the dozens of other Hollywood stars that have run off to Yuma and have been married in any old costume they had on! This veil is still in England but it has been promised to me whenever I want it. I like to design my own clothes, some of them are a little eccentric, I'm afraid, but I like unusual cut, line and color. For my wedding dress, though, I would like something quite medieval . . . you know, a high neckline, long, tight-fitting sleeves and the satin fitted through the body, flowing out into fullness toward the hem. The veil could be held by a small Juliet cap of pearls. And don't laugh, but for my bouquet I should like forget-me-nots and tea roses!"

I didn't laugh because it sounded perfectly charming to me. Frances has such an interesting face, she is pretty, too, but there is something more than just mere prettiness in her face and I could well imagine how lovely she would look in the costume she described and in her grandmother's veil.

ROYER, Fox's clever designer, talked about wedding finery, too. He likes brides to look romantic above everything else. And he, like Frances, prefers to choose his style from old-fashioned sources. He described a wedding party which he had designed for a Spanish picture they were doing at Fox.

"I made the bride's gown in a heavy, luminous satin," he said. "The design was quite simple and conventional but very feminine. The dress was trimmed with an appliqué of lace at the neckline and her veil was net, appliqued with medallions of the same lace. In the wedding scene, she had to wear the veil back from her face, but I had a small veil that completely covered her face when she first appeared. The maid of honor wore a lamé dress made with puffed panniers at the hips, short puffed sleeves and a fitted bodice. Rather a shepherdess effect, you see. A Watteau hat trimmed with flowers for her headgear. The bridesmaids were in tulle and satin, also somewhat on the shepherdess style and wore the same type of hat as the maid of honor. And, the flowers, they were the best fun because I attached them, near the handle, to a Bo-Peep crook."

I saw a picture of this wedding party, later, and I can tell you it was very stunning. I forgot to mention that this was an all-white wedding except for the silver lamé of the maid of honor's gown.

To get back to our own weddings, however. If you are not going to plan for a formal ceremony, there is the alternative of the small home or chapel service. Ginger Rogers, when she married Lew Ayres, had a wedding of this kind. She was married in church but did not wear satin and a veil, of course, it was her second marriage and she couldn't correctly wear full bridal array, but even so, her costume was perfect for the bride who doesn't want to be too formal. Ginger wore pale green lace with a fitted bodice and full skirt. Her hat was trimmed with the same lace. Janet Gaynor and Mary Brian, her only attendants, wore simple, long afternoon dresses in beige and blue respectively. It was simple, charming and very smart.

Any long-skirted, feminine type of afternoon gown is quite charming for the informal wedding. The color should always be a pastel or some soft shade.

And now for the bride who runs off to the city hall. Any simple silk dress or good-looking suit is appropriate. You can wear a corsage, or carry a small bouquet. Rosalind Russell's navy blue silk with the jabot is an excellent type of costume for a civil ceremony. A soft ensemble in a plain and printed combination of fabrics is another suggestion.

Besides Rosalind's gown and trousseau, I have picked several other costumes on page 66, that fit into the wedding picture. Anita Louise wears a heavenly bridesmaid's dress. It is a soft blue tulle over a taffeta foundation. The shirtwaist detail of the bodice and the white piqué collar and tie, are some of those nice paradoxical touches which very feminine dresses often affect this season. Pleating of the tulle makes cuffs, and jabot.

Mary Astor wears a silk jacket costume which is suitable either for an informal bridal costume or for a going-away dress for the bride who marries formally. It is made in pink rough crêpe, the box jacket having sleeve fullness at the elbow. A lace blouse, finely tucked, and in the same shade, accompanies this. Mary's hat is a rough pink straw banded in deep blue ribbon.

For the bride's mother at the formal wedding, no costume could be more perfect than Verree Teasdale's lace and chiffon one in eggshell white. The blouse, with high collar and jabot, is of the lace. The skirt of chiffon has full godets to give it a graceful movement. Verree's wide contrasting belt is brown and yellow silk cording.

A lovely summery evening gown for your trousseau is that of Bette Davis. Yellow and brown dotted organdy, girdled in brown velvet. The whole silhouette is one of crispness and youthfulness.

And Genevieve Tobin holds up a taffeta muff for your inspection. This is not only a grand summer evening accessory but it is also a nice detail for your bridesmaid's costume. Flowers can be pinned to this, making it an individual and refreshing change from the usual arm bouquet seen at most weddings.

I can't half cover the subject of weddings in one article. There are so many ideas, so many interesting angles to discuss. However, I have prepared a leaflet for you on "The Trousseau from Lingerie to Linens"—this covers the number of things you will need for both yourself and your new house. Meet Nelson Eddy loud huzzahs, cheers, glove-splitting applause. Rather, it was one of bewilderment, surprise, that swept into a wordless, motionless, breathless appreciation, as an artist's artistry spun out upon the screen. It must have been a triumph for Eddy, sitting with his mother in the row behind us. For nearly two years he has had to smile good-naturedly as he heard people say, "Nelson Eddy? Oh, yeah, he's that singin' fellah they got out at Metro."

HE went into the theatre as just another concert baritone attempting to crash pictures. "I never thought films the medium for me," Eddy told me previously. He left the theatre a success, the raves of the critics ringing in his ears. In the short space of two and one half hours on the night of February sixteen, public favor had made an idol of him. Admiration showed in the faces of the audience as it swept up the aisles, sighted him in the middle center, stared at him. Actors who had passed him with a short nod the day before, waved at him lavishly, fraternally. "Good old Nelse!" Executives, critics, producers, beamed genially upon him.

The public will soon be clamoring for more Eddy pictures, and Eddy wants to wander around America's far places, singing like a medieval troubador.

"Whadaya want to go out in the sticks for, when you can make a lot more money by staying in Hollywood, acting and singing for the movies, and we're willing to pay the price?" they ask him, puzzled.

"Because I've promised my audiences that I'd sing for them, that I'd come again this year, and I don't want to break faith with them," patiently explains Eddy. "Already doorbells are being punched and solicitors are going from house to house selling tickets for my concert. I've worked fifteen years to get to the point where the concert list of, we'll say, Kalamazoo, reads, 'Nelson Eddy, Baritone, and three others.' When I started concert work, the bill read 'Rachmaninoff and three others,' and I was one of the unnamed. It means something to me.

"I guess you don't know just what it is to small-town dwellers, people who seldom get into the big cities for entertainment, to have the winter and spring concert season to look forward to. Women are already buying new evening dresses in Kalamazoo, dressmakers are taking orders. It's a big event in the lives of these people, and I wouldn't fail them."

YEAH," ask others, "but what do you do? Have you got a band? Do you get up with a baton and direct the boys, and then sing the choruses, like Rudy Vallee, or Buddy Rogers? Or have you a vaudeville act?"

"Neither," answers our idealist, patiently. "All I have is an accompanist. He plays the piano, and I sing . . . German lieder, operatic selections, classics, ballads, just about anything."

Actually, the studio has less of an anomaly under contract than they pretend. They know that Nelson Eddy is a likely runner-up for the title of "favorite American baritone" along with Messrs. Tibbett, Werrenrath, Robeson, John Charles Thomas.

As he tells the story, Eddy's entrance into the movie maelstrom was ex-

Dr. Alban Girault, the French expert, says: "Almost unbelievable how well it works."

Dr. Girault (above) has been chief of clinic, Paris Faculty of Medicine—is a member of leading medical societies. He says:

"I was amazed at the results. Instead of acting harshly as cathartics do, it restores bowel action naturally . . . A notable discovery."

Almost unheard of . . . these results in a noted U. S. hospital

IN Hospitals in this country, astonishing results are being obtained with the new Fleischmann's Yeast: 93% of constipation cases corrected in one clinic; 83% of indigestion cases relieved in another; 89% of skin cases of digestive origin in another. Typical cases from one hospital's records are:

CASE OF T. E. MAN. AGE 30.

Suffered from chronic constipation. Used strong cathartics habitually. Tongue coated. Showed obvious symptoms of auto-intoxication from bowel wastes.

Eating three cakes of the new Fleischmann's Yeast daily gave improvement by end of first week of the treatment. Easier bowel movements daily without laxatives. Felt better.

CASE OF K. M. MAN. AGE 62.

Had used strong cathartics and enemas for chronic constipation for 10 years. Discomfort from gas. Pale, weak. Was on a special diet.

Treatment with Fleischmann's new Yeast improved his digestion. Patient was able to discontinue cathartics and enemas as a result. Feels better. No discomfort from gas. Now has natural daily bowel evacuations.

CASE OF K. Q. WOMAN. AGE 51.

Had used strong cathartics for chronic constipation for years. Appetite poor. Frequent headaches. Very nervous. Complained of abdominal heaviness.

After eating Fleischmann's new Yeast, appetite improved. After one week, had daily evacuations without cathartics. Feels very well, no headaches. Nervousness relieved, no more discomfort from gas.

Completely corrected by this new discovery...

CHRONIC CASES OF CONSTIPATION

A new food supplies "Protective Substances" your stomach, bowels need. No ordinary food, even fruits and vegetables, supplies enough!

HOSPITALS are now correcting even stubborn cases of constipation—simply by adding one food to the diet!

For some time it has been known that "protective substances" were needed in the diet for the stomach and bowels to work properly. When these "protective substances" are undersupplied—people become constipated.

Ordinary foods—even fruits and green vegetables—do not supply enough of these substances.

Richest Known Source

But one food now supplies them in abundance . . . is their richest source!

This food is the new Fleischmann's Yeast. This new fresh yeast starts an increased flow of your stomach juices—tones and strengthens nerves and muscles all through your intestines.

Then digestion improves. Bowels work better. The skin clears. Energy increases.

Begin to eat the new Fleischmann's Yeast regularly! Don't stop when you begin to feel better, but go on eating it! Follow the simple rules below.

Eat three or more cakes of this new Fleischmann's Yeast each day. Eat it just plain, or dissolved in a little water . . . or in milk or fruit juices—or spread on a cracker.

Eat it one-half hour before each meal. This gives it a chance to start your digestive juices flowing before other food enters your stomach.

If you're taking cathartics, discontinue them gradually. As this new yeast strengthens your bowels, you can stop using laxatives entirely.

You can get the new Fleischmann's Yeast at grocers, soda fountains and restaurants—in the foil-wrapped cake with the yellow label.

THE NEW FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST is a food—not a medicine. It can give complete bowel regularity . . . help you to keep free from constipation and the many ailments it causes.

Constipation may be serious. To be sure, see a doctor.

TO END THE CATHARTIC HABIT

Try This Improved Pasteurized Yeast That's* EASY TO EAT

IF you take laxatives to keep "regular," you know from experience that drugs and cathartics give only temporary relief from constipation. Such remedies merely cause a drastic purging action. They do not correct the cause of your condition.

Doctors now know that in many cases the real cause of constipation is a shortage of the vitamin B complex. This precious factor is sadly deficient in the typical every-day diet. In many foods it is entirely lacking. When this factor is added to the diet in sufficient amounts, constipation goes. Elimination again becomes regular and complete.

Yeast Foam Tablets are pure pasteurized yeast and yeast is the richest known food source of vitamins B and G. They should stimulate your weakened intestinal nerves and muscles and quickly restore your eliminative system to normal, healthy function.

With the true cause of your constipation corrected, you will be rid of the evil cathartic habit. Your energy will revive. Headaches will go. Your skin will be clearer and fresher.

Don't confuse Yeast Foam Tablets with ordinary yeast. These tablets cannot ferment in the body. Pasteurization makes this yeast utterly safe for everyone to eat. It has a pleasant, nut-like taste that you will really enjoy. And it contains nothing to put on fat.

All druggists sell Yeast Foam Tablets. The 10-day bottle costs only 50c. Get one today. Refuse substitutes.

ceedingly unusual. He didn't want to go into pictures. He was having too much fun warbling the classics in French, Italian, Spanish, Russian, Yiddish and English (yes, he speaks them all), singing "Amonasro" in "Aida," luxuriating in the deep dramatics of the Wagnerian operas (he's better in "Tannhäuser" than "Herodias," we think) kidding around in Gilbert and Sullivan's "Iolanthe" and "The Pirates of Penzance," singing for the Philadelphia Operatic Society, the Philadelphia Civic Opera, making his début (in 1924) in "Pagliacci." Movies, as you can see, were farthest from his thoughts.

March, 1933, found him in Los Angeles, substituting for a missing artist on a concert series. It found him, later, at RKO-Radio studios with an official insisting that he put his signature to a contract. They had a few good musicals around the place that needed a singer who was not only good, but good-looking.

"But, look," he pointed out, "this contract is for only half as much as you originally offered."

"Sure," was the answer. "You want to go in pictures, so why not take a little less?"

"But I don't," Eddy responded, seized the 'phone, reinstated all his cancelled engagements (that was one time when he almost failed the folks), booked his passage on a train that left in twenty minutes. He made the train and left Hollywood flat. That is, he thought he did. By the time he reached New York, the studios were simply frothing about him. Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer won the heat, and Eddy became theirs.

Without his blondness and his bigness and his indifference to motion picture social life and the thrilling story of his belated film success, Eddy would still be outstanding in Hollywood. He has more drive, more force, more earnest desire to work, than any male now on film record. Born in Providence, Rhode Island, he says he has always had that intense urge to master one more thing than that of which he was capable.

Telephone operator, shipping department clerk, newspaper copy reader, reporter, advertising writer, fifteen years ago he decided to make his voice earn his living for him. An advanced student, he went out of his way to learn "Matthew's Passion," an obscure oratorio. The following week someone asked him if he knew it. "Sure," he answered. "I don't believe it," retorted his questioner. "Play some of it," Eddy demanded. The fellow did. Eddy got the job.

Eddy is an only child, part Dutch (President Martin Van Buren is an ancestor), all American, with a New England father and a Southern mother. Eddy, himself, is as New England as Coolidge was, with as sound convictions. He doesn't think much of femmes who pursue gentlemen, has never married, and prefers his women "sweet." They don't have to be domestic, and know how to sew, knit and cook. "My forty dollars a week will take care of that," he says with a smile from behind the tortoise shell glasses he wears off the set.

Of all the raven, Titian and blonde-haired ladies in professional Hollywood he finds not one with whom he cares to romance. It isn't that he's priggish or egotistical, but he doesn't care much about their predatory tactics. "I don't like to have a girl ask me to take her out to dinner," he explains. "One did the other evening and I said to her, 'Listen, honey, I'd like to take you out to dinner tonight, if I had any interest in you, but I haven't. And I think that a man should have a little interest in a girl that he invites to go places, don't you?'

"But I didn't insult her. She thought I was kidding. She turned around to a friend and laughed at what she thought was my joke. Don't think I'm conceited, but when I ask a girl to go out with me, I like to feel that we have something in common, that there's a little flame of mutual interest. I like to have a sweetness about such things, a delicacy, and, besides, the women that I go around with don't want to be seen at the Grove or the Trocadero where the press keeps tab on Hollywood's romantic affairs."

Son of an inventor under U. S. Naval commission, nicknamed "Red" in grammar school (his education was furthered by night and correspondence courses), Eddy, despite his sensational success, would be a welcome addition to Hollywood, even if it is for only six months of the year. Emphatic in his likes and dislikes, vigorous, forceful, self-assured, you are compelled to admire this idealistic newcomer who is so intent upon keeping faith with his vocal constituents in Kalamazoo, and Oshkosh, too. It's about time "high ideals" had a Hollywood comeback.

"I Love My Husband, But—"

and conviction. Leslie with those amazing blue eyes that so dreamily can contemplate the past and then suddenly become electrified with a fervent contemplation of the present. Leslie who, in 'Berkeley Square' said, 'I love you,' and said it more divinely than it has ever been said before. Leslie who, when kissing one woman, makes every woman in the audience feel as though she has been kissed, too.

LESLIE attracts women because he has a great sex magnetism. Ah, that surprises you! But it is so. Leslie is the perfect combination of the physical and the spiritual. He conveys the feeling of romance which endured through the ages, of love everlasting. That is why, as Mooneyeen Clare, it was so easy for me to respond to Leslie for that little, lovely while. . . .

"And then there is Clark . . . Clark Gable. His beauty is thrilling. I suppose it sounds silly to call anyone as rugged as Clark 'beautiful' . . . I hope he will forgive me. But he is beautiful, from his head to his feet. He is rhythmic, unconsciously alive with a powerful, effortless grace. He was the first leading man on the screen who could be cruel, even slap a woman in the face and make other women love him for it.

"Clark is the Great Lover without any of the morbid, tragic aspects of emotionalism. He is the type with whom a woman could roam the hills and highways of the world, loving and laughing lustily. He doesn't take himself seriously in any way, which is his greatest charm. He would never die for love. He would be far more likely to laugh and ride away, like a strong wind, leaving you breathless. . . .

"Bob . . . Bob Montgomery," Norma stretched her slim length on the dull green divan and laughed, the low delighted laugh of a girl looking over old dance programmes, remembering for the moment a waltz, a summer moon, a boy. . . . "Bob," said Norma, "symbolizes moonlight and prom thrills, sophisticated young love. In our first scene together on the screen we danced on a mirrored floor to the strains of 'The Blue Danube' and I thought, then, 'A girl could dance

Clark Gable and Loretta Young in a chilly scene from "Call of the Wild."

"No more 'tired,' 'let-down feeling' for me."

"I reasoned that my red blood corpuscle strength was low and I simply took a course of S.S.S. Tonic and built it back."

IT is all so simple and reasonable. If your physical let-down is caused by lowered red blood corpuscles—which is all too frequent—then S.S.S. Tonic is waiting to help you . . . and will, unless you have a serious organic trouble that demands a physician or surgeon.

Remember, S.S.S. is not just a so-called "tonic." It is a tonic specially designed to stimulate gastric secretions, and also has the mineral elements so very, very necessary in rebuilding the oxygen-carrying red corpuscles in the blood.

This two-fold purpose is important. Digestion is improved . . . food is better utilized . . . and thus you are enabled to better "carry on" without exhaustion—as you should.

You may have the will-power to be "up and doing" but unless your blood is in top notch form you are not fully yourself and you may remark, "I wonder why I tire so easily."

Let S.S.S. help build back your blood tone . . . if your case is not exceptional, you should soon enjoy again the satisfaction of appetizing food . . . sound sleep . . . steady nerves . . . a good complexion . . . and renewed strength.

S.S.S. is sold by all drug stores in two convenient sizes. The $2 economy size is twice as large as the $1.25 regular size and is sufficient for two weeks treatment. Begin on the uproad today. © S.S.S. Co.

Makes you feel like yourself again to Heaven in his arms.' Our personalities react spontaneously, the one to the other, when we are on the screen. He is effervescent and gay. He has the joy of living and a witty mind.

"I always have the feeling that, before I became an actress, I knew Bob or had been in love with somebody just like him. I seem to remember the lines we speak, the moods, the very gestures we are living through together. In fact one day, during the taking of a scene, we both forgot our lines and it didn't matter in the least. We just ad-libbed our way through the rest of the scene, speaking lines we seemed to have spoken before and the director never knew the difference! Bob typifies every girl's beau. Some of my happiest, craziest moments on the set have been moments spent with Bob. . . .

"And then there is Freddie . . . Freddie March. The delightful, lovable Freddie of 'Smilin' Through' and 'The Barretts.' Freddie has the heart of the true actor. I am sure he would rather act than eat or sleep. I told him one day that no one should get paid for doing something that is as much fun as acting is to him. (He didn't agree with me!) Anyway, while I was memorizing lines and making wild dashes between dressing-room and stage, hoops flying, Freddie would be polishing up his imitation of John Barrymore or doing a Douglas Fairbanks, much to the amusement of the company. I would be quite likely to find him hanging from the chandelier or hiding under the couch, much to the distress of his valet, who would be keeping an anxious eye on a pair of carefully pressed trousers, which were to clothe Mr. Browning's restless limbs for the remainder of the day.

"And yet, underneath the splendid clowning, Freddie has an intensity which is very captivating. He is the impudent Romeo. Wise-cracks and kisses, laughter and sex-appeal, that is Freddie.

"Bart . . . Bart Marshall," and Norma's voice dropped, unconsciously to a graver, more sombre note. "Bart is so appealing on the screen because he has a beautiful courtesy and he suffers so. It is easy to act with Bart. You never have to worry about how he is going to do a scene." Norma laughed, rather tenderly. "If he has to kiss you," she said, "he never fumbles, never hits your nose by mistake, never disarranges your hair, never makes one awkward move. When he plays a scene with you he makes you feel as though you are the only woman who has ever existed in this world. By his hands, by the very inflections of that velvety voice, by the caress of his eyes, he can make you seem desirable and, by so doing, make all women seem desirable.

"And Bart's charm doesn't stop with the click of the camera. A few moments later I have heard him speak to a script girl on the set, ask her to do some little favor for him, and he will have the same tender courtesy in his voice that he would have if he were begging a favor of a legendary queen.

"A woman, I think, is like a finely tuned violin. Each hand draws forth a different melody. Some melodies are transient and die on the air as soon as they are born, in the heart as soon as they are heard. Other melodies vibrate the heartstrings for as long as the heart beats.

"These are the emotions which keep our hearts in tune with life, in tune with love. So that, when we meet the man who has the combined charms of all the men we have ever known, he will be able to play a symphony on our heartstrings and we will know that we have met the Master's touch."

with the camera lens, just outside camera range. Then one animal performs. The mask is reversed and the other animal does his stuff. This has been done. Maybe you remember. And maybe you're wise enough to realize that it looks faked, no matter how skillfully performed.

But, suddenly, Director Chester Franklin had an idea. When the crew had first moved to Sequoia National Park where the picture was to be filmed, a tiny deer and a baby puma cub with its eyes not yet open, had been caught to be used as Malibu and Gato in the early scenes of the picture. They had been placed in nearby cages. The cages were moved closer and closer together and at last they were put in one large one with nothing but a netting between them. To the amazement of the crew these two mortal enemies were discovered actually rubbing noses through the wire netting.

That was when Franklin had his great idea. In the story the enemies of the forest had become fast friends. Could this story be true? Could Franklin make it come true?

He did. The result is "Sequoia." And it took a year and a half to make the film, instead of the twenty-one days planned.

OF course, no chances could be taken. One must not carry a noble experiment too far, so Gato, the puma, was so well fed during the making of the picture that his friend, Malibu, the deer, was no temptation as a juicy delicacy. And both were "collar broke." It was a curious sight to see the two animals each with their leashes, a man to each leash, taking their morning constitutional as friendly as a couple of Pekinese pups on Park Avenue. Perhaps more so.

And the hard-boiled crew of camera experts watched something greater than their science. They watched those two wild things grow up together with a miraculous friendship existing between them.

Remember the scene in the picture where Gato and Malibu meet supposedly after several months' separation? What actually happened was that they kept the two animals separated for three days. Then they set up the cameras, put Malibu by the water hole and Gato on the hill. Trembling with anticipation, the cameraman, director and crew watched to see what would happen. What transpired was exactly what you saw in the film. The first "take" was the only one necessary, for the animals recognized each other, Gato came down the hill and the two nuzzled each other.

Infinite patience was required, as you can imagine, to make these two animals love each other. But no patience in the world could make a baby and a snake become bosom pals. In that thrilling scene where the little Japanese baby is just this close to the snake, holds out his little hand to the reptile and whistles to it, a trick, but a very clever trick, was employed.

What you didn't know is that there was a thick plate glass between the child and the snake, so that no danger could come to the baby.

But deer hate snakes and Malibu actually attacked the reptile as you saw it done in the film.

Well, so much for the friendship between the deer and the puma, but how was it possible for little Jean Parker to have the courage to work with the grown-up mountain lion and the deer?

Chester Franklin, the director, began by making friends with Malibu and Gato. Before a camera crank was turned, while scouts were searching Sequoia National Park for suitable locations, Franklin visited Gato's cage every day. He poked his hands through the bars, let the baby lion grow used to his scent and the feel of his hand. Then Franklin would take Jean Parker to the cage on these daily trips. Together they fed both the puma and the deer. Franklin broke a fast Hollywood rule. Usually it is the actors who try to win the director over. In this case it was the director making a big play for his actors, the puma and the deer. And Jean Parker, who knew durn well that those cute things were going to steal the picture from her showed no professional jealousy at all. It was part of her job, she knew, to make friends with these wild animals. And it was a job she loved.

BUT the animals showed temperament. Gato, for instance, hated to ride in trucks but loved automobiles. One day he was in the rear of a sedan and did not want to come out and work. No matter how much they begged and cajoled, he wouldn't budge. Finally, they had to haul on the collar attached to his chain. And then he came out with the arm rail of the car in his teeth. What's more he insisted upon carrying it around for about an hour. No one could get it away from him.

He loved bright objects. On the set which represented the villain's kitchen was a gayly-colored blanket which Gato adored. He was always dragging this "prop" off the set—a very serious offense in Hollywood—and making a bed for himself out of it.

When pleased, a puma has a strange whistle. Both Jean Parker and Chester Franklin learned that whistle. And Gato would answer them. When Malibu was working one day, Gato was tied to a tree all alone. Nobody paid any attention to him. Finally Gato set up such a pitiful howl merely because he wanted company that he had to be brought close to where the work was going on, so that he could be petted occasionally.

The shots of the herds of deer required tremendous work. During an ordinary feature about twelve different camera lenses are used. In "Sequoia" there were forty-seven types of lenses brought into play. The deer were afraid of bright lights. Moonlight they adored, but that's no good for photographic purposes. But the cameraman discovered that they actually liked artificial light better than sunlight. However, he had to get his set-up and then trust to luck.

The cameramen often waited days at a time, hidden in the underbrush, until they got the effects they wanted. And the shifting of the wind would make the animals rush away just as the men had started what they thought would be an excellent sequence.

The crew expected these handicaps. What nobody expected—and the circumstance that gave "Sequoia" its wonderful off-screen drama—was the fact that the puma and the deer would learn to love each other. This makes "Sequoia" unique. And it adds to its already great charm.

Make your darling a Safer Baby

WITH THESE NEW SKIN PROTECTORS

"Isn't your heart set on giving your adorable baby every possible safety and comfort? Of course it is.

"And, now, there is a new, a safer method of caring for your precious sweetheart's tender skin—a method that's recommended by most hospitals and by thousands and thousands of doctors. The Mennen Guardsmen are the symbols of this new method—because it provides baby with two safeguards.

"First is Mennen Antiseptic Oil. More than half of all the hospitals, important in maternity work, now give their babies a complete body-rub at least once a day with Mennen Antiseptic Oil. These hospitals have proved that it gives baby a lovelier, smoother, healthier skin—and, above all, that it keeps baby safer—'bathed in protection'—guarded against many infections. Doctors recommend that the daily oil-rubs be continued during at least baby's diaper age. Will you do this for your darling?

"And then, when you gradually discontinue the daily oil-rubs, dust baby's body with the new antiseptic baby powder—Mennen Antiseptic Borated Powder. It's everything a fine baby powder should be—prevents chafing—makes the skin satiny smooth, lovelier than ever—and, in addition, it's antiseptic. It continues the protection which the antiseptic oil gives against germs.

"Now—let me send you free trial sizes of these Mennen Guardsmen. For your baby's greater safety—send me the coupon below."

notice you? Listen to you? Be interested in you? Okay.

Start off by being definite. I cannot stress that too much, since every real personality I've ever known is completely definite. Get yourself a set of convictions—good, strong convictions. It doesn't matter much what they are as long as you make yourself believe them. Examine yourself and decide what you really like and what you really dislike. Acquire a few good hates. I've never met a person with honest and compelling vitality who didn't have some lusty, healthy hates. Have, and express your own opinions. But don't carry it to such an extreme that you won't let other people express theirs. Be enthusiastic about things. Get a hobby or a fad, and ride it hard.

THINK of the many fads that the actresses have which seem like such unimportant things and yet contribute to the definiteness of their personalities. Joan Crawford's gardenias. Marlene Dietrich's trousers. Garbo's tweed coats. Jeanette MacDonald's sheep dog. You may or may not approve of the fads of other people, but you can't fail to admit that these things—along with many others—set them aside from the mob, make them individuals who are different and not struck from the same pattern as others.

When you read articles in MODERN SCREEN in which the stars are quoted, you will discover that these people who have risen above the common run of folk have definite opinions, and don't hesitate to express them. You'll never catch a vital personality answering any question with, "Well, yes—and—er, no."

So much for the mental attitude. And now for the poise that comes with grace of manner and movement. And those things you must learn when you decide to appear on any stage, either amateur or professional. When walking or sitting, relax. Walk in front of a full length mirror to catch the faults of your carriage. If you are inclined to stoop, take back exercises night and morning to correct spinal faults. Hold your shoulders up and keep your head high. Practice walking up and down stairs. In walking down stairs never look at your feet. Keep your eyes directly in front of you. It is a hard trick to do, but it can be done and it is one of the rules of acting technique. Get such good control over your body that you do not need to look at your feet when walking.

Here's another stunt to practice. Blindfold yourself. Relax. Walk around your room five times. This is to give you confidence and sureness. Take off your shoes and walk back and forth across your bed—the more springy it is the better. This, too, will make you sure-footed.

Always try to walk naturally. Don't go in for that nonsense about putting the soles of your feet down first. It is natural for the heels to strike the floor first.

When sitting, do not slump in your chair. Avoid gestures unless they mean something. Keep your hands relaxed in your lap unless you are making a definite gesture. Never fuss with your hair, or your face, or your clothes. When you are standing either in a drawing-room or on the stage, let your hands hang naturally and relaxed at your sides. Yes, I know, on the stage they feel as if they weigh a ton and are dangling from your arms like hams on a rope. That's the way they feel but they don't look that way to other people.

OF course, there is nothing that gives the body such co-ordination, grace and vitality as dancing does. And if you cannot study dancing with a good teacher, teach yourself. Dance before a mirror, using whatever steps come to mind, whatever steps you have seen dancers use in pictures or on the stage. You won't feel silly if you're alone. Watch yourself carefully. Stop whenever you fall into an ungraceful movement and begin again. When you move your hands, try to imagine that they are leaves floating in the breeze. But always keep relaxed, easy and natural.

in the pink of condition. Bicycle, swim, golf, play tennis, or just walk, walk, walk. And when I say walk, I mean walk as though you were striding along blithely, walking on air.

After you've walked, walked, walked, on the golf green, down a country road, or along a city street, Ginger Rogers knows a miraculous way to rest tired feet. It is simply a matter of manipulation of the foot, using a little of your own cold cream as massage cream. Rotate the foot at the ankle, bend the toes back and forth, and, most beneficial of all, rub the foot beneath the arch.

If you're a busy housewife, you probably will say that you get tired enough without a lot of extra exercise. You'll be much less tired at the end of the day, however, if all day, as you do your housework, you use your body correctly and keep a correct posture. When you stoop down to brush up crumbs, or pick up things, don't drop the abdomen down. Arch your back and your abdomen with it. Don't always bend your knees and squat to pick up things. Instead, hold your knees stiff sometimes, and stretch the back of them.

Stretching exercises keep your muscles from settling down into a rusty slump, and they keep the blood circulation stirred up. The best thing you can possibly do in the morning to wake up your circulation as well as your sleepy self is to stretch.

WE'RE not just housekeepers and mothers and stenographers; we're living machines made up of bone and muscle, blood and nerves. If we don't use our bodies, they grow flabby, old, and ugly. We generally think of exercise as a means of apportioning the flesh where we want it, and taking it away from where we don't want it. But exercise has a lot of other uses to which we don't give enough consideration. People of normal weight should exercise to keep a waning circulation steady and strong and clear, to send the blood flowing freely through all the veins and arteries, bringing nourishment to the tissues, and carrying away waste that the body does not need. Often it is faulty circulation that makes a skin sallow and full of blemishes, Growing fast...

AND GAINING WEIGHT, TOO

Since he began drinking milk this way

YES, indeed—he'll soon be as tall as you are, Dad. And maybe taller. He's growing fast, and he's filling out while he grows. For his diet is right. Growing children need a quart of milk a day; and since his mother began giving him Cocomalt mixed with milk, that youngster of yours is gaining in double-quick time! For Cocomalt not only makes children adore milk but, when made as directed, Cocomalt almost DOUBLES the food-energy value of milk!

Supplies important food essentials

Cocomalt supplies extra carbohydrates which provide food-energy needed for pep and endurance. It supplies extra specially valuable proteins that help replace used or wasted muscle tissue—for building solid flesh and muscle. It supplies extra food-calcium, food-phosphorus and Sunshine Vitamin D for the formation of strong bones, sound teeth.

Cocomalt has a delicious chocolate flavor that children love. It's a wonderful treat for guests, too. It is sold at grocery, drug and department stores in ½-lb. and 1-lb. air-tight cans. Also in the economical 5-lb. hospital size. In powder form only, easy to mix with milk—delicious HOT or COLD.

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER: For a trial-size can of Cocomalt, send name and address (with 10¢ to cover cost of packing and mailing) to R. B. Davis Co., Dept. MA6 Hoboken, N. J.

"I wonder!"

MIDOL

"I wonder if it would end all regular pain for me, and end it for all time?"

To the woman who is asking herself that question, the makers of Midol make an emphatic answer: It will not.

But they make another statement just as emphatic, and just as true: Midol always relieves periodic pain to some degree, and will for you.

Understand, this extraordinary medicine may bring you complete relief. It has done this for many. And some of these women had always had the severest pain. But others report only an easier time. Even so, isn't the measure of relief you are sure to receive well worth while? Midol means great comfort in any case — compared with unchecked suffering at this time of the month!

Any sufferer who experiences no relief from Midol should consult a physician.

"Yes, but won't it form some habit?" Only the habit of avoiding suffering which is needless! There is no "habit forming" drug in Midol. It is not a narcotic.

So, don't let the speed with which this remarkable medicine takes hold cause you any apprehension. Don't keep it for "emergencies" or wait for the pain to reach its height before you take it. Let it keep you comfortable throughout the period. Learn to rely on it completely. Just follow the simple directions found inside the box.

And speaking of boxes, you'll appreciate the slim aluminum case in which you get Midol. It's so thin and light — and dainty — you can give it a permanent place in your purse and always be prepared. It is a tremendous relief, mental and physical, to be able to approach this time without any misgivings, and to pass serenely through it.

Your druggist has these tablets. You'll probably see them on the counter. If not, just ask for Midol. Fifty cents is the most you'll pay — for comfort that is worth almost anything.

When it has given you back those days once given over to suffering, will you do this? If you know someone who still suffers, tell her of your discovery — that Midol does bring definite and decided relief from "regular" pain.

because impurities are remaining in the blood instead of being carried away. You know how readily your hair is affected by the condition of the body. It needs healthy bodily circulation as well as local stimulation of the scalp.

Ann Dvorak is both an actress and a dancer, and it is her motto to "Keep Limber," which is another expression for keeping the body active and lubricated with a healthy flow of circulation. She is shown demonstrating one of her daily exercises for keeping limber. It goes like this. With arms extended bend forward, keeping the body straight, and touch the left hand to the right toe, keeping the right arm at right angles to the body. Now stand erect, dropping both arms to the sides. Extend both arms again, and touch the right hand to the left toe. Repeat twenty-five times. It is appropriate that one of Ann's latest pictures is "Sweet Music." Certainly the best way to take exercise is to music, for the secret of joy in exercise is rhythm.

I have three long sheets of exercises for reducing and building up "in spots," and you can pick out a few of them for general setting-up exercises, too. They are adaptations of exercises that are used in some of the finest physical culture institutions, and you shouldn't be without them if you're going to work out an exercise program for yourself. Did you know that the screen stars contract to keep up or down to a certain weight when they sign their picture contracts? Well, I want you to draw up your own private little contract, and agree to yourself that you're going to keep to a certain weight . . . and a certain suppleness!

You must bear in mind, however, that this whole matter of "standard" weights, as stipulated in charts, is greatly exaggerated. Such weights take no account of racial and inherited differences, and make no allowance for people that are naturally big-boned or small-boned. For this reason you must not take your weight as shown on a weight table, too literally. If you weigh within ten pounds of the figure shown on the tables, you are certainly near enough the average for health and safety. Measurements, too, such as those given above in the comparison between Venus and Carole Lombard, are not to be taken too seriously for the same reason that the weights are not to be accepted too literally. But we have to have some ideal measurements held up to us as a sort of measuring stick, and it's fun getting out the tape measure, and seeing how closely we measure up. Carole Lombard has one of the loveliest figures in Hollywood, and she is a good model to follow for proportion and symmetry.

If you are in need of gaining weight, or of building up your vitality, you can do what the physicians prescribed for Carole Lombard at one time. Two large dishes of spinach were included in her daily menu, for the necessary iron and additional energy. In order to gain weight, she ate the largest meal of the day at noon, as this is a lesser tax on the digestive organs than having the largest meal in the evening. The doctor also had her drink milk, not with her meals, as this may burden the digestive system, but between meals, sipping it slowly.

TOBY WING, because of her tendency to plumpness, confines her luncheon to a glass of orange juice, and a couple of slices of grapefruit. Which reminds us that the best way to start on any kind of a diet is with three days of exclusive fruit diet to clear out the system. Almost any fruits that are in season will do, but the citrus fruits are always essential to include.

It's "how you feel" that counts as much as "how you look." You hear a lot about the freak diets of movie stars, but it's mostly hearsay. Their health and energy are too important to them to risk the danger of such diets. The old saying, "Nobody loves a fat woman" isn't nearly as true as "Nobody loves a fat woman on a freak diet." Freak diets mean touchy tempers.

The whole question of diet reduces down to this: that whether you want to reduce or gain, all the various food elements that are necessary to carrying on the body's work properly must be included in the diet, in greater or lesser quantities, of course, depending on whether you want to reduce or gain. Joan Crawford, for example, maintains a sane and sensible diet in order to keep her sylph-like figure and yet keep her vitality and energy "at tops." When she first went to Hollywood, she was a good twenty-five pounds overweight. That she has managed to maintain a slim figure without endangering the vitality which makes her so dominant a personality, is testimony to the sane effectiveness of her diet. She always confines her luncheon to a vegetable salad, and the dressing is generally made with mineral oil. Dinner usually consists of creamed soup, lean meat, vegetables, salad, a fruit dessert, and coffee (black). It is her rule never to eat bread and butter, and to avoid all starchy desserts, which she can do safely, since her diet already includes all the food elements necessary to health.

You will find the diets, that I have had prepared for you in multigraphed form, to be entirely reliable from a health and energy standpoint. The reducing diet has been worked out for you in exact amounts so that the caloric count will be sufficient for your working energy. Naturally we have selected more of the foods from the "fat group" for our weight-gaining diet than for the reducing diet, but all the necessary food elements are present in both. Just send in the coupon.

You see, I want you to eat, not only to gain weight or to lose weight, but for energy, radiant vitality, and for beauty!

EVERY diet should include proteins, for proteins are the builders. They are found to some extent in all food, but to the greatest extent in meat, fish, fowl, peas, beans, cereals, nuts, milk, cheese and eggs. Carbohydrates, which are the sugars and starches, are also tremendously important. They are to our bodies what electricity is to the motion picture machine, because it is from their combustion that we get our energy. Fats also are used for combustion, and are found in butter, and all the vegetable and animal oils. Vitamins, about which we have heard so much, exist in the yolk of eggs, in butter, cod liver oil, potatoes, green vegetables, tomatoes, lemons, grapefruits and oranges. Then there are the important minerals, which are found for the most part in fruits and the leafy vegetables.

"Popeye," with his spinach, knows the importance of iron, one of the major minerals. He also would find it in red meat, the yolk of eggs, raisins, grapes, apples, and the leafy vegetables like spinach, as well as asparagus. Iodine, used by our thyroid glands, is important in regulating weight, and is derived from green vegetables and drinking water. We haven't time to go into listing all the rest of the minerals, but we'll stop to mention sulphur. It is found in "the cabbage family," in cauliflower, cabbage, Brussels sprouts, broccoli, and also in the yolks of eggs, and it is an important element in keeping the hair and nails in condition. Curious, isn't it? Perhaps you don't know that you could eat certain foods for the health of your nails, your complexion, or your hair.

Raw carrots are good for the circulation, and so are raw apples, lettuce, blackberries, cherries, beets, spinach, figs and dates. These foods are blood tonics and pep-producers, and hence they're beauty tonics as well.

Did your grandmother ever tell you to brush your hair one hundred strokes every night? She was right, too. But we've just recently discovered an easier way to stimulate hair health and beauty, and it's right in line with our talk about increased circulation. Remember that when we talk in terms of circulation, we talk in terms of truth and beauty. Well, a Swedish inventor designed a comb which has just recently arrived in America. It's an electric comb . . . an electric comb with no ugly wires or cords connected with it, with no electrical attachment necessary, and with only the gentlest electric current flowing through it, generated from the tiny battery in its handle. The electrification is so slight that you never need be afraid of any sparks or shocks. You can run your hand across the teeth of the comb, and you wouldn't even know the electric current was there. The action of this comb is simple . . . it stimulates circulation in the scalp, and thus energizes the hair to new activity. The action of the glands becomes normalized, and oily and dry conditions readjust themselves. Moreover, the comb has special curved teeth designed to increase the natural waviness of the hair. A midget pronged pocket bulb comes along with it, and the bulb will light when you test the battery by placing the prongs against the teeth of the comb. Better pocket this as an idea, and write me for the name of the comb before summer starts its drying effect on your hair.

And now I hope that this offer of diets and exercises is going to electrify you into action . . . and into planning your own Venus-wise campaign.

simple problem it would be, too, if it were not for the fact that every girl in Hollywood is an alarmingly beautiful girl, at least, those who have gotten this far within the studio gates.

The facial kin of Ned Sparks straightens his back to the extent of raising his face above the piano keyboard. A peal of Paderewski thunder brings the feminine chatter to a halt. Pert, luscious, little "I got rhythm-ers" start warming up their engines, loosening rhumba hips with tantalizing little wiggles, legs flashing high over head with pony-like kicks.

An assistant dance director, wearing a black top coat, a newspaper bundled in one pocket, a felt hat turned down over the eyes, looking for all the world, like a conservative office worker, walks over to the assemblage and mumbles a few words of instruction. Black coat tails start trailing through the air as the dance director gives a practical demonstration of his instructions. Watching attentively, the girls proceed to imitate the prescribed dance steps. The dance director repeats his instructions at various intervals in front of the long line of dancers, making sure that every girl has an equal chance of learning the step.

"All right let's have it!" a voice rings out. Paderewski starts thumping out spasmodical notes necessary to dance rhythm. "One—two—three—one—two—three—break!" carols the dance instructor. A long shimmering line of faultless limbs, "legs," "gams," "lower extremities" (whichever you prefer to call them) flash out almost simultaneously. Three simple steps that seem merely slow motion walking, a high kicking, hop-like spin reversing the direction, ending with a dipping swoop known as the "break."

The same simple steps were repeated monotonously for the next five minutes. Finally the piano stops. Silence reigns supreme. Another assistant, holding a large schedule board, goes into a huddle with Director Connelly, then walks among the dancers taking names and addresses. Girls start drifting back to their coats and wraps parked on the chairs near the wall. The first elimination has taken place. The piano and dancing resume as before. Another halt is called. A few more girls disappear. The lucky ones, still standing in line, are the girls chosen for the picture. Assured work for one to seven full weeks at a salary of fifty to seventy dollars per week.

SEEMS easy, doesn't it? Just follow a few steps (if you happen to be a good-looking girl, of course) simple steps that a child could imitate without any trouble or practice—and presto! The job is yours. Nor is it necessary, as many would suspect, to spend fortunes on dancing schools in preparing oneself to be a studio dancer. Any girl with the average grace, poise and agility, could probably show up at a chorus girl "call" and make the grade without any previous dancing experience.

If I am to believe the word of one particular lady of the chorus, the majority of Hollywood "ponies" learn the rudiments of rhythm and simple tap steps from sisters or friends already in the chorus business. The rehearsal hall for an aspiring dancer is usually the kitchen or spare room of her home.

Once the simple limbering up steps have been mastered, a girl has little trouble qualifying for a studio chorus job. Hollywood directors demand long thorough rehearsals before a dance number is even thought of being shot. Meticulous rehearsals supervised by the world's most expert dance instructors, rehearsals that would make a "Ginger Rogers" out of King Kong.

Let's say that you are a Hollywood girl with the necessary knowledge of rhythm and simple dance steps to qualify for a job in a studio chorus. Now comes the really hard part—that of getting a job! You may have a stream-lined chassis that has won every beauty contest cup ever to leave a silversmith's shop, but Hollywood will only reply, "So what?" You may be the wife or sweetheart of seven producers simultaneously, but Hollywood dance directors will only reiterate, "So what?"

If a chorus girl happens to be the secret crush of a producer in the studio she works for, you can depend on said "Dame" holding her job entirely on her ability as a dancer. The ability to palpitate the heart of a producer isn't going to do any harm, naturally, but unless the girl can produce "what it takes" to satisfy the camera lens, it's no go. Time was when a chorus girl could vamp her way into the line-up and stay there. Not so today in Hollywood. A girl might vamp her way as far as the try-out, but from then on she is distinctly on her own, at the mercy of dancing directors who would rather run the risk of turning down an executive's girl friend than hiring her and losing his job by making a bum picture.

Sugar daddies, looking for joy-babies in Hollywood, shy clear of screen ladies with the educated toe. Studio executives think twice before risking an orchid to a captivating member of the chorus.

THIS "poor little working girl" earning $70 a week for an average of forty-two weeks out of the year, is financially independent. No need of a strong sugar daddy's shoulder to lean on while extracting sugar from vest pockets to fill the gap of a chorus girl's salary insufficient to keep little Nell alive.

Nay! Nay! A thousand times Nay! No more does little Nell have to sacrifice herself to the big bad nasty man in order to save the old homestead. Little Nell can write her own ticket nowadays, pay off the mortgage and keep the big bad villain as far away from her as she cares to.

And don't let their seductive abandon, portrayed on the screen, fool you. That alacritous twinkle in a chorine's eyes doesn't mean what the man in the bald-headed row might imagine. It signifies only contentment over a job that was earned solely through her own ability as a dancer, a job that pays two or three times as much as the average stenographer's job, a job that makes one her own boss, financially independent of anyone, able to choose her own company.

From where does Hollywood get the majority of its dancing pulchritude? Dave Gould, dance director for Twentieth Century's grand picture "Folies Bergere," claims that most of his curvacious cuties come from the smaller "hick" towns. 73 chorines were used in the dance sequences of "Folies Bergere." A check-up revealed that all but 18 girls hailed from towns with names sounding like "Stop Water Junction" or "Patooka, Kansas."

Le Roy Prinz, eminent Hollywood dance director, reveals that ninety percent of his cuddlesome rhythm tappers live with their fathers and mothers here in Hollywood. Out of twenty-four girls who worked for him in a recent line-up, all were between the ages of seventeen and twenty, fourteen were married, five had babies, eight girls were engaged to be married, leaving only two to do as they please—and the strenuous studio routine probably left them too tired to even do that! So here's a tip to the Big Bad Wolf descending on Hollywood in search of playgirl companions—stay away from the studio chorines—you're only wasting your time!

natural aptitude toward threatening Pavlova's throne. Young Astaire, or Austerlitz at that time, picked up the routines the others so carelessly dropped and always had an innovation or two of his own design to interpolate. He assisted Adele in many a tedious assemblage of complicated steps, though he loyally insists that he is a no better dancer than she. The fact that experienced critics disagree upon this opinion is, to him, beside the point, of course.

And so, at an age when most youngsters would as soon conjugate a Latin noun as decline it, the Astaires were doing the several-a-day in the best and worst vaudeville emporiums of these United States. When their act wasn't cancelled, as indeed it once was when it played on a bill supporting Douglas Fairbanks, it was lavishly praised. Eventually the Astaires grew up and had musical comedies planned and built for them. They became the toast of New York, the rage in London and a rare treat for any other big town in which they appeared.

Then came Adele's marriage and Fred's decision to go it alone and, just last year, his introduction to the infant industry. It was in a small role in "Flying Down To Rio," but before the six reels were unwound, even the most unobservant realized that Mr. Astaire had stolen the picture and neatly slipped it into his dancing shoes. The-Powers-That-Be were aware that this new-to-the-movies man was in a position to write his own ticket and sincerely hoped that he'd have a heart. He was "the tops"—as fine a comedian as a dancer, and just as personable as funny.

Fred's well-meaning friends were quick to congratulate his becoming a movie star, which best wishes had the effect of slightly irking the gentleman. You see, he has earned the right to be acknowledged stellar material since he left his teens, so when the gang came around with a "Put it there, boy, we always knew you'd do it," it naturally didn't set so well. Not that the lad is conceited—too far from that

IS THAT HOW YOU SELECT YOUR SHADE OF FACE POWDER?

The Wrong Color Can Make You Look 5 to 10 Years Older!

By Lady Esther

If there's one thing you want to "try on", it's your face powder shades. You may not realize it, but it's a known fact among artists and make-up experts that the wrong shade of face powder can make you look older than you really are.

Many a woman's age is unjustly placed at 5 to 10 years more than it actually is simply on account of the color of face powder she uses. There is no greater error than to choose your face powder color on the basis of "type" or coloring. Matching isn't what you want at all, but flattery—enhancing of your natural gifts.

Seek to Flatter — Not to Match!

Many a brunette who uses a brunette or dark rachel powder wants another shade altogether. The same with blondes. Many a blonde who uses a light rachel or a beige really requires a darker tint. You must remember that the color of your hair doesn't govern the color of your skin. A brunette may have a very light skin, while a blonde may have quite a dark one, and vice versa.

The only sensible and practical way to choose your face powder shade is to "try on" all the five basic shades which colorists agree are sufficient to take care of all tones of skin. And this is the opportunity I give you, at no cost to you!

My Service to the Women of America

In order to help you solve the all important question of which shade of face powder for you, I will send you all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder absolutely free of cost. When you try on all five shades, as you must, you will discover whether you have been right or wrong in your shade of face powder and whether you have been benefiting or suffering as a result.

"I Couldn't Sit, Couldn't Stand, Couldn't Even Lie Down!

The Suffering I Had to Bear In Secret"

WHAT a toll Piles take—in pain, in physical and mental incapacitation, in drain on vitality! The sad part about this affliction is that, on account of the delicacy of the subject, many hesitate to seek relief. Yet nothing is more fraught with danger than a bad case of Piles, ending, as it may, in serious trouble.

Real treatment for Piles is to be had today in Pazo Ointment. Pazo not only relieves the pain, soreness and itching, but it tends to correct the condition as well. Pazo works because it is threefold in effect. First, it is soothing, which relieves the soreness and inflammation. Second, it is healing, which repairs the torn and damaged tissue. Third, it is absorbing, which tends to reduce the swollen blood vessels which are Piles.

Pazo comes in collapsible tube with special Pile Pipe; now also, for the first time, in suppository form, 14 to the box. Those who prefer suppositories will find Pazo suppositories better than anything they have ever used.

Try It FREE!

Pazo is sold by all drug stores, but a liberal trial tube is free for the asking. Simply mail the coupon or a post card.

We don't have to remind you that this is "Skippy" of "Thin Man" fame, but did you know the other wiry gent is his stand-in? Ritzy, what? Skippy, the first, is next in "It's a Small World."

for his own good—but he has a nice appreciation of worth and what one goes through to attain it. You see, Fred Astaire has never been anywhere at any time a "flash in the pan." He has gotten there via the old, hard work and perseverance route, the one covered fable-y by the hare and the tortoise.

JUST so that you may not feel cheated on the conventional angle of an interview, it seems time to let RKO's artistic pride and box office joy, speak for himself. He does very little of it, as was said before, but here goes.

"I've been asked how one becomes a dancer. If one is naturally talented in this direction, hard work will do the trick. If one isn't, nothing much will help. I'd like to be able to tell ambitious boys and girls how to profit by my mistakes. Unfortunately, there is no way to learn anything thoroughly except by experience. Observation isn't a competent teacher. You have to go through things to understand them and to climb professionally.

"Naturally, I have studied with several teachers; in many instances, not for very long. I instinctively get the feel of what I am doing. I know pretty quickly if the person, attempting to instruct me, has what I need. Teachers whom I scarcely know have advertised that I recommend them. That is unfair. In fact, it burns me up! I'm not vain and I want to give credit where it is due, but there are an awful lot of places it isn't, and my photographs somehow seem to have appeared in connection with several of them.

"Just as there is really no such thing as a stupid child, there are no ungraceful young people. Therefore, they should dance from the sheer fun of it, without ever a thought of exhibition work or entertaining professionally. I have danced with girls who have told me that they've never taken a lesson. In many cases, if I had been warned, I'd never have suspected.

"Personally, I practice several hours a day. I have a dancing partner and a man who not only plays the piano expertly, but is by way of being a composer. We do a lot of improving. We get ideas—themes, we call them—and fool around until they come out as nearly pat as we can make them. We get the ideas from the situations in the story to be filmed, and make the music fit the dance routines—not the other way around. It's a lot of work but a lot of fun and I wouldn't do anything else for money, which unfortunately I'm told I don't have enough respect for."

And that is all Fred Astaire would say. It may look matter-of-fact in print, but it sounded very humble and sincere vocally. He mentioned his bride, the socially prominent Phyllis Potter, and attending the "Roberta" preview with Randolph Scott and "as how" the girls are that intrigued by a handsome guy like Randy, and how he (Fred) is looking forward to making "Top Hat" with Ginger. He "told all" in brief, clipped sentences—a vest pocket edition of his views, as definitely edited as they appear here. He doesn't seem to care about being the interviewer's dilemma—because he doesn't seem to care about the interviewer at all!

Woman Should Be Weak

always had had a natural instinct for theatricals. She soon became the leading lady in many plays at the famous Theatre of the Golden Bow in Carmel.

You have read, of course, how later she went to the Pasadena Community Players and more or less automatically slipped, by one of the most customary routes, into pictures. She made ten pictures in the first year. And she is considered, today, one of the most promising of the younger actresses. One who is borrowed continually by companies other than Universal because she can play any type of role from light comedy to high drama. She was considered, also, one of the easiest actress to work with. Nothing except her career mattered. Eighteen hours a day, extra shots, extra sittings for photographs or fittings, extra time for interviews or publicity pictures—nothing was too much trouble to Gloria. All of her ceaseless energy went into the strength of that single determination to become the best actress; one of the strongest, most independent of women. She and her husband lived in separate houses because she wanted more time to concentrate upon her career. Later they were divorced.

And I honestly believe Gloria Stuart would have realized her ambition if she had continued with her pseudo self. She may even reach the same goal by her present route. But the difference lies in one single fact: she doesn't care, today, whether she becomes a great actress or not!

Of course, a man did it. Free-thinking philosophy, independence—all the lovely theories not only conceived, but lived by this girl for ten years, skidded into a deep ditch as quickly as does a high-powered car when Gloria Stuart met Arthur Sheekman.

Gloria is twenty-four, he is thirty-four. A newspaper reporter, feature journalist and scenario writer, he had avoided marriage as astutely and perseveringly as Gloria had shunned the bondage of it. They boasted of their indifference to conventional matrimony. But there was one great point of philosophical wisdom upon which they differed.

"Since he was twenty years of age, he has worked upon the theory of doing what you have to do well, but not breaking your neck or your heart over it," Gloria explained carefully. "He would tell me, 'If you put all of your strength and your emotion, everything you have of yourself, into a job and if you do fall short you may be miserable the rest of your life. Don't say you are going to be the best actress. The chances, to begin with, are a million to one against you. If you are a good actress and have done all you can do about it, what does it matter? If you take it smoothly, giving your strength wisely rather than lavishly; your ambition wholeheartedly but not in frenzy—then, if you do become the best, it's pure gravy and you can enjoy it. The thing in life is to be happy—not to be famous!'"

AND these words, uttered, again and again, to Gloria, began to sprout little thoughts different than any she had had since she was nine years of age. They began to remind her of her father; of the little house among the sands and wheat fields of Santa Monica. She remembered the quiet peace; the unruffled certainty that living actually was pleasant. And despite herself, she began to take stock of the past ten years in relation to the first nine; the entire future from the same angle.

"I counted up the actual hours I had dedicated to nothing except ambition and independence. I compared my health, as it was today, and as it was in my childhood. I faced the fact that I was always restless, slept little, ate little. I realized I was working on the average of eighteen hours a day. I counted the time I spent on clothes, alone, so I could keep up with the other Hollywood Joneses. I even counted the hours I spent in putting on make-up so I would look as well across the luncheon table as my competitors. And I tried to count the hours I spent on worry. Would the other girl get that part or would I? Had I said the right thing to that interviewer or would it have been better if I'd said something else?

"This didn't happen all at once, of course. It was gradual. But it happened, I couldn't help it."

Neither Gloria nor Arthur Sheekman knows, today, when the one decided he would like to marry the other. But each made the decision long before they told one another. Gloria knew she was in love and wanted to marry, but she felt he would not want it, he had been so determined against marriage. He knew he wanted to marry but he dared not tell her because he knew, only too well, her independent theories. So they began to avoid all discussion of marriage. Then, one night, they attended a party. A certain male guest took that extra drink which slips one over that borderline between intoxication and sobriety. His wife went to him, cuddled him in her arms, slipped his coat on, urged him gently, firmly, and devotedly from the room toward home. Gloria and Arthur looked on. And on the way home, she said, "Seeing that scene, the devoted way she handled him, gave me a terrific urge to take you home in the same way, if the same thing ever should happen to you."

And he said, "Gloria, if you want to get married, I want to get married, too."

And suddenly Gloria Stuart was the little girl who lived happily, without worry or intensity, with her mother and father.

"I knew then, I wanted to be a weak woman. I wanted to be cared for, protected and ordered around.

"The utter futility of all I had been living for for ten years struck me forcibly. I absolutely know it can never come back to me. If I had continued to live in the same way for another ten years, just what would there have been for me? At thirty-four, I would have been too old, too tired to find happiness. I would have been perpetually restless and nervous. Ambition would have driven every normal, feminine thought from me.

I AM so contented that it is just disgusting. Often, I go to bed at eight-thirty and sleep until late in the morning without even awakening. And I just love to sit and do nothing. Just sit.

"I have complete happiness and all the other things I worked so hard for mean absolutely nothing. I know Arthur can always provide for me so I never worry. If he should have bad luck here, he can always work on a newspaper. And you can live on sixty dollars a week as well as you can on several thousand.

"I told you I have smoked since I was fourteen but when I knew I was to have a baby, I stopped smoking at once. I am so contented that the restless habit of smoking meant nothing in comparison to the health of the baby. I am beginning to believe I give more to my acting because I am thinking of my work quietly and peacefully, instead of driving my energies, at a rate God never intended them to go. After the baby has come, I want to do two or three good pictures a year. Arthur leaves that up to me. I can work or not work. Of course, I'll have more children!

"I cook and I sew. I walk miles with the dogs. We have three of them. I used to laugh at love that makes a woman weak—I never want to be anything but weak again as long as I live. I have learned that a woman's strength actually lies in what I thought was her weakness. You ask me whether I think it will last," she laughed. "I know it'll last but we never even think about it. I am too contented in being a weak woman to worry about anything, not even my own contentment. I've reverted to the little girl I used to be. Reverted to type, I suppose. And women will always be reverting to type, I hope. It will be a restless, nervous, unhappy world if they don't!" beauty set to haunting music and spiced with sparkling humor.

If Shakespeare's art failed to click with Jennie Jones out in Peoria, by golly his fantasy, augmented by Hollywood's technicians' best effects, surely would ring the bell.

So, while Max Reinhardt was learning the possibilties of the camera, and Jimmy Cagney, Hugh Herbert, Frank McHugh, and Joe E. Brown were striving to dress their slapstick in ye olde English spangles, forty-three varieties of artisans, ranging from structural steel workers to cobweb makers and from plumbers to star-dust blowers, were working day and night to bring the magic of Shakespeare's dreams to the screen.

Europe was combed for its best dancers, dance directors, music directors and arrangers. Erich Wolfgang Korngold was imported to arrange the original music by Mendelssohn, and Bronislava Nijinska was brought over to coach the Reinhardt ballet. And Nina Thielade, Pavlova's protégée and recognized successor, joined the Max Reinhardt ballet.

HOLLYWOOD grinned at the idea of Dick Powell, Joe E. Brown, Hugh Herbert, Hobart Cavanaugh and Frank McHugh playing Shakespeare, and openly questioned the wisdom of the selection of Jimmy Cagney as Bottom. Jean Muir, Ian Hunter, Mickey Rooney, Verree Teasdale, Otis Harlan, Arthur Treacher, Victor Jory, Grant Mitchell and Anita Louise might get away with it, but never the famous comedy stock company that had cavorted in a score of hilarious comedies.

So, as these old stand-bys cautiously tried out Shakespeare's lines, and as Professor Reinhardt hesitantly tested camera angles and studied his various test shots with exclamations of astonishment, the clock-like performance and eager efficiency of the "special effects" and other departments came as a comfort to the production department, and it began to lean more and more upon the boys in overalls.

The script called for magic cascades and falls, for deer peeping out from the trees, for frogmen coming up from the waters, for a shooting star that falls and produces a dancing fairy, for a ballet on a glimmering moonbeam; to say nothing of a shaft of moonlight that "pours on the ground like molten silver," shaping itself into a fairy in the form of dancing Nina Thielade, a black fog that belches forth Victor Jory in the role of Oberon and a human being that sprouts a donkey's head. The script called for those things and the technical departments gave a hundred per cent delivery.

in Max Reinhardt's ability to gamble a million dollars on it. When they discovered that he and Director Wilhelm Dieterle were outdoing themselves, that Cagney was giving the performance of his career as Bottom and that amazing harmony and good-will existed on the sets, the studio heads continued to encourage the increasing demand for more and more from the mechanical and electrical geniuses.

The things that Shakespeare wrote to tantalize the theatre gave the technicians the opportunity they had long been awaiting. Electricians, mechanics, carpenters, painters, sculptors, rubber workers, model makers, costumers, cameramen, make-up artists, sound experts and instrument makers—all were in a fever to do the things and to try the experiments they always wanted to attempt.

Everybody was happy and satisfied. They were all wearing the contented smile of the cat-that-ate-the-canary, for in his heart, every actor in the world believes he can play Shakespeare. No studio had ever hoped to attain such accord in filming such a tremendous piece of work. Never a knock or a complaint to be heard. How different from other super-productions we can recall, pictures wherein the various members of the cast were not speaking to each other at all.

And yet, with all this harmony, the sets of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" resembled nothing quite so much as a colorful mad-house.

JUST picture, if you can, the Duke of Athens' triumphant home-coming with his battle-won bride-to-be, Queen Hippolyta of the Amazons. They are disembarking from the royal barge. Behind the Duke are his victory-flushed retainers; before him, milling and cheering is the admiring populace of Athens. Guards in polished metal, prancing horses, knights, ladies of the court, dancers—and a great colorful array of people in costume, many carrying banners or flaming torches.

Picture that, with a battery of giant lamps throwing some three-quarters of a

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM"

It seemed to Hermia that the whole world was up-side-down. She loved Lysander dearly and he returned her love. Yet, because her father, Egeus, had so commanded, she would soon be forced to marry Demetrius. And this same Demetrius, whom she loathed, was loved by her dearest friend, Helena. Helena was beautiful, with her golden hair and fair skin. Why couldn't Demetrius fall in love with her, instead of Hermia? Why must she be compelled to wed with a man she loathed? Because the old Athenian law said: "Either fit your fancies to your father's will, or else the law of Athens yields you up to death or to vow of single life."

Never was the Goddess of Love more confused than in this immortal love story by William Shakespeare. You will enjoy every word of the novelized version of Warner Brothers screen production, "A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM" in the June issue.

Included in the special features and twelve complete stories are Fredric March and Charles Laughton in "Les Miserables" . . . Shirley Temple in "Our Little Girl" . . . Clark Gable and Loretta Young in "Call of the Wild" . . . Jean Muir in "Oil for the Lamps of China" . . . and many, many others.

million candle power of light, while the microphone booms stretch their long, spidery arms in constant pursuit of the action, and the cameras grinding silently.

Rising in the background of all this is a twenty-foot high platform, christened the Tower of Babel, on which stands a camera, flanked by cameramen, an electrician, Director Dieterle and his assistant. The last mentioned is yelling orders into a microphone that is connected with a set of loud speakers from which come a jumble of instructions.

Up there on the Tower of Babel, the tall, gaunt and efficient Dieterle is waving his white-gloved hands and giving instructions in broken English. The players below are attempting to understand him, and growing more bewildered. At the foot of the platform mill a half-dozen assistants and interpreters all trying to interpret Dieterle's orders in differently pitched dialects.

And through it all Max Reinhardt moves quietly, smiling and nodding, or shaking his head. As the assistants rush into the mob, shouting conflicting instructions, Max Reinhardt restores order, in his friendly, paternal manner.

But don't let the quiet manner of Reinhardt fool you. His appetite for detail is insatiable. With him everything must be exact; not just nearly, but absolutely.

Reinhardt's devotion to detail beggars description. If a button is missing from the most inconsequential costume he will instantly demand a halt until the mistake is remedied.

Time, labor, inconvenience and expense apparently mean nothing to him. If a thing is not right, it must be fixed. Makeshifts are his abomination. And how well the art, costume, prop and casting departments learned this.

"I want a beautiful violinist for the fairy who plays on the edge of the moonbeam," said Reinhardt.

"There are several beauties among the fairies," he was told. "Just take your pick."

"No," was his quiet but blunt retort, "she must be a violin player so her fingering will be right."

And so the casting department had to send out a call for the most beautiful violin player in Hollywood.

During the shooting of a scene in the woodland set, Reinhardt decided Hugh Herbert should not go through it with his hands empty. So he said, "Give him an Elizabethan hornpipe."

IF it had been for any other picture the common, garden variety of hornpipe would have done. But for Reinhardt it had to be authentic. So everything was stopped and a rush order sent out for an Elizabethan hornpipe. The research department found a photograph and a description of one.

Then the prop department took the matter in hand. An order was sent to the woodwork department to turn exactly the right pipe from exactly the right wood. Another order was sent out for a beef bladder, because a beef bladder was the correct wind bag for such a hornpipe.

It was delivered on the set exactly twenty-five minutes after Reinhardt said, "Make it."

That, however, was a simple requirement compared to what the plaster, make-up, costume and other departments had to turn out. In fact, the requirements of the wild fantasy of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" became so complicated that entirely new departments had to be established at the studio.

The rubber department, for instance, was a growth from the sculptural department, which, in turn, grew out of the make-up department.

It all began in this way. It was up to Perc Westmore, head of the make-up department, to manipulate the growth of a donkey's head on Bottom's shoulders. And it was not to be accomplished merely by putting on a papier-mâché head. The development had to be gradual, and the change of features had to be photographed so that the audience might see the actual transformation.

The first step was to make a photographic study of a donkey's head, and to enlarge it to the correct size.

Next came the making of a plaster of Paris mold of Jimmy Cagney's head, with every detail of his face perfect. From this mold a cast was made. And on the cast a donkey's head was modelled in clay, true to the enlarged photographs, but retaining several contact points—points at which the inside of the mold would contact the points of expression on Jimmy's face.

Then the final donkey's head that would fit exactly over Jimmy's own head was made. This was covered with hair, set with teeth and equipped with springs to work the lips and large ears.

It was a piece of work of which any make-up department might be proud, but still it was not complete. It had to be made to work.

This called for a strange procedure. Curious little scales and weighing devices were ordered. A scale was placed under Jimmy's chin to weigh the strength of his jaw movements as he talked. They measured his face and tested the muscles of his throat and those at the corners of his mouth. Then a series of little springs, saddles and counterweights, were constructed.

One of these saddles fitted under Jimmy's chin when he put on the donkey's head. Two more tiny ones fitted into the corners of his mouth. Strings ran from them to weights and springs, and thence on out to the jaws and lips of the donkey's head.

These balanced so perfectly that, as Jimmy talks, the donkey's mouth operates without any strain on him, and as he laughs or smiles the lip of the donkey curls up.

Another set of strings, running over Jimmy's shoulders to a belt around his chest, makes it possible for him to wiggle the donkey's ears by the slightest movement of his head.

Then there was the matter of a gradual transformation from a human head to a donkey's head. It was decided to distort the cast of Jimmy's head gradually, and to make rubber masks of each change. So liquid rubber was sprayed on the cast, allowed to dry and then peeled off in the form of a mask.

THUS, bit by bit, and mask by mask (always retaining "contact points" so the mask would carry Jimmy's facial movements), Jimmy's head changed from that of a human being to that of a donkey.

Eight stages or degrees of the transformation were cast into these masks, and with their aid Bottom's assuming of a donkey's head seems a normal development rather than a sudden change.

No sooner was that assignment finished, when Nijinska demanded batmen. Entire costumes, including skulls, trunks and wings were made of rubber.

Next a frogman had to be created, and ten Amazon masks made. Then thirty rubber heads had to be made for another batch of dwarfs. Rubber hands and arms were made, and the fingers extended from six to nine inches.

Moth wings and dainty leaves were cast into molds and then reproduced in rubber for fairy costumes. The head-dress of the fairy queen. Titania, played by Anita Louise, was made entirely of abalone shell and cellophane and had to be put on her head with a pair of pliers.

Sets never before attempted were built for this picture. The woodland set alone took up a stage 175 by 375 feet and extended up a wide ramp onto the roof of another stage.

On this woodland set hundreds of trees were erected, many of them built into grotesque forms. It contained tiny lakes, rapids, running streams and a waterfall which required so much water that a miniature waterworks, with a tremendous pumping capacity, was built for it. It was dotted with tiny glens, miniature gorges and beautiful caves. It contained meadows and flowers, and giant rocks of peculiar formation.

Every morning and every evening for the entire length of production, some four months, this set had to be serviced at terrific expense. The artificial grass and trees had to be sprayed with green every morning, the real branches, shrubs and flowers had to be replaced twice a week, on account of the great heat of the lamps.

Special camera equipment, designed and built for the purpose, was necessary for shooting some of the midnight sequences. An entirely new camera technique had to be developed to meet the many requirements of filming this unusual picture.

For example, when Oberon was to come out of a black fog. The technical department had whipped the fog problem. It was able to make the fog rise, settle, hang low or high, or "roll over" at will.

This fog was made from finely sprayed oil. If it was to rise, it was heated. If it was to remain low or cling to the ground it was frozen with dry ice.

Ah, but a black fog, that was something else again. The cameraman finally accomplished it by adding a plain lens to his camera, over which had been smeared a thin coating of vaseline and lampblack. The vaseline afforded the glow and the lampblack changed the fog to black.

Another time cameraman, Hal Mohr, was told to produce an effect of fairies dancing among the stars, with the stars twinkling all about them.

THIS was accomplished by blowing an artificial cobweb over a small wooden frame and then scattering little "flitters," or tiny fragments of silver, over the cobweb. When the camera shot through this, stars danced and gleamed all about the fairies.

For the costumes, wigs, chariots and other purposes over 600,000 yards of cellophane strands were used, not counting Titania's train, which alone required 91,000 yards of the gossamer strands.

If you think we're getting careless with figures, then consider these. For the seven-ton moonbeam along which over one hundred fairies dance, 750,000 yards of cellophane strands were used to weave the body of the beam.

IF you've seen the picture, you will recall the banquet scene, when the dignified lackey brings in the suckling pig. After many rehearsals they started to take this elaborate shot, only to be stopped in the middle of the parade of incoming food by a burst of laughter from everyone watching the scene.

In the mouth of the suckling pig on the big tray was a burning cigarette. No one knew who put it there, but it certainly gave Herr Max a shock.

There is a scene in which three little Moors (colored boys to you) were supposed to give a bag of money to Joe E. Brown. They rehearsed it with Joe's stand-in, and when the time came for Joe to take the money they wouldn't give it to him, because it was the stand-in they had been told to hand it to.

And that is how shots go wrong. But not all the practical jokes resulted in spoiled shots. In a scene taken in Quince's home, Joe E. Brown is supposed to be eating garlic. Because of Reinhardt's love for detail, shelled Brazil nuts had been cut to resemble garlic buds, and Joe was eating these.

But Hugh Herbert got there ahead of him and slipped in some real garlic. He figured Joe would get it in the rehearsal. But he didn't, and right in the middle of the "take," Joe's face suddenly began to make the strangest contortions.

"Great, perfect, funny!" joyously exclaimed Reinhardt the instant the camera stopped grinding.

"By sassafras!" declared Joe, "some smart Alec put real garlic in that bowl. For the next fifteen minutes Joe was washing out his mouth. But garlic or no garlic, Joe was too good a trouper to spoil a "take."

In spite of the problems and the long hours that the "Dream" brought to the technical department, and despite the exacting requirements of Max Reinhardt, every one at Warner Brothers studio is sorry it's "in the can"; that is, that the film is completed and put in the cans for shipment.

So, when you see "A Midsummer Night's Dream," remember that it has been a lot more than just another picture to Hollywood.

expected Mrs. Temple to call Shirley and scold her for such an overflow of spirits. If she did, she was mistaken.

"A little lady, did you say?" Mrs. Temple asked, laughing. "Not always. Her two older brothers have seen to that."

CONSTANT correction never has been Mrs. Temple's idea. She feels, and the wisest psychologists bear her out, that this sort of thing is impoverishing, that it robs a child of self-confidence and finally of its individuality. Had Shirley always been repressed, it is extremely doubtful that she would be as delightful and natural as she is today, that she ever would have scored her sensational success on the screen. She's never indulged. Far from it. But at the same time that she is asked to respect the individual rights of others, she is given individual rights of her own.

It's always been tap dancing that Shirley has loved best. "When you tap," she explains, drawing down her brows in a serious effort to explain how she feels about the tap, "when you tap you can feel the music. In your legs."

A group of men arrived at that dancing class one day. And when the teacher asked the mothers to be kind enough to wait in an adjoining room, something important began to beat in the air.

Shirley's eyes went big and round. She loved that sense of excitement, but at the same time, much as she wanted to be out in the center of things, she turned shy. She took her stand behind the biggest potted palm. There she could see, yet, she hoped, not be seen. And she watched as the children, one by one, walked up to those men, answered questions, and, in some cases, entertained with a few dance steps.

It was when she became too interested and poked her head too far around the tree that one of the men saw her. "Look!" he said. "Look over there behind that palm."

"It's a pixie," announced another man.

"It is indeed," the teacher agreed, "by the name of Shirley Temple."

"Shirley," she called now. "Shirley!"

The walk across the room seemed to Shirley a long, long journey. She felt all the eyes upon her. She was aware of the color mounting in her cheeks. But not once did she turn back, even though she walked slowly, her eyes cast down. When a teacher called, you obeyed.

"What's your name?" asked a man named Charles LaMont. "Billy?"

DIMPLES, misplaced dimples, one outrageously higher than the other, appeared. And it was as if blue stars broke in her eyes. "I'm not a boy," she told him, pointing in confirmation to her curls.

Softly but distinctly she told her name. Her mother's name, her father's name. She told where she lived. And if occasionally she had difficulty with an "l" or a "th," she didn't talk baby talk.

The men were enchanted. One rubbed his hands. Another sat back with a big smile. They were scouts from the Educational Studios, sent out to find a little girl to play in the Baby Burlesk Comedies. And they had looked far and wide. They had interviewed a hundred professional cuties, a hundred poor children, taught the superficialities of charm by their ambitious mothers. But not until this moment had they found that unconscious charm which springs from an inner radiance. And that is what they were after.

"And now," Mr. LaMont suggested, "perhaps you'll dance for us."

The teacher took her place at the piano. "Tap?" asked Shirley.

The music started. She moved with it in perfect time, her tiny feet sharp and rhythmic against that shiny yellow floor. She tossed back the honey-colored curls which had escaped their blue velvet band. And, if the whole truth is to be told, she flirted with those visiting gentlemen. Unconsciously, yet nevertheless outrageously.

THE Temples didn't take Shirley's appearance in those seven comedies seriously. Making them, she was in the studios only a few hours daily, and at no time were any acting demands made upon her. The weekly salary she received was pleasant, but it totalled no grand sum and little was thought about it.

One of the Educational executives had a notion that Shirley should be put under contract. And he wired to New York to that effect. But the answer he received was short and to the point, "Sign no one to anything." And that was that.

Following her work in these comedies Shirley played a small part in "Frolics of Youth" with Junior Coghlan, Harry Myers and Helene Chadwick. Then she went over to the Paramount lot long enough to appear inconspicuously with Randolph Scott and Esther Ralston in "To the Last Man." After which, as far as anyone could see, her career in the studios was over.

Life went on as before. Shirley gave tea parties under the purple-starred bougainvillea vine. With water tea and make-believe cakes. All for the sheer joy of using cups and plates on which there were pictures of Minnie and Mickey Mouse. And almost always these parties ended with everyone playing "show." With Shirley running things, because she had more ideas to the minute than all the other children put together. Or she would pedal her velocipede up and down the block until, watching her, you would have wondered that her little legs, sturdy-looking as they were, weren't completely exhausted.

"Evenings while I prepared dinner," Mrs. Temple says, "Shirley and John and George usually congregated in the living-room, where they'd turn on the radio, full blast generally, and join the entertainers in whatever song they were singing. While Shirley also would execute her perpetual tap step in the doorway.

"Frequently I used to be surprised at her ability to memorize those songs. But I decided, finally, it was her association with George and John that helped her in this respect and didn't think much more about it."

One evening the Temples were prevailed upon to take Shirley to the preview of the last Baby Burlesk comedy she had made. Movies at night were decidedly against the rules, but an exception was made.

"You wait for me," George Temple said, dropping Mrs. Temple and Shirley at the theatre, because he was obliged to attend a business meeting. "And if I'm a little late, don't worry. I'll be as quick as I can."

Shirley walked through the lobby, holding tightly to her mother's hand, her eyes very busy trying to see everything at once. "Do they turn on all these lights every night?" she wanted to know. "Every night do all these people get dressed up and come here to see movies?"

"Every night, Shirley," her mother told her, smiling.

"Is this the theatre George and John come to when they ask Daddy for money to go to the movies?" she asked when they were in their seats and her mother was taking off her coat and making her comfortable in the big orchestra chair in which she slipped around a bit.

She was, obviously, trying to grasp horizons broader than those which had limited her life so far, to get a sense of the life that went on beyond her own house and garden, beyond the quiet palm-lined block on which she lived, the beach in front of the Santa Monica Athletic Club, the dancing class, and the Educational Studios.

That afternoon there had been a later and longer nap than usual, to guard against sleepiness. So Shirley was able to enjoy that preview immensely. She thought it frightfully funny when she discovered herself on the screen wearing diapers and an extraordinarily large safety pin. And she laughed uproariously at the capers in which she and the other children indulged, quite as if it were all entirely new to her.

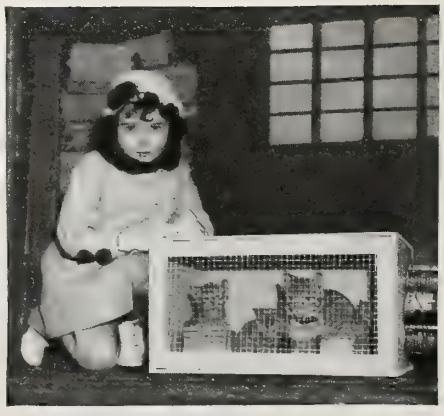
When the show was over she could hardly wait for her father to arrive in order to tell him about everything. "I'll see Dad first," she challenged her mother. And her eyes, dark blue above her flushed cheeks, searched the cars approaching the theatre.

A gentleman came up to Mrs. Temple and presented his card. "I'm Jay Gorney of Fox," he explained. "I've just seen Shirley in the comedy and I'd appreciate it very much if you'd bring her over to our studios tomorrow. We're about to put on a revue, 'Stand Up and Cheer.' Perhaps you've heard about it."

Once again, without any effort on the part of the Temples, Shirley was offered a chance in the studios.

"What do you think, George?" Mrs. Temple asked her husband as they were driving home. Shirley was fast asleep on the back seat. "If it's a revue, they'll want her to dance. And goodness knows she loves to do that. She does it all the time, anyway."

MR. TEMPLE agreed. And the following morning Shirley and Mrs. Temple were at Jay Gorney's office. Had Mrs. Temple been one of the mothers who haunt the studios daily, trying to get little Josie or little Bertie into pictures, she would have realized how really unusual was the enthusiasm which greeted them.



Jay Gorney piloted them over to the studio where dances are rehearsed before they are put into execution before the cameras. And immediately, when Lew Brown, the producer of "Stand Up and Cheer," met them, he mentally raised the top price he had considered offering for Shirley's services.

"Strike up the band!" he ordered the leader of the band rehearsing there in the studio. "Miss Shirley's going to dance for us!"

The band leader raised his baton. The music filled that studio. Shirley began—faster she tapped—faster, faster, faster. Her curls flew helter-skelter. They were playing a song she knew, a song she had learned from the radio. She began to sing, too.

"Mrs. Temple," said Lew Brown, "I want Shirley for this revue and I'm sure we can come to terms if you'll come over to my office." Even his bargaining instincts, strong in any producer, had wilted under a little girl's blue eyes and the misplaced dimples which flashed with her smile.

Now Shirley's career really was under way. Well under way. She hadn't been working in "Stand Up and Cheer" long, when she was called to Winfield Sheehan's attention. Whereupon the Temples—after a long, serious conference as to the advisability of a career for Shirley and the ways and means they would use to keep her unspoiled — signed, in her name, a long-term contract. This contract gave Shirley one hundred and fifty dollars a week. But it wasn't good for long. What if she was earning more than ninety-odd per cent of the people in America? The unrestrained praise of all critics and the deluge of admissions which flowed into theatres throughout the country, immediately her name was displayed, made her worth ten times that, and more. So a new contract was drawn up and the old contract destroyed. The new contract runs for seven years and pays Shirley twelve hundred and fifty dollars a week, almost every penny of which George Temple deposits for her in a trust fund.

Shirley was a star. Electric lights in front of theatres spelled her name. "Shirley Temple in 'Stand Up and Cheer'." "Shirley Temple in 'Little Miss Marker'." "Shirley Temple in 'Baby Take a Bow'."

Everywhere people were talking about her. "Mercy," they said, "she must be a very happy little girl." And so she was. Because she always had been. Really, except that she worked in the studios almost every day, six hours in all but only three hours before the camera, her life was pretty much the same as it always had been. She had the same meal times and the same simple menus. The same bedtime, the same little pleasures and the same childish griefs.

THERE was, for instance, the morning Pinkey died. Pinkey, her very favorite Japanese turtle. She went out to her playhouse at the usual time, ant eggs clutched in her hand, Rowdy, her cocker, at her heels. She sprinkled the ant eggs on top of the water and waited for Pinkey, the greediest turtle ever, to come hurrying up after them. But he didn't move. Even when she pushed the bowl and the other turtles gobbled at the eggs, he remained on the bottom, terribly still.

"John," she called to her brother getting his bike out of the garage, "John! John, Pinkey's dead. He's awful dead, John. Even when I push the bowl he doesn't move!"

John knew she was fighting back her tears. Fighting hard. He was glad to see George come along.

"Pinkey's dead," he told George. "Isn't that good?" Shirley's eyes opened wide and a couple of tears fell to her cheeks. "As you and I were saying the other night, George, that Pinkey was in for trouble the way he ate. Now he's spared all that."

"We'll have to give him a funeral." George rose to the occasion and began to rummage about for an appropriate box. "You go pick some flowers, Shirley. I think those growing in the window boxes would be nice."

Shirley wanted to invite the entire neighborhood. But the boys thought otherwise.

"No." John was very firm. "This is a private funeral, Shirley. The way funerals are sometimes."

Shirley seemed to understand. But when everything was ready it was discovered she had filled her carriage with her dolls. "Just," she explained, "so Pinkey won't feel bad, thinking only a few turned out for him. If you don't mind, boys."

In the studios everyone with whom Shirley works marvels at her facility with lines and her apparent understanding of the different emotions which have to be depicted. However, not even Mrs. Temple herself can explain how she does it or where she ever acquired her understanding for adult problems. For in no other way is she this precocious.

"When Shirley is about to begin work on a new picture," Mrs. Temple says, "I tell her the story in detail. I answer her childish questions to the best of my ability. Then every night, before prayers, we go over the lines she must speak the following day. And again in the morning as Mr. Temple is driving us to the studios. This is all that is necessary. Shirley not only doesn't forget her lines; she doesn't even transpose a word."

It was while Shirley was working with Gary Cooper and Carole Lombard in "Now and Forever" that she suddenly realized that she alone of the three had no "stand-in." This concerned her seriously, not because she felt it a mark of importance to have a "stand-in"—I doubt she realized this was the case—rather because she has a child's natural feeling for the fitness of things. And if a "stand-in" was the thing to have, then she wanted one, too.

She approached the director. "I have no 'stand-in'," she reminded him, politely, rather intimating that, of course, such a thing must be an oversight on his part. "Mr. Gary has. And Carole has. But I haven't."

The director took one long look at Shirley and sent out a hurry call for a little girl, five years old, about forty-two inches tall, and weighing about forty-two pounds. Shirley wouldn't sulk if no "stand-in" was provided; he knew that. But he realized, too, that she would be a little unhappy, since she takes her "business" seriously. And under no circumstances did he want her radiance dimmed if it could possibly be avoided.

MARILYN GRANIS is Shirley's "stand-in." But as often as not Shirley will stand in herself while the cameraman gets his focus and the places in which she is to stand are decided upon. It's enough for her that her "stand-in" is there. And if Marilyn happens to be coloring a paper doll's dress or doing something equally important, of course, Shirley can't have her disturbed. These two children are fine friends.

Like most children, Shirley is quick to like certain people, to discover almost an immediate bond with them. Jimmy Dunn, for instance, she adores beyond any man except her father and her brothers. When she and Jimmy meet on a stage or on a studio street, before they speak, before they so much as greet each other with a smile, they link arms and go into the first few steps of their "Baby Take a Bow" number. It was Jimmy who thought up this ritual, but Shirley delights in it.

The late Dorothy Dell was another immediate favorite with Shirley.

"Dorothy's smarter than most grown-ups," she explained to her mother.

Dorothy, you see, knew all the things grown-ups are apt to be stupid about. Dorothy could "pretend." It was fun to play tea-party with her, to pass her cups of water tea and plates on which reposed imaginary biscuits, for Dorothy always knew how brown the biscuits were and what a wonderful chocolate icing had been achieved for the pretend cake.

They worked together in "Little Miss Marker" but their friendship didn't end when that picture was over. Shirley used to go to visit at Dorothy's house and one beautiful afternoon Dorothy came to see Shirley and have tea with her from the Mickey Mouse dishes.

Perhaps it was because Gary Cooper and Carole Lombard knew Dorothy, too, and talked about her that Shirley liked them so well, right off.

It was during the filming of "Now and Forever" that Shirley heard Carole whisper something about Dorothy to Gary one morning. She thought it odd, especially that they looked so sad when they talked about her. And the way Gary said, "Good morning, Wiggle Britches," without any happiness in his voice, made Shirley feel terrible.

Something must be wrong, she was sure of that, but what, what?

She did her first scene as best she could but she didn't feel she was very good in it and she wandered away from the set, trying to find happiness within herself again. Away off in a corner Carole and Gary sat on one of those wooden horses, talking. Shirley didn't mean to listen, but somehow the words they whispered reached her.

For a minute she stood there, deathly still, afraid of the tearing, choking ache that seemed to fill every inch of her little body. It was the words Carole had whispered—Carole had said Dorothy was killed, that Dorothy, her wonderful Dorothy was dead.

She went running to her mother. "Mommie, oh Mommie," she called, sobs catching in her words, "Dorothy's dead! Dorothy's dead, Mommie. Dorothy's dead."

The silence of that sad studio rang with her childish sobs. Gary began blowing his nose hard. So did the other men. Carole Lombard began to cry, quite unashamed.

Mrs. Temple took Shirley off into a corner and gathered her up in her arms.

"You mustn't cry like this," she told her, holding back her own tears with a supreme effort. "It isn't fair, Shirley. You see everybody here today feels sad, but they have work to do, and they're trying to control their feelings." She spoke quietly, gently. "When you act this way, Shirley, you make it twice as hard for them. And you don't help Dorothy. She's all right now. All right, Shirley. Do you hear me, do you understand? And she'd be the last person in the world who would want you to cry."

At last Shirley's sobs stopped. An hour later she went to the director and said "I'm ready to work again."

The scene filmed then showed Shirley in Carole's lap. They rehearsed it several times, to get everything right. Then the lights were turned on. "Quiet everybody," shouted an assistant. "This is the take."

For the moment, lost in the action of the scene, Shirley forgot about Dorothy. She did beautifully. Only Gary, an old softie sometimes, unable to bear the sight of that mite acting so bravely, walked away.

SHIRLEY'S little hands stole up to Carole's face. She raised her eyes to meet Carole's eyes. And found Carole's eyes blurred with tears. That brought everything back, that dropped that terrible aching into her again. She buried her head against Carole's heart. And in spite of all she did to control herself one choky, smothered sob would escape.

"Okay. Cut. Lights out!" called the director. He would, he had decided, let it ride that way. It fitted into the action well enough. And since in the studios all is grist that comes to the mill, it was too good to waste. For that sob, unmistakably, marked the first heartbreak of childhood.

It was last summer while he had his family with him in the mountains that George Temple, still head of his household even if there is a movie star in the family, arranged to have their things moved into the new house he had bought. The salary Mrs. Temple earns at the studios, added to his income, had made a larger house possible at last. And the time had come when a house behind a high hedge and adobe wall, a house the address of which wouldn't be known, had become necessary.

Shirley thought it a great pity that they had to be away and miss the excitement of their things being carried out into the street and packed in a big van. But the wonder of returning to a brand new house was something, too. And when upon their return she discovered that she would have at least another week's additional holiday since her next story wasn't ready, she was delighted.

There was the afternoon a big car stopped in front of their house and a chauffeur delivered a note. And later on that same big car came back and picked up Shirley and her mother and took them up to the very top of a mountain where a great house, like a palace, stood. There were all kinds of dogs and beautiful birds. And, wonder of wonders, a playhouse that looked like a picture in a fairy story and had the name "Gloria" carved above the doorway. Because, you see, it was the playhouse of Gloria Lloyd. And that note, the chauffeur had brought the first time he came to the Temple's house, had invited Shirley and her mother to spend an afternoon at the Lloyd's house. Mrs. Temple sat in the drawing-room and had tea and sandwiches with Mrs. Lloyd, while Shirley, with Gloria and Peggy and little Harold and Jane Bannister, Ann Harding's little girl, went with the Lloyd nurse to play in the playhouse.

SHIRLEY loved it. And Gloria insisted that she be "Honorary" President of a club they had, a club which gave over its meetings to playing "show." And then later on they went into the house and a big screen came down over the fireplace and they saw Mickey Mouse, just as if they were in a real theatre. Oh, it all was very wonderful.

"Shirley," Gloria Lloyd, going-on-ten, will tell you, "is just the way she is on the screen. We always have the most fun when she comes over. And it's funny, she doesn't seem to know that she's a movie star. Just like my father and Janie's mother. She doesn't seem to know that at all."

At last, however, Shirley's new picture was ready. And she returned to the studios to discover that here, too, she had moved. Now, instead of her old dressing-room, she had a whole bungalow to herself. With a dove côte built into the roof, with a garden and a tree with a swing.

The kitchen had a stove and a big icebox. In the bedroom there was a blackboard and a white desk and seat. It was here that Shirley would work with her private tutor between scenes. And in the big living-room there were dark blue chairs fringed in white, a squashy sofa with pictures of Puss In Boots and Little Miss Muffet and Little Boy Blue in the chintz. And, another wonder of wonders, a white piano that kept on whispering the music for ever so long after you laid your two arms down flat across the keys.

It was Irvin Cobb who, not so very long ago, presented her with an Academy prize for having done some of the most outstanding work on the screen during the past year.

"When Santa Claus dropped you down Creation's chimney," he said, while Shirley stood up on a table and smiled at all the people who clapped for her, "he gave to the world the greatest gift of joy and happiness it has ever known. They say children's laughter is the rustling of angels' wings in Heaven, and if this is true, you are a gift from Heaven to millions of children and millions of grown-ups, too."

Shirley thought it was great fun. But when she saw her mother and father look as if they were going to cry, she had to get down in a hurry so she could sit between them and reach for their hands, under the table where nobody could see.

And so we leave her, now that she is seven . . . What lies ahead in the years which stretch away to form the future, nobody knows. But oh, we do so hope that she'll live just as happily forever after.

SAVAGE LIPSTICK

A transparent, pasteless, simply ravishing color that savagely clings to lovely lips . . .

SAVAGELY lovely . . . this freshly different lipstick whose alluring shades and seductive smoothness bring to lips the sublime madness of a moon-kissed jungle night. Yes, Savage does exactly that . . . for it colors the lips a wicked red, without coating them with paste. Apply it like ordinary lipstick and rub it in. Like magic, the cosmetic vanishes, leaving only the color, which instantly becomes an actual part of the lips. With Savage, your lips can be pastelessly, savagely red all day . . . or all night! Four wonderful shades from which to choose. Their fresh loveliness simply cannot be described. You must SEE them, and use them to know how savage they really are.

I'd like Joan Crawford to leave drama for ones suited to it and go back to dancing ladies.

I'd like George Arliss to get under the skin of the characters he portrays.

Verree Teasdale (pictured) is my idea of a real sophisticate.

Last but not least I'd like the mails to come more often so that I would not have so long to wait for my copy of MODERN SCREEN.—Lily Painter, North Sydney, Australia.

Pro-British

I have been a theatre-goer for years, but I have never felt the need to praise and see my praising in black and white till recently. It started when I first saw that masterpiece of art "Cavalcade." To my way of thinking, the best way of enjoying a picture is to see an English one. I think the best acting is to be found among the English. Of course, we in America have our brilliant actors and actresses, witness Fredric March, the Barrymores, and countless others, but somehow my heart and mind instinctively places above these, the English actors.

I saw Robert Donat (pictured), the most fascinating and breathtaking actor in all filmdom, three different times in his picture, "The Count of Monte Cristo" and I am impatiently awaiting his next one. The only man who can run second to him is Frank Lawton. I thrilled again and again to Ronald Colman's performance in "Clive of India" and I think George Arliss' acting in "Rothschild" is unsurpassed. And we must not forget that perennial charmer, Sir Guy Standing, suave and enchanting always. — Bess Chandler, New York, N. Y.

Thanks!

Congratulations on your feature, "Fashions for Men." It proves that you are on your toes and that the magazine which I chose years ago—and now due to finances it is the only magazine I get regularly—is keeping up to its promises.

All I would ask for, if I could ask for more, is an article on interior decoration. —Lavina Baigrie, Toronto, Ont., Canada.

About a Crooner

Lanny Ross is one of the most refreshing personalities that has been brought to the screen for some time. Although his performance in "College Rhythm" was not outstanding, his acting shows a certain restraint and enthusiasm uncommon to most Hollywood stars.

Given roles worthy of his artistic character, I cannot help but feel that Lanny will surpass his crooning predecessors, Crosby, Powell, et al, and carve a definite niche for himself in the movies. —Barbara Berch, Chicago, Ill.

Film Stars as Models

So many people today take different stars for their models that I think we ought to have better stars. I don't mean to say that some of the stars we have are not fit to be imitated, but I know of some that I would not enjoy seeing a second edition of.

My idea is this: why not give bigger and better roles to stars whom we would not mind seeing copied? For instance, Juliette Compton. To me she is all that a "lady" should be. Perhaps if there were more actresses like her, they would inspire the younger generation to be more ladylike. She looks, talks and carries herself as I think a lady should. With most of the younger set now, it is not "All I know is what I read in the papers," but, "All I know is what I see in the movies."—Virginia Myers, San Fernando, Calif.

Breathless Beauty

I have just seen "Forsaking All Others." Joan Crawford proved she could adapt herself to a comic role with her ethereal beauty and chameleon moods. She is so different from other actresses. She is graceful, dresses stunningly and has a sparkling personality and glorious smile.

Joan is the only actress on the screen who can fix her hair a thousand and one ways and look breathlessly beautiful. She's the perfect combination of all the salient points of femininity—gorgeous face, figure, eyes, hair and complexion. Crawford is a perfect lady about her sex-appeal.—"Mac," Iowa.

A Plea from the Deaf

Why don't the movie moguls and movie exhibitors give the deaf mutes a break?

Before the talkies came I went to from one to three silent shows every twenty-four hours. Now I seldom go except to see Wally Beery. He is not only a great actor but a great guy in private life. I have heard plenty about his charities. And dainty little Janet Gaynor is my favorite actress.

I would suggest that the movie houses in big towns run a silent film at least once a month for the benefit of the deaf. I think it would be a paying proposition—Akron, Ohio, has over 500 deaf mutes; I know there are over 200 in Los Angeles and I understand that there are about 150 in Houston, Texas.

The deaf work, pay taxes, have children and want to be treated as equals, not as poor unfortunates who are incapable of usefulness. I don't believe there is one movie producer who gives a hoot about the deaf.—John Dukes, Price, Utah.

(You have our deepest sympathy, Johnny. But we're afraid that not very much can be done to alleviate the situation which you describe. There are a few theatres here in New York (in Harlem and in the Bowery) where silent pictures are shown, but in general there is no demand for them. And as the prints now in existence become more and more torn and scratched, they will be discarded. New prints will not be made, for there isn't enough money in silent pictures to make it a profitable enterprise. Most of them will go to the reducing plant where they will be junked.)

Ah, But Have You Seen Nelson in "Naughty Marietta"?

I shall not go into "raves" about your magazine. I believe that it is enough to say that I read it regularly.

But to get to the point of this letter: I went to see "Student Tour" yesterday for the second time. I did not like the picture, and I cannot stand Jimmy Durante (apologies to that gentleman); I went to see the picture twice to see and hear a person who appeared on the screen about three minutes altogether—Nelson Eddy.

I was really thrilled by the appearance and voice of Mr. Eddy. I am happy that truly great singers are now appearing on the screen. May we hear and see more of Nelson Eddy, who was the first screen player to draw a "fan" letter from me.—Margaret Louis, Richmond, Calif.

Let John Boles Sing

If the producers would only cast John Boles in a picture something like Grace Moore's successful film, "One Night of Love," and give him a chance to thrill the music lovers with songs that are semi-classical like "The Indian Love Call" from "Rose Marie," and "One Alone" from "The Desert Song," or cast him in another operetta on the order of "Rio Rita!"

Give him more opportunities to delight the public with his grand sense of humor and his very expressive speaking voice, and let him sing songs which are truly worthy of his glorious voice. I believe the producer would surely rake in the money in heaps, and the public would throng to see the production.

The fine thing about John Boles is that the husbands, brothers and sweethearts of the feminine portion of the audience admire and enjoy Mr. Boles' talents, too. Mr. Boles is always a gentleman, and truly a fine artist, and he is never mush in his love-making.—Lillian Musgrave, Minneapolis, Minn.

Thoughts for Producers

I'd let Ruby Keeler try being housewife instead of a movie star.

I'd take Dick Powell and star him with someone that would at least be as good as he is.

I'd work Shirley Temple so hard she would have a nervous breakdown so David Holt (pictured) would get a chance.

I'd tell Irving S. Cobb to stick to writing and quit trying to act.

I'd put gloves on Max Baer and send him back to the ring where he belongs.

I'd cancel the contract of George Raft until he would agree to send pictures out free of charge.

I'd put Kay Francis in some more "doctor" pictures.

I'd bring Claudette Colbert down to earth.

Then, after accomplishing all that "Ay tank ay go home."—Betty Lenore Myers, San Fernando, Calif.

Reviews—A Tour of Today's Talkies

to settle matters.

Not much sense to any of it, but it's first-rate nonsense.

★★ Strangers All (RKO)

Too bad that May Robson is wasted in this. It's a mediocre family drama. There's Miss Robson, the mother, her three sons and a pretty daughter. One of the sons has the communistic bug pretty badly and gets arrested for his pains. One of the sons has the acting bug—William Bakewell plays him, and we take a moment to doff our tattered hat in his direction for enlivening the picture as much as he was able. Preston Foster is the good old reliable son and he gets nothing (not even acting honors) for his behavior.

★★★★ Black Fury (Warners)

A story to remember. A memorable piece of acting by Paul Muni. And a social document which, by means of clever writing and adroit direction, is kept clear of the propaganda charge.

Muni plays the role of Joe Radek—illiterate, passionate, simple miner. The story itself is gripping enough, but it is the social significance behind the story, the exposure of the brutal methods employed by racketeering police in dealing with strikers, and the powerful work of Muni which lift this picture into the unusual class.

★★★ Star of Midnight (RKO)

This detective yarn is guaranteed to make the tired business man even tireder, what with the constant brain-strain and plenty of chair-gripping. We have a couple of mysterious murders, which sleuth Powell unravels with such ease and good humor. We have not a little consumption of fire-water. We have Ginger Rogers, bent on impressing Powell with her potentialities as a female Holmes. She is cute, but ineffectual. We'd rather she stuck to her dancing. J. Farrell MacDonald is grand as the chief of police.

★★ Times Square Lady (M-G-M)

Whoever wrote this story had an imagination that would make the Brothers Grimm either blush rosey red with embarrassment or turn pea green with envy. Yep, such a fairy tale hasn't hit the celluloid boards since Hans Christian Andersen came down the pike. It's about the beeootiful Iowa farmerette who comes to the big city to take over her deceased Pa's sporting activities. Pop was a great guy on the races and the fights and the slot machines. He had a nice little gang of baddies working for him, too. But Virginia Bruce decides to fix all that, and she does—in six good and untrue reels of film. The blonde lady plays sort of a master mind. She couldn't convince you. Well, a lot of people feel the same way, but she does dress beautifully and is indeed fair to look upon. Pinkie Tomlin, composer of "Object of My Affections," appears briefly in this, as does the ever-capable Isabel Jewell. Robert Taylor, a new leading man, plays the hero and is a "natural."

★★ Straight from the Heart (Universal)

Even if you are a "guessing game" fan, this picture will leave you decidedly disgruntled, as there's just no solution to the goings-on. The plot is dismally complicated, with only the crucial moments speeded up to a snail's pace.

The fair heroine, Mary Astor, is picked up off the streets by the handsome hero, Roger Pryor, who proceeds to feed her French pastry and let her go. My, my, you marvel—a man with no ulterior motives! But Roger is very dirty in politics! This startling disclosure leads to more excitement, what with him double-crossing the mayor, a little child, a dead woman and his sweetheart and she double-crossing him a few times! Yes, yes, we got a little mixed up, too.

The cast struggles along as well they can, but the only highlight is the performance of Baby Jane Quigley, who is a surprisingly good little actress.

★★ Gigolette (RKO)

And this, little boys and girls, proves beyond the question of a doubt that honesty and purity will bring even a gigolette through life and night-clubs unscathed. Adrienne Ames is the gallant gal, who finds herself at the mercy of New York when her wealthy father commits suicide because of debts incurred—largely from his daughter's wardrobe, we should judge.

Ralph Bellamy is the rough and tough Broadwayite, whose heart, surprisingly enough, is of soft-soap. Donald Cook gives the best performance of the mediocre lot—that of the play-boy who's out for a swell time at any expense.

★★★ It Happened in New York (Universal)

Maybe it did happen there, but it could have happened in any town where there's a girl with a boy friend, and a blonde dazzler who tries to snare him away. But at that, this is an entertaining picture, and we didn't wonder that Lyle Talbot was a bit bewildered between Gertrude Michael and Heather Angel, both looking their best and trying their hardest to charm him.

Hugh O'Connell is a riot as the press agent for Gertrude, who's the movie idol of the world. Between soothing her tantrums, placating her public and keeping an eye on her business affairs and Pekinese purp, his isn't exactly a soft job. As if that were not enough anguish, he has to contend with two determined young ladies out to get the same man.

While this isn't anything out of the ordinary in movie amusement, the cast has handled its parts with such deftness that you're bound to be entertained.

★★ Sweepstake Annie (Liberty)

There's about as much chance of enjoying this picture as ever winning the Irish sweepstakes, but if you want to see how Marion Nixon reacts to having the one-hundred-fifty-thousand dropped in her lap, here's your chance.

Just a nice little girl is Annie, but suffering from family-itis to such an extent that she sacrifices everything for the ungrateful outfit—money, clothes, good times—with nary a thought for the morrow or a damp day. Tom Brown, Annie's ardent through freckled wooer, urges her to leave said gasping relations and keep house for him. His harsh words about her flesh and blood are so irritating that Annie, though her heart is breaking, sends him away. Then she wins the lucky money and decides to live her own life—which soon includes some Russian nobility and the upper crust of the four hundred—only to find it all a tawdry, shabby bauble.

★★ While the Patient Slept
(Warners)

Well, Aline MacMahon has been framed in another picture! It's our not too humble opinion that this gal deserves a change, as does Guy Kibbee, who also puts in an appearance in this tepid thriller. Yeh, he's sleuthing again, and she's supplying the brain power.

The story follows the formula that is becoming familiar for murder mellerdrammers—a dearth of entertainment and a plethora of corpses. This one starts right out with a death-bed scene. Gathered together at this time are all the relatives of a wealthy, elderly gentleman who are to share his wealth when he shall be no more. Naturally, they're all cuh-razy about each other and you're awfully surprised to hear that a couple of them have been mysteriously done away with. With all the suspicioning in the air, it's no wonder that Lyle Talbot and Patricia Ellis suspect themselves in love.

(Paramount)

If this story was as delightful as the Irish and Scotch accents in which the principal characters indulge, it would be a top-notcher. But unfortunately, such is not the case.

The actors, however, can take well merited bows on their performances. Andy Clyde, as the auld Scotch barber who stints on the lather, but gives his life's savings to his best enemy, proves himself an exceptional comedian. You'll like Walter Kelly, too—he's as Irish as Saint Pat. Jane Darwell is lovable as his wife, with a heart as big as a washtub. Betty Furness handles her role capably.

★★ Traveling Saleslady
(Warners)

This story hasn't much point, but it's saved by a competent cast, including Joan Blondell, Glenda Farrell and Hugh Herbert.

Hugh has one idea, and one only, in the picture. His brain-wave results in a toothpaste flavored with Martinis, old-fashioneds, Manhattans and gin fizzes! He's aided and abetted by Joan, who's peeved at her rich papa's refusal to let her indulge in a career, so she becomes a traveling saleslady and manages to put herself and the product over with the popularity which they both deserve.

Glenda Farrell and William Gargan provide a few laughs, but the real guffaws are furnished by the dumb-but-clever Hugh Herbert. If you are out for a little fun and nothing else, you won't go wrong on this yarn.

(Fox)

If you like those "Ride 'em, cowboy" yarns, you won't go wrong on this picture. Though the story sticks to the old tried-and-true formula of Westerns, a few genuine thrills are added.

George O'Brien as the personality-plus playboy, has made short work of an inheritance acquired by the hard work of his father. He now feels that what is needed in his life is an "objective" and without the vaguest idea of what this might be, sets out to run it down, landing up on an Arizona ranch. Here everything is supplied without further ado—a villain who sneers satisfactorily, a beautiful, harassed heroine, a cowpuncher with a good heart, but a turrible temper, and a herd of cattle dying of thirst.

Dorothy Wilson, Harry Woods and Paul Kelly, do well in their parts, while Mr. O'Brien can pat himself on the back for giving his best performance to date.

★★★ Screen Snapshots
(Columbia)

Harriet Parsons, collector and compilator of these newsy, intimate "shots" of Hollywood's great and near-great, is in order for congratulations. It must take the instinct of an ace reporter and the patience of an extra bent on stardom to put together "Screen Snapshots," one of the most intensely interesting and entertaining reels to emanate from the camera coast. It records photographically the players' away-from-the-camera moments —John Boles putting on an impromptu entertainment at a night club, Ben Lyon ad-libbing a master of ceremonies routine, Mae West a little bit peeved at being "caught" without make-up and with a new boy friend, Tom Mix's circus parade, and Bing Crosby at the Santa Anita racetrack. It's alive, breezy and wholly diverting.

★★ Baby Face Harrington
(M-G-M)

It is really too bad that Charles Butterworth, who has bolstered up so many

Adrienne Ames and Ralph Bellamy in a scene from "Gigolette."

Chester Morris and Jean Parker in a close-up from "Princess O'Hara."

fair-to-middling pictures for other stars, should be so terrifically let down in this, his first picture on his own hook. It is the story of a meek-faced Milquetoast who becomes involved with a gang of public enemies and is himself branded as Public Enemy No. 2. Sounds something like another current picture, doesn't it? Well, let's not be odious and make comparisons. Let's just say that "Baby Face Harrington" is worth seeing only for those few moments when Butterworth is allowed to be Butterworthishly amusing. Una Merkel and Nat Pendleton do the best they can with supporting roles.

(M-G-M)

The only thing actually blood-curdling about this latest vampire chiller is wasting Lionel Barrymore on such a yarn. Of course, the old horror stand-bys are used with pleasant frequency—corpses tangled in cobwebs, fat rats scuttling among coffins and plenty of fog torn by high winds. But not to make this look anything like a "Dracula" rehash, all the mysteries are cleared up in the end with scientific precision. Under the influence of a hypnotist, the murderer re-enacts his crime. Simple and logical, as you can see for yourself.

Jean Hersholt strives nobly to do something about his role as Baron Otto, Elizabeth Allan just gives up and wanders around with a vacant look in her eyes, and Henry Wadsworth is not very convincing as the courageous young man in the teeth of danger. Bela Lugosi plays B. L. with his usual fervor.

If you must see this one, leave the offspring at home. You'll have trouble enough with your own nightmares.

★★★★ Cardinal Richelieu
(United Artists)

Whatever let-down you may have felt when you saw George Arliss in "The Iron Duke" will be forgotten the minute "Cardinal Richelieu" starts unrolling on the screen. It's a grand portrayal, perhaps not as great as the Arliss "Rothschild" but great and grand enough to give you a swell evening's entertainment. Not only is Arliss at his best, but he is supported by a cast that puts its all into a series of excellent characterizations. Edward Arnold, Douglas Dumbrille, Cesar Romero and Maureen O'Sullivan head the group. There isn't much opportunity for great histrionics on Maureen's part but she looks adorable. Director Rowland Lees should get a hand for his expert direction and beautiful production.

Ann's mother, as you know, was an opera singer. Ann's father was a business man. Seldom has such a combination made a happy marriage. Those two temperaments—the artistic and the practical—simply don't click.

ANN was born in a little mid-western town. Her mother was on a concert tour at the time. It was the nearest town that boasted a hospital. Ann hasn't been back since. You couldn't quite call it her "old home town." The papers could never say, "local girl makes good."

She has an older sister. Ann is in the middle. After her younger sister—now eighteen—was born, the mother and father were divorced. And that, it would seem, ended that.

But there is no real end to a family tie. Ann missed a father. She didn't miss her mother's ex-husband, she had never known him. She simply missed having a father. Other girls said to her, "Last night my daddy told me . . ." or "Look at the bracelet my father gave me for my birthday." It always made a lump in Ann's throat. She wondered what it would be like to have a father.

Between Ann and her mother there was a great companionship, a great love. This fascinating, exciting woman knew all of the heartaches that a professional life brings. But she knew the compensations, too. She knew the divine ecstacy of self-expression and, in a very subtle way, she brought Ann up to be a singer.

Oh, she never coerced. She never bullied. She merely "guided." She "suggested" that Ann take piano lessons, harmony, counterpoint. She steeped her in musical lore—told her that languages were more important than mathematics. It was truly destiny that Ann become a singer.

The best schools were at Ann's disposal. The unknown father saw to that and then, when Ann was a girl in her 'teens, the father decided he wanted to see her.

He had married again and was living on the northwestern coast. Ann went to him to finish her education—the best education money could buy.

Ah, what a curious meeting that must have been. Ann, a grown girl now, a girl with character and intelligence, stood before a total stranger who was her father. She had missed having a father. She had thought that when she saw him, at last, a great emotion would possess her. But now she stood there looking at someone she didn't know.

And as time passed she knew him less and less. So different had their lives been, so far apart their ethics, their standards, their codes, that there could be no real meeting between them. There was no point of contact—either mental or emotional. Mind you, there were no quarrels, no scenes. It was a situation which both were too sensitive to overcome.

AT first Ann thought it would be better when they were better acquainted—when father and daughter were not so shy of each other. But she soon discovered that they had been apart too long, that there was no regaining those lost years. And when she had discovered this, she knew that she must not stay.

She told her father that she was leaving—going back to her mother in Los Angeles, where her mother was taking singing pupils. The father, ever disapproving of theatrical life, felt that if Ann went back she would become a part of show business, so he tried to make her stay with him and at last, when he saw how determined she was to go, told her that if she left he would stop her allowance.

That was something for a girl to face, but Ann faced it with the courage of a conviction that has made her life an enobling experience and an inspiration to others.

Her father's money had made it possible for her to live well, to have the best education. What her mother received for her singing lessons could not possibly keep them all. Yet Ann knew that if she were to make the most of herself as a person, she must leave.

In Hollywood, without the generous allowance, she took stock of herself. She was an able pianist—knew counterpoint and harmony. She spoke French beautifully and knew all of the niceties of polite society. But could she earn a living with these accomplishments? Enviously, she looked at girls who had been trained in shorthand and typewriting. There was something tangible! There was a job. With these she would have had something to offer. A fine education in the best schools—what did it mean when the necessity for earning her living was upon her?

And necessity it was, too, for she knew that, if she failed, there could be no going back to her father. She had made the decision. She had broken the slim thread which bound them together. She was on her own now—a free agent. And what did a free agent do?

She knew music. That, if anything, must make her a living, must help her mother and sisters. So she began taking lessons from her mother. Today the mother claims that Ann was her worst pupil. She wouldn't practice scales.

And then Ann had the chance of an audition. She sang before a man at Warner's Studio. She got a job. It was as simple as that.

But Ann was soon to discover that it wasn't so simple as that. Theatrical jobs don't last forever. One ends, another must be found and Ann was not such a free agent as she had thought. She had an actual as well as a moral responsibility toward her sisters and her mother. On her own score she had broken with her father, which had cut them off, too. So it was her responsibility. She must not only provide for herself but she must "help out at home." It was a duty that she could not shirk. She didn't want to shirk it, of course, but if things had been different . . .

Don't you know? Haven't you said it, secretly, a thousand times?

A girl in show business must keep up appearances, must look well. But Ann, because of her responsibilities and the fact that at first she made very little money, must shop around for her clothes, must pretend that she really wanted to walk after a strenuous rehearsal instead of taking a taxi.

In New York, after her experience in the Follies, she found herself looking for a job. She must have a job. "If I don't get a job my family doesn't eat!" If you know about that feeling, then don't envy Ann Sothern.

Or, perhaps, you should envy her—envy her courage, her ability to refrain from complaining, her delight in being able to "help out." But instead of envying, you should emulate her example and try to penetrate her depth of character and beauty of soul.

Everything is fine, now. Ann's at the top and, knowing Ann, I think she is right when she says, "Having responsibilities makes one a better person."

That's all she'll say, of course. She's not the kind to sob on your shoulder. And, as I've told you before, this story was pieced together with the things I learned about Ann from others.

But believe me, she knows your problems. She's had them!

A Beautiful Romance

speaking of it, that they were desperately, madly in love. But her family were opposed to her marrying so young—she was not yet eighteen—and besides they didn't like Frank.

So, in order to attempt to make Alma forget Frank, her mother planned a trip to Europe for Alma and her father.

When Alma told Frank this he said: "We can't let them do this to us. I'm afraid to let you leave me. Let's get married now."

They were married secretly in Hoboken in April. Three weeks later she sailed for Europe. Both she and Frank were heartbroken at the parting, but they were glad that—come what may—they belonged to each other.

Germany was her destination. Alma and her father arrived just in time to be caught up in the webs of war, and for four solid months Frank had no word or communication from her, nor did any of his letters get through to her. He was, of course, frantically worried about her. But nothing he did—not even an appeal to the Secretary of State—brought any news of her.

Up to this time he had been in business with his father, but now he must have more stimulating work—work that could partially take his mind off his grief.

HIS brother, Ralph, had already gone into the theatre. One of Frank's friends, Edgar Allan Woolf, wrote a vaudeville sketch for Frank in which he played. At the close of the tour, Walker Whiteside offered him a part in "Mr. Wu."

He played his role with half his mind and half his heart. He tormented the mailman for letters. He lived only from day to day, hoping that each new hour might bring him word from Alma.

And then the miracle happened. Weary with waiting, he strolled into the theatre one night and found a telegram for him. He clawed it open. "Arrived in New York this morning. Meet me on the mezzanine of the Knickerbocker Hotel after the performance. Alma." That was all, but it was enough. His bride had escaped from Germany and had returned to him.

He gave a bang-up performance that night, but never had minutes seemed like hours before. He would see her tonight. He would hear her say, once more, that she loved him. He would hold her in his arms.

She was waiting for him at the appointed place. And when he saw her he went to pieces with love and relief at her safety and joy in her return. He was trembling so that he could not speak. It was she who opened the conversation, and her words are written across Frank's mind forever.

She said: "Wait a minute, Frank; don't kiss me. I've something to tell you. I don't love you any more."

He stepped back and looked at her. The lobby of the hotel was a whirling kaleidoscope. His hands and feet were numb. A gun seemed to be exploding in his brain.

"I'm sorry," she said. And then she repeated, desperately. "I don't love you any more."

He heard a voice. It was not his voice, but it seemed to be coming from his throat. "Is there—is there another man?"

She shook her head. "I just don't—don't love you any more."

And then, as his reason slowly began to come back, he said, "What is it, Alma? Tell me."

"Not here," she begged. And he saw that she was suffering as much as he.

Somehow they stumbled out of the hotel and into a taxicab.

But even as they drove through Central Park he could not make her speak. Only one thing he knew. He knew it in the taxi. She was lying. She did love him. For some fantastic and ghoulish reason that he could not penetrate, she was lying.

He begged her to tell him what had happened. With her lips she repeated, brokenly now: "I just don't love you any more—that's all." But those same lips told him a different story.

And then began the most torturous moments of his life. He had no pride. There was too much love in his heart to leave room for pride. Every Sunday he went to the country, where she was living with her family, and sat in the living-room watching her, but never touching her. He never once saw her alone. Her family was always present. For months those cruel Sundays lasted.

ONE night at the theatre Walker Whiteside came in to his dressing-room. "I'm sorry to tell you this, Frank," he said. "But I guess you know how bad your performances have been lately. What's wrong?"

Frank shook his head. "I guess I'm just no actor," he said.

"No, it isn't that. You were grand at first. I've hesitated about this. But you've changed. Your heart is gone from your work."

His heart was with Alma—Alma who said with her lips she didn't love him and told him with her eyes she did and persisted in keeping up this cruel mystery.

He left the show.

The next Sunday he managed to whisper to Alma, "I'm going to announce our marriage."

Her face went white. "Please, please, don't do that," she begged. "No one knows about it and it's over, anyhow. Please, please . . . You can't understand."

He had a notice inserted in the paper that they had been married in April. It was now about November. That seemed strange. Reporters interviewed him. They interviewed Alma and her family. And the story came out that they had been married, but it was over now.

Well, there was no use going on like this. He must do something with his life. His heart was being torn to bits. He had lost his first good acting job. But he had to go on somehow, somewhere.

In Richmond, Virginia, he got a job in stock. That was worse. Those Sundays, torturing as they had been, were better than nothing. At least he might look at her.

And then there came another telegram. It was from Alma. "If you can't see any reason why not, I'm coming to Richmond to stay a week."

He met her at the train. She was to visit an aunt or someone. She didn't go near her aunt's house. She stayed with Frank. And she has never left him since. And she told him the reason for her strange behavior.

When she returned from Germany and her mother realized that she was still in love with Frank, that the European adventure had not made her forget him, her mother said: "If you don't give him up tonight, I will commit suicide." Poor young Alma believed her. Although madly in love with Frank, the girl had no choice. Better to give up her husband than to have her mother's death upon her conscience. That night in the hotel she was as desperate as Frank. And it was almost more than she could bear to see his face and his heart go to pieces before her eyes as she pronounced those dreadful words, "I don't love you any more."

And those Sundays—how she had suffered, too. What they had cost her! But her mother told her always that if she went to him she would kill herself.

Then Frank went away. And she knew that she could be separated from him no longer. Let her love bring what consequences it might, her place was by his side. Their love was greater than anything else in the world.

And the consequences were not dire. Her mother did not commit suicide. She is still alive today. And Frank and Alma and their nineteen-year-old son are utterly and completely happy. Theirs is one of those real, real loves. A lesser passion would not have withstood so much.

Rochelle Hudson spoke out of turn while in New York recently, and, as a result, has Will Rogers and her home town of Claremore, Oklahoma, on her pretty neck. A columnist quoted her as saying that Claremore "stinks." Rochelle was indignant because she says only part of her statement was used. What she said, in toto, was that the town has a bad odor because of the radium water which abounds there. "And anyhow," ends up Rochelle, defiantly, "I haven't lived in Claremore since I was a tiny child!"

Nature's Own Method of Removing... FAT

THE CHENO MAID
A slender figure yours the CHENO way!

You don't have to stay fat and unattractive... because removing surplus weight is now easy, sure and perfectly safe.

There is only one cause of overweight... a lack of materials in the system for oxidizing fat. All the reducing remedies on earth can give only temporary relief, and the fat comes back unless the underlying cause is remedied.

CHENO

The Five Factor Reducing System

supplies the missing food elements (a deficiency of which is the cause of overweight)... iodine, iron, calcium, phosphates, etc.... all needed by the body to oxidize excess fat and keep the weight normal. There is not one harmful ingredient in Cheno, but on the contrary its use will improve the health. Clinical tests on 100 women showed that everyone reduced through the hips and waistline first.

Mrs. P. A., Glendale, California, says:
"I have lost 42 pounds in weight since taking CHENO, 7 inches in waistline, 8 inches in hips, 8 inches in bust, 1½ inches in upper arm. I gained in pep and energy, look and feel years younger. I can now wear size 18 dresses."

Send no money! Get this booklet FREE! There are SIX distinct types of overweight. This valuable 24-page FREE booklet tells which type you are, why most reducing remedies fail and how the CHENO scientific food treatment will enable you to lose many pounds of excess weight and STAY slender.

NOW THAT I HAVE YOU...THERE'LL BE No More Ladies

An airy love bandit "swears off" the ladies when he meets his heart's desire—only to forget all about his promise the minute her back is turned! He's permanently cured of his roving eye—and the way it's done makes "No More Ladies" the season's gayest romance! Joan and Bob are at their very best in roles perfectly suited to them—while Charlie Ruggles, Franchot Tone and Edna May Oliver add to the merriment .... Another delightful Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer picture, perfectly adapted from New York's laughing stage hit.

Can't something be done about the situation in which Ann Harding, Barbara Stanwyck and Kay Francis find themselves right now? They are heading for the last round-up rapidly because of poor stories and poor everything. Aren't they worthy of as much attention as Shearer and Crawford? And is Ruth Chatterton (pictured) too far gone to make a comeback? She was a real actress, but those awful stories she had in her latter days were enough to kill any star.—W. P. H., Manchester, Tenn.

To Tom-Tom

Although I am a true motion picture fan, I have never had an actor or actress impress me to the point where I was overanxious to hear more about him as well as to see him get his share of publicity.

The actor of whom I am writing is Felix Knight. I believe his portrayal of Tom-Tom in "Babes in Toyland" was as nearly perfect as it could be. And what a voice!—Carole B., Chicopee, Mass.

A Toast to Youth

Here's a toast to that up-and-coming young screen team, Dixie Lee and Joe Morrison, who sing their blithe way through "Love in Bloom." We are charmed by their sincere acting. And how they can sing! Another point is their genuine youth. After all, we're getting tired of middle-aged heroes singing to not-so-young heroines. But Dixie and Joe sing with the zest of youth and put over their love scenes beautifully. —Lillian Johnson, Burlingame, Calif.

Bob Montgomery's "Biography"

"The Divorcee" who had a "Hideout" on "The Easiest Way" was "Made on Broadway" by "The Man in Possession," who knew that "Strangers May Kiss" and that "When Ladies Meet" they speak "Another Language."

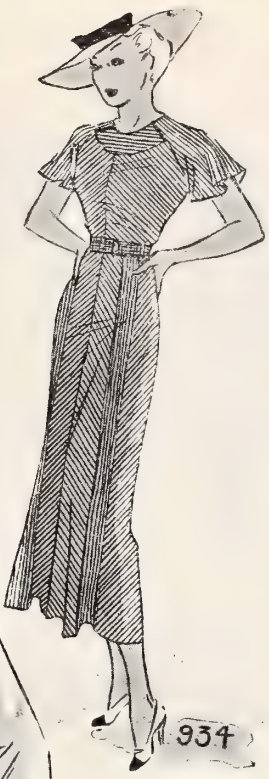
"The War Nurses" in their "Private Lives" are "Faithless" to their "Fugitive Lovers," "But the Flesh Is Weak," so "Forsaking All Others," they follow "Their Own Desire" and are caught in a "Riptide" as "Lovers Courageous."

"Shipmates" find "Love in the Rough" by "Hell Below," and "Blondie of the Follies" becomes "Our Blushing Bride."

"So This Is College" exclaimed "Vanessa," when "Letty Lynton" through an "Inspiration" solved "The Mystery of Mr. X."—Katherine Skemp, La Crosse, Wis.

One Fan to Another

Few fans have regard for standards of beauty. Geneva Miller, you are wrong! Jean Harlow is not beautiful. Her eyes, eyebrows, nose and chin contradict her supposed beauty. In fact, I think her entire face is unattractive. If it were not for expert lighting she would be very homely.



Another damsel whose picture would never be hung in a picture gallery for sheer beauty is Constance Bennett. Her bony, starved-looking face, chilly expression and ill-proportioned body are so repulsive that I can't pay any attention to her acting. Ditto for Hepburn.

MODERN SCREEN Patterns

COTTONS ARE the fabrics for your cool summer clothes and you have never seen such a variety of unusual textures and patterns as are available in the stores. And so inexpensive, too! You can have all three of these attractive costumes shown this month for a mere fraction of what it would cost to buy them. Pattern 907 is Bette Davis' darling gingham evening dress trimmed with perky flutings of white piqué. The peplum is a youthful detail as is the big contrasting bow. Then you can't do without a white linen suit like Pattern 908. It's Claire Trevor's favorite because of its trim jacket, fitted through the waist and buttoning with three center buttons. The skirt is slim. One of the uncrushable linens will make this a practical all-summer suit. Then we have copied Rosemary Ames' striped lawn dress, Pattern 934, because it is the essence of cool smartness. The high, yoke neckline and short full sleeves give a nice bodice detail. The skirt is made with panels in which the stripes are used both vertically and in diagonal effect. Rosemary's wide-brimmed hat has the same banding as her belt.
All patterns in sizes 14, 16, 18, 36, 38 and 40.

Julie Haydon's charming new hairdress is ideal for summer. Note the cool hairline in back.

Courtesy the American Hairdresser.

How to keep your hairbrush clean: use flour on bristles.

Rule 2. Never soak a brush—immerse the bristles only.

Rule 3. Place your brush with bristles down to dry.

Rule 4. When your hair is soiled protect brush with gauze.

HERE'S your chance to shine! Oh, not just in your own special hobby or activity, although that may come indirectly, but to shine in the one thing in which all of you want most to shine . . . the art of being radiantly attractive. Summer offers you your opportunity. Summer and sunshine, the simple magic of soap and water, shampoos, brushes, new coiffures, miraculous creams, new make-up . . . result, new girl!

Radiance, shininess, cleanliness—how they all fit in together! And we're going at this business of making you shine, clear from the crown of your topknot to the tips of your toes, with a vengeance. We'll have to keep you on your toes until next month before we really get much below your neck, because this month we're devoting ourselves mostly to "the tops" in beauty . . . the coiffure and the face . . . but we won't forget the business of pedicures in August.

First, let's think of the shining heads we most admire in Hollywood. Think of Norma Shearer's lustrous, glossy hair that always looks as if it had been brushed and brushed and brushed—and Kay Francis' dark hairdress that is as sleek as a raven's wing; Ginger Rogers' tresses that took such a sophisticated upturn in "Roberta," and Carole Lombard's smooth, blonde cap, and Julie Haydon . . . Well, you don't have to visualize Julie in your mind's eye, for here she is right before you, in three lovely photographs. Her new hairdress is a triumph in coolness, freshness, charm and chic. It is a glorified version of the French twist.

But before we go into the romantic trends of new coiffures, let's get our topknots into condition. If we were to take a ribbon to "tie back our bonny brown hair," as the old, old song goes, we could tie exactly seven knots in it, and each knot would represent an important thing to remember about our summertime topknots. Incidentally, Hollywood this summer favors the girlish effect, and more practically, the restraining effect of a ribbon on flyaway locks.

Now for the first knot: shampoo your hair often enough. You may wrinkle up your noses in disdain, and think this is an unnecessary reminder, but I can assure you that it (Continued on page 94)

It's wise to keep a cool head for summer comfort!

Between You 'n' Me

There are few beautiful women on the screen. Among these are Garbo, Dietrich, Crawford, Colbert, Shearer and Sten.—"Just Me."

Recognition!

People are continually arguing and debating as to who is the greatest screen actress. Granted there are many publicized stars and talented ladies, little has been said in praise of one deserving young woman who has worked to establish herself as a favorite. My hat is off to Myrna Loy. She is a fine comedienne, has loads of charm, turns in flawless performances and, above all, possesses wholesomeness. What more could one ask? Good luck, Miss Loy!—L. G. R., San Pedro, Calif.

Neil Hamilton Admirer

Have you ever stopped to think what a great actor Neil Hamilton is? Anyone who is honest enough to admit the truth will agree with me in saying that he has done more than any actor on the screen to give sure-fire entertainment. What is more he has always fought his way alone. True enough some of his pictures were a flop, but through no fault of his. "Here Comes the Groom" was perhaps the weakest story he ever did. The ones I enjoyed most were "Two Heads on a Pillow," "Blind Date," "Fugitive Lady," and "Once to Every Bachelor." People are still raving about his fine performances in these films.—Marie Hughes, New York, N. Y.

What's Your Opinion?

It's about time some movie magazine did something for us movie fans and I'm glad Modern Screen (my favorite magazine) was the one to do it. What am I talking about? Why your "Movie Scoreboard," of course. All we have to do now is look up the rating of any picture to see if it is suitable enough to visit. You just can't miss this way. Not only does it save us money but also time. Yes, sir, it takes Modern Screen to think up something sensible like that.—Marie Bonafide, Brooklyn, N. Y.

I wouldn't miss a copy of Modern Screen for worlds, but I did miss "The Report Card" in the last two issues. Whatsamatter? Your magazine is the best movie publication I've found so far and I read every page in it.

The "Movie Scoreboard" is good but give us "The Report Card." I enjoy comparing my rating with yours and usually I agree, but I did think "The Most Precious Thing in Life" deserved a far better rating, and as for "Crime Without Passion," it was a crime to have to sit through it.—Evelyn Taplett, Tyndall, South Dakota.

I purchased your March issue and found the customary directory of pictures missing. This was a department I found of much use and your comments quite dependable, i.e., your judgments were about

CARLOTTA DALE, Buffalo, N. Y.; FRANCES HARRITY, Philadelphia, Pa.; BEVERLY PARTRIDGE, New York, N. Y.; BILL, Hasbrouck Heights, N. J.; J. R. NORTON, San Diego, Cal.; M. M., Louisville, Ky.; DOROTHY McKEE; LILLIAN WITKOWSKI—Tom Brown, whose smiling face graces our page this month, is now up for inspection as per your requests. No matter how you look at it, he is still Tom Brown—for that is his real name—and his ancestors came from Dublin, Ireland. Born in New York City on January 6, 1913, he is the son of Harry Brown, stage actor and producer, and Marie Francis, musical comedy star. At the age of 6 months he was presented to the general public in the arms of his mother before the footlights, and has been appearing off and on either on stage or screen ever since. The New York Professional Children's School is proud to number him among its alumni, and Brown University very nearly could have done the same, except that Tom decided to concentrate all his efforts on an acting career. He was a well known child actor in the days of silent films and was prominently cast in more than 50 stage plays both on Broadway and on the road, to say nothing of appearing on three different radio programs. In December, 1931, this popular juvenile arrived in Hollywood, desirous of concentrating entirely on screen work—and has been there ever since. To many, Tom typifies American youth. He is modest and unassuming about his success, likes to tinker with automobiles and play practical jokes, is an ardent devotee of all outdoor sports but is especially enthusiastic about swimming and hiking. He is 5 feet 9 inches tall, weighs 155 pounds, has blue eyes and medium brown hair. His next picture will be "Black Sheep" which he is making for the Fox Studios, Movietone City, Hollywood, Cal., where you may write him.

G. A. H., Waterville, Me.—The movies are working overtime on dual role pictures. Carl Brisson played both the part of the king and that of Carlo Rocco in "All the King's Horses." Maurice Chevalier played two parts in "Folies Bergere" and Edward G. Robinson in "The Whole Town's Talking." Go to the movies and see double! You may write Mr. Brisson at the Paramount Studios, Hollywood, Cal.

MARGARET THOMSON, Washington, D. C.; CATHERINE ARMSTRONG, Binghamton, N. Y.; BETTY HALL, Rahway, N. J.; MARION JUNE LEE, Tooele, Utah—Dawn Paris (O'Day), known better to you as Anne Shirley, was born in New York City on April 17, 1918. She began her career modeling for baby's clothes almost as soon as she could walk, and shortly before her third birthday was given an important role in the film, "The Miracle Child." So in 1922 her mother decided to brave Hollywood with her talented offspring. This step was never regretted insomuch as Anne secured parts in scores of pictures. All was not easy sailing, though, for there came a time when there were no suitable parts for a child of her age. But that time has passed and gone. Anne fairly skipped over the "awkward age" which spells finis to so many youthful careers, and came into her own as a "sweet young thing" in "Finishing School," "Anne of Greene Gables" and is to be seen next in "Chasing Yesterday" in which she will appear with Trent Durkin. She is under contract to RKO-Radio Studios, 780 Gower St., Los Angeles, Cal. Her favorite sports are Ping Pong and swimming and her hobbies crocheting and collecting dolls and china dogs. She has red hair and amber eyes, is 5 feet 2 inches tall and weighs 100 pounds. She is not married yet.

NOEL H. TILLETT, Essex, England—Eric Linden was born July 12, 1911, in New York City. I cannot find any record of his having been in a picture called "Damaged Lives." You may be interested to know that he is now working on a picture entitled "Let 'Em Have It," for United Artists.

VIRGINIA and ALICE WILLIAMS, Archbald, Pa.; BEATRICE TAFT; TESSIE HARVEY, Toledo, Ohio; BETTY JONES, Woonsocket, R. I.—Imagine the stately Kay Francis ever being called Katie! But she must have been because her name was originally Katharine Gibbs. She was born in Oklahoma City, on a Friday the 13th in the year 1899. Before she was four she had lived in Santa Barbara, Los Angeles, Denver and finally New York. And here's another incongruous thing. Imagine Kay doing the 100-yard dash in 12 seconds! But she did, and when she was in school. In fact she was very proficient in athletics and still enjoys a good round of tennis. Upon leaving college she entered a secretarial school and then traveled through Europe for eight months. Eventually she decided to take a fling at the stage and what's more was very successful and appeared in a number of New York hits. Then Hollywood, her first picture being "Gentlemen of the Press" with Walter Huston. She has been married three times, most recently to Kenneth MacKenna. Her hobby is sailing, she lives in a rented house and has two servants. She has black hair and blue-gray eyes, is 5 feet 6½ inches tall in her stocking feet and weighs 125 pounds. After "The Goose and the Gander" she will be in "Stranded."

ELIZABETH B. BROWN, Bronx, N. Y.; DOLLY, New Britain, Conn.; HELEN EVANS, Montclair, N. J.; MISS S. M. SPARKS—Gary Cooper was born in Helena, Montana on May 7, 1901. That is his real name. He is 6 feet 2¼ inches tall and weighs 175 pounds. He has light blue eyes and brown hair. As nearly as I can remember, he has only sung in one picture and that was "The Virginian." He is married to Sandra Shaw, his first and only wife to date. His next picture is rather indefinite as yet, but it may be "Peter Ibbetson." He is under contract to Paramount Studios, Hollywood, Cal.

PEGGY INGRAM, Norwalk, Conn.—It is a little indefinite whether Carl Brisson will make "Waikiki Wedding" or not. Mary Ellis is tentatively scheduled as his leading lady. Irene Dunne is a brunette with blue-gray eyes. Yes, Fredric March is playing the lead opposite Garbo in "Anna Karenina."

PATRICIA PARMENTER, Syracuse, N. Y.; JEAN GRUBBS, Houston, Tex.; HELEN MATTESON, St. Paul, Minn; MRS. L. V. WIMMER, Christiansburg, Va.; JUNE G., Albany, N. Y.; FRANCES REILLY, Mount Vernon, N. Y.; VERNA KIRBY and HILDA BUHL—Thanks so much for asking about Nelson Eddy. This department has been in a perfect twitch to tell all about him. So here goes. Providence, R. I., is his birthplace and 1901 the year of the great event. Both his father and mother, Mr. and Mrs. William Darius Eddy, were excellent singers and young Nelson began his vocal career as boy soprano in two Providence churches. His education, begun in grammar school at Rhode Island Normal, was completed in night school and correspondence courses. His first job was as a telephone operator in Mott Iron Works, after which he worked in the shipping department. Then he started on another job in the art department of a Philadelphia newspaper, after which he was a reporter for 5 years, copy reader, etc. He wrote advertising copy for two companies. Meanwhile he kept up his music, studying with different teachers and learning operatic arias from phonograph records, and made his first stage appearance in a society show, "The Marriage Tax," in 1922. Later he joined the Savoy Opera Company, then the Philadelphia Operatic Society and finally the Philadelphia Civic Opera. His New York debut was in 1924 as "Pagliacci." Eddy sings thirty-two operatic roles: He sings in English, French, Italian, Spanish, Russian and Yiddish. He has been to Europe three times—studied in Dresden and in Paris. He has made successful national concert tours for the last three years. He came to Los Angeles in 1933 and took the town by storm. A contract with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer resulted, and his first picture was "Dancing Lady" in which he had a minute part. His favorite sports are swimming, riding and tennis, and he collects pictures of people with striking heads. Mr. Eddy and Miss MacDonald will be teamed again in another M-G-M musical tentatively entitled "Americans Can Sing."

MISS J. A., Cincinnati, Ohio—Yes, Dick Powell played with an orchestra in Indianapolis. Sorry I don't have the name. He has brown hair and blue eyes. James Cagney's latest are "G Men" and "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Pat O'Brien's are "In Caliente," "Oil for the Lamps of China" and "Page Miss Glory" with Marion Davies. Frankie Darro was the jockey in "Broadway Bill." Shirley Temple's latest is "Our Little Girl" and the next will be "Curly Top." Clark Gable's next after "Call of the Wild" will be "China Seas," with Jean Harlow, Wallace Beery and (Continued on page 74)

THE MODERN HOSTESS

Claudette has a keen taste for good food, inherited from her sturdy French ancestors. The tasty salad below is just one of her culinary pets in store for you in this month's recipe leaflet.

By Marjorie Deen

IT happened one day—that I was having lunch with Claudette Colbert in New York. Claudette was radiant! Behind her was the triumph of the Academy Award for her splendid performance in the best picture of the year—"It Happened One Night." Ahead of her was a New York vacation with all that such a vacation means to a Hollywood star—theatres and shops to be visited, interviews to be given and affectionate admiration to be received on all sides. And for more immediate enjoyment there was before us the prospect of a truly delicious lunch in the Netherland Restaurant of the Sherry-Netherland Hotel. This towering structure, where Claudette was stopping during her metropolitan sojourn, stands on Fifth Avenue at the very entrance to Central Park, providing a lovely background as viewed from the large plate glass windows of the balcony on which our table was situated. From time to time, we glanced out at the passing cars and hurrying children, parkward bound. But the greater part of my attention was given to Claudette's sparkling conversation and to the delicious foods we were eating with great relish.

"It's my French ancestry, no doubt, which makes me appreciate good things to eat," Claudette was saying as dainty and unusual canapés were being passed with our cocktails. "Not elaborate foods," she hastened to assure us. "No, for I think it is an error (though a very common one) to think that French foods are always complicated to cook and ornate to behold. Certainly the French chef or maitre de cuisine as he prefers to be called, can create masterpieces with spun sugar and a pastry tube. But he may (and probably does) prefer to be known for the lightness of his omelette, for the smooth consistency of his Hollandaise and for the flavor of the sauces he uses with seafoods.

"Then, too, the true Frenchman brings to the table the kind of appreciation for fine foods which makes the cook's heart rejoice. Breakfast is 'of a simplicity'—to translate the phrase literally. Lunch consists generally of but one main dish, often some special egg combination, followed by a compote of fruit. But dinner—ah! That is an event—lovingly prepared and planned for in advance, whether the scene of its preparation is the hearth of the simplest Normandy cottage or the mammoth kitchens of some renowned Parisian restaurant. This meal is eaten with an air of elegance considered to be suitable for the occasion.

"MY MOTHER," continued Claudette, as the main luncheon course was being brought in, "my mother abides by these traditions. I can remember that as a child when we were poor, mother had to do the housework. During the day she went about her tasks in simple house dresses but when dinner time (Continued on page 76)

as I might make in most cases. It is possible that this enterprise is quite costly and is not profitable to your general patronage, but it was a division useful to us.—Cecil Hahn, Denver, Colorado. Honest Homage

I would like to say a few words in your column about two stars who appeal to me greatly for very special reasons — Jean Harlow and Franchot Tone.

So much has been written about Jean Harlow's beauty and her sex appeal, her so-called vulgarity and cheapness, that the very mention of these things will call forth arguments. But there is something for which Harlow "boosters" and "booers" alike must give this beauty credit. This is her loyalty to the fans who made her a star, and her sportsmanship, her ability to "take it" which she has been displaying in these last hard months. So to you, Jean Harlow, we pay homage and say, "You can take it, and we're for you, one and all."

To this second star, I should like to pay homage for another reason. To Franchot Tone, for his ability to make up his mind not to talk about himself and his private affairs and to stick to his decision, goes the very largest orchid from Winchell's hot house. There may be better actors and handsomer men, but never will there be a more sincere one or a better sport.

May the gods of the studios give these two stars the breaks they so deserve!—Ena Grassman, Riverside, Calif.

More of Maurice

In your February issue I noticed that, according to box office receipts, Maurice Chevalier is no longer numbered among the elect of screen favorites. Perhaps in some places this is true but I am glad to be able to state that in our city his pictures fill the theatres. It is the opinion of my friends and myself that the diminishing popularity of this exceptional star is due to the nature of the films in which he is cast, rather than to any failing on the part of the actor.

Chevalier certainly possesses rare charm, an abundance of marvelous personality, acting ability—which he has proven—and an excellent appearance, though not handsome. And, believe me, his age is an asset, nothing less. One gets completely disgusted with this infantile sophistication in daily contacts, without paying to see it on the screen.

Please, producers and directors, give this delightful star an opportunity of displaying his talents in better films. Take him out of the everlasting boudoir scenes and give him a real part that is not reeking with suggestiveness. We are not calling for the role of a saint—just that of a decent, real man!—Marie Callaghan, San Antonio, Texas.

Crosby-Ross Fans vs. Marie Rippel

I'm always ready to be "up in arms" for the defense of Bing Crosby, and Marie Rippel's letter in the April issue of MODERN SCREEN made me boil. The writer praised Dick Powell to the skies and dragged Bing and Lanny Ross away down below the dumps. While I agree with her in what she said about Dick, her comments on Lanny and Bing were very unjust. For me, Bing is the tops . . . —Estelle Myers, Camden, S. C. I don't care what Marie Rippel has to say about Lanny Ross, but when she has the nerve to compare Dick Powell with Our Bing, I've got to protest. I saw Dick Powell in one picture and once was enough. All I could think of was a monkey on a string. I'd rather hear a crow caw than hear him sing. But Bing is so breath-takingly handsome and his acting so real and convincing . . . all these great gifts combined with the most thrilling romantic voice in the world makes Bing what he is today, the very tops in the entertainment world . . . —Janice Bronson, Watervliet, N. Y. When Bing Crosby sings it just turns one's heart and soul aflutter. He has the swellest voice and manners of any male singer I've ever heard. As for Lanny Ross, I'd term him just as bad as Dick Powell, who bores me to death. His singing isn't even fit for the sea gulls to listen to. He has no expression or emotion . . .—Romaine Fox, Santa Barbara, Calif. "A couple of hundred thousand girls can't be wrong when they say that Bing, the most popular screen crooner, is "swell," "marvelous" . . . —Sue Albizati, Bayonne, N. J. Why compare Dick Powell with Lanny Ross? It's just like comparing a piece of Limburger cheese to a big, delicious Strawberry Short Cake . . . —Evelyn Sachs and Estelle Bob, Brooklyn, N. Y. Dick Powell, Bing Crosby and Lanny Ross are grand and I am for them one hundred per cent . . .—Betsy Seipel, Chicago Heights, Ill. Surely if Bing's voice is stale and his acting no good, why does he rank seventh among the big box-office stars? Dick Powell is somewhere around 16th . . .—Doris Wildermut, University City, Mo. I'm surprised at Marie's opinion of two of the nicest young men on the screen—Bing Crosby and Lanny Ross . . .—Lillian Ohr, New York, N. Y. I cannot think of anything that would improve Lanny Ross's voice or his acting . . .—L. Nicholls, Birmingham, Ala. Dick Powell should get the frog out of his throat and put some expression into his singing. Lanny Ross is one of the ugliest and most dissipated-looking actors on the screen. He looks as if he went out on a binge every night. His singing is like Powell's, only worse. But God be blessed for giving us Bing Crosby. He'll stay King of Crooners until he dies . . .—Loretta Thompson. (These are excerpts from just a few of the letters which indignant Bing Crosby and Lanny Ross fans have been hurling at Miss Rippel since her "attack" appeared in the April issue.)

FROM 'UNDER THE PAMPAS MOON'

BY JERRY HALLIDAY

He rides like the wind and loves like the whirlwind!

Carramba, but this is one grandioso picture! And as for Warner Baxter . . . ah, be still, fluttering heart. What a man! What a lover! He's even more tempestuous than as "The Cisco Kid". So prepare for fireworks when Baxter, a gallant gaucho with the swiftest horse, the smoothest line, the stunningest senoritas on the pampas, meets a gay m'amselle from the Boulevards of Paree! And to add to the excitement, there's a feud, a stirring horse race, a glamorous cabaret scene in romantic Buenos Aires.

If your blood tingles to the tinkle of guitars . . . if your heart thrills to the throbbing rhythms of the rhumba, to the passionate songs of the gauchos, to the sinuous tempo of the tango, then rush to see this picture — and take the "love interest" with you!

HOLLYWOOD NOTES

FLASH! The cinema capital is playing a new game called the "Triple S" Test . . . studio, star, story. Fans rate a picture on these three counts before they see it. Then they check their judgment after the performance. And it's amazing how high Fox Films rank! • But then, that's to be expected. For Fox Studios have the ace directors, the leading writers, the biggest headline names. • So take a tip from Hollywood . . . when you look for entertainment, look for the name

FOX

Joan Crawford

Behold the beautiful Crawford as you will see her in "No More Ladies." This picture is an adaptation of the great stage hit and gives both Joan and her popular side-kick, Bob Montgomery, another breezy, gayly sophisticated hit to follow "Forsaking All Others." Joan's stand-in, you'll be interested to know, is none other than her own sister-in-law. And brother Hal Le Sueur is an extra in another picture on the same lot. Quite a clan reunion!

Caste— on the Modern Beach by B.V.D.

Beauty reigns on the modern beach! And from every sea breeze, every swooping gull and every bronzed goddess you'll hear the credit line, "Thanks to the Swim Suits of B. V. D." ● Their lovely colors flash against sun-tanned arms and legs like jewels. They're as much a part of their owner's anatomy as her eyelashes. And from their evening gown backs to their fashioned bodices, they know every dressmaker art and artifice to streamline, to shape and to silhouette. ● From Nassau, from Bermuda, and from all the swimming South come tidings of their triumphs. Wherever you go this Summer you'll find the seas and sands decked and adorned by B.V.D. The B. V. D. Company, Inc., Empire State Building, New York. Also made and sold in Canada.

George Brent

Since George Brent has been known as Garbo's best beau, he hasn't been able to have a private thought! However, 'tis said Old Favorite John Gilbert is now muscling in on La Garbo's attentions. Kay Francis takes Brent's screen time with both "Goose and the Gander" and "Stranded" planned for them.

Phillip Reed

Pippo, the cat, and Skippy, the Scot, share this spotlight with their increasingly popular master, Phillip Reed. Phil is in "The Girl from 10th Avenue" with Bette Davis.

Janet Gaynor

Romantic rumors are whizzing around Janet's pretty head but she keeps discreetly quiet. 'Tis said her real heart is a doctor. Meanwhile "The Farmer Takes a Wife" keeps her busy.

Star Stuff

Rosalind Russell and Robert Taylor—write their names down now on your future star list because you are going to hear from them both. Although both Rosalind and Bob have had only small parts in several M-G-M hits, they have registered that certain something that it takes to click; they're already personalities to their audiences. Rosalind, dark, slim and aristocratic, was very good in "Reckless" and she'll feature next in "China Seas." Bob Taylor steps out in front after "Times Square Lady" and you'll think he's swell in "Broadway Melody of 1935." Watch them climb the cinema ladder!

Comeback Bets

Two grand troupers you have been hoping to see again are Bruce Cabot and Dixie Lee. Both are on their way back to stardom. Bruce became discouraged with the uninteresting parts doled out to him so he took a prolonged vacation in Europe until holidaying palled. Then he made "Let 'Em Have It!" and his career picked up. M-G-M has him slated for a bright future. Dixie, of course, had to get the Crosby twins and Gary Leon well set on a robust schedule before she could think about anything but a mother role. Now she's leading the "Redheads on Parade," a Fox production.

Mae West

"How'm I doin', boys, without the bustles?" asks Mae, switching an odd Paradise feather or two on one of the modern creations she wears in "Goin' to Town." The West contours will be even more come-hither in modern dress—not to mention the inimitable Westian repartee which is streamlined!

EUGÈNE SACHETS
The Heart of a Eugène Wave

"Hope my permanent comes out all right . . ."

"Wish I could be sure my hair wouldn't get frizzy . . ."

"If my hair only came out like the pictures . . ."

If these are the thoughts running through your head before you get a wave, it's good to know that you can help yourself. There's a definite guide for soft, lovely, lustrous waves and curls. See that Eugene Sachets are wrapped on your hair when you sit for a permanent. You can trust your hairdresser to set the wave becomingly . . . but see for yourself what actually goes on your hair to wave it.

Each Sachet contains the exact amount of pure waving lotion needed to turn out one perfect wave or ringlet. Each is filled by Eugene as carefully as a chemist fills a prescription. No guesswork, as in the home-made wrappers that often go with a "bargain wave." No harsh ingredients to eat the life out of your hair. No hazard!

So, if you would heap pretty curls on your head, look for Eugene trade-marked Sachets! Trust to their proved safety . . . not to luck!

One Eugene Sachet Sent You Free. Examine this sachet. Acquaint yourself with the trade-mark by which it can always be identified. Take it with you to your hairdresser's. We will also send you a copy of "Here's How!" a booklet of new hair styles, with instructions about keeping your Eugene wave in condition. Mail a postal to Eugene, Ltd., 521 Fifth Avenue, New York.

Stars WHO BROKE THEIR WORD

Proving that they change their minds like other mortals

By DeWitt Campbell

MIND you—I don't always blame them, but why does it always happen to me? Not once in my arduous career of bumping my head against stars have I attempted to wheedle or extract information from an actor or actress who preferred to remain silent.

Never once if, during an interview, these luminaries prefaced a statement with: "Now, please don't quote me—but . . ." did I divulge the confidence in print. And some of those parenthetical remarks would have made Walter Winchell wake up and scream, "Gimme, gimme!"

In spite of or perhaps because of my professional politeness and sympathy, I am forever running into true confessions or wonderful yarns which your favorite stars confidentially tell me although they are fully aware that I come to see them solely to get a story, and not exactly to pass the time of day.

After pouring out their hearts and a cup of tea, they permit me to depart, grateful for their frankness and good sense, and anticipating how much you, dear reader, will enjoy reading it all.

Yet, it seems no sooner has the front door shut behind me, than said star, or said star's press agent, or adviser, or studio, or mother-in-law, or best girl friend, decides that said star must have been out of his (or her) mind to have divulged what he (or she) did. Although what was said probably was no more harmful to anyone than a screen murder.

WHEREUPON THE campaign begins—to persuade me not to print the story—or to put me on the spot if I do. Sometimes the story goes to press before it is suggested that it never should have been—which makes the situation even more tense. Sometimes . . . But suppose you decide for yourself whether or not to pity a poor, struggling fan writer!

A certain famous star and her husband were about to spend a belated honeymoon in Europe. They were looking forward to the holiday with the excitement of

Can you recognize the beautiful, exotic Marlene Dietrich as one of the stars who went back on her word in this very intriguing tale?

Charles Butterworth doesn't look as if he would break his promise to anyone, does he? But he did, and you can try to identify him!

Three more who said things they didn't want printed! Top to bottom: Clara Bow, Clark Gable and Margaret Sullavan. It takes some good sleuthing to pin the related incidents to the personalities. Try it.

a pair of kids. It was to be their first jaunt abroad.

At the jolly farewell party on shipboard I jokingly suggested to the tune of clinking ice that she keep a diary of her travel impressions and that I edit them and have them published. Laughingly, she agreed.

After three months the newlyweds returned. Tea-ing with the star, at a smart New York hotel one afternoon, I playfully demanded my spoils—the diary. Well, she admitted, she hadn't exactly kept a diary—but she had the most complete mental notes. The trip was so vivid in her mind that she could reproduce every incident chronologically and visualize every picturesque scene.

And she proceeded to do so—talking steadily for three hours on the highlights of her stay in France, England and St. Moritz. I took notes as she chattered brightly on for she had her own inimitable way of stating things, plus a refreshing sense of humor.

"You know," I said, "I am going to print this as your diary, and I want your permission to write it in the first person—actually as if you, yourself, had written it instead of telling me."

"If my permission is all you want, here it is, honey," and she wrote her name across a blank sheet of white paper and handed it to me.

"Look out," I said, "that's dangerous, you may be signing your life away."

"I trust you," was her answer.

"But," I cautioned, "you'll certainly want to read what your proxy has written before it's published."

"Oh, that won't be necessary," she answered. "Don't bother about sending it all the way to Hollywood. Just write what I've told you, and everything will be hunky-dory."

"WHAT NAIVE trust!" thought I, amazed, but nevertheless, touched by her faith in me. I determined to edit the story carefully, even to eliminating certain expressions which might not exactly redound to the lady's credit. She had a reputation for startling frankness which she never failed to live up to.

So I wrote the story, using her exact words except when it was necessary to trim, edit, delete, or dress up a remark. Her singular manner of expressing herself was all there, and I patted myself on the back for adhering so faithfully to the original and adding nothing of my own.

The story was duly published, and brought shrieks of delight from the lady's thousands of ardent fans.

Came the dawn—and a telephone call from a frantic editor. The world was coming to an end—war would be declared—what should he do? "About what?" I asked innocently.

"About that diary!" he groaned. "Oh, why did we ever print it?"

"I don't know," said I trying to be helpful, but still in the dark, "Why did we?"

"She now insists," the editor moaned, paying no attention to my query, "That she has been grossly misquoted. Not in her wildest moments would she have said, that the ladies in that certain country dressed without taste, that the climate was unbearable, that the houses were unheated, that she preferred living in America!"

Garbo, Cobb's nemesis!

Garbo fans send gifts!

"GARBO IS DRIVING ME NUTS"

HER FORMER schoolmates have eulogized the girl they had forgotten till she became famous. Fellow-actors have discussed her artistry. Doormen have praised her technique in slipping through doors. Photographers have written treatises on Garbo's back. Sound men have penned odes to her vast silences.

In fact, Garbo has been so analyzed, psychoanalyzed, psychiatrized in public print that she couldn't be interviewed without making someone out a liar.

Only one angle hasn't been covered. And I might do that. Not that I've seen Garbo. I've found it just as difficult to get a glimpse of the elusive beauty as Louis B. Mayer, head of her studio, who, so they say, has managed to get her in his office only once.

Neither was I lucky enough to have a reservation at the Trocadero on that famous night when Garbo made her first public appearance. You see, the Trocadero serves straws in its mint juleps, and Yankees putting straws in mint juleps is what started the Civil War.

In fact, Hollywood just doesn't have the knack of conjuring up a good mint julep. To be good, mint leaves must be grown on the grave of a Confederate brigadier. And it seems as if so many Iowans moved to California they didn't leave any room for retired Confederate brigadiers.

But speaking of Iowans brings me back to Garbo. In my life they are synonymous. It may seem a long way from Stockholm to Oscaloosa, but the road to each crosses my back yard.

And my back yard, not to mention my front yard, is why I am one of the greatest authorities on Garbo-ana.

Believe it or not, I am the head of the family who live in Garbo's house. And I have slept in Garbo's bed—alone.

INCIDENTALLY, it was some bed. It would have to be to hold a man of my girth and poundage. It was a huge, mahogany four-poster bed with a very hard mattress, but, of course, I like a hard mattress. Women usually don't. But being ascetic and Nordic, Garbo apparently didn't go in for the feathered luxuries of a temperate clime.

Sleeping in Garbo's bed did something to me—that and gazing out of her old bedroom over the arroyo, forming Santa Monica canyon, to the green hills in the distance. When the bed went the way of all antiques—and, anyhow, it didn't belong to us—I thought Garbo had gone out of my life forever. But fate didn't ordain it that way. Her life crossed mine again just this morning. As I was rummaging through some drawers, I dug out another rare treasure.

It's simply priceless. I'm going to will it to the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences to preserve as an eternal souvenir of the Great Garbo. No, perhaps that would be wrong; it would be unfair to my grandchildren. I may decide to leave it to them so they can bring it out on state occasions—this thing with fancy trimmings of lace and doo-dads, and tell their breathless friends how their venerable granddad's aches and pains were soothed and alleviated by Greta Garbo's hot water bottle.

Jeanette MacDonald spiritedly debunks all the so-called

JEANETTE MacDONALD'S rare beauty isn't her only refreshing quality. This lovely girl, with the golden voice and the figure Herr Lubitsch loved to undress (in every picture) and the exquisite hair, also has unusual intelligence, a keen wit, a swell sense of humor and an ability for biting and withering sarcasm. Knowing all this, it was with anticipatory pleasure that your correspondent hied away to Beverly Hills and the MacDonald homestead, to discuss with this particular soprano all the sacrifices—from love to food—which, according to the best tradition, must be made by all singers who attain importance.

The servant, who admitted me, led me to the drawing room to behold the rare picture of a prima donna who can be looked upon, as well as heard, with pleasure. She was standing there, framed in the doorway, a gorgeous picture in black and burnished gold; the black of a tea-gown, the burnished gold of what old-fashioned folks used to call a crown of glory. There was that eternal twinkling in her eyes, too—orbits sometimes gray, sometimes green, but always bright and merry. She led the way to a yellow settee of doubtful value as an antique, and after the preliminary skirmish I asked my leading question.

"What sacrifices have you had to make in order to cultivate your lovely voice and also to become a famous star?"

"SACRIFICES?" she questioned, puckering her pretty lips. "Baloney! The sacrifices singers are supposed to make are virtually 100 per cent hooey! It's mostly a lot of bunk formulated by singers who sought to legitimatize as 'sacrifices' all the things they did not like and did not want to do. And such alleged 'sacrifices' became tradition. I understand this perfectly, for I too have aided and abetted in the perpetuation of some of the old traditions, and in originating new ones. I'll tell you how and why.

"When I first came to Hollywood, a greenhorn, I was taken advantage of, no end. On one occasion, at Paramount, I was worked eighteen consecutive hours and, while I was a willing worker, I might have done irreparable damage to my voice. So, realizing I was being abused, I announced I would never again work more than ten hours in one day. What happened? I regularly got a call to report for work at 9 A.M. and for days and days I leaped out of bed at 7 A.M. and began getting the old pipes in tune for 9 A.M. Usually, by 8:30 o'clock, the voice was hitting on all six and I arrived at the studio, pepped up, 'in voice' and a-rarin' to go to work. And, day after day, I stood around for one, two, three or more hours before the pipes were called upon to start piping, and by the time I got the 'go' signal I was so weary of waiting, so tired physically, eccentricities good singers seem to delight in that I couldn't do my stuff as it is supposed to be done. I was, of course, upset, and believe me there is no bunk about it when I say that a singer can't sing when she is emotionally upset. The old cords tighten up and the muscles in the throat refuse to relax.

"THAT WAS an experience which led me to formulate some new bunk. Miss MacDonald made an iron-clad rule: she could not sing before noon, regardless! She not only could not sing before noon, but she would not. She made another rule: When Miss MacDonald was tired, whether it be 1 P.M. or 5 A.M., Miss MacDonald would take her voice home! Now, all this is hooey. I can get out of bed at any hour of the day or night and, after giving my voice a brief warming up, I can sing. As well at 3 A.M., if not tired, of course, as at 3 P.M. But, after my early experiences on sound stages, I decided not to loaf around sets and get upset, and, besides, I simply adore that before-noon sleep! So, you can see by my own admission, the truth of my statement that the 'sacrifice' stuff is mostly hokum. But we're only scratching the surface. Let's get serious and dig considerably deeper."

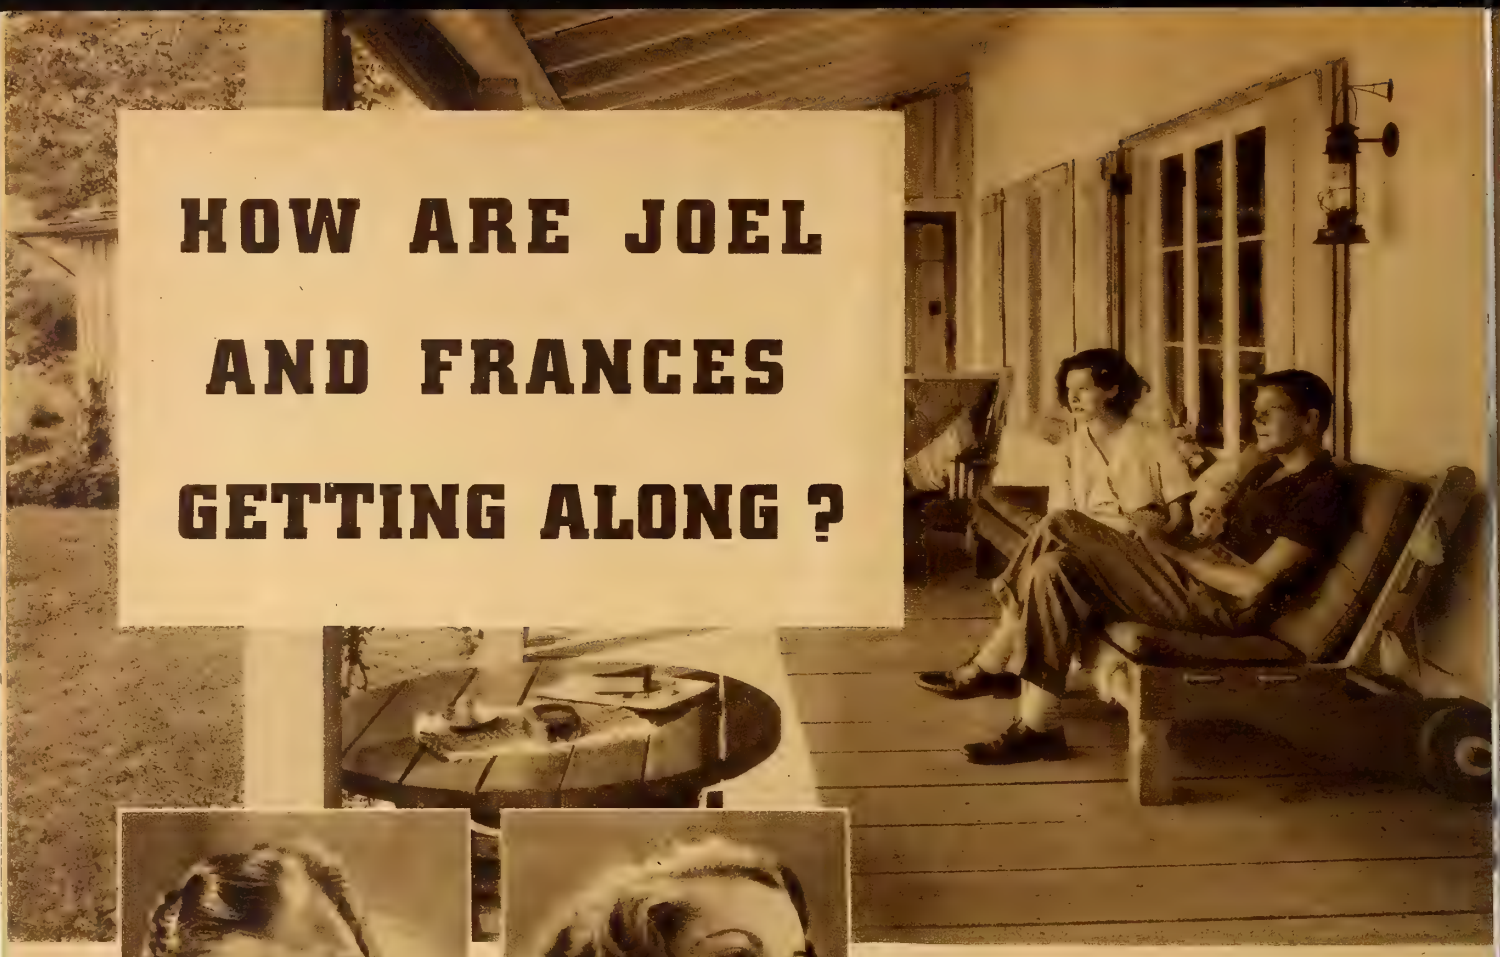
"Much of the hooey about the sacrifices of singers can be traced back to childhood training. I was the only one of the three daughters of Daniel MacDonald who showed any promise of developing into a singer, and because of this fact my dad watched my every movement, and viewed with alarm my every cough and sneeze. If I blew my nose, he was at my side, inquiring if I was catching cold. Elsie and Blossom, my sisters, were much more susceptible to colds than me, but he never paid any attention to their sneezes. I was the singer! What happened? Because of the power of suggestion, plus the fact that I was very conscious of this added attention, I became the recipient for any cold that was on the loose in Philadelphia.



"So it was that my 'sacrifices' to my voice began very, very early. I was guarded against draughts, warned against wet feet, and went around day and night with my throat wrapped up. I was constantly having atomizers and all manner of patented what-nots shoved into my throat and nostrils, and was forever sputtering and gargling. All of which was a lot of bunk I had to outgrow. I suspected as much quite early in my career and immediately set out to harden myself against the elements. Soon I was defying the elements instead of guarding against them, and it worked.

"Today I have nothing in common with the tenors, sopranos and baritones who talk about being slaves to their vocal cords and who stroll about with their throats muffled up and their pockets full of lozenges and gargles. I do not go in for gargles, special foods, special exercises and deep breathing, and as for mufflers—bah! I'm a firm believer in the open-throated, open-chested school of thought. And I'm not the slave of my vocal cords. True, I take precautions against abusing them; a piano player doesn't fool around with doors and windows to see if these will pinch his fingers. I will not sing after having spent most of the night dancing. I won't sing when I'm tired or sleepy. (Continued on page 103)

HOW ARE JOEL AND FRANCES GETTING ALONG?

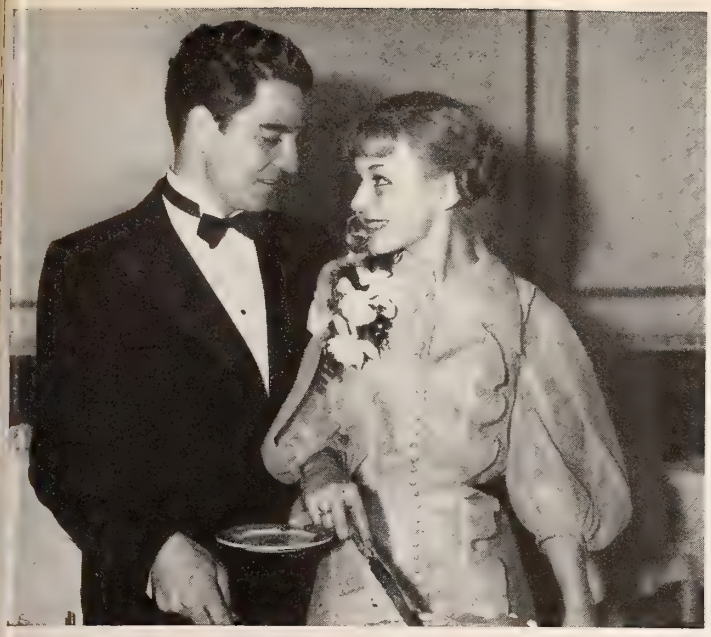
The ideal Hollywood couple has a happiness formula

By Franc Dillon

"IF Joel can't do it, it can't be done," said Frances Dee with a finality that gave no doubt as to her opinion of her husband Joel McCrea's ability to do anything. The particular task that elicited this remark was milking the family cow. It seems that Joel, the big, outdoor man, who can ride a horse, rope a steer and brand a calf with the best of them, had never before attempted to milk a cow. But, for the benefit of his press agent and a cameraman, he tried. First, to the astonishment of those who knew better, he placed the stool on the wrong side of the cow. That slight but bewildering (to the cow) mistake having been remedied, Joel started milking. To the amazement of Mr. and Mrs. McCrea nothing happened.

"How do you work this?" he asked and, having received further instructions, made another attempt without success, which brought forth the declaration of confidence from his pretty wife.



Such sublime faith in his ability to perform even so specialized a task as milking a cow is an indication of Frances Dee's feelings toward her handsome husband and he reciprocates to the fullest extent. These young people, after being married for a year and a half, are repeatedly referred to as Hollywood's ideal couple.

They don't wish to be held up as shining examples, having, no doubt, a superstition that talking too much about it might mar their present contentment, and insist they simply want to be themselves. But the fact that during this eighteen-month period they have had a baby and have made rapid and surprising strides in their screen careers would seem to justify reasonable satisfaction with themselves and their method of mixing movies and marriage.

Each gives the other credit for this happy state of affairs and, with no definite plan in mind for the coördination of their various interests, they have apparently worked out a successful solution.

"Joel has done everything for my career," Frances said simply.

Which seemed strange to me, inasmuch as she had more than once told me that when she was married she would give up her career immediately and make marriage her business. Instead, she kept right on working and even the interruption of having a baby has not interfered with her progress. With her appearance in "Becky Sharp," the first all-color feature ever made, Frances will burst upon the public as an actress of unexpected ability and breathtaking beauty. The Westmore boys—kings of the marcel and permanent—went very social recently and threw a big party on the opening night of their brand new beauty emporium. Everybody and Everybody's Wife—though occasionally in oddly assorted pairs—turned up to make merry. Kay Francis, looking very sleek, officially opened the famous wig-makers' new shop with a big gold key and Claudette Colbert, handsome in a brown and tan striped creation, vied with Kay for sartorial honors. Henry Wilcoxon sported a bob not executed by the Westmores. It was a snappy little shoulder-length coiffeur, which he is wearing in "The Crusades."

Speaking of hair—which is what one invariably speaks of in connection with the Westmores—Charles Laughton wandered around with a close clipped pate—souvenir of "Les Miserables." Anita Louise turned up with Tom Brown (yep, it's on again), Sally Blane with Norman Foster—and they do say he cares—Ann Dvorak and Leslie Fenton, Margaret Lindsay and Dick Powell, Marlene Dietrich, Anna Sten and a host of others. There was champagne and music and many more beeootiful flowers than you'd meet up with at a gangster's funeral, and—an enjoyable time was had by all.

Johnny Barrymore has cut loose and flown the coop—leaving family, home and studio in the lurch. His first move was ordering his wife, Dolores Costello, to vacate the home which they've shared for many a year—plus bag, baggage and children. The next was to thumb his Grecian nose at his studio where he was scheduled to do an important picture, and his final move was a fast one via plane to New York. The only one who's being honored by Mr. Barrymore's profile in the big city is his former wife, Michael Strange. Mary picked up and packed off for a personal appearance tour through the country and—well, y'know what absence does to the hardest hearts! Dick moped and bit his finger-nails in solitary confinement, while Mary gave nary a tumble to the collitch lads who swarmed about her. So what?

Here's a tip on fashion, girls! Dolores Del Rio, reputable best-dresser, has seven suits in her wardrobe, all of them strictly tailored in varying designs and fabrics. She admits also to what she terms an insane array of new chapeaux. From the looks of the top piece we spied her under at the Victor Hugo recently, she's quite right. Hollywood's snubbing Merle Oberon didn't faze her a bit

LA OBERON hustled into her hotel living-room, swishing a Hattie Carnegie hostess gown as if it were a toweling wrapper. She looked elegant, smooth and very sophisticated in the Continental manner—just as you would expect her to—but she had the sniffles!

It seems it was this way. She had been dancing and dining at the Central Park Casino the night before, and just before departing for home, the idea occurred to her that it would be fun to walk through the park in the snow. Mr. Joseph Schenck, her escort and former fiancé, protested vehemently but gave in and loaned his galoshes. Mink-coated, with the Schenck galoshes providing a tent-like protection for her thin evening sandals, Oberon did the Park with glee. Result, Miss Merle Oberon unmistakably was blowing her nose as signal for our talk to get under way!

She looks so exotic on the screen that I was expecting to have a very bad hour with an orchidacious, slightly la-de-da beauty whose British accent would have to be cut with a knife. I certainly was pleasantly disillusioned in the first five minutes of play. She looks like she does on the screen, only less the pampered beauty—much more natural and decidedly more human. There's a twinkle in the Oberon hazel eyes that puts you on your guard; you have an uneasy feeling that you may be taken for a slight ride. Especially if you pry too personally into her own private thoughts.

WE STARTED out with the good old chestnut about how-did-you-get-to-be-a-star? Oberon's succinct reply was, "I needed money and it was the only way I could think of to get it quickly!"

What! No burning desire from childhood to be a second Bernhardt—no vision to whisper to her? It couldn't be. I couldn't imagine finding a successful film star who had worked because she needed money, not because she burned with the divine fire. But it seems that was what she meant and, furthermore, she was none too sure that acting was a God-given talent, by any means.

You see, Merle Oberon, a few years ago, was Estelle Merle O'Brien-Thompson, who, being given a trip to England from India by a kind uncle, decided that India was pretty provincial and (Continued on page 102)

"I HAVE SAID Good-bye TO YOUTH"

By Gladys Hall

"I HAVE said good-bye to youth," Dick said to me. And those astounding words fell upon my ears with a reverberation of incredible thunder. I thought, I must be dreaming! For never before in a long experience of interviewing actors, of hearing astonishing statements and confessions have I ever heard an actor admit that youth is gone.

They may confess that their hearts are broken, that they have murdered their wives, that they are financially ruined, anything . . . everything . . . but never, never that they are not Ponce de Leons who have discovered the secret of perpetual youth.

And so as Dick made this sensational and unprecedented statement, I thought, Here is a man who would face a firing squad with a smile and a flip of the hand!

Dick was saying, "I am no longer young and I know it. I have stood at the crossroads. I've looked behind me and I've seen, down that long bright road the figures of 'Tol'able David,' of the boys who were in 'Broken Blossoms' and 'Way Down East' and others, retreating into the past. I've waved good-bye to 'Tol'able David.' I know that he is gone forever. . . ."

And Dick smiled the famous Barthelmess smile and there were admiring ladies of all ages gazing at him with warm appreciative eyes as we sat at lunch in the Victor Hugo café. And I thought of the time when D. W. Griffith said of him, "He has the most beautiful male face in the world." Just then three girls came over to our table and asked for his autograph . . . and I knew that neither they nor I could see any appreciable difference in the face that has been framed by a star for more than sixteen years.

DICK WAS saying, as I mentioned this fact to him, "But it isn't only a question of looks, you know. You say the real good-bye to youth when you stand at the crossroads and realize that you are faced with a decision. I have stood at those crossroads and I have made my decision. . . ." Dick laughed and added, "From this time forth I shall hope to (Continued on page 80)

MODERN SCREEN offers $2,500.00 in prizes for the best 100 letters submitted during the months of June, July, August and September, 1935. This great contest gives everyone an opportunity to claim one of these magnificent prizes and also a chance to express an opinion on the greatest moment in the book of the century, "The Forty Days of Musa Dagh," which is being made into a tremendous picture of adventure and romance by the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Company.

If your letter is selected as one of the 100 prize winners, you are assured of at least $5.00 or possibly $1,000.00. Isn't this a simple way for you to earn some extra money? Think what you could do with one thousand dollars!

Surely you have a definite opinion on this subject and as you will see this is a simple contest to enter, there being nothing to do except write your letter of no more than 150 words. You may select any situation pictured alongside or, if you prefer, you may write about some other "great moment" from the story. Sit down now and send your letter while this contest is fresh in your mind. Many men and women just like yourself are entering this contest daily and everyone has an equal chance to win. You may win top prize.

Don't waste a minute! Turn to page 113 for the contest rules.

PRIZE CONTEST

Here's all you have to do Write a short letter answering this question: "What do you consider the greatest moment of this story?" Selection of one of the scenes pictured alongside will qualify. Whatever your selection, give your reasons why.

About the Book

Written by Franz Werfel, "The Forty Days of Musa Dagh" is the fastest selling book of the year and is creating tremendous interest all over the world. If you should desire to read this great adventure story you will find it on sale at all leading book stores. It is a moving, historical record of 5,000 Armenian men and women who heroically dared for forty days to withstand the oppressive might of the entire Turkish Empire.

For his hero the author took Gabriel Bagradian, Armenian by birth, Parisian by education and inclination, who, as the story opens, returns to his native land and, with annihilation threatening his race, leads these 5,000 peaceful villagers up the slopes of Musa Dagh (The Mountain of Moses) prepared to resist until death the Turks who were bent on carrying out the fatal decree of their war lord, Enver Pasha.

Simply, clearly, Werfel tells how the courageous little band dug themselves in, organized for battle, arranged a strange communal life, and, from a rock jutting out over the sea, flung a banner: "Christians in Need."

In prose which keeps pace with the excitement of the story, there is described the mounting suspense of those forty days of constant struggle against the repeated thrusts of the Turks, against starvation and internal strife. (Cont. on page 113)

10 The Turks attack and are driven back in a fierce battle in which many lives are lost.

9 Turkish forces lead a little group of Armenian peasants into unwilling exile.

8 Gabriel and a peasant girl fall in love, think they'll be killed, agree to die together.

★★★ G-Men
(Warners)

They would have had a superb picture here if someone had just used a little restraint. As it is, "G-Men" is a long, long way from poor. It's the story of the Department of Justice boys who always get their man—even better than the Northwest Mounted of affectionate legend. James Cagney is excellent as the ex-East Side boy who puts his training in the law at the service of the government and comes through one hundred percent. Robert Armstrong is likeable in another of his hard-boiled roles. The girls—Ann Dvorak and Margaret Lindsay—don't have a great deal to do, but they do what they must satisfactorily. Our only complaint, to get captious again, was with the lack of restraint. There were just too many gangsters to be bumped off, too much noise of gunfire, too many cars tearing around curves at a high speed. Perhaps we're getting old, but we would like a little peace and quiet.

★★★★ Doubting Thomas
(Fox)

The only thing doubtful about this picture is the title, for it beats all the Will Rogers side-splitters—no mean record, you'll admit. Will makes the best of this opportunity to air a few more choice bits of dry philosophy on life, love and politics in general, but the guffaws are furnished by two capable ladies in the cast—Billie Burke and Alison Skipworth. Miss Burke is the devoted wife and home-maker for Will, a successful sausage magnate. Miss Skipworth is the self-appointed leader of the village intelligentsia and is out to get Culture at any cost. Being a lover of "the drahma," she persuades Billie Burke that she is a second Bernhardt and owes more to the beauty-loving world than to her sausage-loving husband.

Will may be temporarily downed but never out, so his cure for his wife is drastic but effective—with almost fatal results to the audience! As if these three expert comedians were not hilarious enough, there is Sterling Holloway and an excellent supporting cast for good measure. Put this on your list of "hafta sees."

Victor Hugo's plea for the unfortunates of the world has been transferred to the screen with great skill, sincerity and —almost—with genius. It isn't a pretty tale, of course, and whether you will like it or not, we can't tell. "Like" is hardly the word, anyway. It is almost unrelieved tragedy from start to finish. You should be greatly stirred by it. You will experience indignation and sorrow and, perhaps, horror. But we think that you will call it great.

Fredric March does the most sincere work we have ever seen him do as Jean Valjean. He has severe histrionic competition—as who has not?—from Charles Laughton. This amazing actor plays the role of Javert, the fanatic, law-driven prefect of police, who pursues Valjean throughout his life and then, when Valjean is at last within his grasp, lets him go free. In lesser roles, Rochelle Hudson, Florence Eldridge March, Frances Drake, John Beal and the splendid English actor, Sir Cedric Hardwicke, are all expert.

Franchot Tone, Jean Harlow and Bill Powell in "Reckless," based on a sensational news story that you'll know.

"Golddiggers of 1935" brings another cut-to-order part for Dick Powell. Gloria Stuart is the heart interest.

"Doubting Thomas" makes a swell title for Will Rogers. Billie Burke shares starring honors with great charm.

this month's movie spice . . . By Regina Cannon

★★★ Reckless
(M-G-M)

The title of this might apply, not only to the Kern-Hammerstein tune written for the picture and to La Harlow's daredevil character in the story, but also to the lavish manner in which money has been spent by the studio. The cast includes Harlow, Bill Powell, Franchot Tone and May Robson. In lesser, but still significant roles, we have Rosalind Russell, Ted Healy and Nat Pendleton. The plot is part musical, part the Libby Holman case, with touches of "It Happened One Night"; "The Thin Man" and "Broadway Bill." All this leaves the reviewer in a pretty delicate predicament. One can't exactly say that the picture is good. And—shucks—one can't say that it's bad either. We ended up thinking that it's pretty good hokum, gave it three stars because of the good that's in it and decided to forget the weak points.

Harlow's acting has improved a little. Her singing and dancing are well enough, but they won't make Ginger Rogers lose any sleep. Powell is somewhat miscast and Tone has such a weak-sister role one feels sorry for him. Rosalind Russell was grand in a smallish part. Watch this girl—she's going places. And see the picture—it's good fun, anyway.

★★★★★ The Scoundrel
(Hecht-MacArthur-Paramount)

Hecht and MacArthur, producers of "Crime Without Passion," have done it again. Done what? Well, they have shown Hollywood how to make a picture. Without spending untold millions, with not a single "big movie name" with which to bless themselves, and without once using the word colossal.

Everyone knows the name of Noel Coward but not everyone has seen him in action. He is the star of this picture and a new personality to reckon with in the cinema world. He plays the role of a philandering unmoral (not to be confused with immoral) publisher of books. He had, we happen to know, quite a bit to do with the writing of the dialogue. The lines make you yearn for a notebook and expert knowledge of shorthand—or a good memory.

Julie Haydon, who had some small experience in Hollywood, does a fine job as the innocent young actress who loves, then hates and at last forgives the devastating Mr. Coward. Alexander Woollcott has a few brief moments for his bland witticisms. The story slides off into the realms of fantasy in the second half—but, even though you may not credit it all, we don't think you'll mind.

(Warner Bros.)

This "glittering galaxy of stars" is just another roll call by the Warner boys. Not that we're objecting to the antics of Dick Powell, Gloria Stuart, Glenda Farrell, Frank McHugh, Hugh Herbert or any of 'em singly; but collectively it's too much of a good thing—and the same thing. Busby Berkely is among those present, of course, and proves that he can make anything on legs dance, by a super-spectacle of grand pianos tripping the light fantastic. (Continued on page 70)

LIFE has just been one bombastic explosion after another for Henry Armetta. Little troubles and big troubles have poured down on his good-natured head . . . which, at those moments, he always thwacks loudly with the flat of his hand. Then he garbles some unintelligible Italian and shuffles off, one shoulder high to the windward. And we—we always roar at his "screen" troubles. We can also laugh at his real troubles now—as Henry himself does—for most of them are a long way off. And today Henry has arrived—arrived at a nice salary of $500 a week, and a comfortable, sure position in the Hollywood ranks. Last year, Henry ranked fourth among the 9,000 thespians in the number of pictures and number of days acting before the cameras.

But 33 years ago, when Henry was fourteen years old, he arrived in this country from Palermo, Italy, as a stowaway. The immigration authorities were going to deny him admittance when an Italian barber, who had had a similar experience when he was a boy, offered to give Henry a home and employment. Henry worked for the barber for several years. Then he graduated to the Lamb's Club in New York, where he became a pants-presser. It was during his second year there that Raymond Hitchcock became attracted by his jovial disposition, and offered him a small part in his production of "Yankee Consul"—thus Henry became an actor. Which meant that his troubles were only just beginning. Those were long, lean, pinch-penny years. If Henry got fifty cents a day for his performances, he considered himself lucky. Some years later he came West to go into pictures. But he was still undiscovered. It wasn't until Henry himself discovered that a few of his natural mannerisms were funny on the screen. He found that people began to laugh every time they saw him. That business of slapping himself on the head, for example. He had done it often in his everyday life but it had never occurred to him to just act natural on the screen, until a doctor called it to his attention. It was this way:

The Armettas were expecting a baby. Their second. They already had one boy, Louis.

"We were broke again, disa time, too," Henry told me. "We wanna da baby, but we don' know how we gonna feed it, unless maybe I get da job. I wait for da doctor to tell me da news. He come out, and he smile, so I know everything is okay. (Continued on page 111)

She'd Rather Work than Eat . . !

By Charles Darnton

ALL work and no play makes a bright star. Anyway, that's what it threatens to do in this astonishing case.

Do you realize, I wonder, what it means for a humble girl of sixteen to soar to the Hollywood heights in less than two years? Well, it doesn't mean the fitful blaze of glory nor the golden rainbow of reward, but just plain downright hard work.

To be sure, work is nothing new to Jean Parker, who began earning her living before she was seven. What she has done, then, in so remarkably short a time has been wrought out of the toiling pattern of her brief yet eventful life.

Accordingly, I wanted to know about the workaday side of her skyrocketing movie career. And as luck would have it, my appallingly industrious Westwood neighbor was, for once, at home instead of at work.

"Hi!"

An arm shot up, an arm as straight as the arrow-like body itself. There she was, down the road, a slender, vibrant figure in slate-blue slacks and tan sweater, her gypsy hair waving like a plume in the breeze.

"Come on!" she gaily cried. "I've got the whole afternoon off. Let's go some place and have some fun!"

We whirled away to a tree-shaded inn on the far side of green Brentwood. There, I learned, among other things, that little Jean Parker had—

Worked four months without a day off—

Worked sometimes twenty-four hours at a stretch—

Worked until she was so tired she couldn't sleep—

Worked all day, then at night getting supper for a family of four—

Worked until she lost ten pounds—

Worked with dangerous wild animals—

Worked in the face of still more dangerous temptations.

Not a bad record for a good girl, you must agree. But I was amazed even more when I asked what had been the hardest work of all and she said:

"Studying Shakespeare on a P. E. car."

Though I knew "P. E." meant Pacific Electric, I couldn't for the life of me understand what Shakespeare had to do with it.

"That was the first thing I had to do," she explained, "and, as I was going to school at the time, I did it while riding from Pasadena to Culver City. The dramatic coach at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer wanted me to learn the potion scene in 'Romeo and Juliet,' then do it for him to see if I was any good."

"You have to be good to do that scene," I remarked.

"You're telling me!" she laughed. "I'd read the play, but I simply had no idea what Juliet meant by saying, 'And shrieks like mandrakes torn out of the earth.' I wasn't even sure what a mandrake was—what is it anyhow?"

"It's a kind of wild fruit that isn't very good to eat," I informed her out of my vast intelligence.

"Well," she considered, "I figured it must be wild if it shrieked, but how in the world a mandrake could possibly scream had me guessing. I was puzzling over it in that P. E. car when a man next to me got up and left his newspaper on the seat. A fat lady sat down there, then the man came back looking for his paper and was surprised at not seeing it. I wasn't, because the fat lady completely hid it. Like the mandrake I wanted to shriek, but with laughter."

She kicked up her white buckskin heels and keeled over against the wall with a merry yelp. Her head didn't appear above the edge of the table again until I brought it up with:

"What then, after you'd really started working in pictures?"

"Playing Beth in 'Little Women' was the hardest thing I ever did," she solemnly declared. "To begin with, I was scared stiff, for I'd had no real training in acting. I realized I was just an amateur among professionals, and that now for the first time I was in direct competition with them. To make it harder still, I was only sixteen, while the others — Katharine Hepburn, Joan Bennett, a wife and mother, and Frances Dee—were all over twenty-four. I did a lot of thinking about it, and I had plenty of time to do it—my, yes! You see, I had moved to Culver City, and the man with whose family I lived had to be at his work by six in the morning, so he'd drive me over to Hollywood and drop me at the RKO studio. So, while I waited there for three hours every morning, I'd keep saying to myself, 'You've got to be that girl and not let anything else enter your mind.'"

You know how well she succeeded in carrying out that determination. But there was one thing she herself didn't know. Only a day or two before I had read "A Provincial Lady In America,' in which its noted English author, Mrs. Delafield, speaks—and speaks first, if you please—of Miss Parker's performance of Beth as "artistically flawless."

"Oh, that's wonderful!" she delightedly exclaimed, marveling at this high praise from a high source. "I loved Beth myself, but I didn't think (Continued on page 110)

Robert Donat fans! Read this and feel a little better. You have been writing this magazine bushels of letters asking about the good-looking English actor who made such a hit in "The Count of Monte Cristo." You have been asking for stories about him. Well, listen: he has been in England, doing a stage play and a picture for Gaumont-British called "Thirty-nine Steps." You'll be seeing that picture soon. Madeleine Carroll is his leading lady—see right. Since completing the picture, the poor man has had an operation for appendicitis, which has delayed his return to these shores, where he will make several more pictures. When he does come, we'll have our best writer at the dock to get a story on him for you. (Below, left) Mr. Donat at home with his two children, John and Joanna.

Don't Call Him Screen Lover!

Charles Boyer tells why he resents "Great Lover tag"

By Carter Bruce

"A GREAT lover," said Charles Boyer, "is the most pitiful creature in the world."

That unusual statement, spoken in French, came back to me as I listened to Hollywood gossip. A chorus of excited talk had swirled along the boulevard and through the cafés to label Boyer the latest Don Juan. It was sudden, breathless. The film colony had made a discovery.

It was inevitable, I suppose, that Boyer should be called a great lover. He's always had the reputation, although Hollywood is still ignorant about that. When "Private Worlds" was released, the most hardened critics acclaimed his genius. This Frenchman, they affirmed, had to have a profound understanding of love to deliver such a masterly performance. Then, "Break of Hearts." After the preview the men in the audience swelled the gasping chorus. Here was fascination indeed! Here was subtlety. Here was a penetrating charm which went straight to the heart and left it fatally weak. Here was a new, great lover.

As I listened to this whispered enthusiasm I resolved to finish a conversation which was started, and dropped long ago. When I first met Charles Boyer, in Paris, in 1931.

He was playing, at the time, in "LeVenin." I was present the opening night. The man made such an unusual impression that nothing would do but to make his acquaintance. His reputation, of course, added to my determination. I had heard it mentioned that he was the idol of the Parisian stage. In every salon where smart women foregathered he was an inevitable topic of conversation. I had always wanted to meet an alleged great lover and so, after my unexpected reaction on the opening night, I dropped everything else to search hopefully for a mutual friend. I was surprised. We had several in common.

CHARLES BOYER, it seemed, had a gift for friendship. That, in a sense, was his hobby. Quiet hours spent with stimulating friends were almost his sole recreation. Fortunately for me, he didn't limit his acquaintance to the stage. I was informed, in fact, that he seldom associated with actors. He preferred the company of lawyers, business men, politicians, and particularly writers. It was in the literary circle that I discovered our mutual friends. Paul Hariat, one of the friends, was glad to grant my request.

It was arranged to meet Boyer in his dressing room after the performance. As we waited, back stage, I watched a perspiring call boy hurry back and forth into his room with boxes neatly tied in colored ribbons. "Flowers, cigarettes, candy," grunted Paul, with a look of disdain. Sometimes the boy carried a scented billet-doux which he merely tossed on the table to add to the growing heap. It was fantastic. To my expression of astonishment, Paul merely replied that all women were fools.

He told me, leaning against the wall and sucking his cigarette, a little of Boyer's history. The spasmodic applause we often heard was well deserved, he said. Boyer had earned it. He had labored like a titan. Ever since he was a little boy he had followed his single objective—to become great on the stage. Peasants and artisans always gathered in Figeac whenever he recited in school. But his father was a successful (Contined on page 92)

He was France's premier matinee idol for several years and now he promises to become ours. At left, you see Boyer alone and in a romantic close-up with Katharine Hepburn from "Break Of Hearts." It's thrilling!

THIS interview was almost prevented by a horse. That was Ginger Rogers' story and it looked as if I was going to be stuck with it! It happened this way: Ginger and I had a date for lunch. She was late, twenty minutes late. But that wasn't the horse's fault—that's still another story.

I sat at a table in the RKO restaurant and tried to look interested in the menu. I know it by heart. Suddenly Ginger burst in. She sat down breathlessly. She had on blue gabardine slacks, no make-up, a perky brown tam and a gay orange and tan sweater. Ginger grinned, "I'm awfully sorry I was late, but honestly I couldn't help it!" She pointed an accusing finger. "It was all his fault." The guy whose fault it was turned out to be Bernard Newman, the designer of her costumes.

Ginger said, "I tried my darnedest to get here on time, but you know how it is when you go shopping. I tried on every hat in the store and looked at every dress sample that they had! Things I need for 'Top Hat.' We start shooting Monday." She scanned the bill of fare eagerly and ordered a small fruit salad and a large orange juice.

While we waited for our orders, I explained to this freckled, frank young lady, "I want to know what mistakes you've made that you'd never make again. You know what I mean. Both professional life and private life miscues. Little things you may have done that hurt someone else or yourself. Things you've learned from those mistakes. We all make them. We're ashamed of them and ourselves afterward. What have you on your conscience, Ginger?"

She crinkled her nose thoughtfully. "I've made plenty of mistakes—I guess we all do. The difficulty is in remembering my worst ones! Number one is that, like everybody else, I've a tendency to tell too many white lies. I'm always so afraid of hurting someone's feelings by telling the truth, no matter how much it should be told.

"But I think that we actually do them greater harm in telling them what they want to hear. I've often fibbed when I knew that I should tell the truth and wake them up. In the end they have a lot of worries they might have been spared if they'd heard the truth when they should have. I'll make stout resolutions never to say anything but the truth and then I'll turn right around the next minute and double-cross myself. though, is that we carry them to such extremes. I've said things I could bite off my tongue for! Someone asks you to be frank and you get too frank, I imagine. We're all afraid of hurting somebody's feelings and when you realize that you've done just that you're perfectly miserable. I know I am."

"The trouble with both white lies and the truth,

JUST THEN Gene Raymond, who had the table across from us, pointed at Ginger and exclaimed, "I know her. She's in pictures. I saw her walk across the screen in 'Roberta'." Ginger grinned back. "I've seen you in pictures, too! You're Clark Gable, aren't you?" Mr. Raymond subsided. I mentioned that I'd preferred "Roberta" to "The Gay Divorcee," Ginger said, "It's pretty hard to do a sequel. And, gosh, in this next picture Fred Astaire and I are making we do one routine like that in 'Roberta' and one similar to a routine from 'The Gay Divorcee'! (Continued on page 105)

TRY THIS ON YOUR NEIGHBORS

By Gladys Hall

HOLLYWOOD, in case you don't know it, is scavenger-hunt conscious. Or unconscious. It is not surprising, at any hour of the day or night, to find Jean Harlow removing your grand piano or Bing Crosby in your hair abstracting kid curlers.

The Younger Set—Una Merkel and Anita Louise and Tom Brown and Mary Carlisle and Jean Parker and others—seem to make a weekly habit of scavengering the town until the gardens are denuded and the mansions of the humble and exalted are stripped bare.

They remove the food from under the eyes of their fellow stars, they rip babies from their mothers' arms, and the chin out of chinchilla coats, the mortgages off'n the roofs, the very make-up from celebrated faces.

Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls have a very unpleasant definition for the noun known as scavenger: "A street-cleaner; an animal that feeds on carrion, as the buzzard" . . . Which really make Messrs. Funk & Wagnalls liable to apologies to the starry scavengers of Hollywood. Not, I am sure, that they ever thought of Jean Harlow in the terms of a buzzard . . .

The potency and penetration of the epidemic is all the more marked when it becomes known that Maureen O'Sullivan has succumbed. For Maureen plays a lone hand in Hollywood. She seldom ever goes around with any of the picture people. She hasn't a girl friend to her Irish name. She never goes to parties. She doesn't more than nod pleasantly even to the people she plays with in pictures. She has no social life. Occasionally she will have a small dinner party for three or four people—on the night before the scavenger hunt she was having the British Consul and his wife, John McCormick, the singer, and, of course, John Farrow to dine with her.

IN FACT, the greatest feat scavenging has ever achieved is the scavenging of Maureen herself. More about that later on.

Did you know that when Maureen or Jean or any of the stars go on these hunts they must be accompanied by another person and are followed by a police escort—an officer astride a motorcycle. It's excellent practice for the police force. It gives them postgraduate courses in sleuthing.

Anyway, I went on a scavenger hunt with Maureen and that night of teasing thievery is not likely to fade from my memory while the brain cells function . . .

We met at Maureen's apartment. Una Merkel and her husband, Bob Montgomery and wife, Anita Louise and Tom Brown, Jean Parker and Madge Evans and Mary Carlisle and four or five others were there.

I was elected to accompany Maureen. And almost immediately we started forth on our "assignments" pleasantly pursued by an officer of the law. We set forth at seven p. m. We were to join the other hunters again at the hour of midnight.

Our first little commission was to retrieve a five-dollar gold piece which had been dropped at an earlier hour into the bottom of Freddie March's swimming pool. Maureen had consulted her list before leaving. And she is nothing if not thorough. The night being balmy and Maureen a healthy girl she put on a swimming suit under her tweed suit and we set out.

THERE appeared to be a party in progress at Freddie's. We left our car and pussy-footed it around the French-Normandy estate to the pool. Trailing us always—you must bear this in mind—was the officer. Maureen cast off the tweed habiliments. She made a swift and skillful dive. The silver waters were slenderly riven and some three minutes later Maureen appeared on the surface, a bit of gold gleaming between her teeth. She looked like a Nereid rising from magic waters and she had her coin!

There was an electric heater in one of the bath houses. I turned it on and Maureen dried off, while the officer discreetly turned his head the other way. Maureen donned her outer suit and we were on our way again with the officer muttering things about his great-grandmother who had died of pneumonia from such "goings-on" . . .

We sped next to the home of Clark Gable in Brentwood. Maureen's orders were to remove a dinner plate filled with dinner from the Gable table. So skeptical was Bob Montgomery that later when he inspected the dinner plate and contents carefully he called Clark's home and roused Clark from his midnight slumbers to check with him as to what he had had for dinner that night. He implied that he suspected us of having bought a dinner at the Vendôme, the Brown Derby or some such place. Clark said, rather emptily, that he hadn't had any dinner as same had been taken out of his very mouth by one Maureen O'Sullivan. But he added gallantly that starvation at such sweet hands was a paltry price to pay, although Mrs. Gable would like to have her dinner plate returned!

Norma Shearer's house at Santa Monica was our next stop. Our orders there called for the removal of a bath brush and hand towel from the bathroom. Maureen said, "That's because Norma always looks so clean—one associates soap and water and freshness with her." When we arrived at the house Mr. and Mrs. Thalberg were out for the evening. The servants were at home. But not one of them could speak one word of English. We tried the sign-language (Continued on page 90)

IT'S THRILLING TO BE AN Actress

Kay says, "Independence is the supreme thrill, it is the one I am working for." She says other amazing things in this sincere discussion of her thrilling existence.

By Faith Service

I SAID to Kay, "Isn't it thrilling, really, to be an actress?"

Kay's moonstone eyes in the camellia whiteness of her face focused on me in that soft, sometimes unseeing look of hers. She said, "Thrilling to be an actress? Why, I'd never thought about it. But—yes, thrilling. . . ." And the word "thrilling" seems thrilling when Kay says it in that velvety, throbbing voice of hers.

She said, "It's thrilling but not, to me at any rate, in the way you probably think. It's thrilling to me, first and foremost, for this reason—because all women love to be loved and a screen actress is loved, not by one or a dozen, but by thousands and even millions all over the world. It is thrilling because all women love to be admired and even envied by other women and a screen actress, deservedly or not, is admired and envied by legions of other women.

"It's thrilling to me to go to sleep at night and feel that all over the world people are seeing me and caring about me. It's being more alive than I've ever been before. It's being more conscious of my own existence. It's so warm, this feeling. All of life is magnified. All of love is multiplied . . . it is truly thrilling."

Just at that moment, Kay was called back to the set.

I had approached that set, where "Living On Velvet" was being made, a few moments before. And I had seen, as I neared the set, the figure of Kay, swathed in mink, and by her side, elegant in evening attire, gone a little gray and the more devastating because of it, sat George Brent.

Ha, I thought, I'll bet it's thrilling to be an actress! Mink—and George Brent—what more do you want? No wonder pretty little stenographers and small-town Susans envy the Kays and the Joans, as they pull on their dollar-ninety-five sweaters, hold hands with the gas-station Galahads and sigh, "There, but for the grace of God, go I!"

I reached the set, all primed to ask my question about the supreme thrillingness of being an actress. Kay and George were perched on teetery stools at what was built to resemble a "Quick Lunch" counter. They were dunking doughnuts in coffee. Back of the counter stood Edgar Kennedy, regarding them with a cold and fishy eye. They themselves wore looks of despair (and dyspepsia) under their studio make-ups. Director Frank Borzage amiably was enjoining them to remember that

Kay Francis finds her life thrilling, but for different

In this scene from "Living On Velvet" Kay, George Brent and Warren William feed a dog—but there was a scene where sixty-nine doughnuts became a trial!

And here is a scene from "The Goose and the Gander"—the newest Francis and Brent team work. How do you like this pair of brunettes together?

this scene was comedy, not tragedy, as it appeared!

There was a pause in the scene, during which Kay and I had the few words recorded above. Then came another pause while the crew made ready for the next take. Kay and George bolted for the nearest exit there to remove from their mouths the last bite of doughnut. They came back to me, saying weakly, "We have eaten sixty-nine doughnuts since morning! We have eaten doughnuts in the silent shots, in the sound shots, in the close-ups, in the process shots. We are still eating doughnuts. We are going to continue to eat doughnuts. . . ."

GEORGE SAID, reflectively, "There was that woman who yawned for eight days—she was front page news—"

Kay murmured, "We have eaten doughnuts for eight hours—"

George observed dispassionately and to no one in particular, "Doughnuts to you!" and strolled off to his dressing-room and soda bicarb!

Kay, released from doughnutting for half an hour, took me off to a couple of camp chairs, a glass of water and a pair of companionable cigarettes. She sank down beside me.

I called to her doughnut-distracted mind the question before the house. I said firmly, "But it is thrilling to be an actress, isn't it? You know, the old glamor stuff, the back-stage mystery. Lovely ladies who are pulled through the streets in their carriages by human hands . . . gallant gentlemen who die with a white glove crumpled in their hands . . . temperament, freedom, fever . . . that sort of thing?"

Kay regarded me with a jaundiced eye. I am afraid she murmured, "Doughnuts. . . ."

She rallied and said, "I suppose so. The great thrill to me is as I have told you . . . the warm feeling of being cared about by thousands of people. Some few of them have names and identities, most of them have not. But they are there—absent lovers—and I am conscious of them. There is one young girl in England who has written me daily for years. She works and saves too great a part of her money, I am afraid, to send me charming and thoughtful gifts. That is the sort of thing I mean. In the ordinary walks of life, if we have half a dozen real friends and perhaps a dozen 'admirers,' we are very fortunate—and very popular. An actress multiplies these friends and these (Continued on page 88)

WHEN THEY WERE

Katherine Albert tells you how Claudette Colbert, Fredric March, Margaret Sullavan, and others beat the school of hard knocks

JUST OFF the teeming thoroughfare, called Broadway, in a busy theatrical office, sits a man who can point to a dozen of the most glamorous and exciting picture stars and say, "I gave them their first jobs." His name is Brock Pemberton, producer of such hits as "Enter Madame," "Miss Lulu Bett," "Strictly Dishonorable" and now "Personal Appearance" and "Ceiling Zero."

For years bright faced girls and eager boys have gone in and out of his office, each one hoping for the magic words, "You'll do"—and a chance to play a role, no matter how small.

Pemberton is noted for being a discoverer of talent. He takes untried youngsters and trains them because, he says, "It's fun." He has an uncanny instinct for knowing instantly who has undeveloped talent and who is without the magic spark. But how? What did people like Claudette Colbert, Miriam Hopkins, Fredric March, Robert Montgomery, George Brent, Margaret Sullavan, Muriel Kirkland, Tullio Carminati and Walter Huston have which got them chosen, while hundreds of others were cooling their heels in Pemberton's office without receiving a glance from the producer?

FOR AT the time Pemberton remembers them, these boys and girls were, in appearance and desire at least, just like thousands of other ambitious ones, padding up and down Broadway looking for jobs. Yet these chosen few rose to the fame they now enjoy. They "got the break." But they had something to begin with, something that Pemberton was able to see when they sat, nervous and eager, before him. This magic spark, whatever it was, needed only a touch to release the flame of their talents.

So let's turn back the clock of Brock Pemberton's memory and look at them when they sat, young and untried, waiting, waiting, waiting in an outer office.

Pemberton was casting a play called "Puppets." The principals were all assigned to their roles but there was still a small woman's part to be filled. An actress Pemberton had used in several successful plays, a Frenchwoman, told him of a cute girl, born in France, but who had lived in this country for a long time and who had great stage possibilities. And so Claudette Colbert was given a ten minute interview with the producer.

Nervous as she was, much as she fidgeted with the end of her handkerchief, the (Continued on page 108)

JOB-HUNTING . .

Kay Osborn tells you how Hepburn, Bob Montgomery, Mary Boland and Douglass Montgomery were told, "You'll never be a star!"

"KATHARINE HEPBURN came to me in New York, with an introductory letter from a mutual friend, looking for a career on the stage. That was six or seven years ago, and what I know now, I expected then. It was her first visit to a producer's office. She had all the ear-marks of an amateur." Edwin Knopf, writer, producer, director and actor, now at M-G-M, leaned back and smiled as he reminisced.

"I dislike amateurs," he went on. "I always have disliked them, and there was no doubt about her being one the minute she walked into my office. She really looked about as unimportant as a schoolgirl can be. She was very serious and very intense about wanting to be an actress, but even that didn't impress me. I had seen that kind before! She didn't look as though she had anything and I very quickly told her so. I told her to go back to Bryn Mawr and finish her schooling, and then to marry some nice man and forget about the stage. She said that she would go back and finish her schooling, but she wouldn't forget about the stage. And as for marrying some nice young man! Well, she was very scornful on that subject."

"'I'LL COME back to see you after graduation,' she said, undaunted. I told her not to bother. I'd be in Baltimore by then, preparing for my summer stock company.

"But that didn't seem to discourage her and she went away with the same spirit that brought her in. I shook my head in despair. Why did untalented little things like that always want to go on the stage! That was the trouble with the stage. There were too many of them on it already.

"I had forgotten about her completely until she showed up again in Baltimore. I was rehearsing Mary Boland in "The Czarina."

"'Well, here I am!' she said.

"I could not even remember her name. I just looked at her.

"'I came down to work for you,' she said, with confidence.

"I told her to run along like a good girl. My company was complete. And I couldn't turn it into a school of acting. It was, after all, a professional stock company.

"Then she asked me if she could stay and just watch me rehearse. I told her that I never let anybody watch a rehearsal . . . that it disturbed (Continued on page 109)

Hollywood CAN'T CHANGE ME!

By Richard English

"WHAT'S HOLLYWOOD taught me?" Alice Faye lifted a quizzical eyebrow, smiled a half smile and said with the husky voice that does torch songs so well, "First of all, you're a sucker if you let it change you! You notice the build-up on every new player: 'In all the world, never has there been a sensation like this!' Or 'A new, dynamic and different personality.' Sure—but just try and be different in in Hollywood!

"They sign you up because you're a new type of screen personality. You get one picture released and then the remodeling starts. The tearer-downers come in. Then the builder-uppers. They'll remodel you from toe nails to your teeth while you're supposed to grin and bear it."

Hollywood prides itself on being able to change a gal's coiffure, character and disposition with all the ease of the guy on the flying trapeze. Publicity men gayly will furnish you with an exotic past, two ancestors clinging to the rail of the Mayflower and a background that makes O. Henry seem tame. But Alice Faye's been doin' Hollywood wrong! She ain't changed a bit.

I know what I'm talking about, too. I met her through Rudy Vallee the day she stepped into her first leading role, her first day's work in pictures. Lilian Harvey had stepped out of the first "George White's Scandals" the day before and executives had chosen Alice for the role without even the formality of a screen test. One peek at her beauty, another peek at her in an abbreviated chorus costume, a second spent listening to her husky recording of "Oh, You Nasty Man!" and Alice was on her way. But she'd rather have been on her way back to New York and she still feels that way! Just listen to this:

"I think it's all rather silly myself! They tell you to be yourself, to sell your own personality on the screen, not to be an imitator. Then they'll turn around and explain that you ought to quit doing this and start doing that. That your coiffure is perfectly ducky, darling, but let's try it this way. They get in your hair in more ways than one! They'll even want to change your voice, so help me!"

Alice was getting up steam. She shook a Faye finger under the English schnozzle. "You've known me longer than any other writer, haven't you, Dick? You remember how I wanted to go back to New York after my first picture, 'George White's Scandals?' That was a little over a year ago. I'm just finishing my fifth picture now, the second 'George White's Scandals.' I've had a year to think it over. And I still think I'd have been smarter to have gone back to Broadway after that first one."

SHE CURLED her legs under her on the huge divan and waved a pillow at me, menacingly. I was fiddling with the olive in my martini.

"Want another?" Alice inquired.

I shook my head dutifully. "This is business. I'm here to do a story on you, Miss Faye!" Alice took careful aim with the pillow.

"English, will you

Lovers FOR A DAY

Henry Wilcoxon's greatest emotional experience

By Dell Hogarth

I WAS with her for no more than twelve hours in my life. But I'll remember her always. . . ." Henry Wilcoxon spoke with a dreamy thoughtfulness which arrested my attention instantly. We were in his apartment. A few hours before we had witnessed the preview of "The Crusades." The thunderous applause of the audience still echoed in Hank's ears as he lolled in an easy chair with his old, blue bathrobe and his slippers providing a welcome comfort. His meerschaum pipe was clamped in his teeth. Somehow, as we idly discussed the picture, our conversation veered to the character of that hard-bitten warrior whom Hank portrayed—Richard the Lion Hearted. When this swashbuckler was swearing, carousing, and conquering in Normandy he fell in love with a simple wench. He was with her but for a day. But, thereafter, some historians affirm, her memory lingered throughout his life.

Could such a thing be? Could such an ephemeral experience endure, when longer relationships are quickly forgotten? Men, notoriously, are swift to forget. It didn't seem possible.

But Hank argued the point doggedly. Of course it was possible. He knew. He had loved someone for one day—and he would never, never forget her.

I stared at him. The argument I was about to fling back died on my lips. It was apparent that he was quite sincere. His mood had altered immediately with that declaration. As he watched a cloud of smoke curl upward into the shadows of the vaulted ceiling, his eyes assumed a far-away look. He was thinking of the past.

I pressed him to go on. To tell me the story.

"PERHAPS it will do me good to tell somebody else about it. I never have before. You see, it is the greatest emotional experience I have ever had in my life. And it will sound fantastic.

"I saw her first in Cardiff, Wales. It was for only an instant. I was walking back to my hotel after the show one night to get some exercise. The night was raw, but I chose a circuitous route which led down by the harbor. Few people were about at that hour. Fog horns tooted dismally as ships crawled up the mouth of the Severn. But, in its way, it was beautiful. Fog blotted out the ugly warehouses. It swirled around lamp posts and made the naked trees seem like twisted gnomes. I turned down a side street. As I passed a lamp post, she went in the opposite direction. In that brief (Continued on page 96)

"IF I WERE POOR"—

By Julie Lang Hunt

FOUR Hollywood stars, with clothes to burn and salaries to dream about, inspired this story.

Four Hollywood stars, whose wardrobe worries, if any, can be whittled down to the slight irritation of too numerous fittings, offer four sound and workable plans to the girl who is badgered by the carking problem of dressing well on the weekly remains of a twenty-five-dollar salary, or less. And these four Hollywood stars know what they're talking about.

There is Jeanette MacDonald who hit upon a "way out" of the perennial and cantankerous clothes quandary when she was taking her first insecure steps toward a stage career.

There is Claudette Colbert, who learned from her mother the French woman's deft theorem for dressing with dash as well as with rigid economy.

There is Ginger Rogers who still can recall vividly the time when her mother managed to keep both of them fed, and, Ginger, at least, decently clothed on her stenographer's stipend of nine dollars a week.

And then there is Kay Francis with a plan so subtly skillful that it can be made to work smoothly for the girl with a large or a microscopic income.

Jeanette MacDonald's solution to the twenty-five-dollar-a-week conundrum is simple—so simple it can be summed up in three words—learn to sew.

Jeanette MacDonald would acquire the sewing habit and haunt the bargain sales.

"SEWING," she says, "is the sharpest and most effective weapon the smart business girl has when she takes on the battle of wresting rent, food and a few good clothes from the average salary of twenty-five dollars a week.

"If I were faced now with a clothes-tight budget, I would rush out and find the nearest city public school that offered a night sewing class. I would enroll immediately and even if I pricked my fingers with clumsiness and loathed the very sight of a threaded needle, I'd stick until I had learned how to copy a Chanel model so that the couturier herself couldn't choose between the original and my handiwork.

"Two or three nights a week devoted to the laborious mysteries of sewing means giving up parties, dancing and fun, and that is not easy, I'll admit. But the joy of a really adequate and smart wardrobe is worth such bitter sacrifice to most of us women."

Ginger Rogers offers a share-your-wardrobe plan which worked out for her once.

Now Jeanette ran smack into this sewing solution rather recently when she discovered the magic wrought in the personal wardrobe of a friend who had attended a series of these night classes in costume designing and dressmaking. Jeanette learned from her that within a few lessons, complicated frocks were put into work in these classes and that by the end of a single season, tailored coats and suits were manageable without supervision.

Any one of the plans offered by these four stars will solve your clothes-budget problem

A clever clothes-buying system would keep Claudette Colbert in the well-dressed class.

"More women should know about this opportunity offered by practically every school system in the country and what great happiness this free instruction can bring into the lives of young girls who appreciate the beauty and importance of good clothes.

"IN MY own case, such knowledge would have ironed out a lot of rough going when I was getting my start on the stage. Clothes were almost as important to me as my singing lessons, but most of the family funds went for the latter.

"I still can remember a number of adolescent moments that were black with anguish because I felt the frock I was wearing was too obviously made-over, out-of-style and not up to the occasion.

"No one but the girl who has had to wear a few make-shifts in her life knows the sheer pain such concessions can cause."

Now Jeanette has still another plan that, when coupled with the sewing idea, offers an unlimited field of wardrobe miracles to the budget-harried girl.

Away back in those "getting started" days, she had her few frocks made by an inexpensive seamstress. During her many shopping tours for bargain materials she devised her own clever and money-saving scheme which she called "buying backward."

This plan is also simple. One merely sits tight and waits for the announcement of the early spring sales of all the succulent winter velvets, and lavish mid-January metal cloth and fine woolens. Such materials are always marked below cost just before Easter to make way for the spring and summer silks and cottons.

"It requires some staunch will power," Jeanette admits, "to spend money on yardage that cannot be used for fully six months. But when autumn arrives, your whole winter wardrobe lies waiting in a moth-proof corner, ready for scissors and pins and bastings, and waiting at a tremendous bargain at that."

CLAUDETTE COLBERT'S contribution is not so much a plan as it is a tradition, one that has been handed down through the years from French mothers to their daughters.

The true Parisienne is taught from childhood to practice the gay deception of looking like a million dollars (or is it francs?) but never, never spending the millions, even when and if they are available.

"I was taught to make old clothes do, rather than replace them with anything that was new and cheap," Claudette explained to me. "A winter coat was made to last season after season, with a possible change of fur for the collar. Somehow it never appeared shabby or demoded, because it was an excellent coat to begin with.

"A party dress was made from the best silk obtainable so it would stand up under many cleanings and then a good dye job when it went into its third year. All frocks were safeguarded against the ups and downs of the mode with deep hems, and were made over at least once."

HERE'S WHAT TO WEAR

Maureen O'Sullivan's shorts and La Evans' tennis suit.

Elizabeth Allan's comfortable flannel sailing togs.

WHEN it comes to play clothes, we get right down to the favorite subject of most Hollywood stars. Despite all the elegant and glamorous clothes worn on the screen, Hollywood, in its play hours, relaxes in just the sort of knock-about outfits that you and I want to pack into our vacation and week-end bags.

The only way Hollywood can forget its terrific routine of hard work is to get out under the sun—bicycle, swim, play tennis, sail and dash down to Palm Springs or up to Arrowhead Springs for a brief rest. And what the smart Cinema-ites wear in these out-of-role, off-screen interludes is what interests us most right about this time of the year when we're vacation-minded.

First of all, let me assure you that our pictures this month represent costumes that you can wear on almost any type of vacation unless, of course, you insist upon going to Alaska! They're all smart and right for you girls who live in every point of the compass.

Maureen O'Sullivan packs her shorts and shirts first, then gets around to more conventional garb afterwards. Actively interested in sport, Maureen puts workman-like, comfortable clothes at the head of her vacation list—that's why she likes shorts so much. Two of these pet outfits are shown here. On page 64 you see her plaid linen crash play suit with matching skirt which converts it into a sleeveless summer sports dress. Blue and red the color scheme, with large white buttons on both the skirt and suit. This is a grand outfit for week-ends because it gives you the much desired two-in-one affair and eliminates the necessity of having to find a place for both shorts and an extra sports dress.

Suspenders add a nice individual detail to the usual shorts-and-shirt combination for another of Maureen's vacation costumes. Pink linen for the full short trousers and the buttoned-on suspenders The plaid gingham blouse combines pink with several other harmonizing shades.

Summer week-ends and holidays are here again

Bathing suits that star under the summer sun are simple, form-fitting affairs. Above, left and right, you see Betty Furness in her white ribbed knit suit with brown trimming. It has a deeply cut sunback. Cellophane woven with lastex is one of Jean Parker's newest. It's one-piece and glistens as if dripping wet even when it is dry! Below, left and right, Elizabeth Allan's knit "bra" and trunk suit in brown and plaid. And Jean again in a blue woolen model.

B. V. D. Bathing Suits

Maureen's white canvas sneakers and white socks are worn with her play suits and with slacks.

Madge Evans and I were discussing sports clothes one day and she made several very interesting observations about her preferences.

"If I had my way," she said, "I would have only two types of costumes in my closet—sports and evening things!"

I said that was my idea, too, but that our busy lives never permitted us to specialize quite so strictly.

"Well, fortunately," she continued, "our lives in Hollywood are arranged so that we can nearly have just such a wardrobe, if we wish. You see, I like to relax completely in my off-screen hours and I find that real sports clothes are the best for both lounging and playing. When I have to dress up, it is usually for formal parties where I am forced to wear evening clothes."

I asked her what she thought (Continued on page 98)

We asked Society Women why they Prefer Camels —

No bothered nerves for Mrs. Allston Boyer

"Refreshing," says Mrs. Robert R. Hitt

No "Nerves"!

"Every one is gay now and almost every one is smoking Camels," replied Mrs. Allston Boyer. "I can smoke as many as I want and they never upset my nerves. Lots of people have told me the same thing. And I notice that if I'm tired, smoking a Camel freshens me up."

Flavor!

"In the enjoyment of smoking, Camels certainly make a difference," answered Miss Mary de Mumm (below). "Their flavor is so smooth and mild that you enjoy the last one as much as the first. I'm sure that's one reason they are so extremely popular." More expensive tobaccos!

"Flavor," says Miss Mary de Mumm

Mildness!

"Camels have such a grand, mild flavor, and that's because they have more expensive tobaccos in them," said Miss Dorothy Paine (below). "Every one is smoking them now."

Women do appreciate mildness in a cigarette, and the additional happy fact that Camels never bother the nerves! Camel's more expensive tobaccos make a real difference . . . in mildness, flavor, and pleasure.

So Refreshing!

"Sometimes you are apt to smoke more than usual," said Mrs. Robert R. Hitt, "and I notice that Camels never upset my nerves. In fact, if I'm a bit tired, I find that smoking a Camel rests me—I have a sense of renewed energy."

Camels give you just enough "lift." They contain finer, more expensive tobaccos . . . Turkish and Domestic . . . than any other popular brand. Smoke one and see.

Beautiful

Virginia Bruce [illegible] one of Hollywood's most beautiful women and one of the screen's most promising young actresses. In a brief year she has emerged as a striking personality. Hollywood swains lose their hearts to her but she shows no favoritism. You'll see her next in "Let 'Em Have It" with Dick Arlen. Also in "Masquerade."

"Doctor, how do Skin Faults first Begin?"

AN INTELLIGENT QUESTION AUTHORITATIVELY ANSWERED—

1 What causes Lines?

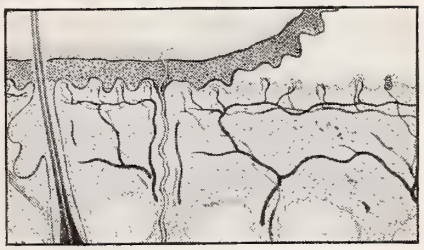
Lines result when the under tissues grow thin and wasted, and the outer skin does not change correspondingly. It falls into tiny creases—the lines you see. To help this, nutrition of the under tissues must be stimulated.

2 Are Blackheads just Dirt?

Blackheads are due to clogged pores. Most often, this clogging comes from within the skin. Overactive glands give off a thickish substance that clogs the pores. The tip dries. Darkens. Collects dirt. Proper cleansing will remove the blackhead. Rousing treatment of the under tissues will prevent further clogging.

3 What makes Blemishes come?

"Blemishes" are the final stage of blackheads. They form when the clogging accumulation in the pores presses on the surrounding under tissues and causes inflammation. They are avoided by removing the blackheads that cause them. When blemishes are many and persistent, a physician should be consulted.



4 Can Coarse Pores be reduced?

Pores are naturally smaller in some skins than in others. They become enlarged through being clogged and stretched by secretions from within the skin. They can be reduced by removing the clogging matter and keeping the skin free from further clogging.

5 When do Tissues start to Sag?

Sagging is rarely noticeable before 30 to 35. Then the rounded contour is lost—notably in neck, chin and cheek line, and under the eyes. Here the skin sags, due to loss of tone in the fibres underneath the skin, to fatty degeneration of the muscles, diminished circulation, failing nutrition of the underskin. To avoid sagging, keep the under tissues toned.

The Underskin—where Skin Faults begin

If you could see through the epidermis into your underskin, you would discover an amazing network of tiny blood vessels, cells, nerves, fat and muscle tissues, oil and sweat glands! On these depends the beauty of your outer skin. When they grow sluggish, look out for blackheads, coarseness, blemishes, lines—wrinkles!

Mrs. Richard Gedney says: "Pond's Cold Cream leaves my skin fresh, smooth. I am never bothered with blackheads or blemishes."

MRS. GEORGE BOLLING LEE of VIRGINIA

beautiful and distinguished wife of the grandson of the illustrious General Robert E. Lee, says: "Pond's Cold Cream completely erases lines, keeps my contour firm. I use it every night. It seems to lift dust and grime right out of my pores."

Keep Under Skin Active

to keep Skin faults away

YOU SEE, from the authoritative answers given above, skin faults practically all begin in your underskin.

No matter what the fault, its important needs are keeping the under tissues vigorous and the skin clean.

Through these two means, Pond's Cold Cream has cherished the beauty of the most fastidious women in the world. For Pond's actually softens lines. Wards off blemishes, blackheads. Makes coarse pores less conspicuous. Firms aging tissues. Softens drying skin. It does these things by means of its deep-skin cleansing and its invigorating effect on the under layers of the skin.

EVERY NIGHT, cleanse deep with Pond's Cold Cream. Its specially processed light oils sink deep, flush away every particle of dust, make-up, skin impurities. Cleanse a second time, patting the cream in briskly to rouse the circulation, stimulate the oil glands, invigorate the newly cleansed tissues.

IN THE MORNING—during the daytime, freshen with Pond's. You will be rewarded with the satiny texture that holds make-up evenly—the radiance of a skin kept clean and invigorated to its depths!

Alice Brady gives her usual excellent performance, this time as the harassed widow on the verge of a nervous breakdown. And well she may be, what with a coupla million superfluous dollars, a daughter (Gloria Stuart) who's beautiful bait for fortune seekers, and a son (Frank McHugh) who's enough to drive any woman mad. Adolphe Menjou will really panic you as the wild-eyed dancing director—particularly when he goes into that dance brandishing the meat cleaver.

It's all light-hearted—and headed—entertainment, and if you're in that mood yourself, it should prove well worth a general admission ticket.

(Paramount)

In this you will behold the metamorphosis of Tol'able David. In other words, Richard Barthelmess has had the courage to change his type completely. He plays a hunted criminal—a criminal caught with pathetic swiftness by a detective who, for a refreshing change, is neither wooden-headed nor stone-hearted. Charles G. Wilson plays the minion of the law well. Helen Mack, Gertrude Michael, Joe Morrison and Ray Milland do well enough in smaller parts. Roscoe Karns does a surprising serious bit. The story gets unnecessarily mysterious at points. However, it is pretty fair entertainment. And we think you'll like Barthelmess just as well as an actor as you did when he was a hero.

★★ Party Wire
(Columbia)

Familiarity may breed contempt, but you'll find this small town story entertaining even if you happen to be living in such a place. For it deals with the humorous and tragic results of that insidious thing which even your best friend will tell you about—gossip. The moral is to tear down your back fence and tear out your telephone if you hope to escape its consequences. Jean Arthur is the gal in question here, who was once the town belle but suddenly finds herself outside the social pale, her job gone and her lover almost gone—all due to the misinterpretation of an innocent remark made via Mr. Bell's handy gadget.

You'll not only feel sorry for Jean, but appreciate her good acting and looks. Victor Jory is not so convincing as her "young man" but Helen Lowell, as his aunt and the town's dictator, gives an excellent performance—particularly when she collects all the village busybodies in the town hall and gives them a liberal piece of her mind. The pay-off comes when all are chastised and repentant as they return home—but each and everyone quietly picks up the receiver for some listenin' in, the minute the phone rings a neighbor's number.

★★ The People's Enemy
(RKO)

The title was well chosen, anyway, for this picture, as any audience would feel antagonistic towards such a yarn. It is the time-worn and tattered tale of the victory of justice. Now, we firmly believe that justice often does win out, but our feelings are hurt when it is pointed out so obviously. Here we have a baddie whose nasty disposition has not been sweetened by three years in the state hoosegow. Escaping with a sneer on his lips and a leer in his eye, he plots to wreak vengeance on his lawyer—who in the meantime has been pretty busy wooing and winning the affections of the convict's wife and cheeild.

You may wonder just where the justice comes in, so far, but you see the lawyer is a model of all the virtues and a pillar of society. It all looks pretty bad, though, until they finally decide to clean up on the desperado and get it all done with. Preston Foster does a good job of making himself obnoxious as the convict, while Melvyn Douglas does a poor job of making himself likable as the lawyer. Lila Lee is adequate as the "woman in the case."

★ Mary Jane's Pa
(Warner Bros.)

This picture is just one of those mistakes that will happen in the best regulated studios, but why Aline MacMahon and Guy Kibbee should be the goats again, makes this domestic tale a first class mystery. What laughingly would be called the plot has to do with another of these chronically charming but irresponsible newspapermen, who finally wanders away from his family and stays eleven years. We didn't blame him for that—but then he comes back. It seems that absence makes even such gentlemen's hearts grow fonder, so imagine Mr. Kibbee's surprise to find that his wife, Aline MacMahon, is contemplating marrying another!

Evidently working on the theory that the way to a woman's heart is through her stomach, the poor man becomes the family cook, just to be near his bad-tempered children and win back his wife. For some unknown reason his wife gives up her good job and good man and takes back the plump, bleary-eyed Guy. Not even a "happy ever after" ending, so the whole picture is a complete waste of time.

(RKO)

We were afraid this would happen. After Anne Shirley's surprising success in "Anne of Green Gables," she was bound to be still orphaned and appealingly naïve in her next picture—but the studio didn't have to cook up quite such a hasty story to capitalize on her charms.

There's a thread of plot, but it becomes hopelessly tangled by irrelevant situations. The cast does some good acting, but with such a background their efforts are to little avail. O. P. Heggie is lovable as the scholarly old gentleman who is inveigled by Anne to save her from the boarding-school where she is overworked and misunderstood. Helen Westley is humorous as the crochety old maid principal who cherishes hopes of appealing to Mr. Heggie's finer nature—hopes which are guilefully encouraged by Anne for her own ends. Anne herself still shows signs of becoming a capable actress, given good stories and excellent direction.

"YES, I use cosmetics," says Carole Lombard, "but thanks to Lux Toilet Soap, I'm not afraid of Cosmetic Skin!"

This lovely screen star knows it is when cosmetics are allowed to choke the pores that trouble begins — tiny blemishes appear — enlarging pores — even blackheads, perhaps.

Cosmetics Harmless if removed this way

To guard against unattractive Cosmetic Skin, always remove cosmetics thoroughly the Hollywood way. Lux Toilet Soap has an ACTIVE lather that sinks deep into the pores, safely removes every vestige of dust, dirt, stale cosmetics. Before you put on fresh make-up during the day —ALWAYS before you go to bed at night — use the gentle, white soap 9 out of 10 screen stars have made their beauty care for years.

EYE IDEAS

by Jane Heath

EYE THE SUN!

LUCKY the girl who can eye the sun—unafraid . . . of his frank remarks about her beauty! But it isn't so difficult. Apply make-up discreetly. (You know how outspoken friend Sol can be about too much powder, rouge, lipstick!) Then curl your eyelashes with KURLASH. Without heat, cosmetics, or practice, this marvelous little implement gives you a natural beauty point that is more flattering in strong sunlight. Your lashes will look longer, darker—sun-silhouetted in lovely shadows. KURLASH $1—and you're a sun-proof beauty right away!

Water Witchery

And let me tell you that even in the full glare of beach or tennis court, a wee bit of colorful eye shadow, SHADETTE, will be almost invisible but most flattering! While LASHTINT, the perfumed liquid mascara, will darken your lashes in an amazingly natural way. Water-proof—so you can wear them swimming! Each only $1!

Sun Shine

Another clever trick! Rub a little KURLENE into your lashes before you face the sun. It will set silken rainbows dancing in them . . . while just a film of it over your upper lids will give you a lovely "dewy" look and guard against sun-wrinkles and dryness. Awfully good for lashes! $1 in nearby stores!

★★ Swell Head
(Columbia)

Whether you're a baseball fiend or have never heard of the Babe, you won't find this yarn of the diamond boring. And unless your heart is as tough as a baseball mitt, you may even find a tear winding its way down your nose when Terry McCall, the Home Run Special, is blinded by a fast ball and tries to "play the game" anyhow. Sure, it's sentimental, with even pretty Barbara Kent angling for some sniffles from the audience, but there's more'n a few good laughs, too, provided by the antics of the team and Mr. Dickie Moore strutting his stuff.

Wallace Ford as Terry, gives a far better performance than we've come to expect from that gentleman. In fact, the entire cast knows how to "play ball." This picture should boom the gate receipts of every ball park in town.

★ Rendezvous at Midnight
(Universal)

Why such an inane plot should be selected for any picture is more of a mystery than the solution of the murder. There's a smattering of every trick known to the movie factories to intrigue audience interest—love, hate, comedy, tragedy, etc., all jumbled up so one's not quite sure which is which.

Valerie Hobson is the wealthy deb who pays a thousand for a gown without batting an eye, but is simply a-dither over the city police commissioner, Ralph Bellamy. He, poor man, is so blinded by duty that love hasn't a chance—until she is accused of murder, then la passion bursts into bloom in his manly bosom and he insists that 'twas he who committed the heinous deed.

The best performance is given by Catherine Doucet, as the proprietor of a gown shop which caters exclusively to the females of the Four Hundred—each of whom she assures is her "favorite customer."

(Paramount)

Charles Ruggles is still at the mercy of Mary Boland in their current matrimonial venture. The story is flatter'n the proverbial pancake except for the determined efforts of these two to provide the expected quota of giggles with a few guffaws thrown in for good measure.

Mr. and Mrs. have been united in the holy bonds for twenty-three years with not a single note of discord (attention, Mr. Ripley) when their daughter, Leila Hyams, announces her intention of Renovating her practically new husband. Tch! Tch! say mama and papa, no blot like that on the family 'scutcheon. Rising nobly to the occasion, they decide to stage a mock rumpus of their own—which turns out to be anything but playful.

The Conservation of Natural Resources committee should look into this woeful waste of talent. However, if you're running low on family squabbles at home, you may find this picture diverting.

★ It's A Small World
(Fox)

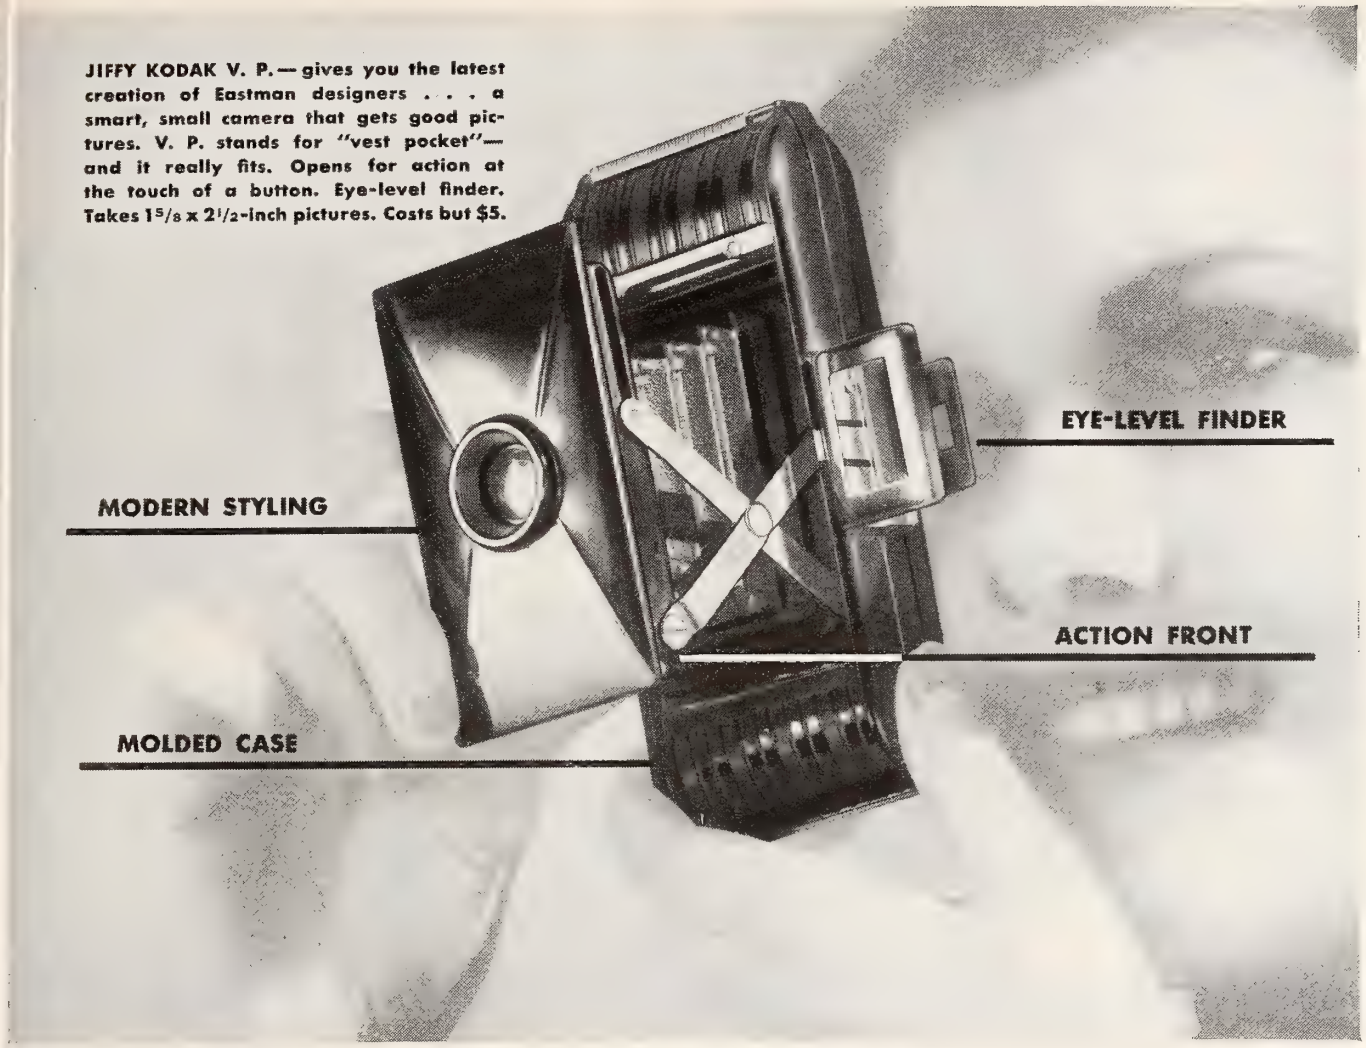
The director must've forgotten that it's not only a small world, but a short life, with neither time nor space for such unmoving pictures. The plot is old enough to be pensioned—two young things thrown into each other's company by force of circumstance, in this case the collision of their Fords. Reel romance follows—several hundred feet of it, consisting mainly of a game of emotional hide-and-seek. As for Spencer Tracy, he should stay far, far away from playful parts—and starches. Yes, Mr. Tracy is getting just a trifle portly. Wendy Barrie, a newcomer, is not only pert and purty but shows sneer-proof histrionic ability. Charles Sellon and Raymond Walburn try hard to make the situation a bit livelier, but without much success.

★ Bride of Frankenstein
(Universal)

Universal has gone and done it again. Another horror picture, picking up where Frankenstein ended and creating a bride for the monster. Except for its beauty, technically and photographically, nothing much can be said for it. An excellent cast struggle hopelessly with a poor story and the picture falls into a horrible picture class—rather than one of horror. Half the preview audience walked out during the showing, so don't say we didn't warn you.

★★ Village Tale
(RKO)

This is another small-town saga with the seamy side of rural life uppermost. A deep current of hatred underlies the story, caused by a foul-minded man who exerts his influence over the village loafers who have nothing to do but spit tobaccy juice around the post-office stove and savor malicious tid-bits of gossip. Kay Johnson is the girl who is the victim of their groundless speculations. She is tragically married to a worthless man, who, "egged on" by his cronies, does despicable things to humiliate her and "Slaughter" Scoville (Randolph Scott)—a man who is intensely disliked because he minds his own business.



There is some comedy relief by Edward Ellis, who gives an excellent performance as the old man who befriends every cat, dog and human in town who needs help. Dorothy Burgess and Janet Beecher also are good in their roles, as indeed is every member of the cast. With such splendid characterizations, it is a pity that the story is so weak in spots that it tears down what good results there might have been. You won't find this a very pretty tale, but neither will you leave until you see the village scoundrel run out of town.

Of course he doesn't rate star billing, but nevertheless, Buck, a big St. Bernard, nearly steals this celluloider. The story is a free—very free—translation of Jack London's famous yarn of the same name and deals with the gold rush of 1900, when the "diggers" weren't Broadway babies nor Hollywood blondes, but "numbers" faithfully depicted as to type by Clark Gable, Jack Oakie, Reginald Owen and Frank Conroy. Nope, not a softie in a carload!

After one has witnessed reels of breath-taking snow scenes unreeled, the thin plot gets under way. There is the villain, convincingly portrayed by Mr. Owen, and the comedy relief (which proves to be very little comedy and absolutely no relief) by Mr. Oakie, and Mr. Gable as the guy who doesn't want to fall for the beeooty, but does. Clark, let it be said, is becoming a first-rate actor, Academy Award or no A.A. Loretta Young, a bit elegant as to diction and with highly polished finger nails, is the gal caught in the drift—snow and otherwise. And then the St. Bernard—marvelous! Yes, taking it by and all, as it should be taken, "Call of the Wild" is better than fair entertainment.

★★★ Oil for the Lamps of China (Warner Bros.)

This picture is just about as good as they come in sincere, thoughtful screen plays. The story is intensely interesting, with the colorful Orient as its setting and the plot centering about a man's deep faith in two things—his work and his wife, and his struggles to do justice to both. Revolution, cholera and other episodes which might have been used for suspense are not enlarged upon, but the constant conflict in a man's life to be true to his responsibilities keeps you engrossed throughout.

Pat O'Brien is an employee of an American oil company in China, and believes that the company has the welfare of the Chinese people at heart, just as he has. Though his wife, Josephine Hutchinson, has suffered years from his blind, exasperating faith in the company, she is the means in the end of shielding him from disillusionment. Miss Hutchinson and Mr. O'Brien give superb performances.

Others in the cast are Jean Muir, Lyle Talbot and Arthur Byron, who are capable in their roles. It's a worth while picture all 'round.

★★ Werewolf of London (Universal)

If you like stories that make the shivers play tag up your spine, you'll simply love this one! But if there's a drop of skepticism in your make-up, better stay away, for even the most gullible should find some parts hard to take. The long drawn out horrors begin in the Tibetan mountains where an eminent botanist (Henry Hull) is searching for a rare flower, and while picking the posy is attacked by a werewolf. Now, one scratch from this accursed creature turns the victim into a biological marvel—half-man, half-wolf—come the full moon. You've probably seen strange happenings by the light of that moon, but Mr. Hull changing to a nasty wolf beats 'em all. London is aghast at the mangled corpses strewing its streets and poor Valerie Hobson, as Mr. Hull's wife, has a pretty bad time of it, what with putting up with her husband's antics and being in love with another.

Henry Hull gives the only good performance in a role that is ridiculously inadequate for his ability. Warner Oland doesn't play W. O. with his customary suavity. But take this picture in place of your next turkish bath—you'll have just as good a time and perspire more freely.

★★★ The Informer (RKO)

Here is a very special picture, one that you'll have to feel "up to" to enjoy. The story is stark in its realism to the point of sordidness. It is the character study of a man who betrays a friend, not through malice but through weakness, and of his mental sufferings as a result of the impulsive step he has taken. It is laid in Dublin in 1922 when rebellion was running rampant. John Ford directed the picture and too much praise cannot be given him. Indeed, this is the only film we've seen in years that is first a movie and then a talkie. Sound is subservient to pictorial effect, and dramatic moments are pointed up through dramatic tricks rather than through dialogue. The direction is so good that it almost overshadows Victor McLaglen's superb performance of the name role. Never has Mr. McLaglen given such a finished, deft portrayal. Indeed, it marks his debut as an actor of merit, rather than a mere character player. Preston Foster, Margot Grahame, Donald Meek and Una O'Connor all come in for a share of praise.

★★ Goin' to Town (Paramount)

Well, the pen may be mightier than the sword, but it surely isn't half as effective as the hips, when it comes to Mae West operas. Yep, the buxom blonde takes credit for writing this one, which is about the same as taking it on the chin. Everything "up to and including" appears in the plot—a prospective husband Mae wins in a crap game, a blue-blooded gentleman she puts a deposit on in order to get the hang of things social, the making and breaking of the uppercrust Southampton colony—yes, it's all there! However, somehow—and here's where you're apt to doubt your sanity—you accept it in the spirit of good, soiled fun. The way Miss W. reads ribald lines all the lunacies and inanities seem worth an occasional laugh. However, let it be said that if the star doesn't get herself a story quickly, she'll soon become a movie memory. But this time, you sorta forgive, if not actually forget. Paul Cavanagh makes an incredible role seem almost realistic, as do Marjorie Gateson, Monroe Owsley and Ivan Lebedeff. Even though "Goin' To Town" isn't by any means that, you probably won't want to miss Mae West.

a generally grand cast. He will also be in "Mutiny on the Bounty" with Charles Laughton and Robert Montgomery.

MARGARET STONE, Chicago, Ill.—James Dunn was born in New York City on November 2, 1905. Claudette Colbert's birthday is September 13 and she was born in Paris, France, in 1905. Gertrude Michael's home town is Talladega, Ala., and her birthday falls on June 1. Fred MacMurray was born in Kankakee, Ill., on August 30, 1908.

PAULINE GOODIN, Somerset, Ohio.—John Wayne is married to Josephine Saens and they have one son. He was born in Winterset, Iowa, May 26, 1907. After graduating from college he worked at various odd jobs around the Hollywood studios until he was given a chance to play in "The Big Trail" in 1930. He has been in the movies ever since. His next two will be "The Dawn Rider" and "Paradise Ranch."

BETTY FREEMAN, Buffalo, N. Y.—In "Gift of Gab," the part of Mac was taken by Douglas Fowley—not Guinn Williams. Joan Crawford's next picture will be "No More Ladies" with Robert Montgomery.

Madame X investigates:

the truth about laxatives — as told to Madame X, the Ex-Lax reporter

THIS is Madame X, the inquiring reporter on assignment for Ex-Lax, the world famous chocolated laxative.

The Ex-Lax Company said to me: "Pack a bag...hop a train...go here, there and everywhere. Get the real folks of this country to tell you what THEY think about Ex-Lax. We want the plain facts. Go into any town, walk along any street, ring any doorbell. Get the story." Here are a few jottings from my notebook.

"EFFECTIVE"...."I used everything but nothing relieved me until I took Ex-Lax." Frank H. Port, 118-48 — 154th Street, Jamaica, Long Island.

"GENTLE"...."It is, therefore, very important when I take a laxative that it be one that is not harsh, yet it must be effective." Mrs. Anne E. Stadt, 7401 4th Avenue, Brooklyn, New York.

"EASY TO TAKE"...."I prefer Ex-Lax to all laxatives because it's easy to take and I like the taste." Pilot William Warner, Floyd Bennett Field, Brooklyn, New York.

"NON-HABIT-FORMING"...."I don't think one should take laxatives all the time, but only when one needs it. With Ex-Lax I get the desired result and don't believe it forms a habit." Miss Bessie M. Bean, 5687 Hub Street, Los Angeles, California.

Ex-Lax comes in 10c and 25c boxes—at any drug store. Insist on the genuine, spelled E-X-L-A-X.

THE CHOCOLATED LAXATIVE

approached and my father was expected home she put on her nicest gown, prettied herself up generally and awaited his arrival (and the ceremony of dining) confident that she would grace the occasion to the very best of her ability, as it deserved!

"Even now, in California, she has not accepted our easy informality in the least. Still the Frenchwoman at heart, Mother dons a hostess gown or attractive dinner gown for even a simple dinner à deux. Whereas I, knowing there will be only the two of us, may come in sport clothes or even lounging pajamas, especially if I've had a long tiresome day at the studio and have gotten home late.

"'Oh, Claudette,' Mother will say, shaking her head reprovingly when she sees what I am wearing. I know that she feels that the evening meal deserves to be more highly honored. That I should at least make an effort to grace her table."

During this part of the conversation we were not neglecting the wonderful luncheon dish that had been recommended by the head waiter as the "special" for that day and one of their chef's masterpieces on any occasion. This dish proved to be a combination of eggs, tomatoes, mushrooms and seasonings, which quite lived up to the advance description of its merits. Claudette was particularly enthusiastic. So much so that I decided then and there to secure the recipe so that I could try it out myself in my test kitchen and then could pass on the complete directions to Modern Hostess readers.

Parenthetically speaking, that's just what I managed to do, although if you've ever tried to extract a recipe from a suspicious chef you would appreciate my efforts in your behalf even more! This luncheon prize, known as Eggs Netherland, which had won Claudette's praise, is indeed the crowning achievement of the Sherry-Netherland's Monsieur Theophile, Maitre de Cuisine—no less! You'll surely want to try it—then you'll want to serve it often. And think of the added pleasure you'll derive from knowing that the dish originated in such a swanky place and that it has Claudette's accolade of merit besides! But let's get back to Claudette for I haven't nearly finished giving you the helpful ideas I gleaned from my delightful table companion!

INSPIRED by the fact that the Eggs Netherland we had just eaten were simply a novel version of scrambled eggs, Claudette suggested other scrambled egg possibilities that you will want to try, too. One is to fill the eggs with finely chopped chives—imparting a lovely color contrast as well as a delicate, onion-like flavor. Scrambled eggs, where cream is used instead of milk, are delicious also. And all scrambled eggs are tremendously improved by being cooked over hot water instead of over direct heat. You'll be amazed at the difference it makes!

Speaking of cream and eggs, as we were a moment ago, there is a little omelette trick carried out by a Frenchwoman who is world renowned for her egg cookery. (I believe she boasts of knowing 1000 different ways of cooking eggs!) After an omelette is set in the pan and is ready to be folded over, a couple of tablespoonfuls of cream are poured into the pan. Somehow the omelette can then be folded with a flick of the wrist and with far less effort.

However Claudette did not confine her suggestions entirely to eggs, for she also feels that unusual things can and should be done with canapés, salads, desserts and even that lowliest of vegetables—the beet. Two of her canapé suggestions and one novel salad recipe are to be found at the end of this article. I can assure you that they are well worth trying.

The recipe for the salad, pictured at the beginning of the article, will be found in this month's recipe leaflet, together with a special French Dressing highly recommended by Claudette. Another Colbert recipe in the leaflet is for Stuffed Beets (as nice a way as I have ever heard of being both economical and dressy). Then there is another recipe in the Modern Hostess booklet you will surely want to try. It is Plums with Crême Colbert. This delicate sweet is a perfect proof of Miss Colbert's theory that dishes need not be elaborate to be delicious. This dessert is nothing but canned plums combined with a special French custard sauce. Unusual? Yes! Difficult? No! You can make it in your own home I'm sure—that is you can if you have the recipe! And of course all you need to do to procure that is to fill out and send the coupon. Yes, the recipes you receive, besides the Stuffed Beets, Swiss Salad and Plums with Crême Colbert just mentioned, will include the recipe for Eggs Netherland which Claudette wants you to know about so you can enjoy them too.

Favorite recipes of famous chefs—favorite foods of a famous screen star! What a combination! And yours for the asking! Write for them now so you can try them the sooner.

AND here are those other promised recipes before we say, with Claudette Colbert—"Au revoir."

Sardine Canapes

Cut thin slices of bread into oblong strips, each wide enough and long enough to hold a single boneless sardine. Fry the bread gently in butter, on both sides, until golden brown. Drain on paper kitchen towels. Place sardine on each bread strip, season with a couple of drops of lemon juice and cover with buttered bread crumbs. Place under broiler flame until crumbs are browned.

Chicken Curry Canapes

4 hard-cooked eggs
2 tablespoons mayonnaise
¼ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon curry powder
¼ cup chopped cooked chicken (canned chicken is excellent for this) fried rounds of bread

Cut hard-cooked eggs crosswise into thin slices. Carefully remove yolks without breaking the circle of whites. Blend yolks with mayonnaise. Add salt, curry powder and chicken (chopped very fine). Mix together thoroughly. Fry bread rounds gently in butter on both sides, until golden brown. Drain on paper kitchen towels. Place an egg-white circle on each round of bread. Fill centers with chicken mixture. Garnish each canapé with thin slice of stuffed olive.

Green Pepper Salad Rings

2 large, firm, green peppers
¾ cup cottage cheese

Helen Vinson and her mother, Mrs. Rulfs, leave Hollywood by plane. Helen will go abroad for Gaumont-British to make a picture with Conrad Veidt. This is in line with GB's plan to exchange American and English talent. Richard Dix and Walter Huston go over soon, too, while Robert Donat and others come here.

1½ tablespoons mayonnaise
⅛ teaspoon salt
½ teaspoon grated onion, or
1 teaspoon chopped chives
2 stalks celery
1 raw carrot, scraped
6 large stuffed olives
lettuce

Cut thin slice from stem end of green peppers. Remove seeds. Cream together cottage cheese and mayonnaise. Add salt and grated onion or chopped chives. Place celery, carrot and stuffed olives in chopping bowl. Chop very fine. Combine with cheese mixture. Stuff green peppers solidly with this mixture. Place peppers in coldest part of refrigerator to chill thoroughly. To serve, cut peppers crosswise into thick slices. Place one or two of these cheese-filled slices on lettuce leaves on individual salad plates. Serve with mayonnaise.

and the sauce is better than I can make!

"WHO wants to slave in a hot kitchen this hot weather? I'm sure I don't! That's why I'm doubly delighted to have discovered Franco-American Spaghetti. It not only saves me work, but we actually like it better than the kind I used to make. My sauce never was as good as this. I think Franco-American has the best sauce I ever tasted!"

Just try it and see!

We might recite the long list of eleven different ingredients this glorious sauce contains . . . the big, luscious, flavorful tomatoes . . . the mellow Cheddar cheese . . . all the tangy spices and seasonings. Yet mere words can never express the most important thing of all that goes into it — the inspired chef's touch! But one taste reveals it—makes women exclaim in surprise, "Why, this spaghetti is a lot better than mine!"

Costs less, too

Serve Franco-American soon. See what a hit it makes with everybody. And remember, Franco-American is not only easier and more delicious, but more economical, too. Actually, it costs less than buying dry spaghetti and ingredients for the sauce and burning fuel to cook them.

But that's only half the economy story. Franco-American is packed full of nourishment. It contains a rich supply of important food elements that are needed to build strength and energy, yet costs surprisingly little. Generous can holding three to four portions is never more than ten cents. Why not ask your grocer for this delicious spaghetti today?

play such parts as Wang in 'Good Earth' if and when that picture is made . . . or I should like very much to play the part of General Grant, whiskers, big black cigar and all if the story of the famous General's life is filmed."

I said, to myself, "It is too soon . . . the Barthelmess face should not be whiskered—not yet—"

Dick smiled, that memorable, one-sided smile of his. He gravely said, then, "I was dying on the screen. And I was dying, not of age but of youth. Youth can become a disease if we don't get over it in time. There comes the crisis in that disease and, if we do not meet that crisis bravely and maturely, we are doomed.

"I have grown weary of hearing people say to Ronnie Colman, to Bill Powell, to Warner Baxter and others, 'You gave a mar-vell-ous performance in "Thin Man" or "Clive of India" or this or that picture!' I don't mean that I am weary of hearing my friends praised or that I begrudge them their just due. It was and is their due. But I am weary of my own recent performances which, I well know, are entitled to no such praise."

I thought then, here is that freak of nature—the completely honest actor. And I thought, too, of the many years of youth this man, still in his thirties, has had. At his home in Beverly Hills, before we left for luncheon (the Barthelmess cook and butler being down with flu!) I had been looking over some of the scrapbooks his mother has kept for him ever since the days when he made the world Barthelmess-conscious by his performance in "War Brides" with Alla Nazimova. In 1916, that was. And one page out of all the millions of words and clippings in those books stuck in my memory. A popularity contest conducted in 1921 and there, among the first three names, the name of Barthelmess. William S. Hart headed that long-ago list, polling 64,556 votes. Wallace Reid came next with 59,824 votes and then came Dick with 37,460 votes to his young credit. And then on down a list of names which included William Farnum, Bryant Washburn, Eugene O'Brien, Warren Kerrigan and dozens of others. Dozens of others who are now only the shadows of shadows on the screen, while Barthelmess, finishing "Four Hours To Kill" at Paramount, is still a star today, and will be tomorrow, in his fixed and perpetual heaven.

I looked at him and thought—but those men were handsome, too, and young and had the same opportunities—why?

THEN Dick spoke again of saying goodbye to the boy who had been himself and I thought, those others . . . those who still live . . . they were not able to say goodbye to youth. They stood at the crossroads, too, and somehow they took the wrong turning.

"I knew," Dick said, "I knew several months ago that I stood at the crossroads. My pictures were terrible. I was terrible. I was miscast and ridiculous. People were laughing at me, not weeping with me. The reviews matched the pictures. I was dying—and I knew it.

"And so, there at the crossroads, there were four forks and I had my choice.

"One fork pointed to—retirement. I could retire, along with my scrapbooks and my memories and my family. And if I had so decided, I would have done so without complaint, without regret. I would have walked that fork of the road with contentment in my heart. I've nothing to complain about. I've had everything. I've made a small fortune. Some of it is gone now but there is enough left for me to live comfortably on, keep my family comfortably. I am completely happy. My original ambitions are fulfilled. People are apt to think of me as morose, melancholy because I have a sort of Buster Keaton pan—but that is just the face. The heart beats to jazz often enough.

"So, if I had followed that fork I could have gone to the South Sea Islands and lived the life of the lotus-eater, feeding upon memories. I considered that. There was a time, a few years ago, when I thought I wanted to do just that. But as I thought about it in the light of immediate action I knew that that dream, too, is the dream of youth. You have to be very young to dream of foregoing the world, of escaping the playing of your part. Very young or very much disillusioned. I am neither. And so that fork of the road was not for me to take.

"The second fork led to retiring from the business of acting and going into the business of producing and directing. Down that fork I did travel, quite a little way. I considered it very seriously. I believe that I am a producer at heart. In the old Inspiration Pictures days, in the days when I was working with Griffith, I had a lot to say about my parts and about the way I should play them. We were individuals then and not cans of soup turned out by a factory. And I've always been keenly interested in developing talent other than my own. Quite a few people who became prominent in pictures took their first starry steps in pictures of mine—Dorothy Mackaill and Bill Powell, Ernest Torrence and Madge Evans, Loretta Young and others.

"Last summer, in New York, Walter Camp and I discussed seriously the plan of re-forming our old Inspiration Pictures Company. We worked out plans and details. We decided that, if and when a Barthelmess story should present itself, I would do that story. But otherwise I would produce and direct other stars.

"We were just about set to go when Joe Schenck came home from abroad and we conferred with him. He was not encouraging about such a venture at this particular time. He told us that the picture grosses had fallen off considerably, due to the depression—and he scared us off and closed that fork of the road to me.

THE third fork led to signing a contract again with another studio. I knew what that would mean . . . stories I should not do . . . parts I should not play . . . a complete inability to do anything about it. If I took that fork, I knew that rigor mortis would set in!

"There was the last fork of the road open to me to travel—the branch that led to free-lancing, to doing only those parts, only those stories which I believe are suitable for me.

"I came back to Hollywood and I took that fork of the road. And now I have finished 'Four Hours To Kill' at Paramount. I play a murderer. And he is a long way down the road from 'Tol'able David,' from those boys who belong to my past.

"And so I have found maturity, or it has found me, and I have accepted it.

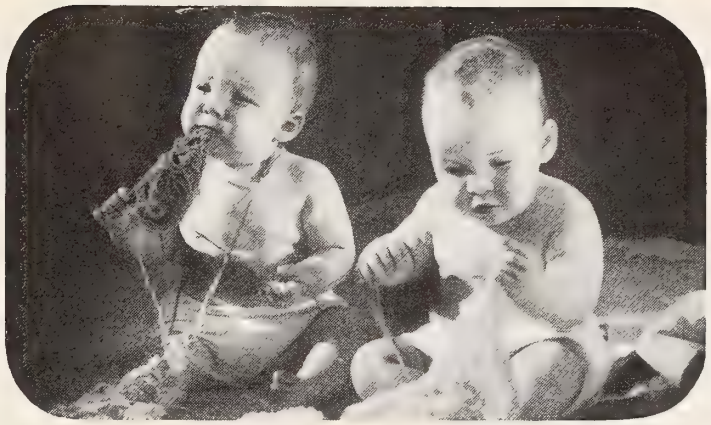
Gratefully, really. There was that book, 'Life Begins At Forty.' Well, I don't know about its beginning at forty but certainly it can go on from there and become richer, riper and more worthwhile with every milestone passed.

"It's especially hard for actors and actresses—I know. It's hard because we form the habit of looking into mirrors and believing that what we see there is the whole story.

"But with me it wasn't a question of looking at myself in the mirror one morning and exclaiming, 'I am no longer young!' It was a question of something deeper than the skin. I was no longer interested in being young. I was no longer interested in the parts I was playing.

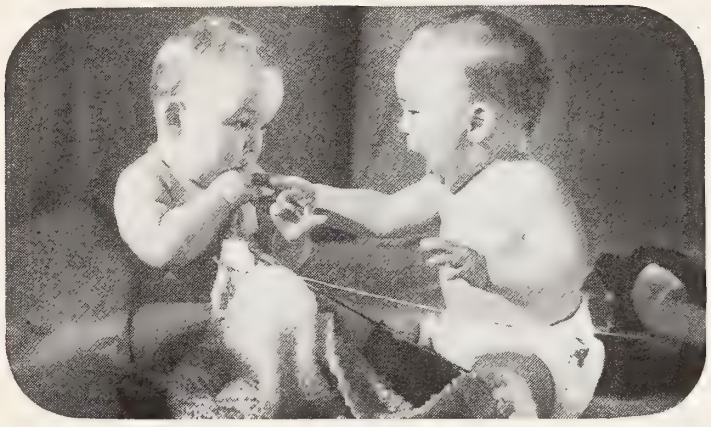
"Of course I am more mature than I was sixteen years ago. I hope so. I would hate to be the victim of an adolescent fixation. People say to me, reproachfully, 'You are heavier than you were ten years ago'. Great Heaven, why not? A man in his late thirties cannot have the lines of a boy in his 'teens. That is physically impossible.

"No, because an actor says good-bye to youth does not mean that that actor is dead. It works the other way 'round. Many a good actor as been entombed in his youth. And most of the men who are successful on the screen today— Ronnie, Bill, Bart Marshall and Warner Baxter are men who have never made youth a selling point.



"I shall work now—more than ever before for the joy of working. I have never taken pictures for a 'racket.' Always I've been intensely serious about my work. I've been grateful for the things my work has given me. Money doesn't interest me any longer. I want enough to pay my taxes, to educate our two children, to buy Jessie a new coat now and then. But there won't be enough money in all of Hollywood to make me play a part unless I believe in it. Unless I know it's truly a part suited to me.

"I should say that George Arliss is the perfect example of all I've been saying. He has the one quality which can defy age, is independent of looks or sex appeal. And that is charm.



"I have said good-bye to youth," Dick said, puffing slowly on his cigarette, "and in so doing I have said good-bye to uncertainties and perplexities, to the fear of losing my way. I know, now, what I want. In my private life as well as my professional. We hope to sell our house here in Beverly Hills. We want to buy a farm in the valley, not a ranch, I won't call it a ranch—I want a farm and I'll put a white picket fence all around and call it a farm. And we'll have a pig and bees and a cow and we'll travel when we have the nostalgia for far places. I'll do the pictures that are suitable for me to do —and I'm happier than I have ever been in the course of an almost completely happy life. Which should be some sort of encouragement for those others who stand at the crossroads weeping into the mirror they hold in their hands . . ."

And so, "Tol'able David" is gone—down that long bright roadway we see his slender, pathetic figure vanishing into the sunlit distance . . . and watching him go, a smile on his face, stands a man with the matured face of David . . . a man who is brave enough to say good-bye to youth...

the hullabaloo?"

"Because," he continued and his voice sounded as if he were pronouncing a death sentence, "the studio insists that, if somebody doesn't take the blame quickly and write an open letter of apology to the newspapers, her new picture may not be released over there. In other words, after reading that cunning little diary, every patriotic newspaperman went to the bat for his insulted nation in front page articles which berated the lady in no uncertain terms for accepting their hospitality and then turning on them with this insolent criticism. Ingratitude was the mildest term they used!"

"Who pays the piper?" I asked.

"You do," he answered. "You wrote it—you fix it! Someone has to get us out of the stew. Under the circumstances, no one could convince the temperamental lady that she said all those horrid things about that lovely country and its perfectly charming inhabitants!"

So I sat me down to write a masterpiece to "whomever it may concern" bringing all my journalist's tricks to the aid of the beautiful lady in distress. It didn't make much sense, but it was all about a bold, bad journalist to whom the innocent star had confided her European impressions—and aforementioned journalist had taken advantage of her trust.

Probably I closed the letter with: "Forgive me—I knew not what I did!"

Pity the poor fan writer!

WHEN I entered his dressing-room, he was deep in a story of intrepid exploring—about an expedition up the Amazon.

"How I envy those chaps," he said, reluctantly putting aside the magazine and stretching his legs. "What wouldn't I give to change places with them! If I had my way, and a little more courage, I'd chuck all this right now." With a somewhat contemptuous wave of the arm he indicated the elaborate dressing-room, the expensive suits of clothes, all the paraphernalia of a screen star who had arrived.

"I'm no actor, you know." He grinned ingratiatingly. "I'm just a simple fellow!"

"Tell that to your fans," I chuckled, "they'd sue you for libel! But supposing you weren't the proud possessor of all this—supposing you were foot loose and fancy free? What would you rather be?"

"Believe it or not," he said, "I'd rather be a writer than anything on earth. I envy you, and that's not supposed to be a joke. No, of course I don't envy you the job of interviewing film celebrities—you can keep all that. But I envy the ability of expressing what you see and feel in words!"

He was very serious now, even the dimples had disappeared.

"What would you write about?"

"Listen," he said, "I'm going to do something one of these fine days that you or any other writer could do if you had the nerve. I'm going to the editor of the National Geographic Magazine, or to one of those chaps who heads an exploring or archeological expedition. 'Mister,' I'll say, 'let me go along on that jaunt to Tibet as your official reporter. I'll write it all up for you, and I'll guarantee it'll be worth printing afterwards. It won't cost you anything but my food, clothing, and shelter!' . . . That's what I'd do!"

"But you never will," I jeered. "Give up all this success, money, adulation. Give it up for a life of hardship and uncertain living."

"Give up being a clothes horse and a background for beautiful film actresses, you mean! Well, you'll be surprised one of these days for that's what I'm going to do." He grinned again—both dimples in prominence.

"'Great Screen Star Renounces Life of Ease!'—or—'When A Man's A Man!' Read all about it in tomorrow's Daily Gazette. . . .' I can hardly wait to read about it," I teased.

"So you think it's all a joke, and refuse to believe me? Will you take a bet on it?"

"Any time limit?" I asked. "One year, two years, ten years?"

"Well," said he, hedging, "let's leave it this way—much sooner than you'd ever expect! You'll be advised when by telegram."

"Will I be advised where?" I asked.

"Not on your life," said he vehemently. "I want to be alone!"

And the sequel to it all? Can't you guess?

Several days later, a phone call from the studio: "Mr. So-and-So doesn't want you to mention that little discussion about exploring expeditions under his name!"

"But why?" I asked, dumfounded. "Oh, just because"—was the enlightening answer.

And it was Mr. So-and-So who said that he envied the life of a writer!

HER sudden marriage had set Hollywood agog. It was one of those rare occurrences which no one, not even a super gossip writer, could have predicted.

It certainly hadn't looked like a romance to anyone—quite the contrary.

Saturday evening she left the studio a bachelor girl and returned the following Monday—a married woman! The first person she saw, as she hurried out of her dressing-room, still smoothing on her make-up, was the man to whom she'd been engaged!

He was standing behind the camera looking at her intently. She almost fainted from the shock.

For her decision to marry that other man so hurriedly had been entirely on this man's account. What no one in Hollywood knew was that she had been engaged to an Easterner for almost a year. Shortly before she fell so violently in love with her present husband, her then-fiancé had written that he was coming to Hollywood to marry her. She had consented, for she was still in love with him.

If a soothsayer had predicted that a dark, handsome and very persuasive stranger was about to walk into her life, she would have hooted at him. If a crystal gazer had seen "a sudden great change and a new romance" she would have shrieked with laughter. She has an excellent sense of humor.

Nothing more or less significant than a kiss in the dark changed the whole course of her life. As unconventional a girl as she is—it was as conventional a formula for falling in love as the one recommended in the popular songs: a moon, a balmy night, a strong arm around her waist (they were riding the roller coaster at the beach)—and a kiss!

Three days later she knew she'd been attacked by a virulent disease. She was miserable. She was joyous. All at once and both together. It was like having chills and fever simultaneously.

And then came the proposal—as sudden as the kiss. For a few miserable hours she fought with herself. How could she tell her fiancé who was already on his way to California? She couldn't face him with this shattering disappointment.

"When will you marry me?" the one and only was doubtless whispering. Her impulse told her to answer: "Now—immediately!" Marriage at least would be something irrevocable as far as the other situation was concerned. Better a sudden shock for him than the endless hours of explanation, recriminations, pleadings, and remorse that would be inevitable if she waited until he arrived to try to explain. Better a clean finish.

And so they stole quietly away on a Sunday and were married. As soon as the ceremony was over, she telegraphed to her ex-fiancé, who was speeding out to her on the Sunset Limited.

After the telegram was sent, she wondered whether she had been too impulsive. Should she have waited for his arrival to break the engagement?

But the knot was tied—and her happiness was great enough to counterbalance any lurking sense of guilt. Yes, it was better to have broken the news this way. In the long run it would probably hurt him less.

So she arrived at the studio the morning after her wedding, hastily applied her make-up, and walked on to the set—to find him standing behind the camera—waiting for her.

It was to have been a surprise which he had carefully and lovingly planned for her. Obviously, he hadn't received the message aboard the train and was, therefore, still blissfully ignorant of the shock in store for him!

Yet the heroine of this romantic drama had solemnly vowed to me, only six months previous, that there were no men in her life. In fact, she knew there weren't going to be any for years to come.

And I believed her!

QUITE different from that other actor who aspired to be a writer, were the views of another well-known thespian who had no envy whatever of the writing tribe. Once he had been a writer, and he remembers those days when he was swayed by the fickle muse, with the same joy that Tommy remembers the last time he took castor oil.

For he was not the sort of writer who fluttered the assembled bosoms at ladies' literary societies. Nor did his name appear in neon-lights on the marquee of some Broadway theatre as the author of the season's latest hit play.

He was that lowliest of the entire writing fraternity—a ghost for one of America's shrewdest and most successful scribes.

"I thought I was stepping up on the ladder of success when I graduated from reporting the exciting goings-on at suburban bridge and rotary luncheons to making, tasty, salable morsels from the left-overs of my boss's fertile mind!

"Take it from me," he said with feeling. "I'd rather do anything than be chief bottle washer to a successful writer. My boss is a splendid fellow, if you don't happen to be working for him!"

He leaned back in his chair and shut his eyes. Enigmatic, those eyes. He was going to be reminiscent. "Many's the time," he said, "that we used to dash down to the corner drugstore for a breathing spell after squeezing an idea dry. That man was a wonder. One idea would serve him in more marketable ways than twenty could serve you or me. And he didn't encourage his help to loaf. While he sipped an ice cream soda, I stood behind him getting instructions for my next assignment. I didn't have the price of a soda. And he didn't think it was fair to get me into the habit of borrowing money!"

At this point in his reminiscences, I interrupted. "Whoa, hold on—I believe I know your former boss. He's one of my best friends. It's X, isn't it?" I asked, mentioning the name of one of Hollywood's most important scenarists.

"What!" he gasped. "You know X?" Then a crafty look came into his eyes. "But of course, X wasn't the man. I was talking about two different people. Another writer, and another ghost!"

He cleared his throat, then said, "Incidentally, did you know I was a friend of Capone? Yes, I knew him well. And he once told me that if anyone ever tried to get tough with me, all I had to do was let him know, and he'd shut them up effectively!"

Meekly I departed.

A FAMOUS illustrator, who had painted some of the most renowned beauties in America, once described his ideal woman as "a balanced combination of whiskey and ovaltine!" Exhilaration and lullaby. A snappy definition for the perfect woman!

The star of whom I'm about to write had always seemed to me to fit that description. Therefore, I looked forward to my first interview with her with some excitement, although I had long since recovered from the heroine-worship stage.

Yet, as I sat waiting in her dressing-room, I felt sentimental, sixteen once again. A supposedly skeptical, perhaps even blasé person—the fan writer turned fan!

Then she arrived and in a few moments I was completely captivated. Gracious, easy in conversation, sincere, cultivated—she soon made me forget that she was a famous star enduring one of those abhorrent duties one executes reluctantly as part of the sacrifice for being a celebrity. And she, absorbed in the conversation, forgot an appointment for a costume fitting.

We had talked openly on a number of subjects, and some of her expressed opinions she asked me not to quote. I gave her my word—and kept it. I was particular to do so, since she had been misquoted more frequently than anyone else in Hollywood.

"Why must they write all that nonsense about me? Why need they continually misquote me?" she demanded. I couldn't tell her that the creation of sensational myths was a weakness peculiar to journalists. That would have been giving my brethren away. Also I couldn't have told her that she rated all this publicity because the public would read anything printed about her. She was a personality plus—the sort who always is noticed. Volatile as mercury, changeable as a chameleon, a combination of whiskey and ovaltine. If I had said that, she would have thought me out of my mind.

"I hope you can make something out of our random talk," she said as we shook hands. "And, by the way," she added, "you'll let me see the story when it's finished, won't you?"

Of course, I promised to show it to her. Who could have resisted such charm? Besides, I wanted her public to see her as she really was: a simple, sincere, completely feminine person and not an exotic, erratic prima donna.

In due time, the article was sent to her, and I awaited confidently her cachet of approval. Quite objectively, I judged it a good job of writing, and a flattering, though completely honest, portrait of this star. Certainly, she of all people, would appreciate its sincerity. But again, I was too naive!

A message arrived from the studio. Would I please come out that afternoon?

I found her still charming, but whereas she had been girlish and disarming before, she was now regal and distant. I soon discovered that her ladyship was neither amused nor pleased with my efforts to portray her as I saw her. Wasn't I making a grave mistake? Certainly her public wouldn't be in the least interested to read that she was just an ordinary woman with human problems and perplexities. No indeed, the article was not at all what she expected.

I should have been crushed. But I wasn't. What did she think they wanted to know about her, I demanded. "Your own words give a better picture of you than any description I could write, that's why I quoted you so literally. But you must admit that I didn't mention any of those things that you asked me not to quote."

"No," she said, and now her tone was icy, "you didn't misquote me but I do not like your story. I expected something different."

Once more she was ingratiatingly exercising that fatal charm. "Surely, you'll write another story, giving in your own words your impression of my personality?"

But this time I was adamant. "No," I said, matching her tone, ice for ice. "You asked me to quote you accurately, yet you don't like what you say when you see it in print."

"It is evident," she said, "that you do not understand me!" And her glance was enough to ossify me.

No, I didn't understand her. And the editor who accepted the story as one of the fairest and most sympathetic he had read about the lady, couldn't understand me when I wired him not to publish it.

"What's the idea?" he wrote back. "Are you retiring, or isn't our magazine good enough for you?"

There was no use trying to explain. He wouldn't have understood my compunctions. A good newspaperman, like the colonel in "Lives of a Bengal Lancer," puts his job first. Was I growing lily-livered? He still thinks I'm either crazy or very susceptible!

Pity the poor fan writer!

Magnificent was her scorn. As magnificent as Lady Macbeth's. As scorching as Electra's. After the first five minutes of acquaintance, I was as dejected as the drenched landscape without, as desolate as her two pet Australian finches who, with pathetic industry, were building a nest in their cage because it was spring in Australia.

I had only strength left to sit and listen weakly, while another tempestuous lady of a thousand audacious legends flooded my mind (what there was left of it) with a monologue which was all frankness and light!

"You asked me to compare motion picture performers to the great actors and actresses of my day. Absurd! You asked me to compare Norma Shearer to Sarah Bernhardt. Still more absurd!

"What do such admirable young women as Norma Shearer know of the acting of my contemporaries? In the first place, they're too young ever to have seen them. In the second place, there has been a war. You knew that, I presume!"

Her eyes blazed; her hands moved with an epic gesture of contempt.

"That war made an unbridgeable gulf between the standards of my generation and the generation you asked me to comment upon.

"When I was young, a young woman who showed her legs was considered immoral. Immediately after the war, short skirts were the height of fashion. So why should I sit here and waste your time and mine by attempting such ridiculous comparisons?

"You might as well have asked me to compare making shoes to painting. One is an industry—the other an art.

"Has anyone the right to call himself an artist whose business is to stand in front of the camera and say the same sentence over twenty-five to ninety times? First with the chin up, then with the chin down, then grinning into the camera, then pulling a long face sideways. . . .

"Is there any art in a love scene in which the embrace is measured mathematically? While the hero clasps the heroine in his arms and mutters, 'Darling,' passionately, some make-up person runs back and forth daubing glycerine under the heroine's eyes so that she seems to be crying?

CAN there be any sincerity in that same passion of the hero when the director interrupts a moment of high emotion with, 'Lower your voice.' The hero tries it again. 'Darling,' he booms in a bass gutteral, this time pitching his voice two tones lower. 'Higher,' screams the director. And when it's all done and they've been pushed about like mannikins, they find out the next day that this 'fine speech' or 'touching scene' has been clipped right out of the picture.

It doesn't take a sleuth to know that this is Jack La Rue's sister, Emily, with him! The other gal is Connie Simpson.

"So how can you say that the actor has anything to do with the creation of a role in a moving picture? How can you say that he builds a character when the last scene of the story is often shot and finished before even the director knows what the beginning is going to be? It's the make-up, the lighting, the camera, and the cutting which make the fans gurgle at the great screen actress or actor.' What a performer may consider his finest spontaneous gesture is thrown out by the director or cutter, who, with the camera and make-up men, are the real creators in this industry.

"But don't for a moment go away with the idea that I'm not pleased with Hollywood or motion pictures. I adore it out here. I love the climate, the flowers, the sunshine, the charming and amusing people I've met (and don't let anyone tell you there aren't many of those here)—and most of all, the money!"

This was the essence of the curtain lecture she fired at me when, in good faith, I asked her to compare today's feminine screen stars with yesterday's great women of the theatre. It had seemed a harmless enough question, but oh—what it brought in its wake!

Unfortunately, she was also one of those who wanted to see the story before it reached print. I, trusting creature, blithely promised.

I returned several days later, with a copy under my arm, to find her, whose name was a tradition, in something of a temper. Seeing me seemed to irritate her still more. She started her tirade.

Why, in heaven's name, she had granted me an interview, she couldn't understand. She must have felt sorry for me. If I wrote because I needed money, far better that I had gone to her and asked for $25, instead of her opinions! She would far rather have given me the former!

My pride bristled. I had to hold on to the chair and pray for self-control.

Having delivered herself of this little pleasantry, she settled down to read the article she knew she "wasn't going to like." (Portions of it I have quoted above.)

Her eyes took in the first three paragraphs, then flashed dangerously.

"This is outrageous!" she cried.

I sat there blinking, too dumfounded to speak.

"Young person," she said, drawing herself up to her full height, and practically sweeping me out of the door with her words, "I shall not permit this to be printed. Why? Because . . ." and with a grand flourish she took her pen from the desk and wrote in large letters across the top of my article, "I object to personal interviews!"

Then, to put the finishing touches to a perfect experience, she swept magnificently to the telephone and rang up my editor: "Just to make sure that the young person who entered my house under false pretenses won't try to put something over on me—as is the custom in Hollywood!"

After which knock-out blow, the lady, who took back everything she said, bade me an hysterical farewell in the manner of the best melodramas.

"I shall ask you to go," she said, "for I am not used to strangers in my house! In fact, I am beginning to feel ill!"

And wondering whether I would ever awake from this nightmare, and all the others, I staggered out into the California sunshine.

Amazing gains in Energy in cases of extreme RUN-DOWN CONDITION*

Patients in hospitals got better appetite and digestion—clearer skin—as CONSTIPATION left

In a leading Eastern institution, patients got these marked benefits:—

IN one American hospital, 93% of chronic constipation cases were corrected by treatment with Fleischmann's new Yeast. Similar results were obtained in 89% of skin cases of digestive origin . . . These typical cases were taken from hospitals' actual records:—

CASE OF N. M. WOMAN. AGE 24.

Constipated. Patient had suffered for many months from indigestion, anemia and underweight. Bad skin condition (acne vulgaris).

After treatment with the new Fleischmann's Yeast, bowel movements showed marked improvement. Indigestion disappeared. Patient's skin improved. She slept better.

CASE OF Q. W. WOMAN. AGE 23.

Obstinately constipated since childhood. Anemic, underweight, digestion and appetite poor. Was given 6 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast every day.

General condition improved very much, bowels moved much better and more often. Patient made almost complete skin recovery.

"It is of great therapeutic importance. I had remarkable results," says the famous Dr. Cain.

Dr. André Cain (pointing to X-ray) is one of many physicians who have reported remarkable success with the new yeast. He is Physician-in-chief of the Hospice d'Ivry, near Paris.

This cause of run-down condition completely corrected by new food rich in "Protective Substances."

A NEW WAY to treat run-down condition—which consists in adding one food regularly to the diet—is now giving remarkable results in American hospitals and clinics!

A most common cause of run-down condition is constipation. And constipation, it has been found, can be completely corrected by increasing the body's supply of certain "protective substances" stomach and bowels need.

No ordinary diet supplies enough of these substances—not even diets with fruits and vegetables. But one food is extremely rich in them. This is the new Fleischmann's Yeast!

This new fresh yeast increases the flow of your stomach's juice, stimulates and strengthens the muscles of your stomach and intestines.

As a result, your food "digests" better—elimination becomes normal—your system is freed from the bowel poisons which so often cause unnatural fatigue—indigestion—skin troubles. Begin now to eat the new Fleischmann's Yeast and eat it regularly, following the rules below:—

Eat three (or more) cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast each day—plain, or in water, milk, or fruit juice.

Eat it one-half hour before meals so it can start your digestive juices flowing before other food enters your stomach.

If you're taking cathartics, discontinue them gradually. Have a regular time for evacuation—preferably after breakfast.

At grocers, soda fountains, restaurants.

THE NEW FLEISCHMANN'S YEAST can give complete bowel regularity . . . help you keep free from constipation and indigestion, skin troubles, run-down condition. It's a food—not a medicine.

* . . . caused by constipation. To be sure of the cause of your condition, see a doctor.

How Are Joel and Frances Getting Along?

loyal fans, of which she has plenty, will be surprised at the improvement over her past performances. A new sweetness and understanding of life shows in her work, and color photography, heretofore more or less an experiment, has found her an ideal subject.

"I wanted to give up my career when I married Joel," she continued, "but he wouldn't let me. I thought marriage, a home, husband and family were all I wanted. Joel knew I was sincere in my belief but he was wise enough to realize that sooner or later I might miss my work and blame him."

"I have always said I wouldn't let my wife do anything," Joel interrupted. "In fact, I always declared I'd never marry an actress, which only goes to prove that men as well as women can change their minds. I thought the place for a married woman was at home but now I wouldn't want to be married to a girl who didn't have some outside interest—something to keep her alive and alert. I think every wife should have something besides housework and petty daily cares to think of.

I EARN enough money to hire all the help she needs at home. Frances hasn't enough to do in the house to occupy her time, even with the baby, which she doesn't want to let out of her sight for more than a few minutes.

"But Frances has too much ability to stop now. I didn't feel that marrying me was enough to compensate her for giving up a career. Anyway, what would she do if she didn't work? Spend her time at cocktail parties or playing bridge? Fortunately, she doesn't care for that sort of thing."

Frances confirmed that statement with an emphatic shake of her head.

It is apparent that Joel understands women although he was never regarded as a "ladies' man." He knows how changeable a woman, particularly an actress, can be. He should, in this instance, at least, for he remembers that for six months Frances refused to meet him. "What's the use?" she asked her friends who were trying to bring the two together. "He isn't the type of man I like."

But Fate was on Joel's side and they met when they played opposite each other in "The Silver Cord." Five months later they were married.

"I wasn't terribly interested in getting married until I met Frances," Joel admits. "I had the ranch, which took up all my spare time. When I decided to marry I didn't know how a girl of Frances' type would like it. But she is as enthusiastic as I am about living in the country."

The Circle M, their thousand-acre ranch forty miles from Hollywood, is the place they call home. They keep an apartment in town, where they live when either one is working on a picture, but the minute they finish they can be found at the ranch. Rather, they can't be found, for without even a telephone they are safe from every sort of outside disturbance.

There, in their attractive farm house, which never steps out of character despite every modern convenience, they live. There, from the top of their own private hill, they can look in any direction conscious that everything within eye sight is their own. They can ride horseback for hours, which they do every morning, without venturing off their own property. They can don bathing suits and dash down the hill a little way to dive into the swimming pool, which is no fancy, blue-tiled Hollywood creation but a cement-lined hole in the ground.

On the ranch they spend their time very much en famille, for they are a very clannish couple. Not that they aren't the friendliest people in the world, but they are very much wrapped up in their respective families. There is a suite in the farm house built to accommodate the two grandmothers of little Joel Dee McCrea, and it is always occupied by one or the other of them.

THEY are seldom seen at parties or at the late spots in Hollywood and when one or the other is preparing for a new picture many evenings are spent in studying their roles.

"Frances and I always rehearse our roles together," Joel recounted. "We hold script for each other. When Frances is giving me my cues she often suggests a better way for me to play a scene. I try her way because she is a much better actress than I am an actor and is good on characterization while I am better on judging stories.

"At first we were very embarrassed rehearsing before each other—probably more so than we would have been with anyone else—but now we don't mind at all. By rehearsing and becoming thoroughly familiar with a role before we start a picture, our work is much easier when we go on the set to start work on a picture."

"I'm more interested in my career than ever," he continued enthusiastically. "Frances got me out of a rut."

"I wasn't exactly indifferent about my acting," he protested when it was suggested that he may have been more interested in the ranch than he was about anything else.

"Well, maybe I was a little bit indifferent," he admitted reluctantly, and then, as though to explain, added, "I was making enough money and getting by as a personality actor. Frances got me to go to her teacher, Samuel Kayzer, and he's done a lot for me. She said if I was going to act I ought to be a good actor. Everyone seems to think I have improved, so I owe it all to Frances and Mr. Kayzer. He's the fellow who coached Freddie March and Ann Harding and, oh a lot of well-known actors. He knows his business.

"I don't want to keep on acting until I'm an old man," he laughed. "I want to quit a year before they fire me. But I don't want to stop now. I feel that I'm just getting into my stride. I'd like to be in outdoor pictures—the type of thing George Bancroft does. I think I'd be pretty good at that sort of thing." At which point the little woman nodded a vehement affirmative.

"When they offered me the role in 'Private Worlds' they didn't think I'd take it because another actor, Charles Boyer, was the star. I told them I didn't care who else was in the picture. All that mattered to me was my part. I don't mind playing with a star like Boyer, Herbert Marshall, Bill Powell or any good actor."

Since Joel began his screen career about seven years ago he has been almost continuously under term contract to one company or another. He has had the bitter experience of receiving a salary week after week, for months at a time, without ever setting foot before a camera. He has many times played roles for which he was not at all suited. And he refuses now to be bound by a term contract to any company.

"I don't want to sign another contract because I feel if I'm free to select the roles I play I will progress faster," he explained. "Being under contract is just like being pensioned. You have to take a role whether you are fitted for it or not because you are being paid every week. I can make a living on the ranch. I don't have to make pictures. But I want to, of course.

"Frances may sign a contract if she can have a clause in it giving her the right to turn down parts that she doesn't feel she should do.

"So far we've been fortunate in working and being idle together, but neither of us would give up a good part just because the other wasn't working. We would give up a trip or a vacation, however, if a good role came up for either of us. Why not? It's business. A career is a great deal more important than having a good time."

JOEL'S feet are firmly on the ground. Having money is nothing new to him. He has always had it but, being an independent determined sort of chap, he has always insisted upon earning his own way. He's Scotch, too, and decidedly the head of the family, which suits Frances just fine. She is the perfect wife, always seeming to agree with anything Joel says. Only once since their marriage have they held a different opinion on what, to them, was a serious matter.

That time it concerned the question of whether or not the baby should take sun baths. Joel, being addicted to fresh air and the great outdoors, believes that no one can get too much sun. Frances, the cautious, young mother, thinks the direct glare of the sun is too strong for a baby and might injure her child's eyes. This slight difference of opinion which, in many instances, might have developed into a dandy family row, was settled amicably and in short order when Joel said, "Well, a baby is a woman's business and Frances knows best."

So little Joel Dee, whom they call "Dee," does not take sun baths and when he is taken outdoors fully dressed, wears a fetching little pink sunbonnet.

"Most young married people expect too much of love," Joel said in further explaining their happiness. "They think life after marriage is going to be just like it was before; that they can go on having one long good time. They can have a good time, of course, but it's different. Marriage takes away your freedom and gives you responsibilities. Frances and I both wanted to have a baby right away. We want our family while we are young and we wanted to have responsibilities."

They agree that the responsibilities are more than overbalanced by the compensations of having each other, and they think a little more responsibility—for instance, one more baby—will make everything just perfect.

"But we have no plan for working out our lives," they insist.

So, as Gertrude Stein might say, having no plan, no plan, no plan seems to be an excellent, excellent, excellent plan!

Every woman should make this "Armhole Odor" Test

No matter how carefully you deodorize your underarm—if any dampness collects on the armhole of your dress, you will always have an unpleasant "armhole odor." Test this by smelling your dress tonight

EVERY sophisticated woman realizes that to be socially acceptable she must keep her underarm not only sweet but dry. Those who deodorize only—because it is easy and quick—soon find out to their sorrow that the easy way is not the sure way.

The reason is simple. Creams and sticks are not made to stop perspiration. No matter how little you perspire—some moisture is bound to collect on the armhole of your dress. And the warmth of your body brings out a stale, unpleasant odor within a few minutes after you put your dress on!

Once you realize that nothing, not even the most careful dry cleaning, will completely remove this musty smell, you will know why women who want to be sure never to offend use Liquid Odorono.

SAFE . . . ask your physician

Odorono was developed 23 years ago by a physician for his own use. Your physician will tell you it has no harmful effect. Women use millions of bottles yearly. It does not dry up or injure the pores of the underarm in any way. It simply draws the pores together and diverts the underarm perspiration to other parts of the body where it can evaporate quickly without becoming offensive and embarrassing.

Examine your dress tonight

If you are not a regular Odorono user, when you take off your dress tonight, smell the fabric at the armhole. You may be horrified when you realize that that is the way you smell to anyone who is close to you!

It will help you to understand why women who try short cuts to daintiness always come back to Odorono. In the end, Odorono is easier. There's no fuss and bother with shields. Odorono ends guesswork and worry scientifically and safely.

Odorono comes in two strengths. Regular Odorono (Ruby colored) requires only two applications a week. Instant Odorono (Colorless) is for especially sensitive skin or for hurried use—to be used daily or every other day. You will want to have both in the house—for night or morning use.

Make Odorono a serious habit, and you will enjoy complete freedom from moisture, ruinous and humiliating stains and careless, untidy "armhole odor."

On sale at all toilet goods counters. If you want to know the relief and confidence brought by Odorono, send for the two samples and leaflet on complete underarm dryness offered below.

CAREFUL WOMEN avoid all "armhole odor" in their dresses by gently closing the pores of the underarm with Liquid Odorono. Millions of bottles are used every year by women who insist on being sure.

admirers almost innumerably. There is no sensation in the world, no thrill in the world comparable to the thrill of being loved.

I SUPPOSE I'd never thought much about the thrill part of it because the thrills an actress is supposed to have are not thrills to me. In the first place my mother, Katharine Clinton, was an actress. I was brought up in a world of theatre talk and theatre people. The mystery was matter-of-fact to me.

"The other, so-called thrills are terrors to me. I am shy. I am easily embarrassed. I would loathe having my carriage drawn through the public streets by human hands. The equivalent of that in our day and way is being besieged by autograph-seekers in public places. I am grateful for the interest that prompts that seeking, of course, but I am too frightened and self-conscious to get any authentic thrill out of it.

"I loathe all of the trimmings. I hate the publicity part of it. I'm afraid of interviews. I detest posing for pictures. I despise fittings yet I've been called one of 'the best dressed women on the screen,' which always hands me a laugh, seeing as how I never wear anything but pajamas or last year's sport clothes when I'm not working. I probably care less for clothes, for shopping, than any woman in the world. I wouldn't go shopping on a bet unless I have to.

"I like to be comfortable but luxury per se has no appeal for me. I still prefer lamb chops to any form of dietary delicacy. I always drive my old Ford around by myself. I have a nice house with some things I care about in it but it is the kind of a house that any competent business girl could have if she wanted to.

"I never 'do anything' about my personal appearance. I mean, I eat anything I want to eat, and if I do gain an extra pound or two, I never know it. I never go in for beauty parlor stuff. I never have massages nor facials. Sunshine and fresh air and keeping my face clean are my 'Helpful Hints To Beauty.' I like to play tennis, bridge and backgammon. I like to watch football games and six-day bicycle races. I adore to read detective stories. I spend every available spare moment on my schooner, the 'Pamet-Head.' I have two dogs, two cats, a parrot, a rabbit, a canary, some gold fish, some very refined frogs.

YOU may want to know what all this has to do with the thrill of being an actress? Just this: the things that make up my personal life could easily be a part of any moderately successful woman's life. The thrills that are popularly supposed to belong to an actress—orchid-like cultivation of one's beauty, sensational public appearances, gorgeous clothes with intensive time and attention given to them, diets of caviar and peacocks' tongues, night clubs and all the rest of the glitter and glamor are not my thrills at all.

"But," said Kay, "I have my thrills, my kind of thrills. I've told you about the greatest of them all. There are others. Being an actress is a job to me. And right there is where my next big thrill rears its startling head. It's thrilling to me to have a job. Any kind of a job in these difficult days. I'm grateful for it. Grateful that I'm independent, able to do for myself, beholden to no one. I'm even more grateful and more thrilled that I'm able to do pleasant things for my mother and for others I am fond of."

Speaking of doing things for those others she is fond of, reminds me of an odd predilection of Kay's. She never gives Christmas presents. That is, not on Christmas. She says that Christmas is a very sacred festival to her and that she feels it should be kept sacred and kept—a festival. And that this very spirit is being murdered by the hard, commercial spirit of exchange which has crept into the world of late. The calculating spirit of "She or he is going to give me something and I'll have to return it in kind." And so Kay does it all differently. All through the year, all of the time, she sends a gift to this friend or that, whenever she happens to see something she knows that friend would really care about. If such a gift happens to present itself around Christmas time, all right. But if it happens to come her way in May or June or July she sends it then. I like that, don't you?

"And then," Kay was saying, the pale smoke from her cigarette making a mist about her night-black head, "and then there is the thrill of knowing that I am contributing my small share to the entertainment and pleasure of thousands of people. I am one of those who may be said to have a 'Mission in Life.' And I believe in helping people to take their minds off themselves and their own problems, even for a little alleviating space of time.

"Oh, I've had one or two of the expected thrills, too, of course. Anyone who can eat sixty-nine doughnuts in the course of a morning is human, all too human. I had a thrill when I first saw my name on a four sheet, for instance. I was going by train, I remember, from Los Angeles to San Francisco. On the way up, I happened to glance out of the window, and there on the bill-boards, as tall as the sky, was the name KAY FRANCIS in—whatever the picture was. I've forgotten. But I've not forgotten that I did feel a very genuine thrill.

THERE was the time when I bought my first, and only, mink coat. This one. Like most other girls and women, I'd dreamed of the day when I should own a mink coat of my own. Back in the days when I was doing secretarial work, when I was working in the real estate office, even when I was 'just a housewife.' I'd see lovely, sumptuous ladies swishing about in mink and things. I'd sigh, and wonder whether I, too, might own a mink . . .! Then the day came when I could. I gave many days to it, as a matter of fact, I shopped that time. I compared mink with mink. I determined to have nothing but the best. I got it—and the real thrill was not so much the mink coat, as the fact that I was buying it for myself!

"Having a job, independence is a real thrill to me, you see. I'd feel the same way about any work I might happen to be doing so long as it was my work and I was making my own money and standing on my own two feet.

"Independence is the supreme thrill—it is the one I am working for. And when I have it, I shall retire from the screen. Yes, I know . . . everyone has said that and no one ever does it. But I shall. I might, in my retirement, make a picture or do a play, now and again, if I was asked to. But for all practical, day-by-day purposes I shall be retired. I'll live simply. I'll travel, I'll read, I'll have my schooner. Then, and only then, will the real thrill of being an actress come home to me—when it has become the thrill of having been an actress!

"I get a thrill out of my mother's thrills. The first time my name was ever on Broadway in electric lights, Mother went down to that theatre and walked around the block a dozen times, just so she could look at it. She even took a camera with her and made a picture of it . . ."

Kay smiled, that rich and luscious smile of hers. She said, "I hope I haven't disappointed you. I should have been able to tell you feverish tales of lovers and rendezvous—of freedom to live my own life—and temperament—of trysts and orchids and gold bath tubs and champagne massages—but we work too hard to have many rendezvous. We have less freedom than any other group of people in the world. If we have a little fit of temperament, it is front page news within the hour. Happiness is difficult to snare and to secure because happiness roots best in peace—and there is no peace. Orchids and gold bath tubs and champagne dips are the kind of thrills other people think we get. Perhaps some actresses do. I doubt it. That sort of thing is as old-fashioned as the gentlemen who died with white gloves in their hands . . .

"No, the thrill of being an actress is, to me, the thrill of being loved by more people than could ever have known of my existence otherwise. It is the thrill of having a job. It is the thrill of being able to make my mother's life pleasanter than it might have been without me and my work. It is the thrill of believing that I am giving my small share of pleasure and amusement to others. It is the supreme thrill of being more alive than I might have been if I did not live under a magnifying glass . . ."

A boy staggered by bearing six mammoth boxes. The air became redolent of doughnuts. George Brent beckoned, bleakly, from the set.

Kay trod out her cigarette with a white satin heel. She gathered her mink about her. She said, "If there is any thrill in death by doughnuts, I'll let you know . . . farewell . . ."

Leave it to us, Lady

we'll tell your MAN about MUM

THAT'S too bad, now—to have this, of all things, come between you and that man who is "practically perfect" about everything else.

We'll tell you something. A lot of men are like that—far too many. Great fellows, most of them, but they haven't learned the facts of life about this perspiration business.

Just leave it to us. We'll fix it.

Send us his name and address on the coupon below, and we'll send him something that will make him absolutely proof against underarm odor.

We'll send him a sample of Mum, the instant cream deodorant that so many men use who have learned that their daily shower won't protect them.

We'll tell him all about Mum—how it takes no time at all to use, is harmless to clothing, soothing to skin, doesn't prevent perspiration itself—just its ugly odor. And how soothing it is to burning, perspiring feet and how it destroys every trace of odor.

Just his name and address on the coupon below—not yours.

MUM

Will he be grateful? He'll be looking for someone to thank!

and a high-school goulash of French and German. But all to no avail. Maureen finally went into action. She made the motions of scrubbing her face and washing and drying her hands and brushing her hair. Maureen proved what a graphic and poignant actress she can be in "David Copperfield," but I'm here to state that she never did a more superb bit of pantomime than she did the other night on the threshold of the Thalberg home with the gaping Thalberg retinue for audience. And the result was that five minutes later Maureen descended the Thalberg stairs bearing a bathbrush and a dainty monogrammed guest-towel.

WE found later that Bob Montgomery had tipped Norma off to what was going on and between them they had primed the servants to pretend to speak no English and to chatter gibberish so as to make it more difficult for Maureen. They reckoned without the histrionic ability of the Irish!

Joan Bennett's was our next stop-over. We were commissioned to get a baby's rattle from Joan's nursery. Joan and Gene Markey were playing some sort of a card game when we arrived. Maureen decided to use honesty instead of subterfuge in this case. She came right out and told Joan what we were doing and what we wanted. And here she met up with a fierce maternal possessiveness. For Joan said that we could have anything in the house just so long as we would leave the baby's rattle. Anything belonging to small Melinda, she said, was too precious to trust to the hands of a—a scavenger. Maureen said that this meant failure and, no doubt, the loss of the prize, but that she could perfectly appreciate a mother's sentiments and be moved by a mother's tears. If Joan would give us a diamond bracelet the head pow-wow of the scavengers might not count the loss of the rattle against us. Instantly Joan disappeared and then appeared again bearing a diamond bracelet and we went forth into the night with the exalted emotions of those who have spared a mother's heart. Even the officer was snuffling and rubbing his eyes with his coat sleeve as he lurked in the doorway and watched too that tender little scene.

We hunted down Francis Lederer next. Never mind where. We promised not to tell. Francis' whereabouts were not a part of our assignment. What we did have to get from Francis was a front page of one of his most cherished World Peace pamphlets. Francis was amenable to reason only after we had promised to bring up our sons, if any, without a single firecracker on the Fourth of July and total abstinence from toy guns, cannons or even a bean-shooter. Having made two World Peace converts of us, Francis ripped off the front page of one of his pamphlets and we stole forth from the retreat of Francis.

MAUREEN stepped on the gas, the officer zoomed after us and we sped back to Beverly Hills again. This time to the home of Director W. S. Van Dyke who has scavenged Africa and the North Pole and other outposts of comfort for the masterpieces he has given to the screen. Maureen said that she was really ashamed to go to Van Dyke's. He is known to all scavenger hunters as a willing martyr to the cause of scavenging. His weekly bills for remodelling, redecorating and refurnishing his scavenged home are part of his heavy overhead. Van was just leaving his house, all uniformed and tanned and handsome. He greeted us without surprise. Maureen told him, timidly, that we simply had to get three white hairs from the bear-skin rug in front of his fireplace. She admitted that he could have felt no greater terror when he speared the polar bear in the Far North than she did while making this request. Van gave his hearty, genial laugh. He said, "Go in and take the whole rug if you want it. I can go back North and get another." But Maureen is as conscientious as she is courageous. She has punctilio and she might have had pneumonia. She produced a pair of tweezers from a diminutive pocket and carefully abstracted three white hairs from the recumbent bear skin.

On our way back from Van's we stopped at Bill Powell's. Bill is living in the Lita Grey Chaplin house here in Beverly Hills pending the completion of his new mansion. Bill was at home. Alone. Reading. Maureen told him right out, with the blushes that only Maureen can richly and redly blush, that she had to get from him an autographed photograph of Jean Harlow. Bill seemed to have a mother's heart where this treasure was concerned. He, like Joan, offered us anything in his possession if we would forego the photograph of Jean. But this time Maureen stood her ground. She said that this was a deadly serious business. It was, in a way, life or death. . . Bill finally removed a lovely smiling head of Jean from the nearest table and handed it to us, a catch in his throat and the prayer that we would return it to him before the stars should have faded from the western sky. (It was returned to him, I know. I returned it.)

The officer sort of choked up over this one, too. He said that he didn't know that these here now scavenger hunts could be so pitiful.

We drove on to Toluca Lake. We had to snare Bing Crosby. And Bing's was a honey. In a businesslike brief-case Maureen carried one of those little recording machines into which a person sings and his voice is recorded. We had to persuade Bing to make that record. Bing looked a trifle weary when, with more of the O'Sullivan blushes, he was asked to make for us an impromptu record. He said that he was really awfully busy with the Santa Anita racing news. He said that he was incorporated but was seriously thinking of incorporating as the most scavenged man in town. And he finally broke down and sang, "Baby's Shoes" for us—and for the record. He reminded us that it should, in his case, be titled "Babies' Shoes."

We had one funny little one to do with a member of our own hunt. We had been commissioned to get one of Tom Brown's love letters to Anita Louise. Our orders read, delicately, that we were not to read the letter nor more than glance at it. Well, we failed. Maureen talked to Anita Louise's mother and was told that Tom had never written any letter to Anita Louise. They have never been separated long enough to make a letter possible. And whenever there has been distance or time between them, Tom has used the phone. Which seemed to us to be something of a sly peep into a lovely young love.

"I don't really mind failing," Maureen said, "for such a darling reason."

OF course, we had to stop at Mae West's. We invaded her apartment, guards and all—and were doubtless admitted, not on our own face value, but because of the portly presence of the officer of the law. We told her that we'd come to get a new Mae West joke. And Mae gave us this one: It seems that she met the Invisible Man on the set the other day. She said to him, "Why don't you come up and see me sometime?" Whereupon he answered, "Why, Mae, I was up there last night!" Mae added that this quip might be on every tongue by morning, but it was brand new as she handed it to us.

Joan Crawford was on our list. Joan lives practically next door to the Clark Gables in Brentwood. We should have skipped over the mock oranges and gone to Joan's directly from Clark's. In our excitement we forgot to do that. So out to Joan's we went. Joan had just finished running an after-dinner picture. Franchot was there and two or three other Joan-admirers. We were commissioned to get from Joan a—guess what? A gardenia! We were hospitably invited in. Maureen cast an eager eye over the lapels of Franchot and the other gentlemen. Not a gardenia among 'em. But Joan seized upon us with avid hands. Here, she said, was her chance. She had been considering writing a story about herself to be called "The Curse of the Gardenia." Now we had given her an "out" and would she take it? Whereupon Joan gathered up her gown and, with Franchot behind her, rushed out into the night. With frantic, determined fingers, regardless of manicure, she invaded the garden and tore from the earth, roots and all, a gardenia tree! She handed it to us without a word. But her eyes, her shortened breath, her air of inexpressible triumph and relief said more plainly than words, "This is the last of the gardenias—now and forever!"

That flowering shrub won Maureen the prize. As Una Merkel observed, "You have not only brought home the booty, you have murdered a legend."

Cora Sue Collins and Jean Harlow wish May Robson "Many happy returns" at her seventieth birthday party.

DON'T NURSE A Corn

Don't be satisfied with temporary relief

The way to end corn suffering is to REMOVE the corn—safely, scientifically—with INSTANT PAIN RELIEF

• Do you cut or pare corns to get relief? Don't. This practice may lead to serious infection. It gives only temporary relief. Unscientific, harsh, untried remedies are risky too. Avoid them.

Blue-Jay (1) gives instant and soothing relief the moment it is applied. Its snug-fitting pad cushions the corn against shoe pressure; (2) it removes corns safely. Blue-Jay's Wet-Pruf adhesive strip holds the pad securely in place—so that the Blue-Jay medication gently undermines and loosens the corn without your feeling it. You walk in complete comfort. In three days, the corn lifts right out.

Blue-Jay is a safe and scientific corn plaster made by Bauer & Black, internationally famous surgical dressing manufacturer. Buy Blue-Jay at your druggist—25c. Follow the simple directions and you will find your corn suffering ended forever.

Special sizes for bunions and calluses.

Why a Corn Hurts... A corn is shaped like a cone, with the small end pointing into the toe. This inverted cone, under pressure from the shoe, presses against sensitive nerves, which carry pain sensations to the brain and central nervous system. That's why a corn seems to hurt "all over."

How to Stop the Pain .... Center the gentle Blue-Jay medication (A) directly over the corn itself. The pad (B) is held securely in place with the special Wet-Pruf adhesive strip (C) (waterproof, soft kid-like finish, does not cling to stocking).

How to Remove the Corn... After the Blue-Jay has been on for 3 days, remove the pad, soak the foot in warm water, and you lift the corn right out.

Read these letters from typical Blue-Jay users

Worth Much More Than Price Paid..."I am a nurse, on my feet several hours a day, writes Mrs. Helen Hansen, Denver, Colo. "I cannot praise Blue-Jays too highly. The mental as well as the physical relief they afford is worth much more than the small price paid in the beginning."

From a Mother of Small Boys. "I have two small boys, aged three and four years. That means a lot of steps, and being on my feet so much has caused corns. I heard your broadcast, advertising Blue-Jay Corn Removers. I bought a box and used them. My corns disappeared like magic." —Mrs. Katherine Hull, San Jose, Cal.

Use Blue-Jay to Keep Smiling — says Arthur F. Bendix, Philadelphia. "The hotel waiter must at all times wear a cheerful countenance. I had my moments of agony when the smile was forced. Now, thanks to Blue-Jay, which eased the pain instantly and completely removed the cause, smiling comes easy. My disposition and bank account are both improved."

merchant. He merely humored his son's preoccupation with the drama. Even on his death bed, he confidently expected that little Charles would carry on his business. Thereafter, Madame Boyer devoted her life to the education of her only child. She insisted that he finish at the Sorbonne before she would consent to his choice of a career. But Charles never wavered. His ceaseless practise with gesture and voice was interrupted only by the War.

"It was that War, Monsieur," Paul said with a sigh, "which makes him prefer tragedy to comedy."

"He's always serious," Paul confided. "But don't be mistaken. He's really a delightful fellow. He just doesn't like to waste time, you know, with the insincere." As he spoke, Boyer paused to exchange a word with his leading lady.

"Criticise him," Paul admonished, quietly. "He likes it. But don't . . ." He broke off as Boyer turned toward us.

The actor's expression lost its gravity as he recognized his friend. He stepped forward, with outstretched hand. No one can acknowledge an introduction so graciously as a Frenchman, but at the moment I recalled what some of the literary clique had said, "Boyer always has a temperature of 104. He's constantly under tension." As I felt the nervous grip of his hand and caught the feverish gleam in his brown eyes I felt that this, perhaps, was not so much of a gross exaggeration. He directed us into his room, shoved beribboned boxes off chairs, and after we were comfortably seated, his long fingers fumbled with a box of cigarettes. We lighted up. My eyes took in the fragrant disorder at a glance and returned to the anxious host. As he measured three jiggers of Napoleon brandy it was only his fingers, I noticed, which revealed his inward tension. Sipping our drinks, we talked for awhile about America and then, like an ass, I made a faux pas. "It must be slightly intoxicating to be attractive to so many women," I said. "How does it feel to be a great lover?" I was immediately aware of the unpleasant reaction. Paul stabbed me with a glance and a slight flush crept into Boyer's cheeks.

"I'm not this lover," Boyer mumbled. "And what sane man would want to be? Your great lover is the most pitiful creature in the world." To my incredulous exclamation Boyer answered with an indulgent smile. "You don't think so?" he said. "Then I fear you know little about women."

WE dropped the subject. In our subsequent meetings, in Paris and Hollywood, I never referred to it again. But after the preview of "Break of Hearts," as I said before, whispering tongues were giving him the same glamorous reputation on the screen that he had in France. I was anxious, suddenly, to finish that conversation. To have him clarify that curious statement over which I had pondered so often. So I phoned his house. He was home. He asked me to come out.

Two furiously wagging tails attached to a Scotty and a Boston Bull greeted me at the door. The Scotty belonged to Pat Paterson, Boyer's English wife, and the American pup was his own devoted companion. They romped joyously about our feet until the library door finally shut them out. The warm hospitality of this room, with the quiet dignity of its book-lined walls seemed to inspire friendly confidence. I came straight to the point. Before Boyer could complete the amenities of a host, I recalled my unhappy remark at our first meeting. "Your reputation almost demands that you make yourself clear," I said. "You'll have to some day. This is as good a time as any."

"All right," he said, in his slightly accented English, "I'll tell you why I'm not a great lover. I not only have no desire to be such a man, but I couldn't be even if I wanted to. I lack several characteristics every great lover must possess. It's not a striking appearance. Many Don Juans have been ugly men, some almost repulsive in body and face. It's not fame. That helps, of course, but it's not indispensable. Nor is it money. Wealth gives a tremendous advantage but so many famous lovers in history have been really paupers. You might call it personality; yet there's a host of personalities which fascinate women, Mussolini's, for instance, and yet he, most certainly, cannot be placed in that category. The first indispensable quality a great lover must possess is complete lack of faith in love."

I exclaimed my surprise but Boyer went right on talking.

"It's more than skepticism. It's a natural inability to feel anything but the most casual sensations that love can inspire. This inability to really feel love enables him to pass lightly from conquest to conquest; to simulate grand passions and play the gallant upon any occasion. It's a game because he is entirely unaffected. And because his heart is free he can master women.

"Consider a moment; and see if this isn't so. When a man's really in love he's a hopeless thing. He acts like a stricken fool. His mind wanders off in a haze of dreams, torment and ecstasy struggle in his heart, he cannot eat, it is difficult to sleep. When he's with his beloved, what does he do? Can he gallantly caress her hand and whisper his love in compelling words? No! He boyishly mumbles about irrelevant things—business, his hobby, what he hopes to do. How can such a man have the dominant assurance which makes your lover such a success?

"A great lover must have one ambition to the exclusion of everything else—to be a conqueror in the domain of women. His empire is flesh. And because he secretly despises all women, he wants to make them his slaves. And in turn, he is enslaved by them. Why? The answer is simple. Every intense person is the slave to his ambition, but the ambition to which we refer is the cruelest of all. A great lover is nothing but the mirror for feminine vanity. He must reflect each woman's ideal of a hero. And because no two women are alike, he can follow no single rule for conquest. His technique must vary with each one. With some he must be your cave man type, with others he must appeal to their sympathy, some he can dazzle with sophistication, many can be swept off their feet by the apparent sincerity of his ardor. Occasionally he appeals to the maternal instinct by seeming lonely and desolate, some are impressed by worldly accomplishment, a few by his spiritual depth, many he must buy. Always, he must aim for the vulnerable spot—the illusion which the woman, herself, has concocted about the man of her dreams. He must conform to that. He never can be himself. It's this everlasting pretense which makes him a slave to his every consort. And that, you must admit, is not an enviable plight."

IT came to me, suddenly, that perhaps, after all, Boyer was not so well qualified to speak on the subject. That he was speaking from theory, rather than experience. What was it Paul had said? "A serious boy grew up to be a serious man following one objective." An internationalist at heart, the war had shattered young Boyer's most precious illusion. Returning to Paris, he entered the Conservatoire de Drama with the vague hope that, someday, the world would be his audience. As chance would have it, the first play in which he appeared was "The Battle" in which he portrayed a Japanese naval officer torn between patriotism and love. His success was instantaneous. But throughout the following, triumphant years his life had one motif. A careful plan which found him in Paris, London, and Berlin, always seeking to enlarge his audience. That is what brought him into films, that is what brought him to America. And in America he did two things to astonish his friends—he failed, and he got married.

Or rather his first picture failed. "Caravan" was a dismal flop. "It was idiotic," Charles told me at the time. "They gave me a silly role as a moon-struck gypsy. All I could do was make love with my eyes and fiddle a violin. I know nothing about violins. I felt like a ridiculous amateur. So I bought up my contract." But although he returned to France, he left his heart behind. It was treasured, adoringly, by his wife.

Some of his friends declare that the only girl in the world he would have married is—Pat Paterson. The manner of his courtship justified this contention. He met her, wooed her, and in three days they were man and wife. I talked to the sprightly musical comedy star, who has been the toast of London, just after they returned from Yuma. Her naturally tinted complexion was alive with happiness. Here, I recognized immediately, was just the adorable simplicity which would be irresistible to a man who had always been the prey of predatory women.

"The great lover," Boyer continued, "must be an artful devil. He must have an agile mind to discover whatever is susceptible in a woman; he must have the resourcefulness to apply the requisite technique. He can have no conscience. He must lie so well that he deceives even himself. Some peasant maid must be convinced that all France is hers before she succumbs to his entreaties; he must fascinate with tall stories of far-off heroism; he must breathe into delicate ears an undying love he has never felt; and to many, when his heart is anxiously pounding, he must act indifferent. For he knows full well, this great lover, that contrary to popular conception, many women are dominated by the thrill of the chase. So he goes through life, pursuing and pursued, and knowing nothing of love."

WHAT a strange people are the French! And Boyer the most typical of all! Believed to be an insatiable Lothario, he finds happiness only in a domestic life. He and his wife seldom go out. They spend evenings at home playing billiards or romping with their dogs. Their friends are few—but intimate. And Boyer has the reputation of being a romantic dreamer. Yet, in most aspects of life he is eminently practical. There is but one exception. He gambles. On one occasion he stood at the tables of the Club Internationale in Paris for seventy-two hours until his last sou was gone.

As far as temperament is concerned, he is vastly misunderstood. He is temperamental. But not in the way Hollywood believes. He bought up his first contract, at a heavy loss to himself, not because of pique, but because he was faithful to a professional ideal. He insists on spending six months out of every year in his native France, solely because he is smothered by Hollywood's "shop talk" environment. He keeps to himself on the set, avoiding the other players, not from a temperamental whim, but in order to concentrate on the role which, for the time, he really lives. And then, in his behavior toward the feminine half of the film colony there is slight amazement. He is cordial. He is even gallant. But there is no effulgence. The reason we have already guessed.

"Consider the great lovers of history," Boyer is saying, "Casanova, Cellini, Don Juan, De Maupassant, Cagliostro, Villon. They were successful men in their lines but their memoirs reveal an agony of spirit. Pandering to every whim of a casual mistress, they were unable to have feminine companionship. And they discovered, too soon, that women are acquisitive. Difficult to win, they are more difficult to escape. Each of those men was seared by spite. A woman's vindictiveness, when scorned, can sometimes make Satan tremble. Every woman has a bit of the coquette, but in her heart she wants love to be more than a sporting affair. No, a man can play every other game with impunity except the game of love. Its thorns are sharper than its flowers are sweet."

really isn't. If you just knew all the letters I get from you readers in the summertime asking, "How often do you think I should shampoo my hair? My hair is dry, and I shampoo it only once every two weeks. Is this often enough?" . . . And so on. Here and now let's settle the shampooing controversy once and for all. Shampoo your hair as often as it needs it, or in other words as soon as it is dirty. This will mean more often than usual in the summer.

DON'T do a half-way job of shampooing, either. Use a good liquid shampoo. Wet the hair thoroughly. Then massage the shampoo into the scalp with the finger tips until you have a really prodigious lather. Rinse thoroughly. Now work up a lather again with some more shampoo. Finish by rinsing in at least three changes of water. A lemon juice rinse or one of the excellent vegetable rinses on the market will help to make your hair the shining halo of highlights you want it to be.

Second knot (and make it a good lumpy sized one): don't forget brushing! Brushing cleanses, stimulates, and polishes. When you brush, stroke up and away from the scalp. Brush until you get a pleasant feeling of tingling life in your lazy scalp. Then you know that the sebaceous glands of the scalp are being stimulated, and it is the distribution of the fat of these glands through your hair that prevents a dry, lustreless condition. I'm not sure but what brushing, if you do an active enough job of it, isn't really the best way to massage your scalp. Be sure to brush your hair thoroughly every time you come home from a drive (especially if you've occupied the rumble seat).

Third: be as fastidious about your hair brush as you are about your powder puff. Select your brush with care. Choose an efficient brush with firm, wide-set bristles . . . and then keep it clean. I know of an excellent brush with the bristles so cleverly set that they actually pick up the hair in strands, and encourage a natural wave, too, incidentally. You will find pictured one of the best tricks I know for keeping your hairbrush clean when you're brushing your dusty locks. A piece of clean gauze or cheesecloth pressed down over the base of the bristles will prevent the dust from accumulating there, and can be changed with each brushing.

Surprisingly few people know the rules for keeping a hair brush clean, young, and healthy. Very hot water will soon cause the bristles to lose their youthful firmness. Luke warm water is best for the brush bath, with soap or soap flakes, and occasionally a few drops of ammonia to cut the grease. Never immerse the back of the brush, and never, never let the brush soak for any length of time. Immerse only the bristles, as shown in the illustration. Put the brush to dry face downward on a towel in the sunshine. Be sure to place it with the bristles down, as illustrated, so that the bristles may rid themselves of every drop of moisture; if you were to place the bristles face up, the moisture would have a chance to run back into the "roots" thus tending to make them soggy. All of which rules are simple things, but vital to the life of a faithful brush.

Fourth: sun your hair but don't scorch it. See that your hair gets its share of the enlivening sunshine, but bear in mind the danger of overdoing a good thing. If you live in the city, where you can't trot down the street hatless without causing lifted eyebrows, and you can't get away to the beach even occasionally, sneak up to the roof, or out to the park, and give your hair a good sunning once in a while. But if you are going in for a heavy session on the beach, wear a wide-brimmed hat part of the time, or seek the shade of a beach umbrella. Your hair can get sunburned too, you know, in a manner of speaking, and then it becomes like straw, streaky, and unattractive. I don't want to underrate the value of sunshine as a tonic to the hair, but neither do I want to underrate the damage that too strenuous doses of sunshine can cause. Many woeful winter hair troubles are traceable to summer neglect.

FIFTH: remedy any dry tendencies with hot oil treatments. Soapless oil shampoos are also helpful. For the hot oil treatment, warm a small amount of olive oil, and massage it into your scalp with your fingertips. If convenient, leave the oil on overnight, but if you have to shampoo your hair right away, wrap a towel wrung out of hot water around your head for about fifteen minutes to aid the scalp in the absorption of the oil.

Sixth: avoid the use of water on your hair as much as possible. Wear a cap when you're taking a shower. When you're washing your face, protect your hair from the constant soap and water inroads with a ribbon or a wide band of elastic. Be as particular about the fit of your bathing cap as you are about the becomingness of your summer "bonnets." We're so prone to slick down our hair with water, to brush it with a soaking wet brush, or run a wet comb through it, when waves and kinks are apt to be unruly. It would be better to apply a tonic or a brilliantine with an oil base to it. The latter is excellent for hair that must stand the glaring rays of the sun. The nicest way to apply brilliantine is with an atomizer. Try it!

Seventh: (and here we get to the coiffures you've been waiting for) get your hair up and off your neck, and keep a tidy, off-the-face hairline. Up and off the neck, and don't let any "stragglers" fail to live up to that cardinal rule for summer! The tendency is all for the back hair to swirl around and up. Longer hair, too, shows this upward trend, reminiscent of the French twist, like Julie Haydon's. It's easy to brush your hair up from your neck, and mass it high on the back of the head in ringlets, a simple version of the silhouette of the gay nineties. A smart idea is to let the locks grow out, just at the hairline, so that they can be brushed upward to meet the curls clustering on the outward curve of the head. For hot summer days with your crisp organdies and billowy chiffons, you'll want a coiffure that is in tune, one that reflects soft, sweeping movements and crispness at the same time. I don't think you'll want bothersome locks on the brow, or intricate treatments over the ears. For most of us, the most satisfactory summer hairdress probably will be the one in which all the hair is directed off the face, and off most of the ears, too, and built up in the back with fresh, crisp looking curls. If you want more softness about the face, and those of us with sharp or prominent features do generally need more softness, a smart hair style is one that combines an almost unwaved top with soft side curls. The curls should move toward the face and off the neck in such a hairdress.

One slick, easy hairdress that I think is the essence of summer coolness is achieved by brushing the hair off the temple without a smidgeon of a wave, and then turning up the ends into two rolls of neat curls.

Somehow we think of inward shininess as a sort of reflection of outward freshness and cleanliness. The sweat glands function overtime in hot weather, and you need plenty of warm water and soap to thoroughly cleanse the skin. If you're tired, if you're dusty, if you're cranky, if you're weary of "trying to shine" in the heat, take a bath. And include in that bath all the lovely perfumed bath accessories that make bathing such an economical luxury rite nowadays. Naturally, you will want to use a deodorant and depilatory regularly during this revealing season. The underarms and legs must be kept free of superfluous hair, and there must never be a question of personal fragrance and daintiness. I know of a pleasantly perfumed depilatory that comes in cream, liquid, or powder form, and a deodorant that comes in convenient stick form for hasty application at the beach or the dance.

THE beach and the dance . . . modern girls must be "devastating" at both. In fact, nowadays the only girls who go in for sun-browning are those who know it's becoming to them (generally the not-too-delicate blondes and the medium brown-haired types), or those who are just too lazy to prevent it. Shining faces as well as shining heads are very much in order at the beach, for at the seaside one should exhibit a beaming countenance that shines with oil. Protective suntan oils are necessary to keep the skin from becoming too dry, and to prevent those squint lines that etch themselves into our skins so easily. Don't try to get tanned if you have the kind of a skin that freckles the first sunny day. Use a sunburn preventive, and go in for wide brimmed beach hats, beach pajamas, and parasols. For your land pursuits in the sun, use a heavy powder base, and plenty of powder in a darker shade than you generally wear, on your neck, face, and arms.

Sometimes there are beach party occasions when one wants to be particularly decorative at the beach, too. Then remember that the eyes and the lips are the features to be emphasizd in beach make-up. Brows which have been shaped to a natural line may be accentuated with a pencil whose coloring is not affected by perspiration. Waterproof mascara can be applied very lightly on the lashes. And lips will profit by the application of a good oily base lip rouge. Even at the dance, one still goes in for the avoidance of artificial makeup. Naturalness is the art we strive for . . . powder that tones in perfectly with our skins, and lipstick that is colorful, but does not coat the lips brilliantly.

If you are interested now in checking up your shade of face powder, I have a handy little package containing four distinctive shades, together with cream, lip and cheek rouge to match, that is yours for the asking. There is no cost involved.

IT MAY BE THE COLOR OF YOUR FACE POWDER!

By Lady Esther

Did you ever stop to think that the shade of face powder you use so confidently might be altogether the wrong one for you?

It's hard to believe that women can make a mistake in their shades of face powder or that one shade can make you look older than another. Yet, it's only too obviously true!

You know how tricky a thing color is. You know how even a slight variation in color can make a startling difference in your appearance. The same transforming effect holds true in the case of face powders. Where one shade will have positively the effect of making you look young, another will, just as decisively, make you look older—years older than you are!

Face Powder Fallacies

Many women look years older than they actually are because they select their face powder shades on entirely the wrong basis. They try to match their so-called "type" or coloring which is utterly fallacious. The purpose in using a shade of face powder is not to match anything, but to bring out what natural gifts you have. In other words, to flatter!

Just because you are a brunette does not necessarily mean you should use a brunette or dark rachel powder or that you should use a light rachel or beige if you are a blonde. In the first place, a dark powder may make a brunette look too dark, while a light powder may make a blonde look faded. Secondly, a brunette may have a very light skin while a blonde may have a dark skin and vice versa. The sensible and practical way of choosing your face powder shade, regardless of your individual coloring, is to try on all five basic shades of face powder. I say "the five basic shades" because that is all that is necessary, as colorists will tell you, to accommodate all tones of skin.

My Offer to the Women of America

"But," you say, "must I buy five different shades of face powder to find out which is my most becoming and flattering?" No, indeed! This matter of face powder shade selection is so important to me that I offer every woman the opportunity of trying all five without going to the expense of buying them.

All you need do is send me your name and address and I will immediately supply you with all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder. With the five shades which I send you free, you can very quickly determine which is your most youthifying and flattering.

I'll Leave it to your Mirror!

Thousands of women have made this test to their great astonishment and enlightenment. Maybe it holds a great surprise in store for you! You can't tell! You must try all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder. And this, as I say, you can do at my expense.

Just mail the coupon or a penny post card and by return mail you'll receive all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder postpaid and free.

moment I saw her beautiful face.

"But I never forgot her haunting beauty. She was so lovely, it was like a stab of pain. She wore no hat. Her hair was like spindrift. Green eyes were elfishly luminous in the lamp light. Perhaps it was vanity, but I thought she smiled.

"I wanted to stop her. As I listened to her footsteps on the pavement I was on the point of rushing back. To stop her. To talk to her. To find out who she was. And where I could see her again. Instead, I was a coward. Too conventionally sensitive. I walked on slowly, looking back, listening to her footsteps die away.

"How I kicked myself afterwards! And how different everything might have been if I'd met her then. But all I could do was speculate as to what kind of a girl she was. I tortured myself with these thoughts. They were my constant preoccupation. She was, I decided, just nineteen. A girl of the streets? Ridiculous! She was probably one of a large family. A family in poorish circumstances. No doubt, she was a dutiful daughter. But was she? There had been such a fierce independence in her proud carriage as she passed me on the street. More probably, she was one of those insurgent spirits who are obsessed with a craving for freedom. A girl who was anxious to try her young wings along some strange course.

WELL, three years later I saw her again. I recognized her instantly. It was easy, you understand, for I had been unconsciously searching for her all the time. I saw her in Portsmouth. I was playing stock at the Garrick and she was in the audience. It wasn't until the middle of the second act that I caught a glimpse of her in the fifth row. I stopped, I staggered, I forgot my lines.

"I came to with Myra—she was the ingenue—trying to cover up the awkward moment by frantically ad-libbing. The stage manager was whispering hoarsely from the wings. But even in my sudden embarrassment the exact seat in which she was sitting registered on my mind. Somehow, I finished the scene. Back in my dressing-room I dashed off a note. I got hold of an usher. He promised faithfully to deliver the note without fail. Then I struggled through until the final curtain."

Hank cleared his throat and asked if I cared for a drink. His own throat was dry. Hank poured me a generous whisky and squirted soda in his own until it was barely flavored.

"Funny," he said, "how trivial we can be in the important moments of life. I knew, of course, that she'd be waiting. Just as I felt so sure all along of so many other things. When I rushed into the lobby the audience was still leaving. People were gathered in little groups to laugh and talk. She was sitting in a chair—so alone, so strangely apart from everyone else. I stepped up beside her. She looked up. Her dark lashes shadowed green eyes which were flecked with golden points.

"I heard myself saying, 'How do you do?' She smiled and said, 'How do you do?' Her voice was softly musical when she spoke. I said, 'I saw you once, years ago.' 'Yes,' she murmured, 'I remember.' I said, 'My name is Henry Wilcoxon.' 'Yes,' she said, 'I know that, too. My name is Deirdre MacArthur.' Then, for some unaccountable reason, I made some stupid remark about the weather.

"We left the lobby. I never did know how far we walked. I was emotionally drunk. Her arm was so snugly warm in my own. We passed taxis which we didn't think of hailing. Down curious streets where I'd never been before. At last we entered a Chinese restaurant.

"There were only a few things about her I'd been able to find out. She was one of seven children. Her father was superintendent of a coal mine in Wales. She was studying music. She wasn't married. Beyond that she wouldn't tell me anymore. But as soon as I gave our order and the hovering waiter departed, I asked her something which I had meant to ask her from the first: 'Will you be my wife?' Her eyes grew wider as she stared at me from across the table. Her lips parted in a faint smile. 'No,' she said, with a curious catch in her voice. 'But thank you, thank you so much.' Oddly enough, that didn't depress my spirits. I felt all along that she would refuse. Just as I knew that I must keep on asking her.

WHEN we taxied home she insisted that the driver stop at a corner. She wouldn't permit me to accompany her to her lodgings. It was a squalid district. As we stood there, by the lamp post, that momentary vision of long ago returned. It was then that I kissed her. Perhaps it was the way the lamp light spilled on her hair, giving its ash blond texture the quality of spindrift whipped from the breaking waves. She didn't resist the caress. I can feel, even now, the warm pressure of her hand on the back of my head. 'Goodbye,' she whispered. 'I had to see you again. And I knew that someday I would. But promise me something now. Please!' I held her in my arms as I promised. Her head came back to look for a breathless instant into my eyes. 'Remember now, you've promised. Don't try to see me again—ever.' She twisted out of my grasp, turned, and ran down the street."

Hank poured a spot of Scotch into his glass and squirted it full of soda.

"That is the first serious promise that I've ever broken. I couldn't help myself, I suppose. And I'm glad. When the show moved on to Leeds at the end of a week, I quit. I haunted that squalid neighborhood day and night. But nobody seemed acquainted with a girl who answered her description. I never saw her myself. But finally a cockney lad in a grocery market felt sure that he knew whom I meant. He led me up a side street. We climbed a rickety stairway in a flat. He pointed to a door. I gave the lad a shilling and raised my knuckles to knock. I never did. The door opened. And Deirdre stepped out. She stepped out swiftly and closed the door behind her. Her face was chalky white. From a window she must have seen us coming. Her coat was on. As I read the reproof in her eyes I felt like a cad. She didn't speak. I reached out to take her hand. 'You're coming with me,' I said. She didn't resist. Gesturing for silence she caught hold of my sleeve as we tiptoed down the stairs. I hailed a cab.

"We drove out to a hill overlooking the harbor and I told the cabby to wait. We walked down a grassy slope to spread our top coats under a cluster of yew trees. It was May. Even the commercial activity on the harbor below seemed touched by the fever of spring. Nervously belching tugs kept churning the water into soapy ribbons. A steamer hooted for the pilot, a great liner swung away from the hovering insects, blasted a warning, and proudly got under her own steam—going, I suppose, to America. Deirdre leaned against my shoulder, breathing in all this beauty. Her hair brushed my cheek. 'Why don't you marry me?' I said. My voice seemed to startle her out of some dream. Her breath came more quickly. 'Suppose,' she finally said, 'that I begin at the beginning. You shouldn't have come. But now you'll know all.'

"Her story was an unusual one. Briefly, it was this. She had fallen in love with her music teacher who was twenty years older than she. When her family suspected the romantic attachment, her father and eldest brother waylayed the maestro. He was beaten so horribly he went to the hospital. Deirdre was stricken. Her teacher had never realized her secret infatuation. When he partially recovered, his pride was shattered. He was a nervous wreck. People still regarded him with suspicion. He had to leave town. Dierdre insisted on going wherever he went. She loved him now. And he wasn't well. Internal injuries had made him susceptible to tuberculosis. Finally, he gave in to her pleadings. She could accompany him as nurse and he would continue with her music. So one night they slipped away.

HIS health became worse. They had only his insurance to live on. She worked on the side and saved money to take him to South Africa. His single passion had been to make her the greatest pianist in the world, but now, by the way his eyes followed her about, she knew that he worshipped her. He never uttered his love. He merely said, 'I must live until I teach you all I know.'

"And throughout these years Deirdre realized that she was responsible for his condition. She couldn't hurt him in any way. She hoped, someday, to make him proud of her.

"Well," Hank continued sadly, "it was dark when we left that hillside. Red and green lights on the steamers gleamed up from below. Driving back in the taxi I had the devil's own time making her agree to my proposition. But I wouldn't let her go until she did. Then I hurried to my hotel, packed, and hopped the next train for London. In three days I had a job. In six weeks I was able to send the necessary funds.

"That summer I lived for her letters. I received one every day. Beautiful letters from South Africa. They evoked the image of that last hour in the cab. Deirdre snuggling against my shoulder, the touch of her cheek, the warm appreciation of her hands. I devoured each letter. But what I really wanted to hear—although I wouldn't admit it even to myself—was that at last she was free.

"I didn't think for a moment that she would deceive me. But before her letters stopped coming I accepted a long-run engagement. I was desolate. I wanted to break my contract and sail for South Africa. It finally became so intolerable that I managed to be released. I booked passage. The day before I was to sail I heard from her again."

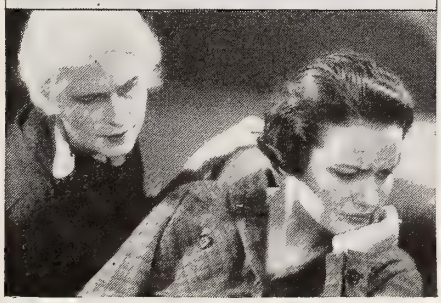
"Wait," he said, "I'll show you that last letter." Rummaging his hand through his shock of curly, black hair, he left the room. In a little while he returned. He untied a faded ribbon from a bundle of letters. He handed me the one on top and sank down in his chair. "Read it out loud," he said.

The stationery was plain. It was written in a fine, neat hand.

Dearest Henry,

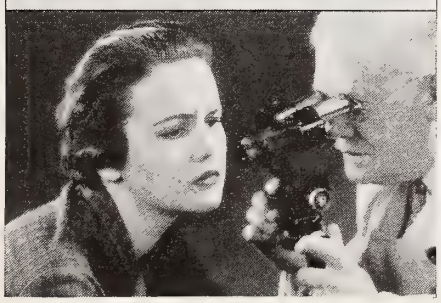
Thanks for everything you've done. The money you sent I used for specialists so I couldn't live apart from Ricci like you begged me to do. I had to stay with him until the end. He died last September. But I couldn't let you know about it then. You see, Henry darling, I contracted what the doctors call quick T. B. I couldn't allow you to marry a phantom, now could I? So goodbye, sweet. The doctor is in the next room and the nurse is waiting to turn out the light. This is probably my last letter. Enclosed is the only thing I have left to give. Keep it always.

Love,



Deirdre.

There were several blots on the last few lines. I stared at them for a moment, and then returned the letter to Hank. Without a word he handed me a small crucifix. "Just think," he mused, speaking more to himself than to me, "those few times we were together were less than one whole day. Yet it seems that I've known her always . . . and always will."



I fingered the crucifix gently and then handed it back. I could think of nothing to say. So I muttered something about the hour and we said good night. Hank probably needed some sleep.

A GOOD HABIT MADE EASY

USE PERSTIK—IT'S EASIER TO USE AND EASY TO KEEP IN YOUR PURSE

Here's a new kind of deodorant—a welcome improvement. No need to spread it on or rub it in with the fingers. No need to dig into a jar. Use it before or after you are dressed—it cannot injure clothing. No waiting for it to dry, and you can use it right after shaving.

This new deodorant is the size and shape of a lipstick—applied as easily as a lipstick. A few touches to the armpits and you are protected against odor for the day.

Its name? Perstik. And because it is the size and shape of a lipstick, it is easy to keep in your purse for use during the day or evening. If you have ever—even for a single moment — suspected the presence of under-arm odor when away from your boudoir, you will appreciate having a Perstik with you in your purse at all times.

Drug and department stores throughout the world feature Perstik at 50¢. Or send 10¢ for trial size to "Perstik 467D Fifth Ave., New York City" of the culotte, or divided sports skirt as it is more popularly known.

Vacationing? Here's What to Wear

"I don't like them at all. They seem like a bad compromise between skirts and trousers and they certainly are cumbersome to wear. I love both pajamas and shorts. My favorite sports costume is one that I buy in all colors from the shop that Bebe Daniels and Mrs. Skeets Gallagher run. I will send you a picture of them because they are so practical and so easy to copy."

What's more Madge kept her word and sent the picture, which you see on page 64. A short-sleeved shirt and either slacks or shorts make up the costume. Unbleached muslin is the inexpensive fabric used—the beautiful part being that you don't have to iron them after washing. Madge buys them in natural shade and in various colors and they are trimmed with bright buttons which are tied on with string! A colored belt to match the buttons is an added detail. As you can see, Madge wears them for tennis, and she ties her white woolly sweater about her neck to form a shoulder protection after the heat of a fast set.

Another combination that Madge likes especially is a navy blue ribbed silk pajama suit. The short-sleeved shirt has two patch pockets, the left being decorated with Madge's monogram in white.

WHILE on the subject of pajamas, I have to tell you about those that Pat Paterson wears almost constantly at home and at the studio. Pat, being an English girl, said that she was amazed at the informality of Hollywood dressing when first she arrived over here but after a few days at the studio, she could see readily why so many actresses preferred to wear either slacks or pajamas—they are not only comfortable but highly practical.

"I actually find it hard to dress up anymore," she said, with a slight grimace in the direction of her closet which was bulging with the new wardrobe which René Hubert had designed for her. "I love Hubert's clothes which he has designed so cleverly for me, of course, but really I have become so devoted to my daytime costume of black satin slacks and red satin jacket, that I almost want to wear them on the street! I can't do that though, because my husband won't let me!" She giggled as she said it but you could see that she was in dead earnest. Her husband, as you know, is the very attractive Charles Boyer—and he, being a Frenchman, frowns on the too casual costuming of Hollywood.

"You really mind then what your husband likes and dislikes in your wardrobe?" I asked.

"Oh, goodness yes, I wouldn't think of wearing anything that Charles really dislikes. It seems silly to me to defy your husband's tastes in things. After all, what's the fun of dressing, if you don't achieve admiration from your husband? He hates all crazy hats, too. In fact, if he had his way, completely, I'd only wear the simplest black clothes, in the best French tradition. However, being English, I do digress, as you see."

She waved an airy hand toward the aforementioned closet. It was jammed full of attractive things but, frankly, I was more intrigued with her trousseau lingerie. And since lingerie goes into every vacation bag, I'm going to take time out to tell you about a few things.

There was a peach satin nightgown with long, full sleeves and a demure Peter Pan collar. Its sole trimming was not lace but beautifully done featherstitching! On the left side her own name "Pat" was scrawled casually in her own handwriting, embroidered on, of course. She laughingly admitted that some of her more intimate undergarments bore the written tag "Shrimp" which is her husband's very elegant pet monicker for her!

A black lace nightie had the same Peter Pan collar but short sleeves and was very feminine with its high Empire waist. Still another was a very bridey confection in white satin with pale beige lace and had a brief but very lovely jacket topping it.

ELIZABETH ALLAN, another English star who has taken Hollywood's brand of sports clothing seriously, wears very full white flannel slacks with a navy blue flannel jacket for yachting or sailing. You can see it at its breezy best on page 64. Elizabeth tucks a polka-dotted Ascot scarf into the neckline of the white mannish blouse she wears with this—the beret she contends is the most practical sailing headgear.

To digress from the active side of our vacation program, take a look at the stunning crash linen suit which Dorothy Tree is wearing on page 65. It's grand on or off a vacation schedule and you will find so many uses for such a suit that you always will have one on your summer list henceforth. The old bogey about linen being so impractical and crushable is practically a myth now because the new weaves are so skillfully executed that nearly all wrinkling and mussing is eliminated. Dorothy's suit is the classic tailormade with single button jacket, rather wide lapels and a fitted waist. Her accessories are perfect complements from the wide-brimmed panama with green woolen cord trim to the green blouse, white "air-conditioned" pigskin gloves and trim white pumps.

Leave it to la belle Lombard to take the dramatic viewpoint of beach clothes! It takes dash and daring to uphold the "best dressed" title in Hollywood or anywhere else—remember Carole's famous predecessor Lil Tashman who never let a good fashion trick go by? Carole's beach skirt and top, divorced enough to show a daring streak of her slender waist in the flesh, are an Americanized version of a Tahitian beauty's best dress! Navy blue linen is set off by bright buttons and a gay colored band on the skirt—the latter doesn't show because Carole's swaggering walk shows the slit skirt instead, not to mention her shapely limb. The gay wicker hat is a knockout extra in the picture. And don't miss her shoes because they are the newest rage in summer footwear all over the country. Interlaced strips compose the entire shoe, created to give a step-in pump effect with bare toes. Kid, cotton and silk are some of the mediums used for this clever footwork.

And speaking of beach hats—or sun hats, as you prefer, Ann Dvorak's favorite one follows an off-the-face movement. Ann likes to get tanned, so the hat is nothing more than a decorative gesture with her. You will see it on page 65. It's a rough cotton, stiffened and stitched with a great sweeping brim fastened back off the forehead. It has quite a swashbuckling air.

Bathing suits—what a vast field for thought! Really, there is hardly a clever idea in this category that hasn't been developed this season. You can have the briefest, most practical of swim togs, or you can go to the other extreme and choose a taffeta fancy that just sits and suns but never swims! If you like to swim, you will pick some really useful suits likes those I have shown on page 66. These aren't afraid of any amount of water and they are practical, yet styled with originality and an eye to flattering your figure.

The dressy group, those gay cottons, crêpes, taffetas and others which catch the eye of the "beached" crowd, can be had in a myriad styles. Nearly all of them can be worn in the water, but as you know, a real swimmer scorns fripperies.

As perishable as cellophane sounds, strangely enough it combines with lastex to make one of the most popular suits this summer. And it is the slickest looking thing. I mean slick in the shiny, shimmering sense of the coat of a wet seal emerging from water. Jean Parker simply adores her cellophane woven suit and has proved its practicality by many dips in pools and the Pacific. These suits aren't scratchy, as you would think, but are soft and pliable.

ELIZABETH ALLAN prefers the bandanna "bra" and trunks type of suit. Her brown shorts are in a heavy knit and the top has a halter neck, also brown but plaided in green and orange.

Both Betty Furness and Jean Parker like the knitted suit with brief attached skirt over the trunks. Betty's suit is white in a rib stitch with brown trim. The back is cut low, the front in square effect with straps.

Jean's suit is very conservative, being in Kingfisher blue rib knit with contrasting braid trim. Again a skirt covers the trunks but is part of the suit.

The peasant beach dress is a great favorite to wear over your suit when out of the water. It usually is made with a basque top and full, ankle-length skirt. Bright cottons in gay prints are the popular fabrics for this. A lot of the younger crowd wear 'kerchiefs tied over the hair and under the chin, à la Russian peasant women when they work in the fields. It's an amusing idea and keeps your hair smooth without having to wear a beach hat. The Tahitian influence, like Carole's costume, is also much in evidence. Of course, you old dyed-in-the-wool pajama and slack gals need feel no qualms about continuing to wear them because you have half of Hollywood on your side. It just depends upon your school of thought. You can have one of each, you know; one for practical purposes and the beach dress for glamor plus!

When you go off for a week-end or a vacation, pack your bag with the least number of extras. There's hardly a place, unless you are going to a very grand hotel or a swanky private summer home, where you won't live almost entirely in sports clothes. One dinner dress of some gay summer cotton or silk and one simple afternoon dress will suffice for an average short vacation trip anywhere. Of course, if you are going to be traveling constantly, rather than to be idling in the sun, you had better send for my list of clothes for various types of vacation trips.

I have prepared a summer vacation fashion schedule for you that includes cruise, resort, country and travel suggestions in clothes. Just send me a stamped, self-addressed envelope with your request, and write to Adelia Bird, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York City.

find herself faced with the perplexing business of living and dressing on twenty-five dollars a week, the habiliment hobgoblins, at least, wouldn't have her baffled or stymied. She would pick up her girlhood training in clever economy right where she left it when she went on the stage.

"I would get along somehow until I had saved enough for just one tailored suit, but a good one, mind you. I would hibernate financially again until I had enough for one excellent pair of shoes. I'd be willing to take a risk on a cheap blouse and hat because these are smaller items that can sometimes be successfully camouflaged for a long time.

"I'd wear that one smart outfit every day for a year, if necessary, but I'd be secure in the knowledge that I was a well-dressed woman, even if I had but one garment to my name.

"I'd follow the same routine for a coat. I'd stamp out temptation when I passed shops flaunting cute, cheap little dresses I needed so badly, and I'd do without a few lunches, but in the end I would own one lovely black coat with straight lines that could not possibly be annihilated by any sudden swerve in the style market.

"But when I could afford a party frock, I might relax my rule slightly and look for an inexpensive one because evening things receive only slight wear, and the dim lights of night are usually very kind to the uncertain seams of the catchpenny gown."

And then Claudette offers her own shopping chart, one she used not so many years ago when she was collecting her first adolescent finery.

The Colbert chart is divided into two separate listings. The first group itemizes the apparel that must always and under all circumstances be the very best. This list includes all daytime wear, suits, dresses, coats, both tailored and dressy, shoes and gloves.

The second group is titled "Safe If Cheap" with an admonishing footnote that says, "But watch your step." This listing indicates guarded economy for hosiery, lingerie, handbags, blouses, hats, dinner and evening frocks, and a bargain wrap.

KAY FRANCIS would meet our twenty-five-dollar-a-week challenge with an "accessory wardrobe."

"I could manage to hold my own in any fashionable circle with exactly three well chosen costumes," she told me. "However, each of the three costumes would do triple duty and do it with chic and éclat by the sheer sorcery of the accessory plan."

Kay is absurdly proud of her suggestion, because she made it work throughout one entire Hollywood season when an overcrowded picture schedule precluded shopping forays. All this occurred about three years ago when Kay was winning her first recognition from all the prominent Parisian couturiers as Hollywood's best-dressed woman. During that very winter, she made one black crêpe frock see her through every formal and semi-formal engagement, and one gray suit and a black afternoon dress meet all her daytime sartorial needs. She actually led the film colony's fashion race with three outfits.

And that is why Kay can offer you this amazingly shrewd set of wardrobe blueprints. She says:

"I would manage somehow from my twenty-five-dollar salary one good suit for business wear. It would be made to measure because that is the only way to purchase any tailored garment. I would have my dressmaker or tailor add to the usual jacket and skirt, a jumper of the same material, thus turning my skirt into a trim, two-piece frock for the office.

"Instead of expensive and perishable batiste blouses, I would select several lightweight jersey sweaters in bright and dark colors, and one silk blouse shot with metal threads to dress up the suit for luncheon and matinee dates. This would give me one tailored suit, a two-piece frock and one semi-dress outfit.

"The second garment of my three-costume collection, would be an afternoon frock and it would be in a color complementary to the suit so that hats, gloves and shoes could be interchangeable. If the suit were black, oxford gray or navy, I would have this frock in black or gray.

"This outfit should be a two-piece affair because the dress you can divide into two equal parts is the one that lends itself gracefully to the magic of accessories. There should be one pair of inexpensive but well-made clips to change the neckline of this frock, and there should be one three-quarter length tunic of a contrasting shade, preferably a bright jewel color with which the outfit is entirely transfigured. And then because there is that blessed separate skirt, I would sometimes wear it with my silk metal-shot blouse for informal Sunday evening occasions, the movies, and the bridge gettogethers.

"And now we come to the evening frock, which is so important to the girl with many dates and a slim income. It should be black, this evening gown, and not too extreme in cut to help defy that "dated" look after its first season. I should own a long-sleeved jacket of the same material, or if I could afford it, an extra metal cloth jacket. When worn with my little coat, the deeply décolletage formal becomes the perfect dinner costume.

"To my jacket I would sometimes add a bright scarf of emerald green or wine red satin and I would tie it Ascot fashion for extra dash. I would find a small cluster of dark red carnations and pin them on the lapel of the dinner jacket (when the scarf is not worn) and I could transfer these flowers with gratifying results to the tailored lapel of my suit.

"For those big nights when my black gown must do formal duty, I would collect two or three bright and enormous flowers to change the effect of the waist, the shouder line and the very back of the décolletage. I might even buy a remnant of brilliant silk and swathe it about the waist and let the ends fall down the back into a gay train. I would certainly treat myself to one enormous clip that could be effectively snapped at varying points of the neckline and waistline and would look effective against a black background."

Kay Francis believes in her accessory plan. She knows that she can carry it out tomorrow, if necessary, and still walk in the ranks of the impeccably groomed. She knows all this because even in the very midst of Hollywood's unbridled extravagance she has made this three-costume-accessory-wardrobe function for her, and function, I might add, beautifully.

GINGER ROGERS offers the most unique solution of the quartet.

She practiced what she is about to preach way back in the days when she helped her mother scratch out a budget for her school-girl clothes from her mother's nine weekly dollars.

"Mother's earning capacity grew healthier by the time I thought I was a young lady, but I still suffered mental agonies over my lack of clothes," Ginger told me. "Nice things are so darned important to any girl, especially the young ones who are just sprouting their social pinfeathers.

"I finally solved my own gritty problem with my cousin, who was my size and age and usually agreed with all my clothes selections. We decided to pool our slender budgets and buy a single but complete wardrobe between us.

"It worked something like this: instead of one last year's evening frock, made over, we had two new ones owned between us, and in place of my mother's hastily revamped jet basque, I had a half interest in one honest-to-goodness evening wrap. I had the use of three hats instead of one, two winter coats instead of one, and so on."

Of course, Ginger realizes that convenient cousins are a great scarcity, but in theory her plan could be made to work. She suggests a girl friend who travels in a different social set, and one who can wear the same size, and who will always be a good sport when it is her turn to have the frocks cleaned and repaired.

And then Ginger offers a second plan, one that is practiced with huge success by the girls who play bits and extras in pictures. These girls need large and varied wardrobes for their work and they usually keep themselves well stocked by purchasing, at nominal prices, the slightly used personal gowns of a number of stars.

Ginger believes that this procedure should work for the wardrobe-weary girl in any town where there are a number of smartly gowned, socially prominent women. If a personal introduction to such women proves impossible, a businesslike note outlining the plan, making it very clear that all selections will be paid for, should bring results.

"Surely," Ginger says, "there must be at least one wealthy, well-dressed woman in every city who would warm to the idea of making some girl gloriously happy, and at the same time realizing some small sum for bridge or charity from her prodigious seasonal wardrobe expenditures."

And now I am certain that you can understand why four Hollywood stars, festooned with finery, can offer four practical and amazingly applicable wardrobe plans to the thousands of girls who are beset by the bleak vacancies in their daily raiment.

She Can Take It

small-town. It was swell for Merle to think so—but there wasn't any money to foster an indefinite stay in London. And, too, her uncle was pretty upset. He was responsible for this cool, determined young niece and he didn't dare return without the O'Brien-Thompson offspring because then her family might be a trifle upset, too!

Having done a bit of acting with the Calcutta Amateur Theatrical Society, which staged pantomimes, Merle decided that she could try her hand at acting in London. Also, a number of people had told her that producers fell for a beauty such as hers. She kidded her uncle into thinking that she had a good chance to land a job, so he, being a good sport, gave her a return-trip ticket to Calcutta and enough money to last her a month. If, at the end of that time, she had not located with some theatrical company, she was to return home.

MERLE never used the return ticket, she cashed it in when funds ran low! She didn't have the faintest idea how to go about getting into either the theatre or the films, but she was determined to make the grade. She scrimped along on her uncle's stipend, meanwhile doing the agencies and trying to hear of a job. Finally, she heard that the H. M. V. Film Company was holding an audition for players at the Café de Paris. She discovered upon arrival at the restaurant that about fifty other girls had answered the call and she didn't have a chance.

However, a rather authoritative looking gent came up while she was there and asked her if she would like to dance in the Café. She was hungry and needed money desperately but she had heard stories about café dancers, so she declined. The man was persistent, despite her rebuff, asking her to have tea a few days later at the Café so that she could meet some of the other dancers. He thought it would change her viewpoint. By the time that day arrived, Merle was even hungrier so she went reluctantly. Result was she got a job as hostess and stayed there for three months until she was snatched away by her frantic mother who arrived from India to find out why she hadn't come home.

Merle won her mother over to her side enough to have her linger on in London with her and provide a home while she continued to look for a theatrical job. By this time she had decided that films were the quickest money-makers. Through friends made at the Café, she finally obtained extra work with British-Gaumont. It wasn't until two years later, however, that Alexander Korda, the great European director, saw her at lunch one day and offered her a screen test. In fact, it was Mrs. Korda who called his attention to her, thus interesting him so much that he sought out the set where she was working and watched her do a small "bit." Result was that she started work for him and soon became one of his most talented finds. Her first leading part was with Roland Young in "Wedding Rehearsal." You probably remember her first with Leslie Howard in "Reserved for Ladies," and later as Ann Boleyn in "The Private Life of Henry VIII."

She and Leslie Howard have been great friends ever since the first picture in which they worked. She is one of his staunchest admirers. At the time we met in New York, Leslie was appearing on the stage in "The Petrified Forest" and Merle told me that she hoped she would have a chance to return with his cast to London and play the feminine lead with him when it opened there.

"I would like to do the part of the girl in Leslie's play," she said. "She is such a real character and I think it would be excellent for me to get some stage experience. And playing with Leslie, I think I would get the self-confidence I would need to attempt my first stage role. I have worked with him so much and he knows the stage and its requirements so thoroughly.

"I like film work but I feel that I need contact with audiences, too. The stage would give me that."

I asked her how she liked working in Hollywood for the first time. She made a slight grimace.

"I HAD a perfectly grand time the last two weeks I was there," she said. "But I went into seclusion the first six weeks. I don't know whether everyone resented the fact that I had broken my engagement with Mr. Schenck, who is very popular out there, or whether Hollywood instinctively is hostile to all foreign importations. I can't believe that I had attained enough importance in their eyes to loom up as a menace!" She chuckled as she said this, because I think secretly she believes that is just what a number of dazzling Hollywood beauties thought.

"I really was bewildered," she continued, "at everyone's hostility. It frightened me and so I took to hiding. As far as Mr. Schenck and I were concerned, their attitude was silly, inasmuch as broken engagement or not, we see a great deal of each other and are the best of friends. You know, I actually became so terrified at the disapproval evidenced for me, that when I finally took courage and accepted an invitation to a party, I stayed close to one friend in the room, asking what man I should smile at and what one I shouldn't!"

And if you believe Merle Oberon did this, you are crazy, because all the time she was telling me, that twinkle, I mentioned earlier, was wickedly glinting. And what's more, I can't imagine Hollywood scaring the Oberon for very long. In fact, a little later, in our conversation, we veered off on clothes, and she told me what a sensation a gown, designed for her by Norman Hartnell, made when she appeared in it at one of these very Hollywood parties. You don't wear dresses like that to appear as a shy, retiring soul!

Merle doesn't think anyone in Hollywood seems to be happy. She thinks pictures out there do something to people.

"I think your stage people and our film people lead a more normal life than the Hollywood stars. I mean by that that they aren't under the spotlight nearly so much. You don't feel that you have any private life in Hollywood, or when you become a Hollywood star. Yet I like working there. We had great fun on the "Folies Bergere" set. Of course, I adore Maurice Chevalier, he is one of the kindest men in the world and one of the nicest to work with. I have known him for so long that I felt quite at home while working. I am going back to make "Dark Angel," and I feel sure that I shall have a good time—the last two weeks of fun I mentioned, convinced me that you can have a good time in Hollywood when everyone relaxes. I wouldn't want to live there permanently, ever, but it is nice to go out for a few pictures a year."

We got onto the subject of happiness, and Merle shrugged her shoulders.

"I don't think you find happiness in being an actress. Perhaps some do, I can only speak for myself. I can't understand now, and you will think this funny since you know how I struggled to get an acting job, I can't understand why young girls should leave nice comfortable homes to battle their way up to an uncertain success. I was so young and so silly that I thought I couldn't stand the small confines of my home in India. I was born in Tasmania, you know, but I had been educated in Calcutta. It seemed as small a life to me as your smaller cities must seem to your young American girls."

SHE looked very serious when she said this, I felt she meant it honestly. And as if, half-talking to herself, she continued, "I had never been hungry, never been without nice clothes, until I started struggling for a career in London. Perhaps that is why I am so extravagant now. I made my own clothes because I couldn't afford to buy nice ones and I refused to wear cheap materials. I used to haunt the fabric counters, when I wasn't looking for a job. I found I could pick up good remnants when the season was nearly ended and I would save them for as long as six months until the season was suitable, then I would make them up into a simple costume that I knew, at least, was good because of its nice fabric. It didn't matter if my sewing was amateurish or the style none too smart."

Merle doesn't stint any more, I can tell you, having looked long and enviously at a closet jammed full of lovely clothes. Many were from her favorite designer, Norman Hartnell of London. She likes black best, brown next. She hardly ever wears colors, she doesn't think they become her. She has a mania for hats, pays wild sums for them. The lovely ice blue of her Carnegie satin hostess gown, she looked upon as an indiscretion, she had never tried that particular shade before. It was very becoming.

She is a delightfully inconsistent person. She tells you solemnly that she is amazed at her popularity over here, yet you know she is calmly steering her own bright destiny with a deft hand. She is deliberately naïve one moment, coolly sophisticated the next. I believe her skepticism about happiness because I think she would be miserable if she found life too placid, too lacking in its recurrent sting and uncertainty. And I think, too, that her slight antipathy to Hollywood is merely the shadow cast by an enormous curiosity to take the place apart and see how it ticks!

Each One Does its Own Job BETTER

Oh, the whispering sopranos, and tenors and baritones, too, that I've met! Just try to talk with one a few minutes, or a few hours, before they get their cue to burst into song. With quiet dignity they will whisper, 'Mustn't talk. Singing, you know.' Now the truth about whispering is that it causes just as much strain as ordinary conversation, if not more. The only logic to be found in this pet superstition is that talking, like running, jumping or riding a horse, requires some physical effort and if a singer talked long enough, and loud enough, he or she might, eventually, become so tired physically as to be 'out of voice.' But talking before singing never hurt anyone.

Miss MacDonald scratched her pretty head. "Let's see," she meditated. "What next—oh, yes! The sacrifice for the figure. Nine out of ten singers tell of the sacrifices made to their figure by the over-development of the diaphragm, that partition separating the chest from the tummy, and the consequent big tummy. Most coaches actually spend a lot of time seeing to what extent a pupil's diaphragm can be developed. I had one teacher who held to the belief that if I could hold my breath and say my A-B-C's two or three times while holding it, that I was doing splendidly. Bunk! That might be great training for deep-sea diving, or underwater swimming, but not for singing.

"The real development is in the throat and it is not necessary to have such a big wind-bag, below, in order to make noises out of such a little opening, above. The sacrifices made for the figure, by the over-development of the diaphragm and the tummy, nine times out of ten, are nothing but an apology for having wrestled with too much spaghetti and vin rouge! Which brings me to the subject of a singer's diet, about which much has been written. This, too, is the bunk! I never take my voice into consideration in the matter of food. I eat what is good for my stomach, and do not eat things that are bad for it. Diet for singers? Baloney!

"Then there's love! A lot of singers, male and female, have told of the sacrifices made to their voices and most of them have used the phrase, 'I had to give up love.' That's silly, and my only answer to that assertion is that none of us are singing all of the time.

"These same people assert they must forego all social functions, as another sacrifice to their art. That, too, is asinine. If a singer really did that, such a singer would become so warped mentally that it would automatically have a very bad effect upon a performance.

"Life should be made a joyous thing, not a burden, even by singers."

IT was then that we entered upon a discussion of temperament, and Miss MacDonald broke down and confessed that she, too, has more than a fair share of it. "I have not always agreed with my superiors," she admitted, "and when you fail to agree with them you are called—well, a bit difficult. I am! But I've never shown any sign of temperament, never been difficult, with persons over whom I have authority. Doing that, in my opinion, is showing off, and a sure sign of an inferiority complex. If I do not like some poor devil on the set, I'm not going to have him thrown off because I do not like him, as some temperamental persons have done. And until recently I thought I had done fairly well with my childhood training which had to do with concealing my emotions. On this recent occasion I found I wasn't quite cured. I'll tell you about it.

"Ernst Lubitsch hurt my feelings—and I cried. It was just before I was to start singing. Then, every time I started to sing, I'd think of my injured feelings, and start crying again. Before long I had my throat tied up in a knot, and couldn't sing a note. For, I repeat, there is no bunk about not being able to sing when emotionally upset.

"Then, recently, during the recording of a big scene in 'Naughty Marietta,' I got unstrung. There was a lot of tension. I got mad, and when I get mad I want to kick something.

"I did. The object of my temper was a steel chair. The chair clattered to the floor and I started hopping about on one foot, holding my toes in my hands. Everyone on the set laughed at my discomfiture. They were entitled to laugh and pretty soon I was laughing with them. But I wasn't forgiven so easily. I was framed!

"Just as I burst into song a carpenter arrived, knelt beside me and the chair, and started nailing the chair to the floor. And a property man arrived with a large rubber boot, which, it was suggested, I put on my right foot before doing any more kicking!

"That cured me.

"No, there isn't so much to this temperament business. What is commonly known as temperament is usually exhausted nerves, or an open display of the emotions. It's usually 99 per cent temper and 1 per cent mental."

Once again Miss MacDonald scratched her pretty head and once again she smiled with another idea.

"It's about singers, and drinking," she announced.

"Tradition has it that sweet wine and strong drinks are definitely bad for the vocal cords, yet scores of singers swear by brandy-and-honey and use it just before singing. Now, where's the logic of that? Certainly, honey is sweeter than sweet wine, and brandy is a high proof distillation of wine, so what? I know some male songsters who believe so firmly in the value of honey and brandy that they eat honey with their meals and drink the brandy just before singing!

"Now, as for me, personally, I couldn't take a drink even of a mild wine, and sing, any more than I could sing after eating. Any intoxicant, even wine, would ruin me for the time being. Now a mild intoxicant is said to relax the throat muscles, but it relaxes mine so completely that I have no voice. Eating before singing? I'll tell you a secret. When I am scheduled to sing I do not eat. Instead, I sip a little lemon juice to still the gastric juices that are battling for food and then swallow a little honey to soften the irritating effect of the lemon. Why don't I give in and eat? Because when I eat I am likely to yawn, and when I'm fearful of yawning—well, I simply can't contemplate a high note."

Miss MacDonald was thoughtful.

"We've been talking about this sacrifice business for a couple of hours," she said. "There certainly are a lot of singers, men and women, who shed public tears over all their sacrifices. But, do you know that there are a lot of them who talk about their sacrifices who really ought to sacrifice their singing—and forget it!"

I'll Never Do That Again

"But we were talking about my faults, and fibbing in particular. I get the biggest kick out of Mother when she tries to fib! It almost kills me! You know how mothers tell white lies to get their children to do things? Well, I've been on to her for years! The other night she was trying to sell me an idea by telling a whopper and her expression was a dead give-away! And I guess that most of our mistakes are give-aways about us to others!"

A page boy brought a phone to our table. Miss Rogers was wanted on the phone. She talked rapidly into it, jumped up and exclaimed, "Excuse me a minute, will you, Caroline? I have to ride a horse in the picture and they've got several lined up in the street and I'm to pick the one I want. I'll be right back!"

I tried to look nonchalant in this dining-room of strangers. A publicity man came up and asked for Ginger. I explained morosely that Ginger was out in the street looking for a horse to ride in a picture. He gave me a startled look and almost fell over Gene Raymond as he backed slowly away from me.

Suddenly she was back again. "Well, that's over," she announced triumphantly. "I even rode him! Now all I have to do is take a make-up test this afternoon and the day is over." I suggested that we learn the rest of her mistakes before a horse stuck its head in the window looking for Ginger. She was game, for she smiled and said:

"Have you ever seen girls that wear too much street make-up? Well, I used to belong in that quota. Every kid that wants to go on the stage seems to think that she has to look and act like an actress twenty-four hours a day. After you've been around a while you know better!

"I started stage work when I was fifteen, winning the Texas state championship during the Charleston craze. But I'd been addicted to too much make-up long before that! Instead of attracting favorable attention like you want it to, it's very liable to have just the opposite effect. Why, when I was seven, I was make-up conscious. You ought to hear my mother tell about that!

"Mother and I were in New York then. We were living in a hotel on Fifth Avenue and one day Mother rushed in, grabbed me by the hand and hurried me down the street to where she had a business appointment. She noticed that people were staring at us and, when the snickers eventually grew too frequent, she stopped to glance at little Ginger. One look was enough!

"I'd been arraying myself in all the make-up and props I could lay hands on. Not that I was laboring under the idea that I was going to be an actress. I simply craved make-up! So, there we were on Fifth Avenue, my lips painted a bright red, enough rouge on to supply a chorus and, to top it all, decked out in my mother's long jade earrings.

MOTHER took me over into a dark corner, and did she scrub that make-up off with a handkerchief and her underskirt! It's a family joke now, but one time—and not so awfully long ago—my use of cosmetics was something of a professional and personal handicap. I imagine that girls don't realize that too much make-up makes you look quite like everyone else instead of making you stand out from the crowd.

"Another fault of mine has been in being too readily impressed by smooth surfaces. Perhaps you have to grow older to learn that still waters run deepest. But cute boys who had great lines and acted like bigshots were one of my kid failings. They don't wear well, and in going about with pseudo-people you either make yourself appear extremely gullible or as false as the people with whom you associate. And that's no help to either your career or yourself if you want to succeed and have people like you for yourself.

"You'll notice that young girls like to go around with that type, but when they get married it's to those men who have some seriousness and stability in their character. That's the tip-off!

"One of my most highly developed feminine traits I've managed to overcome to a degree. Practically all girls like to gossip. I did. And at times gossip so readily becomes malicious that you hardly realize what you're saying or implying. One thing I did stands out in my mind. It taught me the greatest lesson and caused me more genuine humiliation than anything I've ever experienced.

"When I was playing in musical comedies, most of my time was spent backstage. Naturally gossip was one of our favorite recreations. I remember, in this instance, that I was playing at a theatre in Washington and in talking to a girl said something about another person that was absolutely uncalled for.

"Luckily for me—and I mean luckily—that person happened to be standing right behind me and heard what I'd said. I'll never forget how terrible I felt when I turned around and saw her standing there. Her lack of retaliation hurt me more than anything she could possibly have said or done. I learned one lesson from that experience that I'll never forget. 'Wash your dirty linen at home!'

"I'm absolutely rude at times and must repulse people whose only intention is to be kind. I'm so darned afraid of falling for flattery that I often have a feeling that people are saying one thing and meaning another. That makes it hard to be polite. As you know, Hollywood is given to effusiveness. A lot of it is genuine. But I can't help freezing up when my own common sense tells me that it was just meant as honest praise and that I should be deeply grateful for it."

GINGER finished her orange juice, spoke a moment to B. B. Kahane, head of the studio, waved to an electrician, and once again plunged into Miss Rogers' faults. She said: "Another mistake that I often make is my lack of decision. I'll sometimes stall around and hesitate and end up by not knowing just what I want.

"For example, when we're picking songs for my pictures. The song writers will play them over and then say, 'How'd you like them?' I'll hem and haw around sometimes. Other times I'll turn around and make a snap judgment and say that I don't like a certain song. Their experience will prevail, though, and darned if it won't turn out to be the hit song of the picture!"

As we started for the door, with Ginger already late for her make-up test, she suddenly exclaimed, "I'd forgotten about my 'life of the party' complex, and that's one mistake I never want to make again! Many times I used to go out on a date and I thought I was the belle of the ball if I was the center of attraction.

"Really, I was simply making my escort feel conspicuous! After I'd get home and think about the evening, I'd feel like giving Ginger a good swift kick! It's far better to be a little backward than to embarrass your escort by being the life of the party, to monopolize the conversation and so on."

Ginger hurried up the street to the test stage. Not a horse was in sight. While she professes to have made plenty of mistakes that she'd never make again, you'll probably agree that lack of honesty and frankness aren't among them!

Hollywood Can't Change Me!

quit being dignified?" she demanded. I compromised by following her suggestion. I haven't won an argument with her yet!

Peace restored, Alice went on with the conversation. "Maybe it's just me that doesn't fit. I don't know. But the best times I ever had in my life were when I was in the chorus. I used to go window shopping between shows and I got more kick out of that than I do out of being able to buy things now. You hear a lot of gags about people being tired of it all. You know in my case that I'm telling the truth when I say I happen to prefer New York to Hollywood. Nothing personal, understand. That's just the way I feel. Broadway's my home. I belong there, I don't here.

"What I can't understand, Dick, is much of the hullabaloo about being a picture actress. I've worked on the radio, I've worked in night clubs, done personal appearances. You can be yourself—you go out, do your job and the rest of the time is yours. But here I feel like part of a parade twenty-four hours a day. They worry too much. 'Where're you going?' 'What'll you wear?' 'What'll people say?' They never miss on that last one! If you've got nothing on your conscience why should you have to worry about what people say or think?

"The happiest two weeks I've had since I've been in pictures were spent two thousand miles from here. I did two weeks of personal appearances in Chicago and it was swell. Everybody was swell. I'm old Grandma herself when it comes to those stage jitters but just the same I enjoyed it. Of course, you have to remember that if it weren't for pictures there would be no personal appearances. But even if I do get so scared by an audience that I have to lean on a piano for a prop, I like it. You've an audience to work with and not a big bunch of lights that say, 'So this is Faye, huh? Well, make me laugh!'

"I only wish I had Rudy's assurance on the stage. He walks out and wows them five shows a day, week in and week out, and nothing upsets him. That's why he's on the top where he belongs. But me! I'll see some guy in the fifty-ninth row looking for his hat and I'll say, 'There you go, Faye, driving them out of the theatre already!' My knees begin to rattle and it's all I can do to stop from going into an 'off to Buffalo' right off the stage and into the street!"

I GLANCED around Alice's apartment. From her porch you can see the ocean. One of the finest suites in the most exclusive apartment house in Hollywood. Beautiful furnishings, an expensive radio, her mink coat thrown over a chair. "How about these?" I inquired, nodding at the various accoutrements of her success.

Alice ran her fingers through her blonde hair, put her hanky back into the pocket of her deep blue lounging pajamas. "I'm plenty grateful to Hollywood for what it's given me. No matter how hard you work to have to remember that it's certainly Hollywood and the studios that combine to put you over. I got my chance here and I'm not forgettin' it. My mother, cousin and two brothers live out here with me. That's swell! You know how I feel about my folks."

"Another thing I've learned here is that if I should ever get married, I'd certainly marry an actor! You have to, in self-protection. You have to marry someone that talks your language, that knows what you're up against. So many marriages have two strikes on them to begin with that if you're smart you'll fall in love with someone in your own profession. Movies and outsiders don't seem to click so well. Nor with society people for that matter." She grinned. "Not that Faye would be knowing society people! But if you have a common background and about the same type of interests it'd seem to me that there's a better chance of making the grade together. You mightn't believe it, but I'm nigh on to twenty-two and I've never had a proposal in my life! So I guess Faye doesn't need to be getting wrinkles on that score."

As you see, Alice doesn't pretend to know all the answers. She doesn't mingle with the local intelligentsia, if any. Her pals are people who knew her in New York. But she does know all the answers about little Miss Faye who sings for her supper and her family's.

You can't kid her and she won't kid herself. I remember when the studio thought that she should take voice lessons to improve her diction. Alice went to the high mogul of the studio and said simply, "Listen, do you think people are going to go to pictures to see my idea of how to speak like a professor in five easy lessons? You told me to be myself. I'm trying to stay that way. Do you want me to sing songs like, 'Oh, You Nasty Man!' with a broad A? It's silly. I'm not going to do it." That was that. She didn't. Three pictures ago, as Hollywood reckons time, that was. And she's been made a star in her latest one.

ALICE looked out of the window at the traffic streaming along Sunset. Half aloud she said wistfully, "I'll be going East in a week and, gee, will I be glad to be back home!" Looking at her I felt that I knew just how she meant it. Life hasn't been any bed of roses for Alice. She started her picture career under the handicap of unpleasant publicity. She sold herself when the picture was released, simply because Alice Faye didn't fit in with the situation that had been foisted upon her. She doesn't tell you that she had to go to work at fifteen. About her long rehearsals and shows as a Chester Hale chorine. She knows what it means to ride home to Brooklyn on the subway at three in the morning after working all evening in a night club.

The best thing about her, from Hollywood's point of view, is her lack of pretense. That alone sets her aside. She won't pretend to be a lady of elegance or of blueblooded ancestry. No smart quips fall from her lips but plenty of horse-sense does.

Alice was saying, "Sometimes things just don't mesh, I guess. This is one of those times. If I changed, I wouldn't be Alice Faye so all I can do is try to get along by being myself. Maybe I'd been more adaptable if I came from the legitimate stage. But as it is, I'm embarrassed working in front of a chorus—I'd feel more at home in it and I'm not kidding!"

Success can't daunt her, I guess. That it's made her wiser, made her less carefree, I know. But neither Hollywood nor any other town could change this kid who stepped into a leading role her first day in the celluloid city. Who said Hollywood couldn't take it? It's made Alice Faye a star for staying herself!

When They Were Job-Hunting—Part I

wise eyes of the stage man saw that the girl had tremendous vitality and intelligence. As he talked to her, he discovered the alertness of her mind and the keenness with which she grasped everything he said. He pronounced the magic words, "I think you'll do" and Claudette was sent, like every other beginner, to read the part before the stage director.

They saw that she was good and, after several weeks rehearsal, the company opened out of town. But by this time influences were at work over which Claudette had no control. There were large holes in the play. Scene after scene had to be re-written and by the time that this was done, Claudette's part was so changed that she was no longer the type to play it.

YES, she had got her first job. Her vividness had impressed a producer and now she was thrown into the depths of despair. To any producer this is just a "bad break." And Pemberton was too busy languishing over his sick play to bother over a girl's sick soul. He did not know until years later—perhaps he has never known—that Claudette's heart was broken. You see, she did not know that the talent she had, the very thing which had caused Pemberton to give her the part was the thing that would get more roles for her.

The only thing that kept her going was a chance meeting with Katherine Cornell at a party. The great Cornell, already an established actress, looked deep into the girl's eyes and said, "Do not be discouraged. You are so young. You will have a hundred more chances. If you have the ability, there is nothing that can keep you back."

But while Claudette was losing her role in "Puppets," a very earnest young man was working like a slave to fit himself for the stage. He was brought to Brock Pemberton by an agent, as a fellow who showed promise, and given one of the male roles in "Puppets." Fred March was his name. Pemberton saw in him the vital spark and gave him his chance. But he had trouble making himself heard beyond the first few rows. All the emotion necessary was in his voice. What it lacked was volume. For weeks he took the most strenuous exercises under a competent teacher and, by the time the play opened, his voice was firm and resonant.

But Pemberton was having more trouble with "Puppets." The girl who had opened out of town in the role similar to the one Claudette Colbert had and which the re-writing had changed, became ill. They realized that she must be replaced by another girl. Desperately Pemberton wired to New York to have someone for an interview the day he arrived. Worried and harassed he came into his office and was instantly greeted by the most charming smile he had ever seen. It beamed at him from a piquant little face topped by a mop of golden hair. His secretary said, "This young lady was sent up by the agent. She's done a couple of small bits in musical comedy." But Pemberton knew from that first bright smile that she had the magic that would electrify theatre audiences. Her name? Miriam Hopkins.

AND all during rehearsals it was that smile that the producer and director and other members of the cast remembered.

Most of these young players were, as I've told, sent to Pemberton by someone who could vouch for them. Very seldom has the producer time to interview those forlorn, would-be actors and actresses who sit day after day in his outer office hoping for a chance for a word with him.

However, one day he noticed, amongst that motley crew a girl whose very appearance caught his eye. She was so quiet, so demure, so calm. He told his secretary to send her in. She had no agent and was merely making the weary rounds of producers' offices hoping for a break. Two things impressed Pemberton—first, her gentle manners (she was so obviously a lady) and secondly, her rich lovely voice, a naturally beautiful voice. So he sent her out in a road show of "Strictly Dishonorable" and eventually she had the chance of playing the leading role. That's how Margaret Sullavan got her first break.

The play "Strictly Dishonorable" itself has a dramatic background. Two newcomers to Broadway appeared in the New York production. One was Muriel Kirkland, picked from fifty girls who tried out for it and another was Tullio Carminati. Tullio had been a well-known actor in Italy. A film company had brought him to America a couple of months before talkies came in. When the microphone menaced Hollywood, the moguls decided that the Italian's accent would not record so he was sent on his way.

It was in a road show that someone saw him, realized his charm and suaveness and recommended him to Pemberton. And his success was instantaneous.

BOB MONTGOMERY was another who approached Pemberton and was given a small part. And George Brent was picked for a role in "Seven Year Love" when he was still an unknown. Walter Huston was discovered by Pemberton in another way. Walter's sister asked the producer to see him. Huston was, at that time, playing in vaudeville. Various acts were on the bill that evening, most of them pretty dreary. And then Huston appeared. Why, the man could do everything—he sang, he danced, he acted in a little skit he had written himself. So versatile was he, of such depth was his acting that Pemberton did not bother giving him a small role. Instead, he began at once looking for a play for him. And he found it in "Mr. Pitt." In this same production, by the way, was an unknown called Minna Gombell.

Amazing, isn't it, how great these names have grown? Surprising to realize that those boys and girls, like you, perhaps, today, were out job-hunting! And hunting jobs with them at the time were boys and girls whose names no one knows. When all is said and done, Pemberton, himself, hardly knows why he picked these few. One had a bright smile, another was gentle and lady-like, another was intelligent and earnest. But this fact remains, there was in each one some vital quality, some force of personality, some latent talent that shone through the awkwardness one feels in applying for a job, that overrode the nervous tension bound to be felt before so omnipotent a producer as Pemberton.

With this mysterious, undefinable quality you can't be kept back. Those first little roles were the open sesame for these stars. But had Pemberton not seen it someone else would have. Talent was there and talent cannot be buried!

When They Were Job-Hunting—Part II

any direction and it annoyed the actors. But she didn't seem to understand English, for she took off her hat and made herself comfortable. Finally, because I thought she would annoy me less on the stage than she did sitting right there on my elbow, I told her she could be one of the Czarina's ladies-in-waiting. . . .

"She was on the stage before I had even finished my sentence. I told her where and how to stand. Then came the dress rehearsal and I knew that something had to be done!

YOU see, even in an atmosphere part, Katharine Hepburn stood out like a bright star in an indigo firmament. She wore the identical costume that the rest of the ladies-in-waiting wore and was supposed to act and be just like them. But she wasn't! She wasn't, at all. For this reason she spoiled my entire set-up. She made the other ladies-in-waiting look unimportant, colorless. Katie had something about her that you just couldn't miss. I didn't know what it was then. I scarcely know what it is now . . . but I knew I had to either throw her out of the company altogether, or give her a better part. I decided to do the latter.

"Mary Boland was also responsible, in a way, for my giving Katharine Hepburn a chance at a good role. You see, Katie adored Mary—but not from afar. She would follow her around, watching her every gesture, listening to her every intonation, getting in her way and under her feet wherever she turned, until poor Mary could stand it no longer.

"'For heaven's sake!' she would say, 'Why don't you give this girl a big part and keep her busy and out of my way?' So you might say that Mary, too, helped Katharine to get started in her career.

"It's foolish, in a way, for anybody to say that they discovered Katharine Hepburn. She discovered herself! She knew she had something to offer before anyone else knew it. And she knew that she had to get on the stage for that someing to be seen and appreciated. She arranged that through her own will and determination . . . the rest was easy. When a girl like Katie hangs around the footlights, you just have to put her back of them.

"Here is something interesting about her that I don't believe has ever been told before. Following two summer seasons at Baltimore, I decided to produce a play on Broadway. That play was 'The Big Pond' and I gave Katharine a chance at the leading role. She worked like a Trojan on that part. We rehearsed for several weeks, and opened out of town, at Great Neck. By that time we were all certain that Katie was promising material. But she wasn't ready yet. She hadn't the necessary training and experience. And after a week in Great Neck, I had to tell her so. I felt like the devil about it, but I had to tell her that she just wasn't ready for Broadway.

WELL, she took it beautifully. There were no tears. There were no angry outbursts. In fact she said and did something, the like of which I had never heard before in the theatre. 'All right,' she said. 'I understand. But if I can't do the part on Broadway, I'd at least like to understudy it.'

"And so Katharine Hepburn understudied the role she had just been playing. It was one of the most amazing indications of good sportsmanship that I have ever witnessed. And she stuck with us, too, during the length of the show's run on Broadway."

But Mr. Knopf was introduced to even other examples of good sportsmanship, right in his own Baltimore stock company. Most stock companies at that time were operated on the star system. Each company usually boasts one or two well known actors, or actresses who had been well known on the Broadway stage. These actors received six or seven hundred dollars a week and the rest of the company received practically nothing, in comparison. So, also, did the producers. For this reason, Mr. Knopf decided that there would be no stars in his company. Even well known players, who might like to come down to Baltimore for the fun of the thing, would never receive more than two hundred dollars a week, his top salary. Supporting players would, on the other hand, receive better-than-average wages. There would be no names in lights. There would be no favoritism shown in any way. It was just to be one big happy family.

Strangely enough that is exactly what it turned out to be. Even Mr. Knopf was surprised. It didn't seem that so much talent and so much temperament could be thrown together and still live to tell the tale. In addition to Mary Boland and Katharine Hepburn, Douglass Montgomery and Bob Montgomery were also members of that company. If one of them played a leading role one week, he played a bit part the next. The dressing-room question was handled a bit more simply. The biggest and best dressing-room, which was the one always nearest the stage, was occupied each week by the person having the most costume changes. In the two years that this Baltimore company existed not one actor asked for a raise. Not one actor complained about his quarters. Not one insisted on more publicity. Not one seemed jealous of anyone else—and there were no nasty outbursts of temperament.

"Of course, of the four people mentioned, three of them were comparatively unknown then. Mary Boland was the exception. It's interesting that in spite of the warning 'you can't be stars here!' that's exactly what they all turned out to be! Which is just another way of proving that you can't keep a good man down.

Douglass Montgomery was one of the first to open with this Baltimore stock company early in its first season—and the whole town went mad about Douglass. At least, the ladies did. He played juvenile parts and hearts both young and old went pitty-pat every time he appeared on the stage.

After the end of the third or fourth week, a few of the more enterprising matinee hounds got together and formed the "Douglass Montgomery Club." What was its purpose? What is the purpose of any club? They wanted to meet their Douglass. They wanted to shake his hand. They wanted to twist the buttonhole in his lapel. And, since they had organized a club in his honor, it was only polite that he should invite them to tea, or at least come out into the audience to greet them after the performance was over. They had special stationery printed. They sent Douglass the joyful announcement of their organization and, of course, Doug responded as they expected him to. Even in those days he had plenty to talk about and so his worshipers found him even more delightful in person than they did on the stage. His popularity grew by leaps and bounds and it looked as though Mr. Knopf's "no-star system" was doomed, because of Douglass.

DID it turn his head? Did it turn the heads of the other members of the company away from him? Quite the contrary. They laughed and kidded him about it but no one seemed jealous. Everything went along just as smoothly as before.

"At the end of our first stock season in Baltimore," Mr. Knopf went on, "Douglass Montgomery received an offer to appear in a New York play, and left us. Which meant that I had to look around for another juvenile. It was about that time that Bob Montgomery came to see me. I liked him, in spite of myself—you see, he, too, was, at that time, little more than an amateur.

"From the beginning Bob worked against tremendous odds. Remember that Baltimore had been crazy about his predecessor, Douglass Montgomery. So, though they liked Bob, they were always wishing that they had their little 'Dougie' back. The newspaper critics were always comparing the two—an always odious procedure. Patrons wrote us letters, asking about Douglass. Why hadn't he come back? Where was he playing at the moment? and so forth. A few even insinuated that I had purposely hired Bob because he had the same last name that Douglass had. Insinuating, too, that in this way I had hoped to entice Douglass Montgomery fans into the theatre—under false pretenses.

"Bob was a bit discouraged at first, but as time went on he saw that he was gaining a foothold himself. The strain of trying to take Douglass Montgomery's place lessened. By the end of the season, Bob had won over many of his predecessor's fans and had gained hundreds of new ones for himself.

"It was at about this time that the play 'Broadway' closed on Broadway and came to Baltimore. They opened in a theatre next door to ours. A girl, by the name of Elizabeth Allen, had the lead in that play. Bob Montgomery came to me one day and said, 'There's a swell little actress playing right next door. I want you to meet her. Maybe we could have her here in the company with us.' Accordingly, Bob took me next door to meet Elizabeth Allen. He had not known her very long, then, himself, but it was easy to see that he was all for her! I liked her, too, and told her to come and see me when she finished her run in 'Broadway.'

SO, several weeks later, Bob Montgomery and his future wife, Betty Allen, appeared together in one of our plays. They were married, I believe, before the year was over. Incidentally, that play in which they acted together was 'Clarence,' with Bob playing the juvenile role.

"Bob, too, showed what kind of stuff he was made of during my early association with him. After 'The Big Pond' I signed to direct another play on the road with the hope of bringing it into town later. The producer, Arch Selwyn, wanted Douglass Montgomery for the leading role. But Douglass wouldn't be free for several weeks. So I made Bob a proposition to play the role during the road try-outs with the understanding that he would give it up, as soon as Douglass Montgomery was free. Bob, as usual, was swell about it and he had so thoroughly proved himself a fine actor that when the time came Selywn hated to see him give up the role.

"Following the production of the play, 'The Big Pond' was bought for Maurice Chevalier to do in the movies and, since I was sent out to Hollywood to do the adaptation, I lost track of most of the people with whom I had worked. But to prove to you that there is such a thing as a grateful actor I want to tell you that when I did meet Bob Montgomery again, I needed his help—and badly. Let it be written in the book, if those who deny to actors the quality of gratitude—he came through, and generously."

These people have all gone a long way since those early days. When we hear today that Katie Hepburn fights with her director we surely cannot blame it all on her disposition—after what Mr. Knopf has told us. No real trouper is naturally belligerent. The word "trouping" means quite the opposite. Some people are born good troupers. They get to the top eventually even though they may have to play all the backwoods towns . . . sleep in small, cheap hotels . . . eat bad food and live on a few dollars a week. They get to the top even though they have been told that they can't be stars! At least, that is what happened to these four people, and we admire them all the more because of it!

anybody would pay any attention to me. I was terribly shy then and so tired from worrying that I felt numb. But all the girls did everything they could to help me, particularly Miss Hepburn. She was lovely to me. When I said I lacked her intensity, she told me that what she needed was my relaxation. That struck me as funny, because she didn't know I was half-dead for sleep."

SHE could laugh at it now, though a bit wistfully.

"Has everybody been kind to you?" I inquired.

"Yes, very kind indeed," was her grateful reply, "everybody but one woman star. As we took our places for a scene, one day, she turned on me angrily and called out, 'Don't stand there, you little piece of trash!' Of course, I was just a nobody, but I didn't feel I was trash, and what she had said right there before others hurt me terribly. I stood where I was, in spite of her, because the director had told me to stand there. But I never spoke to her again. A day or two later she stopped and demanded, 'What do you mean by passing me without speaking?' But I wouldn't answer her."

Spunky little thing, this Jean Parker, with all her gentleness and charm.

"All the directors I've worked with," she went on, her face lighting again, "have been fine and helped me immensely, most of all dear 'Boly'—Mr. Boleslavsky, you know. In 'Rasputin' he handled me like a baby. Lionel Barrymore had a bad cold and was afraid I'd catch it, so we didn't rehearse our scene. 'Boly' just read it over with me. He thought, and so did I, that as the Princess Maria I should look Slavic, and as I'm Polish that was simple. I just accentuated my looks by slicking back my hair and wearing a switch, then making my mouth wider and straighter by taking the curve out of it. I never have anyone put on my make-up and I always do my own hair."

As you may surmise, this uncommon youngster gives the impression of being a thoroughly competent person. There were no silver spoons lying around loose when she was born, so she soon learned to make herself useful with the kitchen variety, and what's more she never did any crying about it. She feels pretty much the same about pictures.

"It isn't that I can't cry easily," she assured me. "But I don't believe a tense scene should be played with tears. They should be held back, and if the audience is made to feel the scene strongly they will do the crying. I know girls in pictures who can cry at the drop of the hat. But there must be more than mere surface emotion, something deep down inside you. Before I tried it I thought acting in pictures was much more artificial than it is. But it's really like paying you to play house sincerely."

"And paying you well," I suggested.

YES, that's true," she assented. "But good shoes and good cars are all I care about. Maybe I'm crazy."

She grinned impishly over her salad.

"Is it easy to play house sincerely?" I asked.

"No," she replied, "it really isn't. With normal intelligence a girl must have good health, otherwise she won't be able to stand it. Then everything depends on her training. With me, first of all, something had to be done about my thin little voice. The teacher I went to said, 'I want to treat you like a rose. We will start at the roots, then you will bloom.' That sounded lovely, but somehow I couldn't help feeling that my voice ought to be pulled up by the roots. I must say for it, though, that it came in handy for yelling purposes in my first picture, 'Divorce in the Family.' I had to fall out of a canoe into dirty water and sticky mud three times—and did I yell! When I got through making a mess of myself I looked mighty like, not a rose, but an old swamp hag."

She hopped up and ran her hands down her straight hips.

"Did work do that?" I asked.

"I'm afraid it did," she admitted. "This is the first day off I've had in four months. I worked in three pictures—'Caravan,' 'Have a Heart' and 'Sequoia'—without a break, sometimes working twenty-four hours at a stretch."

"Did you mind going to the studio at six in the morning when you were playing Beth?"

"I minded getting up at five, which I had to do," she confessed.

"You put in a pretty long day."

"But an interesting one," she added.

"And did it end with your work at the studio?"

"Not quite," she hesitated to say. "You see, when I got home at seven o'clock I had to get supper for the family—five of us altogether."

"Have you ever felt in danger of temptation?"

"No," she promptly answered. "It would be silly of me to say I haven't had any temptations in picture work, and I know that the movies are an orgy of temptations—money, greed, vanity, rivalry, passion. But yielding to those temptations is an individual matter. Before I went into pictures I was in love with a boy, and I'm still in love with him. He's everything in the world to me, and some day I expect to marry him, have a home of my own and babies. Those are the things I want and value above everything else in the world. Meanwhile the only thing in pictures that interests me is my work."

There seemed nothing more to say and nothing more to do than offer her a cigarette.

"No, thank you," she smiled.

Jean Parker doesn't smoke, and she doesn't drink, but she is hopelessly addicted to—work.

He's Naturally Funny

I say, 'What is it? A boy or a girl? The doctor, he laugh and pat me on da shoulder. "It's better dan dat,' he said. 'It's a boy and a girl!' At first I don' unnerstand. He say again, 'Mr. Armetta, it's twins!'

"Holy Mother! I was upsidedown. I hit myself on da forehead, like I always do. He say, 'Dat's funny!'

"I say, 'You tink maybe it's funny—two instead of one?'

"'Oh, no, dat is not funny,' he say. 'Dat is wonderful. I laugh at you. You are funny, hitting yourself like dat."

WELL, it seems that Henry was too confused by the arrival of the twins to think twice about what the doctor was saying. He calmed down after a while, however, when he saw the twins, and saw how cute they were. And the next day or so, Henry did get a job. It was while he was waiting to do a scene, that he remembered what the doctor had said about his looking funny. He went to his dressing-room, stood in front of a mirror and slapped his forehead again. Yes, maybe it was funny. He went back and tried it in front of the camera.

"Da director, he laugh. Everybody on da set, dey laugh. Da people in de audience . . . dey laugh at de preview. And I laugh, too. Not because I tink I am funny," Henry hastened to add. "But I laugh because now I tink maybe my troubles are over."

And that was about the size of it, too . . . particularly after he added that funny walk of his, to the thwacking business.

The walk, with one shoulder high in the air, was not natural however. Henry worked that out for himself.

"One day, I sit in my house, tinking how I can be more funny, when I see a pillow on da couch. Well, I tink dat maybe I am too tin. I was ver' tin. Yes, you don' believe me? I show you pictures. I tink, maybe I should be fat. I put de pillow under da vest, and look in da mirror. But I say to myself, 'Henry, if you are fat, you walk different. You have more to walk wit.' So I walk different ways. But it not ver' funny. Den, da pillow, he slip a leetle to one side, and I jus' naturally lift my shoulder to balance him. Now, dere! Dat, it is funny! The director he say so, too. So, for a coupla years, I been walking sideways. I get fatter, we make da pillow smaller. Now, I don't use da pillow anymore at all. My stomach, he is all me, in person."

And speaking of Henry "in person," he is just as charming and delightful and as enjoyable as he is on the screen only, of course, not quite so exaggerated. We had luncheon together at one of Hollywood's finest restaurants and I must say that I have never dined with anyone who received more deferential attention and courtesy than Henry did. Perhaps it was because the waiters have seen Henry waiting on tables on the screen many times and have seen him spill soup on some of Hollywood's loveliest stars. Perhaps they knew that Henry knows what not to do if one should stay out of trouble, and they were, therefore, twice as cautious and courteous. (Henry has the reputation for being the funniest character waiter in the business. You have also seen him as restaurant and hotel proprietor. Not to mention his roles as cab driver, street sweeper, etc.)

BUT I rather think that there was more to their attention than that. Henry is the sort of a fellow that you can't help liking. A man who once worked for fifty cents a day and who now makes $500 a week and who is still as sincere and modest as ever. He bears no grudges. He has a face on which only friendly thoughts register. He is a genial and generous host. You can't help liking a man like that.

Speaking of being a host. Henry has a specialty . . . barbecue parties. Henry has never owned his own home in Hollywood because, as he says, he prefers to move around. But the first thing he does when he moves into a house, is build a barbecue pit in the back yard. Consequently, Henry has populated almost the whole of Beverly Hills with barbecue pits, and they are beautiful, expensive ones, too. In fact, when Henry moves out of a place, the owner can always be certain of getting at least $20 a month more rent from his next tenant. When he gives parties, which he does often, he always serves barbecued steaks and a big dish of spaghetti which he prepares himself.

"I no save da money," he told me. "If I get a coupla dollars in my pocket I say to my family, 'Come on, we go to some swell restaurant, and eat swell.' We have a big meal. Maybe with champagne. I don' care. I don' care about da future. When we got money we enjoy it. Extravagant? No! Only, you know, good food, good wine, dat is fun. Dat is da best life."

Six years ago Henry bought his first car—a second hand Chevrolet for which he paid $250. Today he owns the most modern of modern cars, a new streamline Chrysler. It's his pride and joy and there's an interesting story connected with it, too.

Not long ago he decided to do something he has always said he was going to do. You know how a man is always saying, "Someday I'm going on a roughing trip. All by myself. I am going to leave my family and go off into the woods and eat beans and bacon cooked over an open fire!" Well, at last Henry was going to do it, but he was going to do it in style. As he told me, "I have da new car, but I don' wanna drive it. I wanna chauffeur. He drive me and I sit in da back seat and be comfortable. Well, we start off. I lean back and try to get comfortable.

"But I get so nervous to have somebody else drive my beautiful new car! And da chauffeur, he was ver' reckless. I have no fun at all. So I tell him to get out and sit in da back seat, and I drive. Well, I drive and feel ver' happy again when, all of a sudden I smell someting burning. I look in da back seat and dere is my chauffeur asleep—and his cigarette burn up all my new upholstery! Dat time I hit myself on da head good—to stop myself from hitting him. After dat I don' let him smoke, not any more. But I was also ver' much afraid someting else happen, so I turn around an' we come back home. Chauffeurs, bah! I tink dey just are not for me. Maybe beautiful new cars not either. I don' know." He shrugged.

"Well, you've got to do something with $500 a week," I kidded him.

"Oh, don' you worry about dat, I can do sometings," he laughed. "Yep, dat is ver' excellent idea."

He motioned to the waiter and whispered something in his ear. When the waiter arrived with the champagne he said, "You want me to make a noise when I pull out the cork, Mr. Armetta?"

"Oh, no," said Mr. Armetta with that quick funny little gesture of his. He put his finger to his lips. "Shhh," he said.

I smiled with approval. Most any other actor would have said, "Of course, by all means. Let the joyous 'pop' ring out!" And they'd only be hoping that there was somebody important there to see, and hear!

come in mighty handy at my house for Garbo left me headaches to go with the hot-water bottle.

If I'd known the job it would be to follow in her footsteps, I might never have bought the house. But I got so tired of being asked how I liked Los Angeles that I picked up and moved to Santa Monica. The natives have such a plaintive, wistful way of asking how you like the town—just as if they expected you to say you didn't.

It took Los Angeles a long time to find out where Garbo lived. I hope it doesn't take them as long to find out she moved. At present the tourist guides are reaping a big profit showing my house off as the place in which Garbo lived. All I'm getting out of it is a hoarse voice telling sightseers and insurance salesmen that Garbo doesn't live here any more.

I don't rightly know which is worse—insurance salesmen or sightseers, unless it's the two ant exterminator salesmen who fought over me. Why, if they fought ants as they fought over me, there wouldn't be an ant left in Southern California—or an ant exterminator either.

I told those fellows they'd make a sale if they would figure some way to exterminate the sightseers, but they admitted that was one science they hadn't mastered.

From the street you might not even suspect there was a house here. A huge ten foot cypress hedge hides all evidence of habitation. The only entrance is by the driveway which runs through a cypress arbor. You'd think Garbo could have hidden in here as long as Dillinger kept hidden.

But, at the rate sightseers pour up that driveway, I sometimes think a "Welcome" sign hangs in front. Tourists drive right up to the house, park by the garage, and when they've figured out where Garbo used to walk, decided she couldn't go swimming in the fish pond, and wondered where she took her sun baths, they drive out again.

When one Middle Western woman spied me, she sighed dejectedly, "I guess she doesn't live here any more."

Another one, was so sorry Garbo had moved. "I wanted to tell her about the sinking of the Titanic," she explained to me. "She would have been so distressed!"

There's some recompense, though, in the packages we sometimes find on our doorsteps addressed to "The Beautiful Swede," or the "Mysterious Garbo." If it's cake, I don't bother to forward it.

The straw that broke my back, however, was the car full of Iowans that puttered up the drive to a stop. I was lounging in the patio basking in California's well advertised sun. Out of the corner of my eye I observed them looking me up and down.

Now I wasn't trying to appear furtive or mysterious. I wasn't posing as Garbo. I was slouching comfortably in an easy chair, wrapped up in a black artist's smock with a slouch hat pulled well down on my forehead.

"Humph," snorted a woman in the back seat, as the gears ground into reverse, "I don't think so much of Garbo's new disguise."

That was the final straw. I believe in Southern hospitality, but when in Santa Monica, I decided to do as the Los Angelans do. I built a retaining wall, shutting off the patio from the drive. Now when people come in, all they get is a good view of the chauffeur and the kitchen.

If my experiences are but a sample of Garbo's no wonder the poor hunted beauty was frightened away by crass American curiosity.

At heart, of course, I think almost everyone who's had a taste of fame really likes it. Once you've started to attract public attention, there are two ways to take it. One's to be affable and put yourself on exhibition. That calls for handshaking, greetings, autographs.

I've done my share. Of course, it's easy to recognize me. Almost every caricaturist has taken a whack at me, and the better the caricaturist, the better the likeness. Friends have asked if it doesn't bore me. "It does," I confess, "but if you really want to see me bored, wait till people stop noticing me."

It's like a movie star who was dining with a friend of mine. Suddenly she turned to my friend and asked, "What's the matter with everyone tonight? Nobody's annoying me by staring at me."

My friend could have observed, but didn't, that a fading celebrity is like a betrayed husband—the last to hear the bad news.

The other way to accept fame is to act as Garbo—remain aloof and become even more mysterious and glamorous. Whether Garbo's solitude is sincere or affected, it's made her ten times as fascinating.

It worked with her. But imagine the embarrassment of Garbo's imitators. They've tried to hide away from the world and found that no one cared. And if this isn't the end of Garbo stories, it's the end of this one. Ah tank ah go to bed!

$2500.00 Cash Prize Contest

Paul Kelly's one of the most popular young men in this town—but it isn't due to his nice smile nor correspondence school charm; it's all due to his chili con carne. Yep, Hollywood's highest and mightiest moguls angle shamelessly for an invitation to the Kelly home just to sample and re-sample his work of art. Paul's favorite hang-out is his kitchen where, armed with a huge copper kettle and a two-foot wooden ladle, he brews his mysterious concoctions. Paul's awfully helpful to those who want the recipe. "Just line up all the ingredients on top of the stove," he advises, "and throw 'em in as the spirit moves you."

Besides the talented Katherine, Cecil B. DeMille is the proud papa of Agnes, who's earned herself an enviable reputation both here and abroad as a dancer. Katherine's an adopted daughter, but Aggie's a real "chip off the old block"—so much so in fact, that there's apt to be sparks flying when he and his fiery offspring clash. F'rinstance, the director had the brilliant idea that his dancing daughter would be an asset in his picture, "The Crusades." And so did Agnes—until she found that she was to dance on the back of a bull! It took a trip to New York to calm the lady—and the bull's in the picture without Miss DeMille.

What with almost every junior contract player at Paramount drafted for "College Scandals," you can expect something plenty lively if not actually scandalous. Arline Judge, Wendy Barrie and Willie Benedictine are just a few samples—and what that trio can't think up has never been thought up! Nothing, it seems, can dim that devilish sparkle in Arline's black orbs. Even when a two hundred pound beam fell on the set, crushing one end of a davenport—the other end being occupied by Miss Judge—she cheerfully reflected, above the rattle of her knees, "Humph! That almost knocked the giggles out of me!"

"Happy birthday to youse," carolled everyone on the M-G-M lot recently in honor of the studio's oldest and youngest stars—May Robson, who was celebrating seventy years of accomplishments, and Cora Sue Collins who had reached the venerable age of seven. The party was given by Louis B. Mayer, and the guests included all the old-time troupers and the youngest hopefuls on the lot. Lotsa fun, made merrier by two elegant birthday cakes—one a three-tier, five-foot high concoction, surmounted by a bird cage with a live canary chirping a gay greeting. On top of the cage was the number seventy in bright spun sugar. Then there was a tiny but equally beautiful cake, frosted in glistening white, and bearing seven pink candles in rosebuds. And we join in to wish you both many more happy and successful birthdays!

Frank Borzage has at last met his directorial Waterloo. Beneath his magic touch many actors and actresses have given their best performances. There has never been anything or anybody that Mr. Borzage could not direct with success—until now. Out at the Uplifters' Club, for the last month, you could see Frank and his stablemen experimenting almost every day with a group of half-broken Mexican ponies. It was the director's fond hope that these spirited mustangs could be developed into valuable additions to his polo string, and that he would become the envy and despair of Will Rogers, Bob Montgomery, Chet Morris, Gene Raymond and his other polo competitors. But the only development so far are numerous bruises on Mr. Borzage and some wrecked Santa Monica landscape. "I've soothed some of the wildest tempers in Hollywood," reflected our hero, as he ate his lunch from the mantel, "but my charms are to no avail on a Mexican mustang!"

There's just one person in this country who is not conscious of the fact that Shirley Temple is a child wonder—and that is Miss Temple. Thanks to her wise mother, this small girl is more unspoiled than many a child of her age. She plays every day with her friends in the neighborhood of their modest Santa Monica home; she has very few toys, most of the ones sent her by hundreds of fans are delivered to children's hospitals and orphanages; she thinks that moving pictures are "lotsa fun" and that's all. And this is most amazing: Shirley has never seen how adorable she is on the screen—because she's never seen herself on the screen at all!

Ann Sothern is New Yawking—but this time we'll bet she's looking forward to Hollywooding again. The last time, a year ago, that Ann left town, she didn't much care if Southern California ever saw her again, or not. In fact, the young leddy had firmly made up the gray matter under her yellow curls that it wouldn't. But back she came—they all do, for "just one more chance." And she got it. Ann is now a full-fledged star and positively scintillates with joy.

They do be saying that there's another Astaire in the offing in the person of George Murphy. We can't exactly believe that but we will vouch for George's ability to trip the light fantastic. For years he has done professional dancing in this country and Europe, but, on ruining his dance team by marrying his partner, he succumbed to the lure of the Klieg lights. "These flickers aren't exactly a soft spot," George said ruefully, lacing up his twenty-eighth pair of dancing shoes on the "After the Dance" set, "for the shoe industry it's a snap and a half, though."

Fred Astaire seems determined to keep the country dizzy. Every man, woman and child with two legs rushes home after seeing the Astaire do those twists, turns and glides so effortlessly, determined to execute the same manoeuvers. And just when they're too exhausted to go on contortioning, Mr. Astaire springs a new dance and it all begins over again. First, the Carioca swept the land, then the Continental and now—the Piccolino! You'll see the last named in "Top Hat."

Many of the stars out here believe in sporting symbolic weather vanes on their house-tops. Atop Ken Maynard's palatial shack in Beverly Hills you'll see a bucking broncho and a dashing cowboy astride, silhouetted against the sky. But some of our well known actors don't take themselves quite so seriously—their roofs flaunt weather-vanes showing flippant fish and cuckoo birds!

The European situation may be settled, but the Hollywood situation's attracting more attention and causing more anxiety around these parts. To move or not to move, that is the question. It seems that in the long run the studios will save an amount of lucre yearly that can't be sneezed at, by moving East; but on the other hand, there's millions of dollars invested here in property and a coupla million dollars worth of climate. So what? Anyhow, all the stars and producers have stopped even planning 'till this question is settled for once and for all—which may mean a couple of years or a couple of days. No wonder the town is kinda het up!

You can't serve fish or say fish to either Marian Marsh or Dick Cromwell these days. In a recent picture, several sequences were shot at the wharves. It was necessary to have a boat full of fish for local color—but said fish provided more than local color after the famous California sunbeams had warmed them for ten days. The day the studio chow wagon brought filet of sole as the main luncheon dish for the company, Marian and Dick hastily retired to the nearest hot-dog stand for nourishment.

Leo Carrillo and Luis Alberni are genuine hot-headed Spaniards — but in pictures they're always Italians. In desperation, finally, Señor Alberni appealed to a prominent director for a Spanish part in one of his works of art. "Not a chance," said the director promptly, "I want a Spaniard to play this part that's a real Spaniard—one who can even speak the language." Luis broke into a desperate volley of Spanish, but the director walked wearily away saying, "Nope, Italian never did sound like Spanish and never will."

Clark and Mrs. Gable arrive at the "Call of the Wild" preview. Mrs. G. looks kinda glum, doesn't she?

he went to see—'twas the spectators. He wants to study human emotions under the strain of winning or losing on the ponies. No wonder Vidor's one of the finest directors of intense emotional pictures when he will devote days to studying just the changing expressions of racing addicts. "Some people show such vivid and strong feelings in their faces," said Mr. Vidor, "that were they to be portrayed on the screen—even the most tragic ones—they would call for laughs from the audience; they'd be just too ludicrous to seem natural."

A friend of Helen Vinson's was considerably perplexed to receive a large box of lump sugar from New York where Helen is visiting before taking off for England and a Gaumont-British picture. He didn't quite know whether it was meant for a compliment or something else again, until the following day when an explanatory letter arrived. Seems that Helen's horse, Arabella, just mopes and languishes when her mistress is away, and would he be a "friend in need" to both Helen and Arabella and go out to her North Hollywood ranch and give the horse a lump a day?

Wendy Barrie's through with housebreaking—her own house included. Arriving home from a party one windy night, she fumbled in vain through her purse for the key. Disliking to awaken her maid, she prowled around the house on the look-out for an unlocked window, and finally located a loose one in the kitchen. It was high and took plenty of poking with a stick to raise. Then Wendy clambered up, got a leg over the sill and quietly slipped to the floor. Just then a blood-curdling scream rent the air! Wendy crouched shivering in one corner, just missing the violent swing of a broom as it was aimed at her. There, not exactly pale, but with her teeth chattering audibly, stood Mandy Lou, Wendy's buxom, brave cullud gal!

"An' ef Ah'd had a gun, Ah would've shot t'kill," she affirmed, when she could get the words through her clattering teeth.

Constance Collier, who slipped quietly into Hollywood a short time ago, found herself a rage after her first picture. Miss Collier has that certain sumpin' which movie audiences go for in a big way. But still the lady isn't happy! "I expected Hollywood to be a mad, hectic town," she complained, "and I came all prepared for a nervous breakdown from overwork. But instead my first picture was completed calmly in three weeks and I was told that I could rest and vacation for another month at least before starting my next."

That's a brand new complaint from an actress. Why, even the lady's recreations would prove hard work to most of us. She goes in strenuously for writing, composing music, motor-boating and is a constant spectator at racing matches, polo, tennis and aquatic events, to say nothing of indulging her fondness for cooking large spreads for friends at any hour of the day or night. Seems likely she'll have that breakdown—from too much recreation.

Here's something new in fan devotion. Fay Wray and her husband, John Monk Saunders, write that they are entranced with the English way of showing admiration for stars. Fay has been in England doing a GB picture. "I have an escort of boys on bicycles every evening when I go out," she says. "They follow my taxi to the theatre, restaurant or wherever we may be going. And when we arrive, they stand and smile until we've gone in—and that's all. They're extremely polite about the whole matter and have nothing at all to say."

Frank Capra was just starting work on the difficult script for "Lost Horizon" when he won the Academy Award for the best directorial work of the year on "One Night of Love." Chances to work after that were as scarce as hen's teeth—so Mr. Capra in desperation packed his suitcase and himself off to Palm Springs, the desert hide-out. But his public proved just as smart; he couldn't outwit them, it seemed, until he struck the happy thought of playing hide-and-seek. He immediately left for Hollywood, stayed a day and left for the desert. That night he returned to the Hollywoods—and continued taking important phone calls at Palm Springs! Had 'em re-routed, y'see. Well, neither did we, at first. Anyhow, only Mr. Frank Capra knows where he is now.

Peggy Fears has devoted her time to startling staid Hollywoodites since her arrival here some time ago. Between outlandish garb, sable bedspreads and nine greyhounds on a leash, the gal's succeeded nobly, too. But her latest idea of midnight airplane jaunts to Palm Springs and other points of interest in the state have not made such a hit with her friends. Last week her party narrowly escaped disaster when the plane made a forced landing in the desert, with a landing wheel knocked awry on a ledge of rock as they came down. It wasn't the first forced landing for Peggy and pals, but it was the first time that the entire group of them were found shivering in a disabled plane, listening to coyote obligatos until the cold, gray dawn.

Peter Lorre, that wild-eyed Hungarian who sent the shivers pell mell up your spine in "M," was asked by Farenz Waxman, musical director at Paramount, if he had any power of scaring people off the screen. Lorre said that of course he could—he was born scary. Waxman bet him twenty-five dollars that he was unscarable—but in less than three minutes he was rushing madly out of the room, after Peter had "turned on" his hypnotic, lurid leer. Nor was the check presented personally—Mr. Waxman mailed it.

Carol Ann, Wallace Beery's adopted daughter, is about as cute as they come in the line of little girls. Wallace finally had to make good his promise to her, given in a rash moment, that she could appear in a picture with him. So the three-year-old was given a part in "China Seas"—just a little part, which was soon completed. But Miss Carol Ann, once "in the movies" was not to be ousted so quickly. Every day she appeared at the studio, insisted on donning grease-paint and sailor suit, and staying on the set—confident that her genius was indispensable to the picture.

Francis Lister, from latest reports, is considering changing his name. The dignified Englishman says it is no gag, but a matter of considerable moment.

It seems that since publicity was sent out revealing the fact that his uncle was Lord Lister, the man in whose honor Listerine was named, Francis has been bombarded with letters from fans asking if he can use his influence and get them free samples.

"My fans seem more interested in their gargling than in my acting," said Francis mournfully.

Binnie Barnes, England's newest import of feminine charms, has fallen in love over here. Maybe you've heard that it's with Buck Jones—but 'tain't so! She's enamoured over a little gosling which Buck picked up half starved and nursed back to health at his ranch. When he brought it to the studio, Binnie became so fond of it, that Buck presented the bird to her. She promptly sent it to her mother who has a country place in England. Buck is a bit surprised, to say the least. "I never expected my ward to have such advantages," he said, "foreign travel and an English eddication is more'n I ever got!"

"BARBAROUS!" Says GOOD HOUSEKEEPING BEAUTY EDITOR

"INTELLIGENT!" Says YOUR OWN DENTIST

IT ISN'T BEING DONE, BUT IT'S One Way TO PREVENT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

"IT'S worse than a blunder, it's a social crime," exclaimed the Director of the new Good Housekeeping Beauty Clinic. "That girl," she went on, "is headed for social suicide."

But dentists looked at it differently.

"An excellent picture," was their general comment. "It's a graphic illustration of a point we dentists are always seeking to drive home. If all of us gave our teeth and gums more exercise on coarse, raw foods, many of our dental ills would disappear."

Time and again dental science has crusaded against our modern menus. Coarse foods are banned from our tables for the soft and savory dishes that rob our gums of work and health. Gums grow lazy... sensitive... tender! It's no wonder that "pink tooth brush" is such a common warning.

DON'T NEGLECT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"!

For unheeded, neglected—"pink tooth brush" may mean serious trouble—even gingivitis, pyorrhea or Vincent's disease.

Follow your dentist's advice. Brush your teeth regularly with Ipana Tooth Paste. Then, each time, rub a little extra Ipana into your gums. For Ipana and massage help restore your gums to healthy firmness. Do this regularly and the chances are you'll never be bothered with "pink tooth brush."

WHY WAIT FOR THE TRIAL TUBE?

Use the coupon below, if you like. But a trial tube can be, at best, only an introduction. Why not buy a full-size tube of Ipana and get a full month of scientific dental care and a quick start toward firmer gums and brighter teeth.

IN A HOLLYWOOD PROJECTION ROOM!

The hush in the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer projection room turned to a muffled whisper...the whisper rose to an audible hum... and in less than five minutes everybody in the room knew that a great new star had been born—LUISE RAINER—making her first American appearance in "Escapade", WILLIAM POWELL'S great new starring hit! It was a historic day for Hollywood, reminiscent of the first appearance of Garbo — another of those rare occasions when a great motion picture catapults a player to stardom.

A TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

By Regina Cannon

★★★ Break of Hearts (RKO)

The Hepburn fans have a treat in store, for in this her latest, Katie has an opportunity to run the gamut of her emotions—and it isn't all the way from A to B, as a wisecracker once put the range of the young woman's histrionics. This time she takes in the whole twenty-six! Also, she looks radiant—which means that the camera's a fibber or the cameraman, an expert. But—and be still you thumping female hearts—the pièce d'résistance of the whole bloomin' business is one Charles Boyer. Not much on the profile, but oh, the charm and acting ability! John Beal, too, does a fine job in a secondary role—that of a champagne-drinking playboy—which is a far cry from "The Little Minister" and is one up for Mr. Beal's versatility. The first part of the story, which deals with the meeting of an ambitious music student and a great musical conductor, is thrilling in its beauty and realism. Then all of a sudden, something goes boom and, once again, we have the one about two rich, temperamental people chasing each other all around Robin Hood's Bar (not a typographical error), not to mention the great Atlantic. There is the conventional happy ending which, in a picture with such initial startling story possibilities, also comes in the nature of a let-down.

Preview Postscripts

During the making of this picture, the set was closed to visitors. Katie always insists upon this. It's probably the Garbo in her. The set is not only closed to visitors, but to columnists. Those are the baddies who insist that a star is invariably "that way" about her current leading man. Sometimes they're right. Sometimes they're wrong. At this writing, Charles Boyer is in Paris with his wife. Mr. B. is slated to do things to the female public. They in turn will do things to the male public. They'll say, "Why aren't you like Charles Boyer? Why aren'tcha, why aren'tcha? And then the male public will pick up its morning paper and leave without kissing the female public good-bye. John Beal may not cause much havoc, but he has his share of charm, though it's not of the "what I want, I take" variety. He comes to us via the Broadway stage, where he has several "hit" performances to his credit.

★★★ The Flame Within (M-G-M)

Unless you have a passion for psychiatry or Ann Harding, this picture may leave you quite cold. The story involves little action, but a great deal of profound meditation, sharp repartee and mental anguish. Miss Harding can always be depended upon to "do" something; so having painted, written and played the harp in former yarns, she is now a nerve specialist, intent on untying the knots in people's personalities and snarling her own up in the meantime. It takes Herbert Marshall to untangle her—in fact, it takes him four years of silent suffering before the independent creature sees the light. In spite of such troubles though, they both do some convincing acting. But Maureen O'Sullivan and Louis Hayward, as the doctor's patients, outshine the stars with their performances. Maureen is the spoiled, spunky daughter of millions, who tries to escape Life via wrist-slashing and window-leaping. Hayward seeks solace for his woes in dat ole debbil drink.

As a thoughtful psychological study this celluloider is okay, but it's too thoughtful to be classed as excellent entertainment.

Mr. Edmund Goulding must not have been satisfactorily psychoanalyzed, for he became such an ardent student of psychiatry that not only did he direct this opus, but the story itself is the result of a Goulding brain-wave. (Continued on page 8)

"Accent on Youth"

Should a girl marry a man of her own age or should she choose a more mature husband? Can a girl in her twenties find happiness with a man twice her age? Granted that May and December are mismated; but what about June and September?

Millions of girls for millions of years have asked themselves these questions and attempted to answer them in their own lives.

Now the question — and one of the several possible answers — has been made the theme of one of the most charming screen romances of the season, Paramount's "Accent on Youth". . . As a stage play "Accent on Youth" won acclaim from the Broadway critics and tremendous popularity with the theatre-goers. Opening late in 1934 it promises to continue its successful run well into the summer of 1935.

Sylvia Sidney plays the screen role of the girl who comes face to face with this age-old question. She is adored by young, handsome and athletic Phillip Reed and she is loved by the brilliant and successful but more mature playwright, Herbert Marshall . . . Which man shall she choose? . . . That is the question around which the entire plot revolves and to answer it in print would spoil the delightful suspense which the author, Samson Raphaelson, developed to a high degree in his original New York stage success and which Director Wesley Ruggles maintains with equal success and charm in the screen play.

In the supporting cast are such well-known players as Holmes Herbert and Ernest Cossart. The latter is playing the same role on the screen as that which he created in the original Broadway stage production.

Bob Woolsey and Bert Wheeler doing justice to "The Nit Wits." Believe us, it's hilariously funny.

Handsome Ray Milland is Sally Eilers' leading man in "Alias Mary Dow," a Universal picture.

Beautiful photography, a swell rhumba number and Warner Baxter and Ketti Gallian in "Under the Pampas Moon," make it a must.

George Raft comes into his own in this exciting murder mystery, "The Glass Key," with Edwin Arnold and a grand cast.

Besides looking "mental" enough to qualify for Mr. Goulding's heroine, Ann Harding also beats all the other fillum ladies on that "sassiety upper-crust" look—and she comes by it honestly. Brought up in military circles, Ann even knows how to take orders—ask Mr. G. But don't ask Harry Bannister, her first "ex"—and last, to date. He's too busy asking the courts, anyhow, about who's getting the custody of their small daughter, to pay much attention . . . Herbert Marshall's the bone of contention in these parts—seems all the brightest stars crave strong, silent men for reel lovers. So much so that real wife, Edna Best, packed up and sailed for merry England recently, leaving Bart at the mercy of Garbo, Shearer, Bennett and Swanson. Since Maureen O'Sullivan left the Emerald Isle, she's changed from a wild, Irish rose to a hard-working, dependable actress, who is now more in demand than almost any other young player. Maureen claims that everyone on this picture had a "ravelling good time," for the set looked like an old-fashioned knitting bee most of the time, with every feminine player making a dive for her knitting when a "shot" was over.

★★★ Our Little Girl (Fox)

It's another Shirley Temple picture, which means A-1 entertainment for the kiddies, a fair show for grown-ups and a great clanging of the box office bell. If one wants to register a criticism against little Miss Curley Top, it would be that she is beginning to act just a leetle bit too much and seems quite camera conscious at this stage of the game. But who could register a complaint against that endearing dimple, that enchanting smile and the sturdy bit of babyhood that is our Shirley?

This time the Fox starlet plays the daughter of a country doctor who unwittingly neglects his pretty wife for experiments, urgent hospital calls and the like. There is another man—of course, there always is—but he's not a baddie by intent; well, he's Lyle Talbot! However, Shirley saves her parents' marriage through her winsomeness. The child's supporting cast—Joel McCrea, Erin O'Brien-Moore and Rosemary Ames—do what they can at interpreting not too scintillating characters in a time-worn yarn, as does John Robertson who took care of the directorial end of the picture-making.

If the green-eyed monster comprised part of Frances Dee's make-up, the young woman would forbid hubby, Joel McCrea, to appear in another Temple celluloider. Seems our Shirley is positively shameless in her affection for Joel. Everybody talked about it and, where there's so much smoke—well, you know. . . . On the strength of this great love, Fox tried to induce Mr. McC. to sign a contract to keep him in the fold, but he is evidently not permitting the romance to interfere with work, for he's still free-lancing. . . . Rosemary Ames, now the wife of Abner Stillwell who does big business in Chicago, got special permission from the groom to make this, her final, appearance on the screen. . . . As for Lyle Talbot, this gentleman did a little sulking about the set as he was once tops in Shirley's affections. It isn't easy to be supplanted, but time is a great healer. . . . Erin O'Brien-Moore, one of Broadway's finest stage stars, ought to be done something about. She's movie material plus. Somebody ought to throw a good role her way or at least a little decent lighting and then would she go places. . . . Let's not forget to mention Sniff. He's the Scottie the whole cast wanted to adopt when the picture was over. However, he's through with acting. It's too hectic. Maybe that's because he caused so many retakes. It's invariably the feller that's in the wrong that does the yipping. (Continued on page 95)

The Modern hostess

If you were a guest in Myrna Loy's home, the menu would include a crisp, tangy salad. Perhaps an Avocado or a Sour Cream Salad, the ingredients for which are pictured at the left, below. Simple to make, a treat to eat.

By Marjorie Deen

HUMOR, originality and sex appeal are outstanding characteristics of lovely, laughing, alluring Myrna Loy, as we all know. And those same qualities characterize the salads that are whipped together daily in Miss Loy's kitchen for her especial enjoyment.

"Sex appeal, humor and originality in salads? How is that possible?" you inquire incredulously.

Well, and why not? I know I was completely sold on just that possibility after hearing Myrna Loy's ideas on the subject of salads and after listening, fascinated, to the recipes and salad-making directions generously given me by Miss Loy's French-Spanish, Mexican-born secretary de luxe and feminine major-domo, Carolina Pradeau. From the efficient Carolina (pronounced Cahr-o-leena by Miss Loy) I managed to find out a good deal about new ways to fix and serve the different greens and dressings that comprise the salad course. But of even greater importance is the fact that I discovered during our conversation the kinds of salads that Myrna Loy demands.

"I loathe sweet salads, all thick with gooey fruits, cherries and whipped cream," redheaded Myrna informed me. "I like salads that are crisp, tart, full of green vegetables and drenched with a spicy dressing—a French dressing, maybe, or Thousand Island, or the Special Mayonnaise that Carolina makes. Down with sweet salads!" she declared with an impish smile.

And won't the men folk cheer at that declaration! For Myrna's words, I am sure, echo the protest of most of the males of the nation. Down with sweet salads indeed—men, like Myrna, want greens that are crisp and dry, vegetables that are fresh and crunchy and dressings that are tart and tangy.

Of course, it's not at all surprising that the men would approve of anything that Myrna favors, for as Loy goes so goes the masculine nation. Yes, since playing the humorous, companionable, entirely urbane wife in "The Thin Man" Miss Loy has become, in a comparatively short time, the Number One Glamor Girl of the films. Which merely proves that the exotic is out of date!

YOU REMEMBER doubtless when this very popular young star from Helena, Montana, self-christened Myrna Loy to match slanting green eyes, auburn hair and a striking appearance, played only sirens, without achieving more than a moderate success. Then along came another type of role completely and she discovered that a nice, healthy sense of humor gets a girl much farther these days!

But how to inject a sense of humor—not to mention sex appeal and originality—into a salad? Well, that's a problem that might well stump the average housewife. So let's see what hints we can collect from the imaginative Loy kitchen. I'm pleased to relate that while doing so we can also pick up some working plans for a couple of light summer dishes which Miss Loy dotes on.

Men will rave over the salads that Myrna Loy likes

These include one jewel among gems—a Mexican dish on which Carolina prides herself no end. It is Myrna's favorite concoction and is called "Taquitos"—but more about that later.

On those days when her many other duties allow her time to go into the kitchen, Carolina proves to be a splendid all-around cook. And, according to Myrna, she's a past master at salad-making in general, having very definite ideas about the ingredients that go into her salads. "More salads are ruined in the making than in the serving," she says very wisely.

"Never," says Miss Loy's Carolina, "do I let metal touch the salad greens—whether lettuce, romaine, chicory, endive or water cress. Many people shred greens with scissors, you know, or chop them with a knife. Not I! I always tear salad greens with my fingers."

How many times, in restaurants, have you marveled at a salad's firm, fresh beauty? Well, to achieve the crisp, dry perfection of a professional chef's salad, according to Carolina, you place your greens in a sieve or colander, wash them thoroughly in cold water, shake the water from each leaf and place the greens in a dry napkin. Then place them in the refrigerator for three hours or so. This eliminates the necessity for freshening greens with ice cubes or any danger of waterlogging them.

Another Carolina precaution is never to put the salad dressing on greens and vegetables until the last moment—just before serving, in fact. As you have probably learned from sad experience, nothing ruins a salad more quickly than adding the dressing an hour or more before serving and popping it into the refrigerator for safe-keeping. Your salad comes out as limp as a post-Christmas pocketbook!

HAVING found out that Myrna is extremely fond of salads, I set about discovering her favorites from Carolina. One, I found out, is Sour Cream Salad; another is a delicious concoction called Salad De Luxe, the recipe for which Myrna begged from the chef of Musso-Frank's Café, a popular and informal Hollywood restaurant. Still another is a ritzy Salad Caviar, and the fourth is a pictorially perfect dish utilizing an avocado (alligator pear, you know) and a hard-boiled egg to achieve a handsome effect and a dashing color scheme.

Salads, in the Loy household, frequently take the place of desserts, appearing last on the menu, followed only by a small (Continued on page 90)

"That's a mean crack. Why don't you be nice and tell Lucy how to get rid of tattle-tale gray?"

"How would I know? I've never kept house. You tell me and I'll tell her."

"Lucy's trouble is left-over dirt—her clothes are only half clean. So tell her to change to Fels-Naptha right away. That grand golden soap is so chockful of naptha that dirt almost flies out. And I mean ALL OF IT, too!"

"I'll remember—anything else?"

"Sure! Tell Lucy to wash everything in that gorgeous trousseau of hers with Fels-Naptha Soap. It's gentle as can be to silk undies and stockings. And it's nice to hands, too." © 1935, FELS & CO.

FEW WEEKS LATER . . .

"Look! I told Lucy what you said about Fels-Naptha—and now she won't keep house without it. It's a life-saver!"

When is a husband not a husband? Yep, you're right! When he's Mae West's. However, all this talk about wedding rings, rice, old shoes and the event that is supposed to have come off way back in 1911 isn't getting the buxom blonde down. Indeed, 'tis said that the handsome dark lad with eyes like coals of fire (just the poet in us, pals) who led the lion cub on a leash before the Brown Derby recently is the present object of Mae's affections. Anna-hoo, the fans armed with autograph albums and fountain pens, bent on collecting the "John Hancocks" of their film favorites, retreated when the miniature Leo made his personal appearance, and the doorman at the B. D. beat a hasty retreat into the adjoining auto park, as your reporter dropped the pound of steak she was carrying in order to keep the African puppy busy while she looked for a hole in which to hide.

Well, whoever said that there is nothing left to hunt in the jungles these days except the Martin Johnsons surely knew what he was talking about!

Just to prove that we're generous or foolhardy or sumpin', we give any of you who may be embryo lyric writers a lead on a new song. Howz about "When it's casting time at Metro, then the stars begin to sulk?" Never mind, never mind, you're welcome! Seems that that gwate big Wally Beery just didn't like the role assigned him in "O'Shaughnessy's Boy," so he up and flew away to parts unknown until the Powers That Be decided to coax him back. Yep, they didn't even know Wally had gone until the hangar in the airport was found empty.

Then Myrna Loy, so full of "perze" and aplomb, didn't care for her part in "Lie Like a Gentleman," so she took a train and a boat and wound up in dear ole Lunnon. That was going far enough away from an unpleasant situation, you'll admit! However, all's well that ends well and, at this writing, the two problem children have returned to home and filmside with a vacation apiece to the good.

Moral: If you want a thing, don't ask for it—just take it!

Well, it may not have been orchids to Ann Sothern, but it surely turned out to be a big corsage of scallions for Gene Raymond! It seems that the story got around Hollywood that this pair were "that way" and that the platinum gent had sent Miss S. a dozen orchids to clinch the deal. Instead of being grateful that he was accused of being such a spendthrift, Raymond emphatically denied wherever possible that he even so much as presented the lady with a posie. Gallant—eh, wot? Naturally the woman in the case became much embarrassed. But Gene explained it all away by saying that if the false rumor got around to Janet Gaynor she might be angry and perhaps even jealous. Now, pull-eez! Janet with her dentist-beau, her impacted wisdom tooth n'everything!

You're gonna fall for Luise Rainer, Metro's latest importation, when you see her in "Lie Like a Gentleman." La Rainer was discovered in Hamburg (a city in Germany, not to be confused with the product of a hot dog stand) and is totally unimpressed even by genius.

A charming gentleman approached the table when we lunched recently and after he departed, Luise remarked, "He eez so sweet. He play to me on the boat coming over when I am so-o seasick. He play well, too. Heez name is Mischa Elman." And how are you getting along with your music?

Did you know that Shirley Temple has two false teeth? Yes, yes, she's getting along now, is our little girl. In order to fill the space left by two departed baby molars, a dentist inserted tiny china ones and Shirley had her troubles keeping them adjusted during the filming of "Our Little Girl."

The English colony here are certainly augmenting our vocabulary! Someone asked Herbert Marshall why he didn't buy a home in Beverly Hills and really settle down.

"My dear," he replied, "I can't stand coping, that is why. Coping with mortgages, coping with taxes, coping with servants!" However, luckily for the real estate agents, there are plenty of Americans who like to cope!

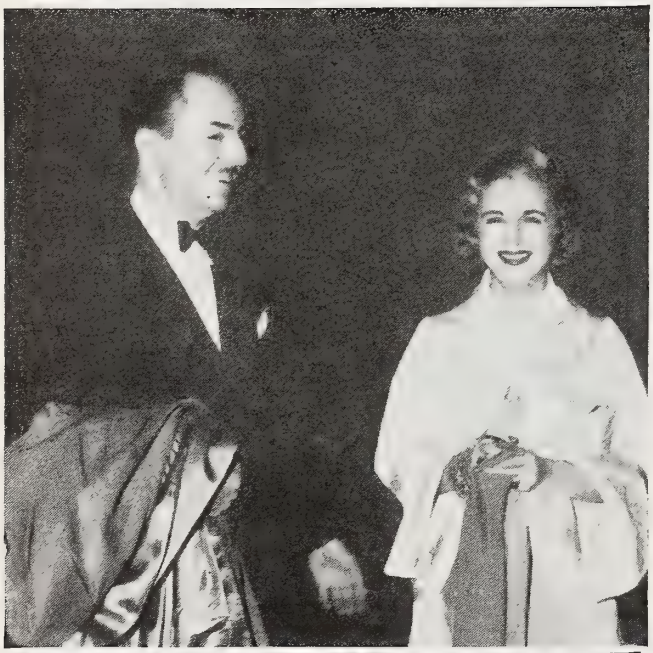
Those old meanies who predicted that the Joan Bennett-Gene Markey matrimonial bark was heading for disaster are now just as busy pretending that they don't know what is being talked about when the matter is accusingly brought up. You see, when Joan tripped to New York all by her lonesome recently, it was to visit her oculist and not for the gay vacation that was reported. This news is perhaps disappointing in some quarters, but nevertheless true!

Hollywood scene—straight from the Cinema City

Ginger Rogers shows a distinguished guest about the "Top Hat" set, Col. Henry L. Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy. Ginger's sea-going costume is nifty, dontcha think?



We wonder if Bruce Cabot and Adrienne Ames like to play Indian. At a recent preview of Bruce's latest picture, "Let 'Em Have It," he entered the theatre lobby alone and twenty paces behind (or four tomahawks) his "squaw" sauntered. Two nights later at a big preview, along came Bruce, all dressed up and on parade seemingly by himself. And again, Adrienne brought up the rear. What goes on? The Cherokees vs. the Comanches? No prize will be given for the answer, no matter how nearly correct you hit it.

Pat Ellis was seen for the first time in lo, these many moons, stepping out to the Trocadero with Earl Blackwell. Theirs was one of those romances that "flivvered" as Hollywood romances have a way of doing, but it looks as if all's well again with this handsome young couple—for the time being, anyhow.

Speaking of constancy, if you think that sudden fame and fortune necessarily change a young man's affections, you'll be surprised. Fred MacMurray and Robert Taylor, lads who will go far histrionically and financially, are still cuh-razy for the gals who "knew them when." Fred still knows that the beautiful model in a Los Angeles department store is the only one for him and Bob will tell you any old time that a "bit" player on the lot—and not Jean Parker or any other Jean—is the feminine tops.

No, now don't get excited! Bill Powell isn't dating Joan Bennett Markey in place of Jean Harlow. They just were snapped this way at a recent benefit. So that's that, my dears.

You'll find it's the biggest, boldest, baddest he-men who carefully walk several feet out of their way to avoid going under a ladder. So we weren't s'prised to hear that Buck Jones is superstitious. His famous horse, "Silver," is getting along in years, so has had to have several doubles for difficult feats. And each and every one of his new stand-ins must answer to the name of "Silver" before Buck allows him to appear in the picture! Claims that name has brought him nine-tenths of all the luck he's ever had.

Can you imagine it? We always thought the best place to study the Hollywood stars was right on Hollywood Boulevard, but Doris Kenyon, Fritz Leiber, Joan Crawford, Billie Burke and many other of the movie colony folks go to Griffith Park these days where the world-famous planetarium has just been completed. They claim it's the best place in town to study the stars.

Frances Langford, a great radio pet, sings a duet with Dick Powell for a weekly broadcast. Frances is on the coast to make a picture. She's a cute trick to watch for.

Kay Johnson believes in suffering for her art if need be. In fact, she's even sacrificing husband John Cromwell's peace of mind for the next year to come—at least every time he looks at her. For t'other day Kay had her hair cut off within an inch of her scalp—all for the Noble Cause. She happens to be crazy about her new role for "Jalna" and, finding that the wigs which she was to wear looked too heavy, Kay just hied herself to the nearest barber chair, shut her eyes, gritted her teeth, and told him to go to it! What's more, she's facing a predicament with her hats, for the only kind of chapeau Kay will wear is the kind that perch right on the tip of her nose.

Know how you get the jitters when someone literally sits on the horn of their car in front of your house? Well, Adrienne Ames and Bruce Cabot know how 'tis, anyhow, for the other day they were entertaining Evelyn Venable and Hal Mohr, when a loud and persistent tooting started up from the front drive. Finally Evelyn reached for her hat, claiming that she was slowly but surely losing her mind—and she'd rather lose it at home. So the Hal Mohrs' started for their car, only to find it hidden in a cloud of smoke, with a valiant crowd of neighbors dousing buckets of water on it and frantically honking the horn for the owner!

Adrian, who designs smart gowns and snappy accessories over Metro way, had a tough assignment on his hands recently. The order was to think up something gay and colorful in the way of lady's apparel for Stuart Erwin. No, your eyes are not deceiving you! It seems that Stu is to play a female impersonator in "Broadway Melody." Try as Adrian would, his client got twisted up in every length of silk he put on and, no matter how conservative the model, Mr. E's freckled face beaming atop it, gave the frock that futile, silly look.

Speaking of the Erwins, this happy pair threw a spook party not so long ago, at which the women became so hysterical that it was called off in favor of bridge in short order. Among those frightened were the Paul Kellys, Pat O'Briens, James Cagneys and Frank McHughs—all Persians!

Going up! The Laurels and the Hardys rise to the ballroom floor of the Beverly - Wilshire for the Mayfair party. Left to right, Mrs. Laurel, Stan, Mrs. Hardy and Oliver.

The making of "Diamond Jim Brady" rated Hugh O'Connell a couple of sprained leg ligaments. It seems that Hughie was required to bounce a Gay Nineties belle on each knee in the barroom sequence. The gals hadn't even a bowing acquaintance with lamb chops and pineapple—or any other diet you can name. Mr. O'C. must have bounced too realistically and—well, you know the rest! He was carried home only to find that more ill luck had overtaken him. His Chinese cook had heard about their needing extras for "Oil for the Lamps of China" and swiftly departed Warner-ward to be an actor without so much as a "by your leave" from Hughie. It never rains, but it pours!

Jean Muir is fast climbing the ladder of success. But she's climbing in her stocking feet! Before going into any of those tensely dramatic scenes, for which she's gaining such an enviable reputation, Jean kicks her shoes into a corner on the set. Then she proceeds to emote. "I feel so much more more soulful this way," she explains.

The two charming Mexican sisters, Renee and Raquel Torres, pose informally. Raquel is Mrs. Stephen Ames, you know. And Renee dates many swains.

If there's anything that makes the husky men of the screen grit their molars and see red, 'tis when some lissome lassie sighs enviously and says, "Aren't they lucky—never having to diet for their screen figgers!" For—shhhh—even the gentlemen of the fifth estate have to watch that third dimension. Clark Gable, Richard Dix, Pat O'Brien, in fact all of 'em—are subject to waistline scrutiny by their directors. The latest actor to go on a rampage of pineapple juice and an occasional lettuce leaf is Jimmy Dunn who was advised in no uncertain tones to part with ten pounds before showing up for the lead in "Song and Dance Man."

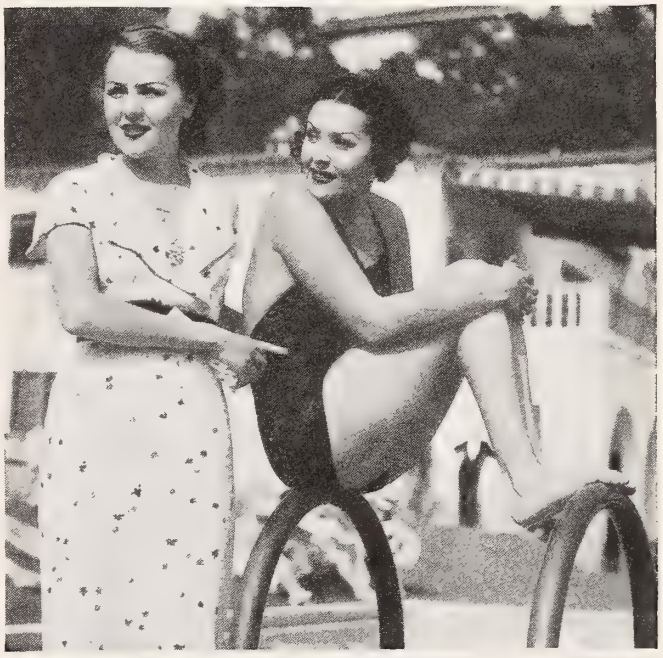
In "Orchids to You," John Boles' latest flicker, you'll see the world's most beeYOUtiful set—in fact you'll almost smell it! It's a florist shop built of chromium and glass and housing millions of lovely flowers. There are American Beauties, orchids, violets, lilies, camellias and—well, every variety of bloom under the sun. Such a profusion of posies we'd never seen—and wouldja believe it, every one is artificial! Special studio flower-makers have painstakingly patterned each bloom into such an exact replica of the original that only by feeling the paper leaves and sniffing the pasty perfume could we believe that our eyes deceived us.



Hollywood wonders if James Bakewell and Mary Carlisle are back together again. They certainly look chummy hereas snapped at the Torres' tennis party.

Fay Wray just can't keep her feet on the ground any more. After flying from New York to Hollywood, following her return from London, where she was kept busy by Gaumont-British doing "Clairvoyant" and "Bulldog Jack," Fay spent just two weeks in sunny California, then flitted back to New York enroute to foggy England. "I just don't like terra firma," Fay explained to the crowd seeing her off at the airport. "Well, as for me," flipped Bob Montgomery, "the more firma the less terra."

beauty advice

A vacation can do wonders for you—from a beauty standpoint

Grace Moore, off to Cannes for her vacation a while ago, knows the value of "getting away from it all." Why don't you, too, catch up on your beauty while you're vacationing?

by Mary Biddle

AROUND about this time we read snatches about the stars "getting away from it all," and tripping off to Europe, or the Bermudas, or retiring to their own "little" place in the country. For sheer vacation glamor we hand the palm to Grace Moore and her handsome husband, Valentin Parera, who celebrated the occasion of their fourth wedding anniversary in Venice, in the very "Palazzo" overlooking the Grand Canal where they spent their honeymoon. The glorious Grace sang at the King's Jubilee in London, and spent some time at her home near Cannes in Southern France, so she is our idea of a cosmopolitan vacationer de luxe.

Ah, me, we sigh in envy, and wonder how it would feel to plan a vacation such as that. But here we are up to planning our own vacations, so we can't be very envious. Do try to make your vacation as different as possible this year. We all need a change of scenery, a "getting away from it all," once in a while. A vacation is the greatest wrinkle eradicator in the world. The fatigue lines that make our faces haggard, and develop those nose-to-mouth furrows, the frown wrinkles that etch themselves through worry and tenseness, all get smoothed out miraculously.

All right, you say, it's all very well for her to talk, but we can't very well make a vacation different unless we have a different budget. Well, what if you only get a vacation in the country, you can make it a real beautifying vacation, anyway. Take long hikes along country roads and sweet smelling woods. "Go Hollywood" and wear shorts. Climb fences and jump brooks. Ride horseback. Climb haystacks and slide down them. All those things are going to accomplish marvels with your figure. The spare tire around your waistline will be punctured before you know it. You'll have to take in deep breaths of the fresh air, and there is nothing better than deep breathing exercises to round out a hollow neck and flat chest, and make you desirable looking in a décolletage evening gown for later on. You have soft water in the country, too, which your skin will appreciate. You'll come back from your vacation looking so healthy that you'll gasp at yourself in the mirror, and say in admiration, "Is it really I?"

Whatever your vacation, whether it be spent at the seaside, in the mountains, or in the city "doing the sights," you generally have to make your trip by train, auto, or boat. (Unless you're like Miriam Hopkins and a lot of the Hollywoodites who go in for air travel almost exclusively.) So you'll want to have a complete, compact, convenient, ready-at-a-moment's notice beautifying kit. Suppose you should discover Robert Montgomery or Ronald Colman back on the observation platform of your train. Don't whip out your compact, and apply fresh powder, rouge and lipstick over stale, grimy make-up. Hie yourself to the dressing-room or turn an implacable back to curious onlookers. Apply your cleansing cream with quick but thorough fingertips. A quick cleanser is one of the most important things your beauty kit should hold. A liquefying cleanser that melts right down in your pores in a jiffy is a grand quick cleanser. Remove the cream with soft facial tissues. And do carry a large supply of the latter on any and all traveling occasions. (Use them double thickness and you'll find them the most sanitary handkerchiefs in the world . . . you know how grubby looking handkerchiefs get in a short while.) After removal of the cream with the tissues, wipe away every last trace of oil with a skin freshener. If you're feeling hot and sticky, a skin freshener or mild astringent is a beautifully refreshing face tonic. Pat the freshener on with a small cotton pad which you can throw away afterward. You can get a small box of cotton pads at the ten-cent store, and they're a worthy traveling investment. Use them for patting on your powder, too. Some of the powder puffs I've seen traveling have been grimy enough to make strong men shudder.

RAQUEL TORRES, who married Stephen Ames a year or so ago, and has since had about four or five honeymoon trips, says that the success of keeping fresh looking while you're traveling depends on the frequent cleansing of the skin. And that's one time when you can't say, "Oh, I just don't have time for it."

If you can manage it in your vacation budget, an overnight kit is a convenient thing to have for carrying all your beautifying aids; the kind with a mirror in the top so that it becomes a regular portable dressing-table. When I say all your beautifying aids, I'm not prescribing

CAN'T CHAFE—CAN'T FAIL—CAN'T SHOW

"CAN'T CHAFE"

Means much on active days

To be happy and natural one must be comfortable. The new Kotex gives lasting comfort and freedom. You see, the sides of Kotex are cushioned in a special, soft, downy cotton—all chafing, all irritation is prevented. But mind you, sides only are cushioned—the center surface is left free to absorb.

"CAN'T FAIL"

Is important, too

Security means much to every woman at all times . . . and Kotex assures it! It has a special center layer whose channels guide moisture evenly the whole length of the pad. This special center gives "body" but not bulk—makes Kotex adjust itself to every natural movement. No twisting. The filler of Kotex is actually 5 times more absorbent than cotton.

"CAN'T SHOW"

Gives evening peace-of-mind

The sheerest dress, the closest-fitting gown reveals no tell-tale lines. What an aid to self-confidence and poise. The ends of Kotex are not only rounded but flattened and tapered besides. Absolute invisibility—no tiny wrinkles whatsoever.

IT'S only natural that women should be vitally concerned about this intimate subject. And I've discovered this: once women understand the 3 exclusive advantages that only Kotex offers, most of them will not be satisfied with any other sanitary napkin!

By reading the facts presented here, you can learn what I believe every woman has a right to know. You need never have times when you're ill at ease. For now there is a simple way to carefree, perfect poise on the days it's hardest to attain. Here's a modern sanitary napkin—Kotex—that has removed all annoyance from women's most perplexing problem.

Kotex brings women 3 gratifying comforts that you can understand by simply looking at the construction of the pad itself.

With all of these extra Kotex advantages costing so little, there's no economy in accepting ordinary kinds.

For greater protection on some days depend on Super Kotex. For emergency, look for Kotex in ladies' rooms in West Cabinets.

Encore!

A triumphant encore to "One Night of Love" is Grace Moore's new Columbia picture, "Love Me Forever." Leo Carrillo and Michael Bartlett, a new singer, provide the love interest for the lovely diva in this opus. Grace finished work on the picture and then rushed off to New York and a sailing for England in order to keep her date at Covent Garden on June 6, when she warbled for the King and Queen as part of the Jubilee celebration. Any prolonged stay in Europe will depend upon how soon Columbia will need her.

Clever-Lovely

Bette Davis need no longer doubt that Hollywood thinks she's a swell actress since all the Academy Awards stir. Evidently undismayed by the clamor, Bette steals a sun bath between shots on "Front Page Woman."

After an Hawaiian vacation that stirred up romantic wedding rumors about an Army officer, Ann Harding is back at work, looking lovelier, if possible. Her next role is in the famous play, "The Flame Within."

Now Kiss

Here he is, girls, the blond young gent who is giving all Hollywood's he-men a bad case of migraine since you fans went wild over him in "Naughty Marietta"! Nelson Eddy —a magnetic new personality, grand voice and—well, the editorial staff is out of adjectives! He and Jeanette MacDonald will team soon again for M-G-M.

And to the right, another new face that is causing a great flutter whenever it flashes on the screen—Fred MacMurray. Perhaps it's because Fred considers all the acclaim just pure luck, that he gives a very genuine, unaffected portrayal to all his roles. "Men Without Names," a new one of the G-men thrillers, is in work now with Fred in an important role.

Old Timers

You don't need any introduction to this suave, charming gentleman who adds a distinguished touch to every picture he appears in. Sir Guy Standing, of course. Incidentally, Sir Guy has had Hollywood's tongues twitting about his frequent public appearances with Toby Wing. You'll see him next in "The Big Broadcast of 1935."

That zany, Charlie Ruggles—he manages to get into more baffling situations than any other comedian on the screen. It's probably the wrong number that he's toying with here, but you'll have to see him in "No More Ladies" to make sure. Joan Crawford, Bob Montgomery and Franchot Tone are Charlie's playmates in this opus.

Collegiate

She may be a mother and one of Hollywood's most respectable matrons, but to her fans, Arline Judge is the collegian's delight. Her lively wise-cracking netted her her eighteenth campus flapper part in "College Scandal." And if you don't think it takes skill to be a perennial collegian—try it!

Going on Ten

This gay young miss has a way of stealing more than her share of applause in about every screen role she has. Jane Withers isn't quite ten yet but she is a swell little actress. Meet "Bubbles" who poses with Jane and is her pet blue Persian kitten sent by a fan. Jane's in "Ginger" with Jackie Searle.

the truth about the Mysterious Miss Loy

First part in the charming story of a plain freckle-faced Montana girl who became Hollywood's leading exotic lady

By Gladys Hall

A little girl of thirteen stood alone in a strange room and said to herself, "My Daddy is dead." And, as that thin, chill knife of dread certainty entered her heart, it cut her life right in half, as neat an incision as ever was made.

For on one side of the knife-cut stretched thirteen sunny, secure years for little Myrna Williams, daughter of David and Della Williams. Happy home life in the pleasant spacious house in Helena, Montana.

Helena was a wealthy community, for many of the Gold Rush families were still living luxuriously and gaily upon the wealth the Gulch had once given up to them. They were the comfortable custodians of the Gulch and life was lived spaciously there, substantially and well. And the Williams family, while not conspicuously wealthy, were comfortable, too.

The small Myrna's first thirteen years were lived in a peaceful, plentiful home of her own, with a room of her own and pretty clothes, books and toys plus good times with a young brother, David, to tease and be teased by. The Montana ranges were her playground and on those magnificent acres she grew robust, hardy and fit.

Myrna's grandparents were pioneers, stalwart men and sturdy, child-bearing women who had come over the plains in covered wagons, taking the day as they found it. From them, Myrna believes, she has inherited her belief that to live for the day is sufficient unto itself. As those hard-living pioneers laid them down to rest, giving thanks for a day of food and safety, so Myrna lives only for the day and does not reckon with tomorrow, and tomorrow. She takes good care of the present. She leaves the future to her Presbyterian God.

Once, when she was very small, a visitor teased her and said, "What nationality are you, Myrna?" And the child answered, soberly, "I am Presbyterian."

And she was. Very Presbyterian during her adolescent years. Given to reading the Bible for hours at a time and saying long and earnest prayers, very preoccupied with the rigors of observing the Ten Commandments.

Her father's people were Welsh, her mother's people came from Scotland and Sweden. Only last year her mother returned to Scotland to visit and brought back interesting tales of the eighteen sons and daughters of the maternal great-grandmother who are settled the length and breadth of the Scot domain.

MYRNA NEVER saw her father's mother but she is said to resemble her. From the paternal grandmother, she has been told, come those wide cheek bones and slightly Oriental eyes, that Celtic something in that calm provocative face. Strange and haunting are the tales told of Grandmother Williams, of her fascination and courage, her Welsh wit and wisdom, the aura of mystery that always hovered over her. The "Mystery Woman of Hollywood" must be legend derived direct from the "Mystery Woman of Wales!"

But it was Myrna's maternal grandmother who most influenced Myrna's childhood. Myrna's mother and father were gay and sociable people. They had a great many friends, a great zest for life and entertained and were entertained lavishly. And many a time Myrna and the small David were sent to Grandmother Annabelle's for the night or for a week at a time. And Grandmother Annabelle was a memory-making grandmother. The kind of a grandmother who had a storeroom full to overflowing with jams and pastries, and cookie jars full of ginger cookies and a reticule filled with pep'mint lozenges and a heart full of the old lore of the days when she had crossed the country in a covered wagon.

"She never took anything as a hardship," Myrna told me, "and I think that if I have any independence of spirit I owe a great deal of it to Grandmother Johnson. As a child she gave me to understand that there is something nasty about people who whimper and whine, even when those people have a real right to scream and cry. She had a lusty fearless joy in life and hardships were a part of life and you took them—standing up!"

Myrna's father was her pal, too. He was a gay person, Myrna told me, a man who made a lot of money in Montana lands and believed that

ALL ABOUT THE GREAT MAE WEST MARRIAGE QUESTION

Is Mae married or not? Evidence gathered for this story answers "No." But what do you think?

By ROBERT EICHBERG

WHEN MILWAUKEE relief workers, reassorting municipal files, came across an application for a marriage license dated April 11, 1911, and made out to "Mae West" and "Frank Wallace," nobody was very much interested at first. It might have meant any Mae West (there was one in burlesque some twenty years ago—and another is a colored girl living in Harlem today)—or another Frank Wallace, for that is not an uncommon name.

But when closer inspection revealed that the married Mae gave her birthplace as Brooklyn, her father's name as John, and her mother's maiden name as Matilda Dilker, born in Paris, the whole world pricked up its ears. For our own curvaceous Mae's father was Battling Jack West, and her mother fit the other description. Then, too, Mae was born in Brooklyn.

Immediately the press of the nation went mad. They printed a denial from Mae, who said, "I never heard of the guy." A statement from Jack Linder, who produced her big stage hit, "Diamond Lil," saying, "She got Frank Wallace a job in the show. They were together a lot. But he died a couple of years ago." Another from a Frank Wallace who is a dancer in vaudeville, saying, "I'm the man Mae married, I can prove it." A facsimile of Mae's sworn statement, made when she was convicted of giving an immoral performance in her show "Sex," shows that she then swore she WAS married.

This, apparently, clinched it, so MODERN SCREEN sent me up to interview Wallace.

He made an appointment to meet me in the room of his dancing partner, Trixie La Mae, in a theatrical hotel on West 45th Street. It was one of the strangest places I have ever seen—a brilliant crimson dressing table—a mammoth scarlet radio set—a depressed little monkey gibbering in a big cage—two monster couches —and an atmosphere so full of cigarette smoke you needed a gas mask.

MISS LA MAE, a tall slender blonde with a southern drawl, introduced me to Wallace. He is tall, dark, partly bald and very thin, with deep-sunken black eyes and a nervous manner. The first thing he said was, "I can give you a swell story. I can tell you all about it. But I've got to get some consideration."

"You'll get every consideration," I said. "I'll even check the story with you before I print it."

"Well," he said, "I didn't mean that. I meant for expenses. Like for pictures."

"You won't have any expenses. We'll take any necessary pictures."

Then it came out. Mr. Wallace would give us any sort of story we wanted on Mae—if we hired him. We explained that any story he was paid to give us wouldn't be worth printing, because he would naturally try to earn his money, and therefore would be biased. We did agree, however, to pay him ten dollars apiece for any old photos he had of himself and Mae, outside of the one picture already published in the papers.

He told us several conflicting stories of why he could not give us the pictures. First, they had all been destroyed in a fire at his mother's home; second, that his manager had them, and would want more money than that to release them; third, that they were up at his mother's in Albany, and it would cost quite a bit to go there and search for them. Then he suggested that pictures could be "faked."

To be fair about it, I don't (Continued on page 92)

Here at the right are some of the pictures which may influence your answer to our question. First the marriage license that came to light in Milwaukee and started all the fun. Below, at left, is Mae in "Diamond Lil" when a Frank Wallace was the "singing waiter" shown with her. And, next right, the same Frank with the two who made up his trio in the same play. Last row, Mae as she is today in "Goin' to Town." And last, a dark Mae in a honeymoon pose with a Frank Wallace and her brother. Do you think the dark-haired gal looks like our blonde Mae?

Read this one girl's true experiences before

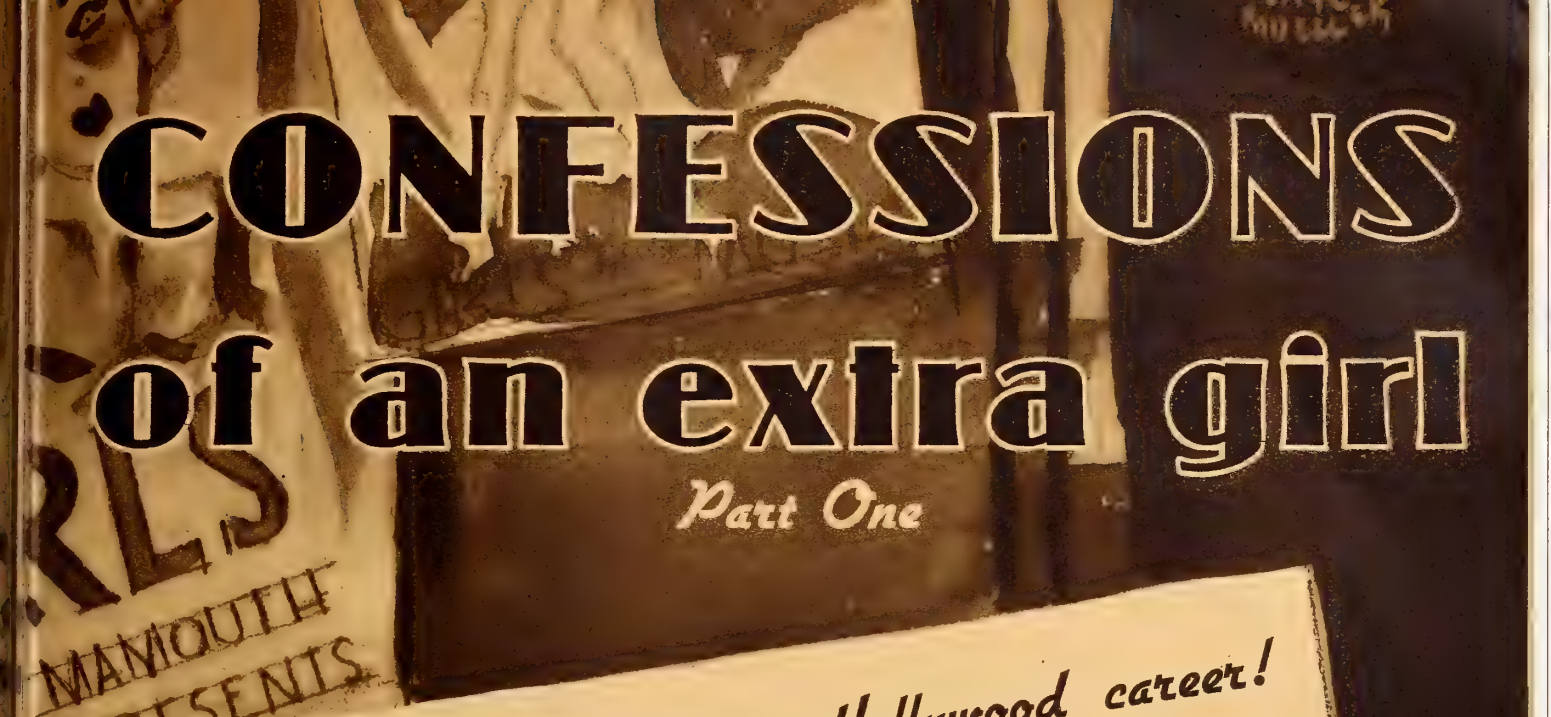
MODERN SCREEN is proud to present this unique series of articles written by a Hollywood extra girl who, since she is still working in pictures, must not reveal her name. So many extra girl stories come from embittered, disgruntled girls who haven't seen Hollywood for years. But this young lady will give you the true picture of Hollywood today, discuss the chances of an unknown's getting into the movies, and give you intimate "set" gossip of the stars. As her story progresses you will realize how important it is to her career that her confessions remain anonymous—now, begin her story. . . .

WHEN I first came to Hollywood, about five years ago, I was given a lot of different kinds of advice. Although I had done a little work in a summer stock company not far from home and, therefore, felt that I would be just what Hollywood wanted for the talkies (for the talkies were not old then), my father believed that Hollywood and all of show business was sinful and wicked. He had not minded the stock work because the director of that was very nice and had been to our house for dinner, but, when I said that I was going to Hollywood to go into the movies, he hit the ceiling!

I don't know where he got his information but he told me things about Hollywood that made me blush. But I was blushing more easily then than I am now, for I was only eighteen. Although I did not have sense enough to ask Dad where he got his information, I did not believe him. I believed what I had read in the movie magazines—namely that Hollywood was just like any other town and a girl could be good or bad, because men were not any more "on the make" in Hollywood than in Podunk.

So, imagine my embarrassment or amazement or something when, a week after I arrived in Hollywood, I had a proposition. And the man was a director, too!

He worked for a cheap little independent company. I know now that they are called "quickies" but I did not know that then. Then, every company was alike to me. They all made movies and I wanted to be in the movies. The only difference, I thought, between this company and Metro or Paramount was that I had been out to Metro and Paramount and couldn't see anybody, whereas, at this little company I was able to see the director.



Well, we sat in this cheap office on one of the studio lots that rent space to the quickie companies. The director had on a tweed suit that was baggy at the knees and his fingernails were not clean, but he was not, actually, a bad looking man.

THERE WASN'T anything in the office but a desk, two chairs, some files, a couch and the director. When I went in he stood up and shook hands with me. I thought that was wonderful because at Paramount and Metro nobody had stood up because I never could get to see anyone.

He said, "How-do-you-do, Miss Andrews" (that's the name that I'm going to call myself), "sit down."

I sat on one of the chairs. He smiled and said, "Now tell me all about yourself."

I said, "Well, I have had some stage experience and I know that I can act." And then I told him about the summer stock company and the parts I had played in the various plays. He smiled and nodded and I thought that meant he was pleased and would make me a star right away. He looked over some papers on his desk and said, "Yes, I think I have a little part for you—not a big role, understand, you couldn't expect to jump into a big part right away. Yes, I'm almost sure there's a role in my picture that you could play."

My heart began to pound. Here I was just a week in Hollywood and I was going to get a part, and people had told me that girls had been in Hollywood for six months without so much as seeing the inside of a studio.

And then I did a very foolish thing. I jumped up from my chair and ran around to the director sitting behind the desk. I grabbed both his hands and said, "Thank you. Oh, thank you!"

He stood up, still holding both my hands, looked right into my eyes and said, "You're an impetuous little thing, aren't you?" And I said, "Yes," because I thought it would make him think that I was fiery and could act.

"This is a big acting part," he said, "the woman is supposed to be very experienced. What do you know about life?" And then, because I was so afraid that I wasn't going to get the part, I behaved foolishly again. I didn't really know anything about life but I was afraid to say so, so I answered, "Well, I'm young in years but old in experience."

"Oh, are you?" he asked. "Let's see." He was laughing so much that I thought this was all just friendly until he suddenly grabbed me and kissed me. I was so amazed that I just stood there and didn't know what to do. Then he let me go. "No, not so old in experience," he said, "but we can fix that up. You see, my dear, you can't act until you've lived and an innocent girl like you shouldn't be running around loose in Hollywood. I can make a great actress of you if you'll put yourself completely in my hands and do everything I say. How about having dinner with me tonight? I'll read the script to you."

BUT BY this time I was crying and I realized that I wasn't going to get the part and that this was the Hollywood Dad had told me about. I ran out of that office as fast as I could, with my hat over one eye. And I was so disappointed I thought I should die.

Now that was five years ago. The man was a little quickie director. And that is the first and last time in Hollywood that a director of any sort has ever behaved that way. So I guess Hollywood is like any other town after all, because girls get propositions even in Podunk.

I've told about this first because I thought it was so strange that this should happen to me my first week in Hollywood and then not happen again. But now I'll go back and tell about my starting to Hollywood, although I don't know whether that is interesting or not. But here goes.

I had read that a girl shouldn't go to Hollywood without enough money to live on for six months. My Dad, as I've told you, didn't approve. But my Mother, who had always wanted to be an actress, gave me my railroad fare and five hundred dollars. And with my stock experience, I thought there was nothing else I needed.

I had read of the Studio Club but I didn't want to live there because, strange as it seems in a girl who likes acting, I liked to cook, too, so I wanted a little apartment with a kitchen.

My train arrived in the morning and I had sense enough not to take a taxi to Hollywood because I knew how far away (Continued on page 87)

"I want to talk about my baby!"

Says Joan Blondell, smashing Hollywood's pet taboo

By Kay Osborn

IT just never occurred to me to seek out Joan on the subject of her baby—for publication, that is. It's sort of understood out here that women stars with babies don't like to talk about them to the press. A lot of other writers weren't asking about the baby either, because they, too, considered the subject taboo.

I ran into Joan one day and asked her about the baby, carefully explaining that my interest was personal, not professional. I told her I knew she didn't want to have a story written about him. So you can imagine my surprise when Joan protested, "Who says I don't!" and her blue eyes flashed. "As a matter of fact, I've been quite hurt that nobody has come to me, wanting an interview about me and my baby. What is this, anyway? Doesn't anyone want to hear about him? Of course I'll talk about my baby! He's the most important thing that's ever happened to me, or ever will happen!

"This business of a baby spoiling the fans' interest in a female star is all the bunk. Audiences today are more intelligent than they used to be. They like to see an actress give a good performance, more than anything else. And a baby helps a woman to become a better actress. My baby is helping me. He takes me out of myself. Makes me understand many more emotions than I have ever felt before. Why shouldn't I talk about him?"

Well! We plopped into the nearest chairs, and, believe it or not, I never got another word in edgewise.

It seems that Joan's baby is the cutest, the cleverest, the prettiest and the healthiest baby that ever shook a rattle. Oh yes, I know you've heard that story before. But this time it's so, says Joan.

"Do you know that right this minute, and at this minute he is exactly five months, three days, and five hours old, he is every bit as big as a year-old baby? Why, he never could wear any of the lovely things which were given to me at my shower. I've had to give all his presents away. The doctor comes in to look at him on his weekly visits, and laughs. Just laughs! And Normie laughs right (Continued on page 73)

Bill wanted to forget Hollywood and its ceaseless grind; he had enough wealth so he ran away—and ran right back again!

Bill found there was workman's compensation—like playing with Jean Harlow in "Reckless," for instance!

No Success as a Playboy

By Martha Kerr

WHEN THE alarm clock rings at seven-thirty and you know you can't roll over for that extra snooze or you'll be late for the office, how many times have you said, "Oh gosh! Wouldn't it be swell to have all the money you need so you'd never have to work again?"

And when work is particularly arduous and confining do you ever think longingly of the Riviera and Paris or the South Sea Islands or Shanghai? You wouldn't be human if you didn't.

This story is for all you who have strained at the yoke of a job. It is the story of a man who had worked hard all his life, had made enough money to quit—and didn't. And it's as exciting a little journey into human psychology as any I've run across in Hollywood.

A good many years ago I was assigned the task of getting together, for a magazine, a group of photographs of the stars in the roles they had always longed to play. One girl was mad to play Portia and had her picture taken in the classic Shakespearian costume of the first lady lawyer of fiction. Another girl had a secret yearning to do Peter Pan—and got pretty cute all over the place in a leather doublet. One of the men thought it would be wonderful to be Hamlet and struck the well-known attitude.

When Bill Powell's photograph came in I thought he had got the idea all wrong. There was Bill, attired in a natty modern lounging robe, lolling back in an easy chair with a highball on a nearby table. This looked very unfamiliar. And then I read the accompanying note: "Role I most want to play. Wealthy, retired motion picture star, living on the Riviera." Signed Bill.

I thought it was a funny gag—and that was that. Several years later I happened to mention it to Bill and I asked him if that were still his ambition.

He shook his head. "I tried it," he said. "It didn't work."

And then he told me the story which is for all of us who long to kick our jobs in the face.

Bill had worked hard for stardom. And, after he became a star, he discovered that fame was pretty empty and that all it got you was a lot of worry and grief. He had enough money to last any man a lifetime. Hollywood made his nerves jingle.

He told his friends that he was going on a trip to Europe. Actually, it was his plan to retire from the screen and come back to the United States only for a visit. Fortunately, he did not make such an announcement. But in his heart he knew that he was through—through with work forever, through with pictures. Hadn't he earned the right to enjoy a little leisure? Wasn't it about time that he lived life instead of playing it before a camera?

HE WENT straight to the Riviera—that glamorous vacation spot where the wealthiest and most spectacular of Europeans gather to loll in their gay cabañas, go to bed with the dawn, wear smart clothes, dance and gamble.

Bill thought it was the most entrancing place he had ever seen. Nobody to call him to the set at nine A. M. Nobody to give him scripts to read. No wardrobe and no make-up tests. No endless waits if the film in the camera buckled. No grinding work under the glaring lights. Nothing but clean white beach, lovely sunshine, amusing people, gayety. (Continued on page 72)

Bill Powell tried to retire—but it didn't take!

Above, three of the best looking figures in Hollywood—Bennett's, Crawford's and Harlow's. And right, the tiny lady who can make your figure look thataway, too—Madame Sylvia.

We wish to make an Announcement

Dear Readers: Please be advised that, commencing with our next issue, Madame Sylvia of Hollywood joins our ranks. Read details below and get your pictures ready!

Her name is as well known as that of President Roosevelt, Mickey Mouse and Garbo. Sylvia of Hollywood has brought more beauty to a beauty-starved world than all the jars of cold cream on the cosmetic counters. She is going to write a series of articles for MODERN SCREEN. The first one will appear in the September issue—so don't complain that you weren't told.

Now, here's what Sylvia wants you to do. She wants to be of real assistance to you. She wants to take, with each article of her series, one general type of face and figure—point out its defects, its need for improvement and tell you just exactly how such improvement can be achieved.

For example: How many of you are—in a general way—the Jean Harlow type? Does your mirror or do your friends tell you that you "look sort of like Harlow"? Blonde, curved, voluptuous. Would you like more perfectly to achieve the svelte and lovely Harlow lines and fight off the plumpness which that old meanie, Nature, delights in wishing upon this particular type of beauty? Sylvia will tell you how to do it. She did it for Harlow and she will do it for you.

Here is what you must do: Send your photograph to Sylvia in care of this magazine. A full length photograph please, in a bathing suit or a close-fitting dress. A snapshot will do. Send it as soon as possible. In her second article, Madame Sylvia will choose the girl who looks most like Jean Harlow. She will also pick, from the photographs sent in, several other near-Harlow types, criticize the bad points and tell just how they can be improved. Mind, you need not look like Jean's twin sister in order to benefit by this. We are speaking of a general likeness of face and figure.

So—Harlow-girls, send your pictures to Sylvia. And next month we'll tell you the second type Sylvia will overhaul. Believe us, if you listen to Sylvia and do what she tells you, you won't be sorry. We know. There is a large safety-pin taking in the slack of the skirt we're wearing. We're very proud of that safety-pin, because it indicates a reduction in poundage—all thanks to Sylvia! You can be equally as proud if you follow her advice.

Loretta goes on a clothes spree

Loretta Young had been running about the Paramount lot in the medieval trappings of "The Crusades" for so long that when she had a day off she went on a shopping binge! Above, left, is a charming silk ensemble—a black crêpe dress with unusual hemline is topped by a gay floral patterned, three-quarter length coat. The popular cape theme is stressed in a blue and white polka dotted silk ensemble. Red and white dotted silk is used for the flowers and belt. There's a deep veil on her straw sailor hat. Radishes make a perfect trimming for a lady gardener's costume! Bunches of them trim Loretta's wide-brimmed hat and her pale pink linen cape frock. Note big front pocket for gardening gadgets.

doffs "Crusades" costumes for smart modern garb

Since evening is the time when Loretta really has a chance to relax during work, she went in heavily for stunning formal costumes on her recent shopping trip. At the extreme left, top and bottom, you see two charming ones. A great-skirted lilac taffeta gown with violet corsage at the waist and over it a blue taffeta wrap with corded detail. If you will look across the page you will see this same gown without the wrap. Isn't it charming? Especially the sweep to the skirt and the flesh-colored revers. Back to the left again, and below, Loretta wears a black and white printed satin gown with an interesting décolletage that is outlined with a flaring ruffle of the fabric. Again the wide skirt is emphasized—this is one of her pet evening details, and since she is tall, she can carry the extra width off with perfection. Ombré-toned fringe is a striking trimming for a simple eggshell white dinner gown. The fringe forms a capelet, and makes a hemline of unusual gracefulness. And last, looking forward to fall, Loretta selects a two-piece dinner gown of double-faced satin. The crêpe side is used for the blouse, the satin side for the skirt. Huge pink flowers at her waist.

Paul Lukas answers a question you all ask at some time

Can a man be true to one Woman?

By Gladys Hall

"CAN a man be true to one woman all his life?" I asked Paul Lukas.

And Paul, smiling a quizzical, raised-eyebrow, faintly amused smile said, "I should not talk on this subject, really. Because I am what is known as a sad dog . . . happy as I am in my marriage I still flirt a little, here, there, not seriously, but a little . . . perhaps only to prove to myself that I still can flirt.

"If I answer your question I shall have to tell some very personal, very private tales on myself. Well, why not?"

It did seem slightly preposterous to ask Paul Lukas, of all men, whether he thinks there can be such a thing as one woman in a man's life—one fidelity outlasting the years.

For Paul is the type of man who kisses your hand, looks into your eyes and you see, in your mind's eye, the white hands of hundreds of women, the responsive eyes of hundreds more. This suave sophisticate from Budapest is the type of man who makes a woman feel that it is magic and subtle and deliciously dangerous just to be a woman.

"One love in a lifetime?" Paul repeated after me. "All right, I will tell you how it is with me. I should not, perhaps, be taken too seriously because I am . . . well, women are irresistible to me. I am like that. No, a man does not love only once in a lifetime and he should not. Especially the actor should not. Because the strength of the actor is in his imagination and that imagination should be fed by more than one experience.

"I repeat that a man does not love once in a lifetime. I do not say that such a love is impossible. But to make such a love possible the woman must possess two qualities. Some call them the 'good and bad angel' in woman, and there must be both. I call them 'rolling gold' and the 'sense of home.'

"Now I shall have to tell these private tales on myself to make you see what I mean. In the first place, I learned very early in life to realize the enduringness of love. For I was in love while I was still at home in Budapest. It happened to me, this terrible love, while I was on the legitimate stage playing at the Comedy Theatre in Budapest, in Ferenc Molnar's 'Liliom.' She was a woman not of my class. She had worked havoc with other men, I knew. She was, from the very beginning, unfaithful to me and I knew it. But I loved her with such a desperation, such a hunger, such a blind hopelessness of passion that I shall never forget. For three and one half years this savage, sinister thing possessed me. I couldn't help myself. One ugly thing after another she did to me. And then, one morning, I awoke and it was gone. Gone as though a poison had been drawn from my blood. The woman had become a stranger to me, a stranger for whom I felt nothing but repulsion. I now believe that because she did so many ugly things to me she herself became ugly in my eyes.

"But she did teach me," he said slowly, in that rich accented voice of his, "one thing which helps me to answer your question. She taught me that if a woman is 'rolling gold' she may hold a man for most of his life. This woman was 'rolling gold' and if she had had that one other quality I might never have escaped her.

"Now I will explain to you what I mean by the term 'rolling gold.' Shortly before I left Berlin, where I had worked under the direction of Max Reinhardt as guest artist in the theatres of Vienna and Berlin, a slight misadventure befell me. I had carried, in the pocket of my overcoat for many months, a gold-piece. I had

Three score years and ten

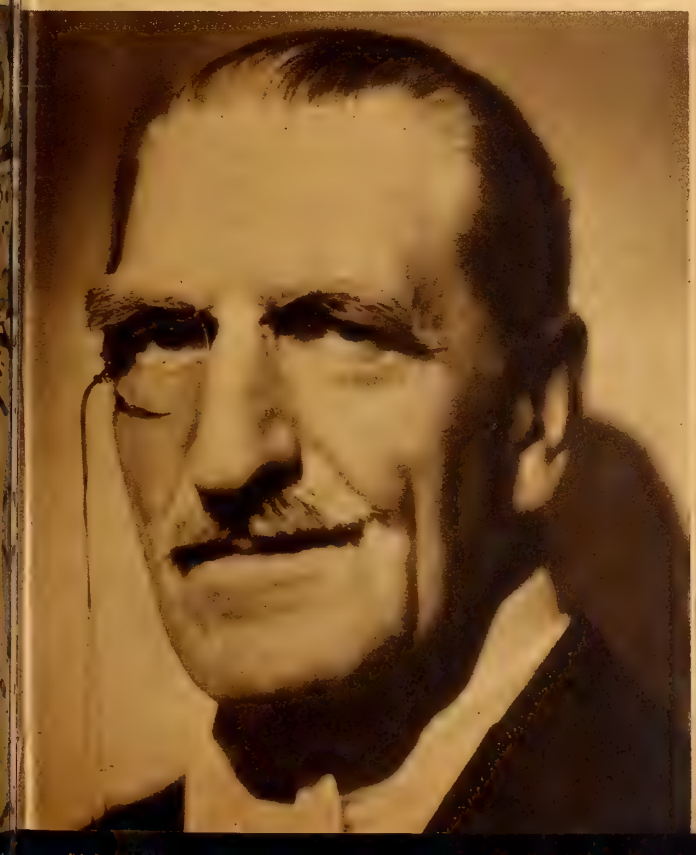
C. Aubrey Smith looks back on a full and dramatic life

By Faith Service

WHAT do you really know about that superb actor, C. Aubrey Smith?

You know that in almost every good picture you see, "Bulldog Drummond Strikes Back," "Lives of a Bengal Lancer," "The Crusades," "China Seas," dozens of them, there is a tall, virile, kindly Britisher who looks as though Galsworthy might have written him into "The Forsyte Saga" (he could be old Jolyon to the life). You know that you are always glad to see him, that he adds richness and authenticity of character to every part he plays and that you carry away with you, invariably, a warm and grateful memory of him.

But isn't that about all you know of C. Aubrey?



Did you realize that he is seventy-two years old and that almost fifty of those years have been spent on the stage and that these three score years and ten constitute a stage in themselves—a stage upon which have walked the greatest beauties, the most famous men and women of his colorful generation? Ellen Terry and Lily Langtry, our own Maude Adams, Mrs. Pat Campbell, Charles Frohman, Sir James Barrie, George Bernard Shaw, and Victoria, Queen of England. No wonder he says, politely, that the theatre is not what it used to be, nor great artists what they were in the days when Ellen Terry rehearsed some six and eight weeks before she spoke a line before an audience.

Did you know that he has been married, and to the same wife, for over forty years and that he has a married daughter and that before the summer wanes there will be a first grandchild.

It is going to be hard to get three-quarters of a century of rich and robust living into the confines of one short story, but I'll do my best. For it's a long, long way C. Aubrey Smith has come from his father's surgery in London to the studios of Hollywood. A long way and a good way and as he enters his three score years and ten he says, "The most and the best of life is to love what you are doing, and to be kind."

SOME SEVENTY odd years ago, a small boy was born in London to a proud young doctor and his wife. He was christened C. Aubrey Smith. Then two sisters come to the Smith home and they grew up in the Victorian Era when the widowed Queen ruled the realm with a child-sized hand and influenced her time and time to come with Victorian virtue. An age when all things gaudy and theatrical and gay were frowned upon by the little prim lady in Balmoral Castle and so by her subjects.

C. Aubrey Smith remembers the funeral of Victoria—sees in his memory that tiny coffin, flag-draped on the gun-carriage, while all of England mourned and the whole world was at half-mast. He (Continued on page 78)

The appealing story of Ann Dvorak's stand-in whom she is grooming for stardom

ANN DVORAK was walking down the dirt road leading from her home in the country. Thinking of nothing in particular except the clean sky overhead and the soft air around her. It was good to be alive. It was marvelous to know fate had done so many kind things for her.

A sound. Ann could not place it. What made it? She looked around her. A young girl was running the lawn-mower over stubby ends of grass not far from her. Ann noticed the grass was stubby, wild, unwieldy. Why was this child trying to mow it?

Ann looked more closely and drew a sharp breath. Here was beauty! The dirty slacks, the mussy hair, the roughly tanned hands and arms, the huge blue eyes and the length of black eyelashes for which most women, whom Ann Dvorak knew, paid big sums in beauty parlors. And suddenly Ann wanted to know her. How could she make her acquaintance? She looked around hurriedly. "Eggs for sale!" She smiled. She had her own eggs; she raised her own chickens. But the cook could make an angel food cake—

That was the first trip. Ann made several. She took her husband, Leslie Fenton, with her. Always to buy eggs. Ann and Leslie grew weary of angel food cakes in the two weeks which followed.

But it was when she was alone that Ann, suddenly, asked the girl, "And what do you mean to do with your life? Are you planning to spend all your days out here mowing wild grass that should never be cut, talking to white leghorns which can't understand you?"

THE GIRL shrugged. "I don't know. What can I do? What is there for me to do? I graduated from the Van Nuys High School. I tried teacher's college. I always wanted to be a writer. I took a little journalism at the University of Southern California but I couldn't keep it up. There wasn't enough money. What is there?"

"But you are beautiful!" Ann spoke impulsively.

The girl shrugged. "Am I? What has that got to do with it?"

"But you just can't stay here and do nothing!" Ann was insistent. (Continued on page 81)

A great actress puts on a great act

By Katherine Albert

THEY SAY that she's shy (she says so, too). So shy that she trembles with fear before she steps on the stage to give a performance, so shy that she's afraid to see her own films after they're completed, so shy that the very sound of an interviewer's voice (and her own voice answering) is enough to depress her for days.

That's Elisabeth Bergner. That's the girl who is hailed as the greatest actress since Bernhardt, the girl whose stage gaucheries have knocked New York for a loop, whose picture, "Catherine, the Great," made in Europe, thrilled you and whose future productions you will see as they come across from abroad (for she will not make films in Hollywood). The Viennese glamor girl. The acting queen.

So shy. Useless to try for a personal interview. Useless to meet her in her dressing-room or at her hotel, draw up a couple of chairs, smoke a couple of friendly cigarettes and chat together like two human beings.

Instead Miss Bergner is persuaded by Joe Schenck, through whose company her pictures are released, to "meet the press"—a gesture which went out with Pickford curls and "Shakespeare is my favorite writer, my dear." So the girl who is too shy to be interviewed, to have a cosy tête-à-tête, "meets the press"—a couple of hundred of them—at a cocktail party in a regal apartment at the Ambassador.

Let us see just how this shy flower behaves when "meeting the press."

IN THE FIRST PLACE the apartment looks like a movie set. It is all done in cathedral-like grandeur and would remind one of a cathedral were it not for the fact that at the end of one enormous room there is an elaborate bar and standing before it is Elisabeth Bergner.

Her hair is straight and blonde, parted on the side and sweeping across her head, leaving the brow exposed. She wears a dark blue skirt, a loose printed blouse and a dark blue tie. There are but three or four people in the room when I arrive. The bartenders are the only ones who seem in the least busy. They have nice honest jobs. They don't deal in emotion, except in a very roundabout fashion.

Schenck, to relieve the tension, offers La Bergner a large dish of steaming spaghetti. "What iss diss?" she asks.

Schenck tells her.

"No, no, t'ank you."

He offers her some chicken à la king.

"And diss—what iss diss?"

He explains.

"No, no t'ank you."

Meet La Bergner, of "Escape Me Never"

My husband is my Best friend

By Adele Whitely Fletcher

THE really successful people in this world are those who waste neither time nor energy grousing over the conditions which exist in their lives but, instead, get busy and shape them into a happy pattern.

Which brings me to Irene Dunne. For Irene has taken her marriage, which circumstances projected into a pretty difficult pattern, and made something darn swell out of it. A husband and wife separated most of the time by three thousand miles might be expected to grow apart. But, after four years of this state of affairs, Irene Dunne and Doctor Francis D. Griffin are as close and as good friends as any two people you know. And far closer and much better friends than entirely too many married people you know.

The first evening Irene and Frank Griffin were in New York this last time, after their trip from California by boat, he took her to the theatre.

"Let's run over and see 'Personal Appearance'," he suggested at about eight o'clock when the last of the friends who had dropped in to see them had left. "Not dress? Okeh. I'll call down and have them reserve seats." And he was on the telephone.

"Personal Appearance," one of Broadway's most successful comedies is, you know, the story of a movie star, a flamboyantly temperamental upstart who mushrooms to fame. There are many who feel there has been no star, like the lady Gladys George portrays in this play, since the talkies. Claiming, therefore, that the play is dated. Be that as it may, it remains good fun and no one laughs harder than the movie stars who go to see it.

The Griffins sat well down in front. But because they hadn't dressed and because they had come in quietly no one recognized them. They were as alone in that theatre as any other couple who moved closer and reached for each others' hands when the lights went down.

EVERY TIME there was a little jibe at the expense of the movie star, Frank Griffin would turn to Irene and she would feel his eyes bright with laughter.

"Must I do everything myself?" the movie star in that play asks in an harassed moment while at least six people wait on her, hand and foot.

Irene felt a nudge in her side. And she remembered times, when her secretary had neglected to send a check for the telephone bill or her gardener had failed to tie up the chrysanthemums against the tugging wind, and when she had said something very similar.

She pretended, however, that she didn't know what that nudge meant. She continued to sit there very seriously for a second or two. Then, as usual, unable to resist his salty laughter, she began laughing, too. And when she couldn't find her handkerchief he had to give her one of the huge affairs she has made especially for him, since those sold in the shops rarely come large enough to please him.

As the final curtain fell they hurried out into a taxi and back to their hotel. Then, while Irene went in to change into something comfortable, Frank Griffin lit the electric grate fire. For the sake of cheer.

"You wouldn't have any good Irish reason for taking me to that particular play on our first night in New York?" Irene challenged him over their cheese sandwiches and beer.

HE SHOOK his head soberly. "Certainly not!" He was as innocent as Irishers can be when they've been up to tricks.

"That's what I thought," Irene said sweetly. It was a game two could play. "That's exactly what I thought!"

I lunched with her on one of her crowded days in New York. Her suite had the atmosphere it always has. New books were about. Music stood open on the piano which is moved into any suite she occupies, simultaneously with her trunks. Red tulips and purple lilacs were lovely against the pale green walls. And the jonquils which filled a silver bowl were no brighter yellow than the sweater Irene wore with a black tailored skirt.

She shuffled a batch of photographs which had arrived, photographs taken of her and Frank Griffin during their voyage from California—on (Continued on page 86)

Three-Cornered Romance

Joan Crawford, beautifully gowned in pleated gold brocade, is out to bewitch these two charming gentlemen, Bob Montgomery and Franchot Tone, with particular attention to the former. It all takes place in that delightful comedy-drama which was such a success on Broadway, "No More Ladies." Charlie Ruggles, Edna May Oliver, Reginald Denny and Gail Patrick also take part in the merry goings-on.

Gable Flipped a Coin

Five times, that big little word "if" changed Clark's destiny

By Katherine Albert

SOME philosophers believe that there is a destiny which guides us, a fate which overtakes us and that despite anything we do our lives are mapped out for us.

Others contend that chance is the true goddess and that your life and mine is a succession of "ifs." "If I had not made a mistake and taken the road to the right, my car would have been hit by a truck." "If I had not come down with influenza I would have taken the plane which crashed." If, if, if. And certain things which seem to be hard luck at the time happen to turn out to be the best luck one can have.

As proof of all this let's turn the spotlight on the astonishing life and career of Clark Gable and see how great a part chance has played. The "ifs" in his work loom larger than an executive's power. And what strange "ifs" they all are.

Number one: If he had not been almost penniless and terribly lonely in a little Ohio town he would not have become an actor!

Having no money and no friends seems to be the worst fate that can befall a person. Yet that was what opened up the way to the exciting road Clark was to travel.

He was working in a rubber factory by day and attending medical school at night. He was set upon becoming a doctor. And then a tawdry, down-at-the-heel stock company camped in a tent on the outskirts of the town. If Clark had had the money for more lively entertainment he would never have gone to that show on a Sunday night, the only evening he had free from medical school. And if he had not been so bitterly lonely and depressed, he would certainly have seen no glamor in that miserable tent show.

BUT BECAUSE of all these things he saw in that tent the release from his hum-drum existence. His life, at that time, was completely devoid of glamor, and the company represented freedom and a full emotional life. He came to know the actors and when the pitiful little troupe left town Clark left with them, as a sort of handy man who occasionally was allowed the delightful experience of playing "super" and sometimes bits and small parts.

Number two: If a man had not become ill Clark might have been the stock company handy man all his life.

In bits and small roles and sometimes a second lead, Clark saw no chance for advancement. The stock company leading man was a great favorite wherever the company played. And then the man became ill. With great misgiving, the manager handed Clark the leading role. He was tremendously successful. And even after the erstwhile star recovered Clark continued in the top spot.

Number three: If he had not ripped his coat on a nail, he might this very minute be a second-rate vaudevillian.

He had been out of work for some time and needed money badly when an offer was made to him to play opposite Dorothy Davenport (Wallace Reid's wife) in a personal appearance vaudeville tour.

Much as he needed money Clark deliberated. He was trying hard to make a name for himself in the legitimate theatre and he knew that if he took this job it would only afford temporary financial relief and would not help him in the advancement of his career at all. He wanted to act on a real stage, not simply be a stooge in a vaudeville act. Broadway was his destination, he felt, not the little towns into which the circuit (Continued on page 90)

2. Mail your letter to Adelia Bird, in care of MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

3. The contest closes on midnight of August 15, 1935. No letters postmarked after that time will be eligible.

4. State your size and preference, according to the description of the gowns given here.

5. In judging, consideration will be given to neatness of presentation and aptness and originality of expression.

6. The four best descriptions in the opinion of the judges will win, in each case, the costume best liked by the writer.

7. The decision of the judges (Miss Bird and the editors of MODERN SCREEN) will be final. No contest entries will be returned.

8. In case of duplicate entries of prize-winning merit, duplicate prizes will be awarded.

Sounds simple, doesn't it? And furthermore, it is!

keeping cool

YOU CAN look cool, even if you don't feel it! That is the best platform for your July to September dressing. And if you can't find clothes that create an illusion of cool detachment from the torrid atmosphere, it isn't the fault of the designers and fabric manufacturers this season. Crisp, sheer and airy are the summer textures—cool, practical and wearable are the results of clothes fashioned from them.

Hollywood-ites are especially expert at getting their wardrobes down to the coolest possible terms. As you know, California sun gets burning hot in the daytime, even though evening usually brings a refreshing breeze. Linens are prime daytime favorites, while chiffons, organdies and sheer cottons are evening pets.

Cool colors dominate the Hollywood scene. White, alone and in all sorts of combinations. Pinks, blues, greens and natural tones. Many of the light shades are contrasted with dark tones in the same color range such as pale blue with navy and pink with deep wine red. Such combinations give you a very fresh, cool look. It is amusing to notice that so many wintry colors are being used, too, and that combined with white or some pastel shade, they look as summery as the pure whites and pastels. For instance, a deep wood green is becoming very popular when accented with a light lime green or white. And Dubonnet red, a true wine tone, is another color that used to be relegated to the fall and winter color card but is showing up with fetching results as an exciting summer shade.

A number of your favorites have contributed their cool thoughts to our fashion tale this month—and they should give you inspiration for your clothes, accessories and even your hairdress!

Since nothing makes you forget a hot day quite so completely as dressing up and trotting off to dance in the cool of the evening, I have dedicated pages 48 to 49 to summer evening gowns. These are pet costumes of each star pictured and are suitable for either country club parties or city roof gardens. Let's look them over carefully.

By Adelia Bird

JOAN CRAWFORD'S detachable starched piqué collar gives a sharp, crisp accent to her pale blue satin gown. Its creases and jutting points are definitely reminiscent of the headpieces of a certain French order of nuns. I wouldn't be surprised if it actually drew inspiration from such a source. And when you think how cool nuns manage to look in their dark robes, even on the hottest day, you can see why this idea has merit. Joan's train really is too exaggerated for a summer evening gown for all of you but that is one of the dramatic licenses a designer has to take for scenic effect. The vest, also of starched piqué, is accordion pleated and the clips are placed adroitly. Joan wears this gown in "No More Ladies."

Gertrude Michael chooses a sheer black gown for her California evenings. It is a dramatic one with its full tulle skirt and short capelet with little hood to pull up over her locks. These hooded capes are a Weather report—heat wave to continue! So as you read that in the paper, turn your eyes to the cooling pictures on these two pages. Extreme left, Joan Crawford's crisp starched piqué collar and vest topping a blue satin evening gown. Next, sheer black tulle for a gown and hooded capelet of Gertrude Michaels'. Dolores Del Rio's striped "sari" worn over a white gown gives her a new elusive personality—nice wrap for cool evenings. Frances Drake a cooling sight in sheer brown and white polka dotted net. Huge, colorful chiffon flowers at the bodice. And above, the incomparable Kate Hepburn in pale pink satin with cape of rose tulle. This is the stuff out of which Hollywood fashions its illusions of refreshing mid-summer coolness.

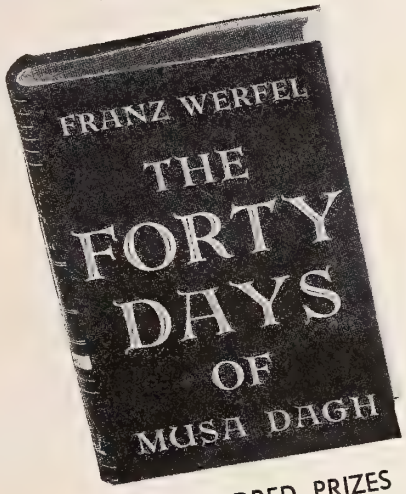
grand innovation, don't you think? How many times we all have rummaged through our dressers to find some scarf or piece of material to wind around our heads, and usually, whatever came to hand, looked so makeshift that we discarded it outside the club house door. But these capes are decorative—and so-o flattering. All you need is a few yards of net, tulle or chiffon. Most of the stores are full of them, very moderately priced, too, for such a new stunt.

Dolores Del Rio never hesitates to adopt the most unusual ideas from each new season. Her sheath-like white gown with its striped "sari" is very new and stunning. These saris are an East Indian head scarf worn by native women. They impart a feminine and most un-modern air. Dolores is wearing one designed by Orry-Kelly that is a more fullsome version of the real native sari. Hers is to be used either as a cape wrap or in the sari manner as shown in the picture on page 48. The draping of the sari is half its charm—and I think it takes an exotic person like the Del Rio to carry it off with dash. You'll find saris in the shops made of all sorts of materials, many diaphanous as befits the season.



Kalloch has designed a sari costume for Grace Moore to wear in "Love Me Forever." He made the dress with drapery in the skirt to give it a slight East Indian flavor—this in black with a sari scarf in emerald green. And a very grand extra gesture is a rajah coat of gold tissue on organdy which Grace may wear over it. If this keeps up we will all look like maharajahs!

FOR a youthful and very wearable semi-formal frock, you can't beat Frances Drake's. Brown and white polka dotted net with an off-the-shoulder neckline and brief ruffled sleeves. The use of brown dots on white for the skirt bands and the reverse color scheme for the dress, is smart. The skirt fullness comes below the hips—and for actual dancing, the dress should be shorter than the length Frances is wearing.

Seven layers of rose tulle is the frosting Bernard Newman has put on a pale pink satin confection that Katharine Hepburn wears in "Break of Hearts." The tulle forms a cape which boasts an alluring collar of hand-made roses tied on with long satin streamers. It's sheer summer romance. And as a practical thought, (Continued on page 70)

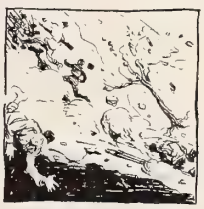
Send your letter in any ordinary envelope you wish. Do not use special mountings or unusually decorative letters or envelopes as they in no way will influence the judging.

No correspondence can be entered into regarding letters submitted to this contest. All letters, upon receipt, will become the property of MODERN SCREEN MAGAZINE.

Do not send letters of more than 150 words. This applies only to the main text of the letter, excluding salutation and signature.

This contest is open to everyone except employees and former employees of the Dell Publishing Company, Inc., Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Company, The Viking Press, Inc., and members of their families.

The contest ends at midnight, Eastern Standard Time, September 30, 1935.



Address your letters to The Modern Screen Forty Days of Musa Dagh Contest, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Gabriel offers to lead the peasants in defense of their lives and faith.

The peasants before leaving their village forever bury the Church bells in the graveyard.

An avalanche comes down the mountainside and forces Turkish invaders to flee.

A child leads Gabriel to a spot where he finds his wife in the arms of another man.

Gabriel's son at night drives a platoon of Turks away and captures their howitzers.

Gabriel's wife refuses freedom, stays with her husband on the mountain.

In Constantinople the Turkish war-lord refuses mercy to the Armenians.

Gabriel and a peasant girl fall in love, think they'll be killed, agree to die together.

Turkish forces lead a group of Armenian peasants into unwilling exile.

The Turks attack and are driven back in a fierce battle in which many lives are lost.

Comedians' get-together! Jack Benny, lovely Alice Faye, Jack Haley, Gracie Allen and George Burns at the Beverly-Wilshire. Mr. Burns seems to be master of ceremonies.

Fay Wray returns to Hollywood after doing "Clairvoyant" for Gaumont-British in London.

On completing "Under the Pampas Moon," Warner Baxter and Ketti Gallian gaily exchanged farewells and best wishes for luck in the next six months 'til they should meet again. Warner hopped a plane for Mexico City and the next a.m. Mlle. Ketti took wing to New York. Three days later they dolefully greeted one another on the set. Frantic wires had brought them both back for retakes on the picture. Just a sample of Hollywood's idea of vacations!

Hollywood's star host and hostess are Mr. and Mrs. John Boles. But they don't reserve their charming hospitality just for the Pickfords, Garbos and Swansons. The other evening they entertained five couples with an elaborate dinner-dance at the swanky Cocoanut Grove—the five girls were the "extras" with whom Mr. Boles dances in "Redheads on Parade" and the five men were their best boy-friends!

"Don't laugh at 'puppy love'," warns Constance Bennett, since her son Peter, aged six, became stricken with the charms of Miss Shirley Temple. After an afternoon spent playing with the Baby Blonde at Palm Springs, where the children's respective parents had them vacationing, Peter could not eat a mouthful of supper. When he looked disconsolately at his spinach, Connie wasn't much alarmed, but when Peter flatly refused ice cream, she began to view his heart trouble seriously!

'Tis said that Garbo's favorite director is Woody Van Dyke and perhaps a reason for this is that Woody "takes nothin' from nobody nohow." It just doesn't matter who you are, the director gives the orders when Mr. Van Dyke wields the megaphone. In the picture he made with the Great One, Mr. Van D. requested her to descend the stairs on the left side. Greta decided on the right, whereupon the camera was immediately moved to exclude her from the picture. Miss Garbo meekly moved left as she meekly remarked, "I guess I come down his way."

We've always been practically sea-sick while watching one of those pictures showing a giant ocean liner plunging through the wild waves of a stormy sea. But t'other day watching a similar scene being "shot" we were really sick — with disillusionment. What's more, we don't intend to suffer alone, so we've made up our mind (pahdon the egotism) to tell all. Happening on a puddle of water in Paramount's back yard, we stopped to look at a toy ship, about four feet long, floating around in it. 'Twas then we spied the cameras and learned the awful truth—they were photographing a storm at sea! Electric fans were kicking the water up into ripples, and two bored looking men were standing on either side of the puddle. In their hands was a rope which was attached to either end of the boat, and this they yanked on, every now and again, causing the craft to look as if it were really at the mercy of Father Neptune!

First of all, we hasten to assure you that this just happens once in a polka-dotted moon! But this really happened to Nan Gray, a sixteen-year-old Texan school girl. Nan was summer-vacationing in the Hollywoods, and having nothing better to do the day before she left for home, she accompanied a friend on a trip to the Brothers Warner studio. She'd just put one size three, triple A across the doormat, when she slipped on the other and fell ker-plunk into the arms of a W. B. director. He finally let her go, but not without a contract! You saw her in a swell starter role in "Mary Jane's Pa" and you'll see her from now on—and on. Or we're wrong again.

Glenda Farrell, having punched the Warner time-clock the other a.m., spied Joan Blondell ahead of her on the set. "Hi!" she called out, "How's the baby?"

"Swell!" came a deafening chorus—being composed of the lusty vocal chords of Pat O'Brien, Al Jolson, Guy Kibbee and Frank McHugh! By sneaking up on these people in days past, we used to be able to glean a few choice gossip tid-bits, but since they've become doting parents, all we get for our trouble is the latest scientific formula for strained spinach.

Miss Gloria Lloyd, sub-deb daughter of the Harold Lloyds, recently celebrated her eleventh birthday by entertaining a group of school friends for luncheon. For weeks this gala affair was the one and only topic of conversation about the Lloyd home—Gloria's first long dress was discussed at great length; long and heated arguments over whether she could wear "just a little smitch of lipstick" took place; hours were spent planning entertainment that wasn't "too childish." At last, still game, Mildred Lloyd brought up the question of the menu with her small daughter.

GOOD NEWS

Meet the newlyweds, Mr. and Mrs. Jack Doyle. She's Judith Allen of the films.

Henry Wilcoxon, still wearing the longish hair bob necessary for his work in "The Crusades," goes nightclubbing with Frances Drake.

"How about chicken and creamed potatoes, darling?" she asked. Gloria favored her with a long, cold stare, then replied loftily, "I should say not! We'll have turkey and mashed potatoes."

Mrs. Lloyd admitted that she couldn't see a great deal of difference, but then she's only a mother!

After gaining nigh onto twenty pounds while hibernating in the mountains for the "Call of the Wild," Jack Oakie had despaired of ever seeing his knees again. "Not that there aren't knees I'd rather see," Jack explained, "but one rather likes to feel that one has some of one's own." Whether one does or one doesn't, at least Jack lost a coupla dozen pounds when back in civilization again—and what's more heartening, he's lost that superfluous new vocabulary which he was airing with such pride.

As if California doesn't have beautiful enough gardens, and all the year 'round, too, to suit any picture! But no, Paramount's just built a mammoth indoor garden, covering two acres to use for a garden-party scene in "Accent on Youth." Huge oak trees, rambling vines, masses of shrubbery and blooming flowers have all been transplanted on the "set," while fountains and arbors have been specially constructed and landscaped. Sylvia Sidney's the star who is going to scintillate in these surroundings.

Fred Keating had just about made up his mind that Loretta Young was really cross-eyed after all. For days he'd been noticing on the set of "Shanghai" that every time Loretta talked to him, she seemed to be glancing over his left shoulder. He was beginning to almost weep at night thinking of the poor girl's handicap, when he discovered the cause of Loretta's wandering eye. Seems that the oldest "Young" sister, is more intent on getting a favorable angle on her neck than on her acting, hence she has convenient mirrors placed all over the set so's she can see the effect of the lighting on her lovely features. So far, we'll hafta admit, Loretta has shown a good eye for beauty!

Some Foxy business involved that studio deeper'n they'd figured on. Their publicity department conceived the brilliant idea of staging a hot'n'heavy love affair between the blondly beautiful Alice Faye and handsome Nelson Eddy. 'Course, this was to be strictly on paper, and that's where Eddy kept it—but not Alice. The studio finally had to announce that Mr. Eddy had outrageously insulted Miss Faye. Seemed the best way to get out of it all for all concerned.

"Everything Happens at Once" is the name and a brief resumé of what goes on in the latest W. C. Fields side-splitter. Mr. Fields spent the first day on the set tearing up the script; then noting a slightly peeved expression on the author's face, he sat down and wrote another complete version. But still the director looked a bit disgruntled, so W. C. took over the directing of the picture, too. No matter how you look at it, this is certainly a Fields, Inc. fillum. Mr. Fields believes in writing from personal experience, so you'll see a corker of a scene with Bill and his nose peering out of the bars in the town jug.

In the "Big Broadcast" you're gonna see Jack Oakie and Lyda Roberti and Henry Wadsworth in an awful fix. Lyda's just cuh-razy about both of 'em, and simply can't decide on which one to marry. While rehearsing the other day, Jack said, "If I married you it'd be darn big o' me." "Yeh," responded Lyda, "but I'll marry both of you and make it darned bigamy!"

If you could see Bette Davis at the "Cotton Club" these starry nights, you'd know why the news had been circulating that she's the most frivolous flirt in Hollywood. For the dazzling Bette, whether dining, wining, or dancing, is always surrounded by a group of handsome young men. But the truth will out! So here's the low-down. "Ham" Nelson, the orchestra conductor, is none other than Bette's own husband, and all the gallant gentlemen who vie for Bette's favor are none other than his best friends, trying to help the little wife to kill time while waiting for her husband to quit work and take her home! Spikkin of devotion, that's almost the tops. But the real tops was a while back when "Ham" was playing in a San Francisco café and living in an auto camp to save money. Bette asked for a vacation at the studio, packed bag and baggage off to the aforementioned auto camp, and proceeded to cook, scrub and mend for her husband 'til that job was over. That's what we call love—in capital letters.

between you and me

Has your letter been published in this corner? If it hasn't, get busy, boys and girls, and drop us a line

Is Mary too Placid?

Why do some players who have a large and loyal following of fans and more ability than the average actor or actress suddenly drop from sight? Who decides that we do not want to see them any more?

Take Mary Brian for instance. She has a large fan following and is capable and popular. Her fans want her back. Why can't we see her more often in good parts in good pictures? She is much better than most of the actresses we have to see over and over again. We love her. Why not give this little girl a hand or must she be forty or a gay divorcee to succeed? Or are they so busy with the foreign stars that they have not time for the modest sweet home people who have no temperament? And I guess Mary Brian is the only one who fills that description, at that, whether foreign or domestic. — Jack Wheeler, Canandaigua, N. Y.

Nice Girls Don't Smoke

My favorite actress used to be Ruby Keeler, but since I discovered that she smokes, she has gone down considerably in my estimation. Girls who don't smoke like to be able to look up to at least one star and be able to say, "There's a swell person who has no use for cigarettes either." So a word to Ruby: nice girls don't smoke and if you don't want to lose your popularity, you had better quit it.—Virginia Kendall, Seminole, Okla.

Charming Mr. Vallee

Rudy Vallee is the most delightful personality to hit the screen in ages. His performance in "Sweet Music" was the most appealing of the year in my opinion. For the first time movie producers have given the long-popular radio star a break and Vallee made the most of it. He went through the piece with a naturalness and charm that struck an entirely new note for the screen. His singing was more wonderful than ever, his acting and comedy great; and from start to finish he completely won and held his audience. That should definitely prove that the Vallee charm is no myth, but a reality.—Nina C., Savannah, Ga.

She Wonders Why

You ask us to write to you, telling you what we think and what our own opinions are toward the movie people; then you'll publish them. Well, I've wrote several letters and not one of them has even been published in a Modern Screen Magazine as I get one every month on purpose.

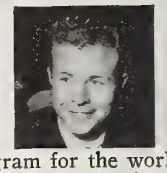
Honestly I believe you're worse liars than some of these crooks that run loose on Fifth Ave., in New York. It would be far different if you would publish one letter at least from every person that writes. Then maybe people would believe you.

Personally, I doubt very much if you ever print letters that are written by outsiders. I believe you write your own letters about the people you care about, then sign some dizzy name to them and publish them.

That will be all for this time.—Modern Screen Fan, Santa Barbara, Calif.

The Case of Franchot Tone

May I enter my protest against the extremely poor roles Franchot Tone has been drawing lately. I see no reason for continually typing him as a rich cad who likes his liquor. Of course, he does that sort of role very well, but he is a versatile actor and should be given a greater variety of roles. Witness "The Stranger's Return" and "Lives of a Bengal Lancer." That boy has the goods and he should not be wasted in roles the average young actor of indifferent ability could do.—J. Hunter Norris, Baltimore, Md.



Change of Mind

I have just seen "The Wedding Night" and as I left the theatre, my thoughts were not with Gary Cooper nor Anna Sten, but with Helen Vinson, the actress who is forever being cast as the cold, heartless wife.

I always thought she had been cast perfectly before, as I thought she even "looked" the part, but that just proves what a real actress she is, because in "The Wedding Night," she had a chance to be a little human and she showed us how really charming, lovable and cute she could be when given the chance.—Hess Harrison, Muskogee, Okla.

Her Heart Beat

He is better than Clark Gable! He is grand, colossal! My heart thumps wildly whenever he appears on the screen. I wouldn't miss any of his pictures nor his radio program for the world. What a smile, what a voice and what a boyish personality! Who is it? Why that Dick Powell boy, of course. I just can't see or hear enough of him.—Florence Blair, Boston, Mass.

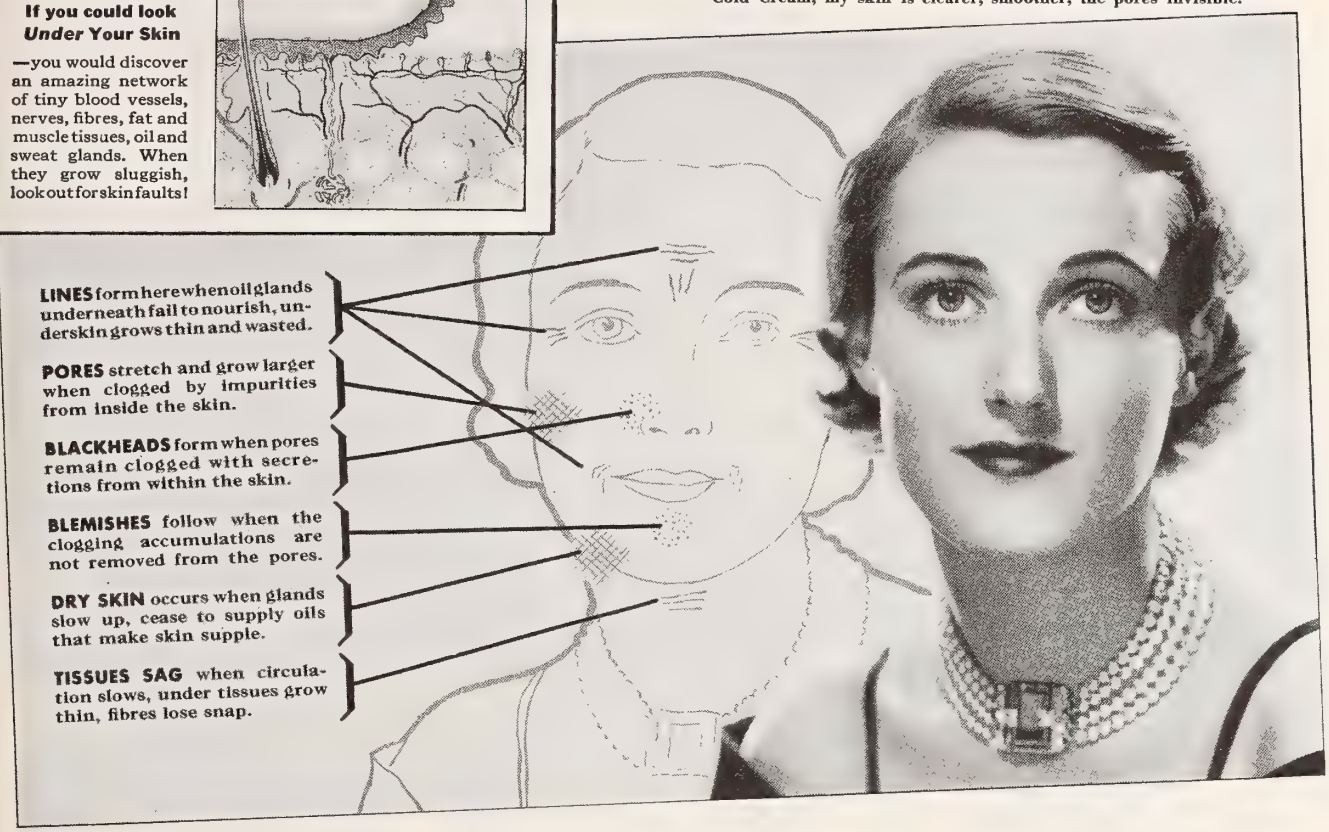
Knocks and Boosts

I am glad that, in cleaning up the movies, the producers are also breaking up a few of these screen teams. The best thing they did was to separate MacDonald and Chevalier (pictured). His croaking is an insult to her glorious voice. Why, oh, why must we have such an overabundance of lip cast upon us. If he is what they call effervescent then I'll take ZaSu Pitts.

Having just seen "Naughty Marietta," I can't stop raving about the superb performances turned in by the ravishing Jeanette and that he-man singer, Nelson Eddy. The picture is in its second week in New Haven and, believe me, a picture has to be real good to do that in this critical old town.—Frances Holmes, New Haven, Conn.

Wants Sweetness and Light

Sometimes I sit and wonder just what it is that makes some screen stars great. They must have something, but I go to their pictures and fail to see it. Greta Garbo with her silly remoteness; Crawford with her posing. Those stars don't seem real to me. I like to see an actress on the screen who is pretty and charming and real. I'm afraid I couldn't apply any of those adjectives to Garbo, Crawford or Mae West. Enough for the brickbats,.



I saw Maureen O'Sullivan in "The Barretts of Wimpole Street." She was delightful. And there's lovely Jean Parker (pictured). Just to see her face on the screen makes one believe in the three virtues, Faith, Hope and Charity.—Rosetta Wyninger, Anderson, Ind.

If you could look Under Your Skin

—you would discover an amazing network of tiny blood vessels, nerves, fibres, fat and muscle tissues, oil and sweat glands. When they grow sluggish, look out for skin faults!

Miss Hélène Macy of New York says: "Since I began to use Pond's Cold Cream, my skin is clearer, smoother, the pores invisible."

When Underskin fails to function, expect Lines, Blackheads, Blemishes!

DO YOU KNOW what makes skin supple and smooth? The tiny oil glands underneath it.

Do you know what keeps it firm, young? Millions of tiny nerve and muscle fibres just below the surface.

What gives it that clear glow that never fails to win admiration? The active circulation in little blood vessels all through the underskin.

Skin authorities say the whole beauty of your outer skin depends on the proper functioning of all these things just under your skin!

Hundreds of women have learned to ward off skin faults with a cream that both cleanses to the depths and rouses the slowing underskin to vigorous action —Pond's Cold Cream.

And here's the simple way they use it:—

EVERY NIGHT, apply Pond's Cold Cream generously, patting it in till the skin is warm and supple. It sinks deep into the pores, softens and flushes away dirt, make-up and impurities from within the skin itself. Wipe cream and dirt away.

Pat in some more cream briskly, and give your cleansed skin a second invigorating treatment with it. The circulation stirs. Oil glands are wakened. Tissues and fibres toned. See how clear and glowing your skin looks. How satiny to the touch.

IN THE MORNING, repeat this. In the daytime, too, before you put on fresh make-up. Rouge and powder go on evenly, stay fresh for hours.

Modern Screen Dramatic School

By Katherine Albert

A LOT of you Dramatic School students—you boys and girls, men and women who are interested in amateur theatricals, who want to make the stage your real career or who are simply interested in the art of drama as a means of enriching your lives—tell me that you're having trouble with the sheer mechanics of bodily movement.

"What can I do with my hands?" you ask me.

"How can I stand up and sit down gracefully on the stage?"

"What is the correct way to walk?"

Last month I told you that I was going to discuss some of the individual dramatic club problems (and there are now hundreds of clubs formed throughout the country, but there is still room for more). Your big problems seem to be posture, walking, sitting, standing and gesturing. So let's start off by learning about them. And certainly I can bring you no better teacher than Zee Silvonia, conductor of Paramount's "Charm School." This month you are going to receive the benefit of her vast knowledge. You are going to learn exactly what she teaches the young Paramount players who are about to be launched upon screen careers. I think we're darned lucky to have her as our guest.

Her own story is pretty fascinating in itself. She was one of the most beautiful girls in the "Follies," but when she came to Hollywood she had a run of bad (Continued on page 75)

C.; MARY GALAROWICZ, Detroit, Mich.; BETTY CYR, Gary, Ind.; LUCILLE JANSSEN, Sheboygan, Wis.; MIRIAM TYSON, Atlanta, Ga.; MARGARET ROSE, Ottawa, Canada—Now that that's over, we can get down to the real business of investigating the past and present of Gene Raymond. His "vital statistics" are: Real name—Raymond Guion; Birthdate—August 13, 1908; Birthplace—New York City; Nationality—American (French descent); Height—5 feet 10 inches; Weight—150 pounds; Coloring—Blue eyes, blonde hair (nearly platinum). He has one brother named Robert. Gene made his first stage appearance at the age of five, was educated in New York public and private schools while occasionally taking parts in plays. From 1922 until 1931 he took up his stage career in earnest, appearing in a great many productions. His first picture was for Paramount opposite Nancy Carroll in "Personal Maid," and since that time he has made pictures for nearly every major company in Hollywood. He is at present under contract to Columbia Studios, 1438 North Gower St., Hollywood, Calif., where you can reach him and get his photograph for 25 cents. He enjoys horseback riding, tennis and golf. His favorite delicacy is a thick steak and he can prepare bacon and eggs expertly. He spends his leisure days on the desert, plays the piano well and enjoys travel. He lives in Beverly Hills and is often visited by his mother, Mrs. Mary Kipling, a writer. His most recent picture is "Hooray for Love."

DOROTHY SCHOLLAERT, Joffre, Pa.—No, Jeanette MacDonald is not married. There has been a rumor, never substantiated, that she is secretly married to Bob Ritchie. At any rate, they are together a great deal.

VIRGINIA WINSLOW, Waltham, Mass.; BERNICE BLOOMFIELD, Detroit, Mich.; MARIE MENTEN; ELEANORA SALAY, Hicksville, Ohio; M. S. H., Walden, N. Y.—And now for Janet Gaynor. "Vital statistics": Real name—Laura Gainer; Birthdate—October 6, 1907; Birthplace—Philadelphia, Pa.; Height—5 feet; Weight—100 pounds; Coloring—Brown eyes, copper brown hair. She has one sister. When Janet was 6 her family moved to Chicago where she attended the Graeme Stewart grade school. When they moved again to San Francisco, she finished her education at San Francisco Polytechnic High School, and worked in a shoe shop and then as usherette in a movie theatre. The day after Christmas in 1924, she obtained her first job as an extra in Hollywood. Work was scarce so she took up secretarial training, but gave it up believing that she was no business woman. Back to the studios again, she began to get better and better parts. Her first real leading role was in "The Johnstown Flood." The rest is history. She is divorced from Lydell Peck and her best friend is Margaret Lindsay. She plays the piano and ukelele and her favorite sports are swimming and golf. Her favorite food is Chinese dishes and her pet colors are yellow and blue. She dislikes exhibitionism and is very shy, rarely appearing at public functions. Her hobby is collecting Lalique glassware, and arranging "phonograph operas." She is under contract to the Fox Studios, Movietone City, Hollywood, Calif. Her next picture will be "The Farmer Takes a Wife."

VIOLET CONNORS, Harrison, N. J.—Grace Moore's birthday is December 5, and she was born in 1901. Her leading man in "Love Me Forever" is Michael Bartlett who, under the name of Eduardo Bartelli, has won European successes achieved by few Americans. He is hailed by music critics as the best American born tenor. Leo Carrillo has a very important part in the picture, too. Jeanette MacDonald has never sung in opera. She has, however, given concerts throughout Europe.

ANNA AMEN and ALICE M. WEBER, New York City; SUZANNE SCHIESL, St. Joseph, Mo.; FRIEDA BEELER, Clawson, Mich.; L. HARTMANN, Chicago, Ill.; MAE and HELEN ROCK, Oak Park, Ill.; JEAN FIELDS, Bklyn., N. Y.—Fred MacMurray is named after his father, the noted concert violinist. He was born in Kankakee, Ill., on August 30, 1908, and after a few weeks his parents moved to Beaver Dam, Wis., where they settled for a few years. Here Fred attended grade and high school. He also went to high school in Madison where he won 10 letters for his athletic prowess in football, baseball, track and basketball. He later enrolled at Carroll College in Waukesha, Wis., where he remained for a year. Then to Chicago as a saxophonist and soloist in a dance band, followed by a similar position in the stage band at Warner's Hollywood Theatre. In 1929 MacMurray was featured in a singing sketch with Libby Holman in "Three's a Crowd" on Broadway, during which time he was with the California Collegians, a cooperative traveling orchestra. For the next five years Fred remained with this orchestra and appeared regularly in New York's most popular night clubs. The band was booked for featured billing in Max Gordon's hit, "Roberta," where, in addition to his singing, MacMurray was understudy to the leading man. Paramount talent scouts spotted him and in April, 1934, he was signed to a long term contract. You can write him at the Paramount Studios, Hollywood, Calif. He is 6 feet 3 inches tall, and weighs 185 pounds. He has dark brown hair and brown eyes. His Paramount pictures are: "The Gilded Lily," "Car 99," "Men Without Names" and his next will be "Alice Adams" with Katharine Hepburn for which he has been borrowed by RKO.

PHILIP MACY, Piru, Calif.—Samuel Hines played the part of Jean Parker's father in "Sequoia." Yes, Ann Sothern's real name is Harriette Lake.

BETTY WAND, Elizabeth, Ill.; PEGGY MONSON, Burrel, Calif.; DALE MILLER, Callery, Pa.; WILMA, Cedar Rapids, Iowa; MRS. C. NEWMAN, Detroit, Mich.—Just what Ginger Rogers' real name actually is, is hard to state. According to her biography it is Virginia Rogers, but according to her marriage certificate it is Katherine McMath—so take your choice. Anyway, she was born in Independence, Mo., on July 16, 1911, and later moved to Fort Worth, Texas, where she attended school. When she was 15 she won the Texas Charleston championship. Through this she obtained a vaudeville contract followed by sundry stage engagements. Then she went into a featured role in the musical, "Top Speed," and while appearing in this show, made her screen debut in "Young Men of Manhattan," which was made in the East. She was in several other musicals, the last of which was "Girl Crazy" in which she made a tremendous hit. Then to Hollywood and the lead in "The Tip Off." Ginger is 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighs 110 pounds, has gold-red hair and blue eyes. Dancing is her hobby, and her favorite method of keeping trim. She plays a fair game of tennis, likes to play golf and is fond of swimming and riding. She likes music and cooking and her favorite dish is ham and eggs. When she was quite young she married Edward Jackson Culpepper and was later divorced. On November 14, 1934, she and Lew Ayres became man and wife—and a cute couple they make, too. Her career will not be halted by this matrimonial

Rescue Kent Taylor

I want to start a "beef" because more hasn't been done for that perfectly grand person, Kent Taylor. If he were given some good parts in pictures, rather than these namby-pamby sweetheart roles, I'm betting he would pass Clark Gable in no time. And please don't co-star him with Evelyn Venable. Give him someone who is alive.—Betty Hayes, Los Angeles, Calif.

Silly!

Just what does Regina Cannon mean by calling Katharine Hepburn an exhibitionist? If any one is an exhibitionist it is Greta (silly) Garbo. What do you suppose she is acting the way she does for? Just to get writers like Cannon hot and bothered. Garbo can do all the smiling in public she wants to, but it's going to take more than that to get her fans back. Garbo has been putting on this little show for a long time, but when she saw that Hepburn was crowding her out, she took herself to the Trocadero to get some publicity. I know all about this big Garbo mystery act and it's time you woke up to the facts (don't be so darn silly).—Ardent Hepburn Fan.

All Agog

I want to thank you for your article about Nelson Eddy in the June issue. He is all that you say, and more, as I can testify after seeing and hearing him sing in person here in my home town four weeks ago. I was still running around in circles four days later when I went to see "Naughty Marietta," and after viewing the picture there was no more argument about the matter. In my opinion he is the perfect formula for screen success, and if he does not become the most popular hero in the history of the screen then I am a poor prophet, as he has an equal appeal for both men and women. It is a pity that the silver screen does not do justice to his unusual good looks; however, he will come into his own in color pictures and then his fans can see him as he really is.—Lois Williams, Dallas, Texas.

Just a word of congratulation for Nelson Eddy. "Naughty Marietta" was held over in Atlanta for two weeks. I saw it five different times. Nelson Eddy is a perfect combination of gentleman, lover, and singer. Three cheers for Nelson Eddy.—Jane Colby, Atlanta, Ga.

Here at last is a real man who doesn't look sissy when he sings, yet has a truly wonderful voice. May we hear more of this new sensational star, Nelson Eddy.—Ann Cain, Kansas City, Mo.

Is Helen in a Rut?

It is difficult not to drop a few lines in criticism of the roles that are being assigned to little Helen Mack. A charming person and a capable actress in parts requiring genuine ability. Even if she has not actual star rating at the present time, she would well repay the "risk" of allowing her to portray the part of Fleur in Galsworthy's "The White Monkey." Cannot something be done about it?—D. H. Pingree, Waltham, Mass.

Complainin'

I'm tired of seeing Crawford, Colbert, Harlow, Dietrich, Bennett and the rest of the same chosen few forever overpublicized. Give the others a chance. I used to buy a number of movie magazines each month, but lately have not because I am too fed up reading about the same stars all the time.

I'd like a respite from those silly animated cartoons and "comedy shorts" inflicted upon us along with a good feature picture. Does an exhibitor have to show all that tripe when there are so many wonderful novelty sketches that could be substituted?—Ethel Carlson, Chicago, Ill.

In all Fairness . . .

Fred Astaire deserves all the praise he is receiving for he is the greatest screen discovery in the past few years. But in mentioning him, let us not forget Ginger Rogers who has risen to fame alongside of him. She is the sweetest and most adorable personality on the screen today. I hope RKO never stops making pictures with them for we will never tire of them. I can hardly wait for their next one.—Betty Wexler, Bronx, N. Y.

Mrs. Eddy meets her son Nelson on his return from a concert tour. He'll do another musical with La MacDonald soon.

money was made to be spent—and spent it. He read books with Myrna and rode over the ranges with her and laughed at her early ambition to become a dancer.

This ambition was born, Myrna believes when, at the age of six, her mother took her to see Maeterlinck's "Blue Bird." The children who danced in that pageant danced straight into Myrna's heart and with their unconscious grace moulded an ambition.

BUT Father Williams didn't really sympathize with his small daughter's avowed career. He was of the school who thinks the theatre no place for a daughter of his. Not that he worried about it. He didn't have time . . .

And so, for those first thirteen years Myrna went to public school and played games in the afternoon. She made fudge with girl friends and read Louisa M. Alcott, "Lorna Doone," "The Wide, Wide World," and Tennyson's poems—and dreamed. She studied hard and successfully only the things she wanted to study. And the things she wanted to study were the subjects she thought would be of use to her when the world should applaud her as a premiere danseuse. History and English were her favorite subjects. For from history she could draw upon the stately images of queens and reconstruct scenes at Versailles and the pomp and vanity of the French and Viennese Courts. And from English she could absorb the living thoughts of dead poets, the immortal dreams of great men—and all of this would live again in her Art. She loved dramatics, too, of course. And gym because she knew that she must keep her body supple and fit.

She had a great many girl friends but no boy friends at all.

"I was," Myrna laughs now about it "a very plain little girl, to put it kindly. Carrotty hair. Freckles then, as now. Light eyelashes and eyebrows and unpleasantly skinny. I was a tomboy, too. Grubby hands and knees, torn dresses and socks, screechy voice. Not a trace of dimpled appeal. No one ever called me a 'little angel.' I was really quite hopelessly plain. It must have been hopeless if my mother gave up and did nothing about me. She evidently felt that you can't make a glittering brocade purse out of a little freckled sow's ear. She just saw to it that my hands and face were immaculately scrubbed at least once a day, my dresses tubbed and my reddish hair tightly braided into two pig-tails for neatness' sake. And let it go at that.

"And I suffered agonies in silence. I always have been inarticulate when it comes to personal pain. I wanted, passionately, to be beautiful. I read of Elaine and Guinevere and childish heroines like the 'Little Colonel' and I covered the pages with great globby tears of self-pity.

"I suffered all the more because, of all things, I had chosen for my best friend the little girl who lived next door. And she was a curly, golden-haired cherub who wore ruffles and ribbons. She had a peaches and cream skin and nary a freckle to her face, and a gurgly little giggle. She was feminine, soft and lovable—everything that I was not. She was a lace paper valentine, I was the comic

■ Miss Helen Mitchell Stedman, of New York, of exquisitely fragile blonde beauty, says: "Pond's Rose Brunette Powder gives my skin the loveliest glow!"

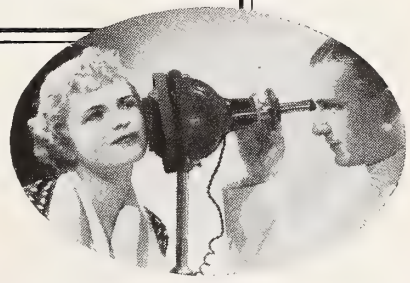
Blonde looked Pale... Faded

The Color Analyst advised a Brunette Powder!



SHE WAS A PRETTY GIRL—that is, she would have been if her skin weren't so dull and washed-out looking. It made even her hair and eyes look faded. She was using a flesh powder of a popular make. It made her skin look positively chalky! "You are deadening your skin with that powder," the Color Analyst said. "See what this will do." He put on Pond's Rose Brunette. "Why it's lovely!" she said breathlessly. Her skin glowed enchantingly. Her hair looked like spun gold. Her eyes sparkled like jewels!

TO FIND OUT just what hidden tints gave beautiful blonde skin its enchanting transparency—what gave brunette skin its glamorous warmth, Pond's color-analyzed the skin of over 200 girls.

They found the answer in the most surprising tints hidden in skin—bright blue in blonde skin, brilliant green in brunette. These tints they blended invisibly in Pond's new powder shades. Now no one need have dull, faded skin. These new shades bring to your skin just the color note it lacks.

If your present powder is not helping you, see what Pond's scientifically blended shades will do for you:—

Rose Cream—gives an enchanting radiance and a clear blonde coloring variety! The boys made a great fuss over her—they carried her books to and from school for her. I trudged alone carrying my own. They shared their lunches with her, bought her ice cream and candies and sent her smudgy little notes covered with circular kisses. I ate my own lunch and never had a single note to my name. The contrast was really rather awful for me—it's a wonder it didn't give me an inferiority complex for the rest of my life. There was Amy, golden-curled and so pretty and there was I, pig-tailed and freckled!

THEN, to make the situation still more acute, I fell in love with a lordly lad of twelve. And he fell in love with Amy! I worshipped him. He worshipped Amy. And if adults bemoan the pain of unrequited love, they should remember the awful, inarticulate love of twelve!

"He would ride Amy home from school, this Romeo, on the back of his bicycle and I would tag along behind, taking little running steps in an effort to keep up with them, trying to pretend that I was having a glorious time, that it was fun and squeezing my eyes tight shut all the while to keep the tears back! Amy would get me to telephone him, too, from my house, and invite him over to play with 'us.' And when he came he and Amy would go off and have secrets together and play games which never included me. I didn't try to compete. I think I knew I had no weapons with which to fight. It never occurred to me that I might try keeping my hands clean and curling my hair and softening my war-whoopish voice. I had none of the instinctive siren in me. I haven't now. Which is why the fact that I have played so many slinky exotic sirens on the screen strikes me as really funny . . .

"As a pay-off to that portion of my past . . . not very long ago I had a note from this very boy—asking for my autograph! He had been seeing me on the screen and realized, suddenly, that Myrna Loy and the small Myrna Williams were one and the same. He said very flattering and rather fulsome things, the kind of things that would have transported the child Myrna to Seventh Heaven. One might say that the Law of Compensation had worked in my behalf. It had—but too late.

"That was my first experience of being in love with someone who wasn't in love with me. I've had the same experience many times since. Unrequited love! I should be a poetess to sing that dirge. I've almost always fallen in love with the wrong man—or with a man who didn't know the state of my feelings.

"Gary Cooper lived a block in back of us in those days. I don't remember him. He says that he vaguely recalls seeing me about. And my mother knew his mother. Doubtless we went to the same grammar school together and must often have ridden the same ranges. It's just as well I didn't see him—I should probably have had another unrequited love to weep over!"

And so Myrna's childhood, up to the age of thirteen, was the childhood of any everyday little American girl in a happy home. Then, when Myrna was thirteen, came the flu epidemic. Myrna, her mother and brother were all stricken with the dread malady. Indeed, the whole town of Helena was laid low by the epidemic. Hospitals were filled beyond capacity in that first onslaught. Nurses were at a premium. In the Williams household a nurse was obtainable only for an hour or so each day. And for the rest of the time David Williams acted as nurse for his wife and two children. When Myrna became so ill that she was unconscious and had to be packed in ice, she would wake from a coma every now and again to be conscious that her father was sitting by her bedside, his strong hand holding firmly to hers.

He saved her life—and lost his own.

Gradually Myrna, her mother and brother recovered and then, with fatal swiftness, the malady struck David Williams. Myrna was sent to the house of a neighbor—to wait.

One day dragged by, two days. Myrna wandered restlessly about the house. On the third day, at high noon, she suddenly felt giddy, funny. She ran upstairs to an empty bedroom with her invariable instinct for hiding her heart from others. As she entered the room the thin blade of a knife seemed to enter her fast-beating heart. She said aloud "Daddy is dead." She sat down to wait for the telephone to ring. Within five minutes it rang. Another few minutes and her hostess came slowly into the room. Myrna did not need to look at that compassionate face. She said, without raising her eyes, "You don't have to tell me, Mrs. Carter—I know."

MYRNA said, "I can't explain, but with Daddy gone I never thought of anybody taking care of me. I knew that any care to be taken was up to me. Perhaps it was because I had always been identified so closely with my father that, when the reins fell from his hands, I picked them up. Perhaps, too, it was because mother had always been such a gay person, without ever having had to shoulder responsibility or know the meaning of making ends meet.

"In spite of which she was really magnificent in the months that followed. She rose to the sad occasion gallantly and competently. She decided that we would go to California, she, David and I. We had spent an occasional winter in La Jolla when we were younger and it had always agreed with her. Her health was precarious . . . Dad's death, her own illness and those of the friends who had fallen to right and to left of us had endangered it. There was a small amount of money left us from our lands in Montana and from insurance. We could manage until I should begin to work.

"We came to California and rented a small house in Culver City, not very far from here."

Myrna went to the Westlake School for Girls for a year. She wanted to study dancing and music. She wanted more history, French and English. She was too young, at that time, to do anything but prepare. Before the year was over, she had found a position, teaching dancing in a small private dancing school. She had thirty pupils, most of them older than herself, and she earned twenty-five dollars a month for her labors.

Myrna said, "Even in high school I never mingled much with the other girls. Alone the majority of the time, I always could be found, wearing a wisp of chiffon, in every May festival or amateur theatrical. But even in those moments you could hardly have called me companionable. For I was not being myself—I was somebody else!"

A little later Myrna decided to study sculpture. Both for its own sake and because she believed the plastic art would contribute to her dancing. She finally entered Venice High School in Southern California because she'd discovered that an artist of national renown, Mr. H. F. Winebrenner, was head of the art classes.

Not even then did boys, crushes or romance enter Myrna's life. She said, "I think my almost boy-less state at that time can be accounted for by the fact that While Myrna Loy was studying sculpture at the Venice High School, she was selected to portray Spirit because she possessed intelligent understanding, beauty and grace.

I was consumed with a passion for success. My dreams were dreams of success. My daytimes were spent pursuing it. And then, there were things to do at home—helping mother, helping David do his homework. Occasionally I felt dreamily in love with some gilded youth but always one who did not know that I existed."

WHILE Myrna was sculpturing at Venice High, Mr. Winebrenner planned a sculptured group wherewith to grace the campus. He conceived the idea of an allegorical group of three figures, one to represent the Physical, another the Mental and a third the Spiritual. This classical group was completed and won the admiration of the art world. But a mystery hovered about it for five years—the mystery of the identity of the model who had posed for the Spiritual. Then, five years after the unveiling, the sculptor revealed the identity of his model—Myrna Loy!

Mr. Winebrenner is quoted as saying, "I had no difficulty in selecting the first two models. A football gladiator posed for the Physical and a pretty girl of high scholastic standing for the Mental. But the model for the Spiritual was not so easy. It required a girl with a beautiful body and if that were all it would have been easy. But animating the body the spirit had to be manifest, clear and idealistic. A prismatic refraction of intelligent understanding, beauty and grace combined into the term called spiritual. I was watching an interpretive dance at the school one day and happened to notice Myrna Williams, one of my own pupils. My eyes were opened. It took a good deal of persuading to induce her to pose for me but she finally consented to do so providing the work be done in the privacy of my own studio-home. Later, she asked me to keep her identity a secret. She said she would feel so silly, a little, unknown schoolgirl, being marbleized as Spirit!"

"My dancing school work," Myrna told me, "was getting me exactly nowhere. The twenty-five a month was getting us into debt. Funds were dwindling and drastic action was imperative. I had to take that action. I never wavered in my conviction that I was the man of the family. I wouldn't ask for help.

"I heard, then, that Fancho & Marco were putting on one of their revues at Grauman's Egyptian Theatre. I applied for the job and got it. I was one of thirty girls doing the dance numbers. I stayed there for one year and three months, made thirty dollars a week and was grateful."

And not then, not even then, did boys, good times, staying out late and partying figure in the life of Myrna Williams. Now and again she went dancing with some boy. Now and again she was in love with some youth who was unaware of her. The work was hard and constant and she had occasion many times, she told me, to be grateful to the Montana plains for the sound body they had given her. Now Myrna admitted, laughing, she never makes an athletic move. She is, she says, one of the laziest women living. A swim now and again is the sum total of her gladiatorial gaddings. And then, too, at that period of her life she had few clothes and when you have few clothes and must look smart all of the time, a considerable amount of home dry-cleaning, pressing and mending is necessary.

"Then—" said Myrna, "then something happened to me that was to be the turning point for me. Though, as is usually the case, I didn't know it for a turning point when I saw it. It was chance . . . and it is my belief that Chance is seventy-five per cent of success, the other twenty-five must be ability.

"Henry Waxman, the photographer, happened to have an idle evening on his hands. He dropped into the Egyptian. I chanced, that night, to be the central figure in the dance numbers. He happened to notice me, and thought I would make a good photographic subject. He came back stage and offered to photograph me. I was flattered and accepted the very kind offer, which was to be without cost to me. No one had ever wanted to photograph me before.

"The pictures were made. They turned out beautifully. A day or so later, Valentino happened to be in Waxman's studio. He saw my pictures and he asked about me. He went to see me at the Egyptian. The next day Henry Waxman called me. I was to go to the studio where Mr. Valentino would make a test of me—Natacha Rambova was preparing to screen "What Price Beauty?" and—and they wanted to test me!

"I couldn't sleep that night. I thought, "Ha, there, Amy!" The next day, carrying my heart in my hand, I walked into the presence of the most beloved man on the face of the earth. The most beloved and the kindest. Natacha was there, too, and they explained to me that they wanted me to test for the part of Intellect. Natacha was using all types of women in this picture which starred Nita Naldi.

RUDY himself made me up—and to this day and hour," Myrna said, a tremble in her low-pitched voice, "to this very hour I think there has never been an hour so terrific, so thrilling as that hour when Rudy's hands worked on me, when Rudy's eyes watched me, when Natacha brought me her own clothes to wear, when they both stood by and helped me make the test—both so friendly, so kind. Wherever Natacha is now, and if she reads my life story, I hope she will know that I am remembering her kindness . . . and Rudy's . . .

"Well, and so the test was made. A few days later I went to see it. I walked into that projection room alive and I walked out of it—dead.

"As I watched my screen self, stiff, absurd, ugly, I thought. 'They've done all these things for me and I'm a complete flop!'

"Imagine . . . imagine what it meant to me, not only to know that I had failed, lost my chance—but that I had failed Valentino! If there could be any young fate more heart-breaking, more nerve-shattering than that I should not like to know about it."

But there is something sturdy and substantial about this girl who has played so many "exotics." The freckles on that bizarre and beautiful countenance are the little brown badges of her independence. They give the lie to the lotus-lily soul. She is not languorous, of the night-blooming species. The pioneer spirit of Grandmother Annabelle beats valiantly in her blood. When she is down she is down only long enough to draw a full recuperative breath and then—she goes ahead and does things.

She went home from that projection room and stayed in bed for two weeks. That was the recuperative breath. When she rose, recharged, she decided that she must go to New York to dance and find new fields. But before she could go, there must be the wherewithal to go on. And wherewithals were earned, not given. Perhaps she could get some extra work at, say, M-G-M. An extra didn't need to photograph beautifully.

Carfare was scarce in those lean days but fortunately Myrna was near enough to walk from her home to M-G-M. She found out where the casting office was, she entered it and, on those narrow wooden benches of hope so often deferred, Myrna sat patiently, long day after long day.

And there, again, the drama of this girl's story should smite the reader between the eyes. Her first entrance into M-G-M—as an applicant for extra work, a holder-downer of wooden benches. And now, a handful of years later, a star in that same studio, with the gates flung wide at her entrance!

Every now and again, in those days, a small wooden grille would open sharply and a man's cold eyes would slue about, eyeing the bench-sitters as though they were so many bolts of goods. Now and again his voice would bark, "Here, you Elsie de Smithers . . ." or, "You, there, in the black sateen, wanter work today?"

But no one called, "Here, you . . ." to the thin girl called Myrna Loy.

And then, one long day later, when funds were ebbing low and hope was having to fight for its life, the grille opened and the fateful voice boomed out, "Hey, you over there in the blue suit, wanter work?"

And Myrna said, "Oh, yes—yes, please—"

And she entered the portals of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer.

What did she find awaiting her behind those magic doors? If you make seven guesses they will all be wrong.

venture. Quite to the contrary. Her next picture will be "Top Hat" again with Fred Astaire. You can write her at the RKO-Radio Studio, 780 Gower St., Los Angeles, Calif. (Aside to Mrs. N.—Never heard that story, but it may be true.)

BETTY HAYES, Germantown, Pa.—Helen Hayes was born Helen Hayes Brown, in Washington, D. C., October 10. She is 5 feet tall, weighs 100 pounds and has brown hair and blue eyes. Cary Grant's birthday is January 18, and he is 6 feet 1 inch tall, weighs 172 pounds and has black wavy hair and brown eyes. Leslie Howard, born in London, England, on April 24, 1893, is 5 feet 10 inches tall and weighs 145 pounds.

ANNIE DICHIARA, Sacramento, Calif.; RAY MORRISON and MARION TRIGILI, Philadelphia, Pa.; CAROLINE WALTZ, Palmyra, Pa.; GLORIA KOHL, Cincinnati, Ohio; D'ARCY FALLER, Carlisle, Pa.; MARY MONTOYA, Long Beach, Calif.; WALTER P. LEN; CAROLYN JURIS, Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; H. A. REED, Cass Lake, Minn.—From the listing above, one would almost think that Pennsylvania had an option on George Raft. However, that's beside the point, and Mr. Raft has had such an interesting life, we'd better get to it. Born in New York, September 27, of French, German and Italian parentage, George attended public school in that city. When he was 15 he became a boxer, and as a bantam weight fought for two years in the leading clubs of New York without particular success. He next tried baseball and was signed as an outfielder on the Springfield (Mass.) Eastern League team but was dropped after two seasons because his batting average was pretty grim. On his return to New York he secured employment "hoofing" at tea dances. Then came stock companies followed by musical shows in which he danced with Elsie Pilcer. Europe called and George became the highest paid American dancer ever to thrill Continental audiences, and he became known as one of the world's fastest dancers. On his return to New York, Raft danced in innumerable night clubs and motion picture theatres, until he was induced to go to Hollywood to play in "Quick Millions." The role of the gangster in "Scarface," though, was what brought him his Paramount contract. He is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 155 pounds, has an olive complexion and black hair and brown eyes. His hobbies are baseball, dancing and boxing. He is separated from his wife and has been going around with Virginia Pine for over a year now. Although he does not give his age, I would estimate it to be around 30. His next picture after "The Glass Key" will be "Every Night at Eight" with Alice Faye and Frances Langford. You can reach him (and get his photograph for 25 cents) at the Paramount Studios, Hollywood, Calif.

A. L. SALYIERS—Shirley Temple's next picture will be "Our Little Girl" followed by "Curly Top." Kent Taylor's most recent opus is "College Scandal" and Ray Milland is in "The Glass Key" and his next will probably be "The Last Outpost." Kent Taylor was born in Nashua, Iowa, and Dick Powell in Mt. View, Ark.

PEGGY FISH, Newtonville, Mass.; ELLEN F. CROWE, New York City; ALMA REISINGER, Newark, N. J.; BETTY GRAHAM, San Francisco, Calif.; M. J. Detroit, Mich.; VERA BROWNING, St. Louis, Mo.; LUCILLE CAMPBELL, Wash., Pa.—Robert Taylor, a newcomer, was born in Filley, Nebraska, the son of Dr. S. A. Brough, a physician. Later the family moved to Beatrice, Neb., where the boy was educated in public schools. He attended college at Doane, Neb., for two years and finished his course at Pomona, Cal., where, in addition to his outstanding dramatic work, he was a star tennis player. During the summer he played in productions given at the Hollywood Playhouse. After signing his studio contract Taylor completed the remaining months of his college course and graduated with a Liberal Arts degree. At the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studio he went into training for screen work and now that he has begun to get good parts, is being groomed for stardom. His favorite sports are tennis and horseback riding. He plays the cello and the piano, owns a collie dog and his hobby is collecting different types and colors in sweaters. He owns about fifty of them. His pet aversion is black cats, and he is a firm believer in hunches. Six feet tall, he weighs 165 pounds and has brown hair and blue eyes. He is not married, but is much in demand. After "Murder in the Fleet" he will be seen in "Broadway Melody." Write him at the M-G-M Studios, Culver City, Calif., and for 25 cents he'll send you a photograph. (Note to all readers: 25 cents is the price usually asked by the stars for their photographs. This is to defray mailing costs.)

HOWARD D. RICHARDSON, Haddon Heights, N. J.—The part of Louise Beaver's daughter in "Imitation of Life" was played by Freddie Washington, a negress. She did a marvelous bit of acting in that piece, and certainly deserves a good part in the near future although none are scheduled for her as yet.

Tonight... make this "ARMHOLE ODOR" TEST

No matter how carefully you deodorize your underarm—if any dampness collects on the armhole of your dress, you will have an unpleasant "armhole odor"

FAILURE TO SCORE a social success cannot always be attributed to a lack of personality. Often it is due to a condition that makes even sincere admirers turn away.

No matter how sure you are of yourself, make this simple test. Tonight when you take off your dress, smell the fabric at the armhole. That stale, musty "armhole odor" may be an unpleasant surprise.

Perhaps you thought you were sweet and dainty because you were using a cream or stick deodorant. But these easy-to-use preparations do only half the work needed. They deodorize, but they are not made to keep that little closed-in hollow of your underarm dry.

No Quick and Easy way!

THERE is no quick and easy method to prevent "armhole odor." When you deodorize only, moisture still collects on the armhole of your dress. And every time you put on that dress, the warmth of your body will bring out a stale, unpleasant perspiration odor. Women who want to be sure not to offend have learned always to take the extra minutes needed to keep the underarm sweet and completely dry—with Liquid Odorono.

Entirely Safe...

YOUR doctor will tell you that closing the pores in the small underarm area is absolutely harmless. Odorono gently draws the pores together and diverts underarm perspiration to other parts of your body where it quickly evaporates without giving offense.

With Odorono, you are entirely free from "armhole odor." You can be really unself-conscious—your most charming self. You need never again wear hot, bulky dress shields or be humiliated by wrinkled blouses or stained coat linings.

Odorono comes in two strengths. Regular Odorono (Ruby Colored) requires only two applications a week. Instant Odorono (Colorless) is for especially sensitive skin and for quick use. Use it daily or every other day.

On sale at all toilet goods counters. If you want to insure complete daintiness, send today for sample vials of the two Odoronos and leaflet on complete underarm dryness.

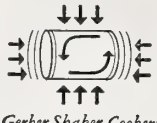
SHAKER COOKING

Wonderful new Gerber process gives Baby finer, fresher-tasting

Strained Vegetables

OPEN a can of the new Gerber Strained Vegetables! You'll find them brighter colored, fresher in flavor than you ever dreamed canned vegetables could be.

They're cooked a new way, developed by Gerber after two years of research. Shaker-Cooking stirs the foods 140 times a minute, as they steam-cook in the sealed cans. It takes as little as 15 minutes for thorough heat distribution this way. By methods in general use, it would take 4 times as long and the food on the outer edges would be much overcooked and far less appetizing.



Now, with Shaker-Cooking, every particle is evenly cooked, finer-flavored, brighter-colored . . . better than ever for Baby.

Specially Guarded for Baby —from Crop to Can

All Gerber Strained Products are prepared with extraordinary care for Baby's own requirements. Vitamins and minerals are protected as they can't be in ordinary home preparation. Vegetables are fresher, richer in vitamins. In every process air is excluded to lessen vitamin loss. Moisture is regulated—to save the minerals poured off in water. Your baby gets more vitamins and minerals than if you cooked and strained his vegetables at home. You save tiring work—have more time for Baby. Baby gets the finest vegetables the year round. Unseasoned for serving as they are. Or serve slightly seasoned as taste or your doctor directs.

In ordinary canning, food nearest heat is overcooked before that in center is sterilized.

Gerber Shaker-Cookers stir the food while cooking—cutting cooking time 60%—cooking every particle evenly.

it is a perfect way to dress up a last summer's evening gown with but slight expense.

I ALWAYS love to talk to some of the younger stars about their clothes. Not long ago I had quite a chat with pretty, young Rochelle Hudson. And if you think Rochelle has namby-pamby fashion theories, you are wrong. She's one young girl with decided views as to her likes and dislikes. She hates ingenue clothes, but on the other hand, she doesn't go in for slinky, sophisticated trappings either.

Here is an idea of what she likes to wear best. She loves shirtwaist dresses, pajamas (of the tailored, slacks type) and she adores anything piqué. She doesn't like bathing suits—and this is amazing when you notice what a charming figure she has. Light blues, natural color and pastels are favorite colors. She prefers not to wear white because she thinks it is impractical and does nothing for her coloring. Rochelle has hazel eyes and dark hair, with the sort of skin poets go dotty about.

Rochelle doesn't like evening gowns that have too flaring skirts. She thinks they tend to shorten her and give a girly-girl look. Her pet evening gown, which she dragged out like a fond mother showing her nicest child, is a soft gray crêpe made very slender and with a cascade of pink ruffles down the back of it. Over this goes a pink silk piqué jacket with a peplum flare to it.

"I really don't like clothes, you know," Rochelle told me as she dragged out one attractive costume after another. "I hate puffs and ruffles and if I get a dress that I really like, I wear it till it drops off! Like this one I have on—truly, it is three years old and Mother simply dies every time I put it on."

THE dress was a simple navy blue affair with white vestee. Rochelle said she changed it every season with a new vestee and cuffs. Actually, though, I think she does like clothes very much. Certainly her large and attractive wardrobe would indicate it—unless, of course, her mother makes her dress the part of a smart young star. When you think being a young star like Rochelle is the only life, just let this statement from Rochelle give you pause for thought. She had to test ninety-seven different costumes for her role in "Imitation of Life!" Every one was tried on and inspected by the director, who can't tell what a gown will look like in a scene merely from seeing the designer's sketch. Finally, only three costumes were used, and one of these, which had been selected in a Los Angeles store and had been returned, had to be bought back from a customer who had taken it upon its first rejection from the studio. Does that sound like a snap existence to you? No wonder Rochelle says she doesn't like clothes!

To get back to this business of being cool. If you have leisure time for hot days, you can relax in clothes like those shown on page 50.

The Ralph Forbes (she's Heather Angel, y'know) and the Robert Youngs at the Beverly-Wilshire. Isn't Bob the devoted husband?

MAUREEN O'SULLIVAN relaxes in the sun at home. Her rough linen dress has a divided skirt and a deep backline for sunning. It is pale yellow, while her brimmed hat is bright red to match the woven lacings of her barefoot sandals.

Temperatures soaring outside, hot studio lights beating down inside, couldn't possibly faze Pat Paterson in her airy negligee of satin candy-striped chiffon. It is the perfect thing to put on when you arrive home both hot and tired. It has enough formality to appear as a charming dinner costume at home—it is so light and sheer that it couldn't make you feel anything but cool. The shirred shoulders topping the full sleeves are a nice detail, as is the pleated collar. Pat's hair tied back with a little bow is an attractive way to keep your hair off your forehead on a hot day.

All you have to do is to mention Mona Barrie's name to any of the Fox designers and they are off! They may disagree privately as to the length skirts should be, or the line of a new sleeve—but when it comes to Mona they are unanimous in their vote for her chic! I was talking only yesterday to Miss Templeton, one of the Fox designers who had been abroad for three months. She said that Mona Barrie is a joy to design for because she not only wears clothes well, but she has an innate flair for smartness. She added that she dresses as smartly in private life as she does on the screen. Miss Templeton, by the way, is the young lady who achieved designing fame when she was Ann Harding's private secretary. She had designed clothes before going with Ann but had not told Ann anything about it. And it wasn't until Ann came upon her one day, scribbling sketches on the telephone pad as she phoned, that Ann discovered she was very clever. From that time on, Ann let her design more and more of her personal wardrobe until finally, she became so good that she started off on a career of her own and achieved success in a short time.

BUT back to Mona. René Hubert designed this charming linen jacket costume she is wearing on page 50. It shows a peasant influence with its contrasting appliques on the pockets of both the jacket and the dress. Coarse blue and white linen are used in clever contrast for both the dress and jacket. And her hat is felt and the same linen in similar contrast effect. Note the barbaric bracelet on Mona's arm.

Carole, spending all her spare moments beside her pool, wears a typically smart Lombard costume. Her navy blue and white polka dotted shorts are topped by a long white linen coat which has revers of the print. Her hat is white leghorn with a navy band.

And for a last refreshing fillip to our pictures, we offer you Kathleen Burke, flowers in her arms, and quite the coolest and loveliest looking thing in pale pink dotted Swiss. Kathleen uses this as a sort of super garden party frock, but it would be just the thing for your country club parties all summer. Notice that her hair is curled high on her head, further adding to the summery and very desirable cooling effect.

If you have any fashion questions you wish to ask me, just send a stamped, self-addressed envelope with your request. Write to Adelia Bird, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

THE WORLD looks pretty rosy to this little lady.

She gets Fletcher's Castoria for a laxative. And she loves it! It is one laxative every child takes willingly!

And that's very important! For if a youngster hates the taste of a laxative and struggles against taking it, her nerves are upset by the struggle. And her stomach may be upset also!

So pleasant taste is one of the important reasons why Fletcher's Castoria is the right laxative for children . . .

Here's another:

Fletcher's Castoria is designed just for a child's system. It contains no strong, purging drugs such as some adult laxatives contain.

It is safe for delicately-balanced young systems. It will never, never cause griping pain. It is gentle but thorough. And it is not habit-forming.

Whenever your youngster needs a laxative—from babyhood until 11 years old—turn to Fletcher's Castoria. Look for the signature Chas. H. Fletcher. And save money—buy the family-size bottle.

No Success as a Playboy

"Ah," murmured Bill, as he was just getting up one afternoon at half past three, "this is the life. It's wonderful! I'll never go back to Hollywood."

The people—they were grand. They knew he was a movie star but it didn't impress them much. They accepted him, not because he was famous, but because he was a good sport and so obviously fitted into their way of living. And a luxurious living it was—a quick dip in the ocean, a stiff game of tennis, a couple of drinks, a wonderful, well-planned dinner and then, as evening settled, the inevitable hunt for romance. And the finding of same.

There were no crowds of autograph hounds following him wherever he went. In just a few weeks, it seemed, he had stopped being a movie actor and had become a playboy. Well, he had earned the right to live as he chose. This was real living—carefree, leisurely, mad living. Hollywood could go and jump in the lake.

IT was grand for several months. And then, at a party one night, he met a boy about twenty-four or five whom Bill liked very much. They began to talk. Bill asked the boy what he did. For answer he got a look of amazement. "I mean," Bill explained, "what's your job." "Job?" "Well, your career, then," Bill amended.

The boy laughed. "Oh, I haven't any."

"But what do you plan to do?" Bill persisted.

"Why should I plan to do anything?" the lad asked, and called for another drink.

Bill thought about that and it was particularly amazing in the light of the fact that he had been told that this boy, who was a real German baron, was practically penniless. Yet there he was, at twenty-four, without a job or without any plans for getting one.

Bill could not help but think of himself at twenty-four, and much younger, playing in miserable theatres, changing shows every week in a stock company, working like a dog to earn the right to enjoy life. And here was this boy, veritably living off the bounty of others, without the faintest idea that he owed himself — and the world—some obligation.

Bill strolled out on the beach and thought, for the first time since he had been on the Riviera, about Hollywood and all its hard working people, its people who had pulled themselves up by their boot-straps, who very truly were fulfilling their obligations.

He went back to the party. No, he had sworn he was going to retire. Damn it, he had retired! He wouldn't think morbidly. Hollywood could go and jump in the lake.

But during the next few weeks he had to face the fact that he was being bored by the Riviera. He told himself over and over again that he had no desire at all to go back to work. All he needed was a change of scene and he tried to put out of his mind the fact that when he came to the Riviera he thought it was the garden spot of the world and that he should never leave it.

He and a group of his friends decided that they would tour the chateau country. In a smart French car they began the journey through that magic country where tradition practically hangs from the branches of the trees.

Bill learned a great deal on that trip. He learned what wines wouldn't travel, he learned at just what temperature champagne should be, he learned exactly what an eight course French meal should contain. But he didn't see the chateaux!

HE ate and drank his way through that miraculous country. It was really silly, his companions told him, to bother with the chateaux when there were so many entrancing restaurants and so many delightful bars.

And perhaps it was better that Bill didn't look at the chateaux. They might have reminded him of movie sets. And they might have reminded him that people had worked to build them, that skilled craftsmen had designed and executed the magnificent tables, chairs and tapestries they contained. And it might have occurred to him that in these palaces had lived people who, at one time, had done the world's work.

Yes, it was better to eat and drink and be merry. But Bill couldn't be merry for long. He could not crowd these thoughts out of his mind and one morning—or afternoon, rather—when one of his friends banged on his door and said it was time to get up and have a cocktail, Bill said he couldn't come along, that he had a lot of packing to do and that he had to see about getting his ticket on the boat that was to take him home.

At first, of course, they didn't believe him. And he did not try to make them understand that a man who has worked as hard as Bill had must keep on working if he is to stay alive. He could not tell them that this sort of living was all very well for a few months' good time but that it could not fill a man's life, that if it were made his entire career, madness was ahead. It was better to leave these things unsaid. Bill knew them now and that was enough.

When they saw he was in earnest about returning they gave him a marvelous farewell party. It lasted for days and Bill was passing the Azores—or some odd place like that—when he actually realized that he was on his way "home" and glad of it.

And that was how Bill Powell became a playboy—and then stopped being one to return to work. He is glad he made the experiment. He is perfectly content now. Studio grief? Of course, he has plenty of it. Early morning calls? Every day when he's working. Long, hard hours under the lights? You bet! And Bill complains and grumbles as everybody on any job always does. But he had to come back. The life of a wealthy, retired motion picture actor living on the Riviera could never be complete. Bill has always been a working man. "And I'll always have to be," he said, "so don't be surprised in the next ten or fifteen years when you see an old bearded character man doddering before the camera, if he looks like me. It will be me. Any job gets on your nerves. But any job is better—and take it from one who knows—than no job at all."

back at him. Imagine a baby laughing at five months, three days, and five hours old! It's almost unprecedented. And he says, 'Ma-ma' and 'Da-da,' too! Of course that's all he can say yet, but he says that all day long. Starting at about five in the morning. . . .

"Oh, of course he wakes us at five in the morning. And we love it! It used to be that we most often were going to sleep at five—whereas we now wake up at five. Oh, no! We never argue about who's going in to see if he's all right. We both get up and go in. Why, I wouldn't miss a minute of my baby—not those I don't have to miss. It's bad enough being away from him at the studio all day long. When I'm working, I always play with him from five to six in the morning. Then I have to get dressed and have breakfast, to be at the studio by seven-thirty. Then, when I get home at five-thirty in the evening, I have a half hour more with him before he goes to bed.

WHEN I brought him home from the hospital, we put him in the downstairs nursery which we had fixed up for him. But we didn't like being so far away from him, so George and I slept downstairs on the couch for a while. But that was a bit inconvenient, because our things still had to be kept upstairs. Now we're having the house remodeled so that the nursery can be right near us.

"Wait till I tell you about the room we are fixing for him now! It's a regular college boy's room, only on a small scale. I've ordered a miniature desk for him, with a miniature world globe on it. On the wall there will be college pennants, only scaled down, of course. And you know those silly signs that college boys always collect and hang on their walls. Well, we're having some of those made now, in miniature. One is a 'Don't Disturb!' sign. Another says, 'Men at Work.' You know . . . crazy things like that. Everything is going to be exactly like a college boy's room, only in baby size . . . even down to the pictures of girls that are always pasted around. Only I've cut out the grown-up girls' faces, and pasted little-girl faces in, instead!"

Husband George Barnes joined us at that moment, and, putting in his two cents, worth, said, "Yes, and when he grows up, he probably won't even want to go to college!"

"It won't matter. He's going to do and be just what he wants. We're not going to run his life for him. We agreed on that, didn't we, George?"

"Yes, only it would be a shame for him to become a plumber or something like that, since we gave him a middle name."

"Yes," Joan explained. "He's not just to be Norman Barnes. It's Norman Scott Barnes. I think three names always sound so much more important—like George Jean Nathan, you know."

In case you haven't heard . . . little Norman was named after Norman Foster (Claudette Colbert's ex-husband). Norman has always been one of Joan's and George's very best friends. And he is their baby's godfather.

"George didn't want the baby to be named after himself, because George is a Junior, and to have three George Scott

Why?

There is just one reason. She's careless about herself! She has never learned that soap and water cannot protect her from that ugly odor of underarm perspiration which makes people avoid her.

She has nobody to blame but herself. For it's so easy, these days, to keep the underarms fresh, free from odor all day long. With Mum!

Barnes would really be too much for any family tree. Besides I think it's a good idea to give a baby a fresh start in life by giving him a new name.

"Even if Norman had been a girl, we were only going to give her my name as a middle name. The first name would have been Georgia. Georgia Joan Barnes."

Before the baby was born, Mr. Barnes presented his wife with a beautiful bassinet for the baby. On it was a card which read, "To my baby, from your baby, for our baby!" Darn clever, these cameramen.

"And I've been getting presents ever since," Joan went on. "Having a baby really has other inducements, in addition to the baby itself. Look what George gave me the day the baby arrived!" Proudly she showed me the bracelet she was wearing on her arm.

IT was a charm bracelet (a fad which has become quite popular in Hollywood). But, instead of having odd and incidental charms hanging on it, the charms on this bracelet tell the complete story of the Blondell-Barnes romance. First, there are two tiny, diamond-studded hearts, welded together, that hang from the bracelet. Next, there is a miniature engagement ring. Then a diamond wedding circlet. Then a diminutive house. And last, but not least, a stork on the wing. The whole happy story in a bracelet! (Of course, there's nothing sentimental about these two.)

Then—the latest present—is a set of two beautiful bracelets which George had given her only that day. "Because I've been such a good girl," said Joan, beaming.

"No," said George, "because you let me photograph your new picture." (It's "Broadway Gondolier," by the way.)

"Oh well, it doesn't matter what for, only I think you're foolish to give me presents in between times, when we have so many more things to celebrate, now that the baby is here. There's Mother's Day—I can hardly wait for that—and Father's Day, and all the baby's birthdays, besides. It doesn't seem like enough!

"Did George tell you about the toy train apparatus that he's building for the baby? At least he claims it's for the baby . . . but I have my doubts. It's laid out in the cellar, miles and miles of tracks, it seems, and real trestles and bridges, and tunnels, and what not. And one of the most beautiful engines that you have ever seen. The same people who built the toy train exhibition at the World's Fair last year, are building ours. Of course it's a bit difficult on my nerves . . . the whistles shrieking and the house shaking as the train goes around the curves and all that. But the worst thing is that George spends half his time in the cellar now. I have to yell down the drain pipe to get him to come up to dinner.

"Oh, and the play yard! Wait till you see it! We're putting in a miniature tennis court, a small handball court—everything like a real gymnasium. Of course, he won't be able to play those games for a little while, though, at the rate he's going, it won't be long now.

WE haven't taken any movies of Normie yet . . . though we take snapshots of him every Sunday. They're all pasted into his baby book. And speaking of books, you have no idea how many there are, written on child psychology. I'm studying it as thoroughly as I can, and read every book I can lay my hands on . . .

"You know, there's a school at the University of Southern California where they take children as young as two and three years. They don't teach them anything, of course, except how to play . . . which is important, in itself. And they teach them good sportsmanship, and unselfishness.

"One of the things they do, for example, is to give a child a toy he likes very much, and then, just as he is about to start playing with it, the teacher says, 'Now dear, why don't you give that to Mary? I'm sure she would like to have it.' Great idea, I think. When Normie gets a little older we may enter him there—though I'm trying to practise some of their methods at home, right now."

At last I did get a word in edgewise. "All these books and modern theories on bringing up children, say something about not talking baby-talk to children, don't they?"

Joan tried awfully hard to hide a smile.

I dared to go on. "They say you shouldn't talk baby-talk to babies, or that is the first language they'll learn—thereby delaying their instruction in proper English. You don't talk baby-talk to your baby, do you?"

Now Joan was really grinning. "Oh, you can't help it, once in a while!" she admitted!

Modern Screen's Dramatic School

luck and had to take a job in a restaurant. There, Dorothy Dell, who had been her best friend and her roommate in New York, discovered her and shortly thereafter persuaded Paramount that what Zee didn't know about charm just wasn't in the book and that the studio would reap a reward if they put her in charge of training the younger players to have poise. For a year, now, that's been her job. And these are her poise secrets, which she passes on to you gladly.

"WALKING naturally and gracefully is an art," she says, "and often has to be acquired. It is very important in gaining poise. Here's the routine that I've found works best of all.

"Place shoulder, head, hips and heels close against the wall. If you start out in this position, you cannot help but walk gracefully and correctly, as the arms will have a natural, easy swing.

"Then place a basket containing anywhere from one to three books on your head. If your posture is fair to start with, you'll need only one book. If you stoop badly, use three. Now walk across the floor ten times, keeping the basket steady on top of your head.

"Correct posture while sitting is important to the amateur as well as to the professional dramatic student. If you let the hips touch the back of the chair at all times, you cannot help but sit properly.

"You should never cross your legs while sitting. The feet should be flat on the floor, with one foot slightly extended. It may be the right or the left foot, depending upon which is the more natural position. In this way it is perfectly easy to rise from your chair and it is one of the little tricks of stage technique which all professionals use. Try it.

"And now for your hands. I have found that dancing is the best method of enabling you to become unconscious of your hands. The best dance for this purpose is the Hawaiian dance. Begin by sitting on the floor and imitating the hand movement of the Hawaiian dancer. It is the old childhood game of 'Peas Porridge Hot,' but instead of holding the hands stiff when patting the knees and making the outward movement, keep your hands flexible at the wrist.

"For the body and the feet, the waltz and the two-step, done properly in the old-fashioned way, are excellent. You may practise this dancing alone, using your arms gracefully as you dance, and dropping into a little curtsey at the end.

"But in order to have perfect poise and charm you must have complete control of your body and that can be had by doing simple exercises. I'm going to give you the ones most necessary. Start out gradually at first and add more and more as you go along.

"Bend from the waist and allow the palms of the hands to touch the floor. Do not try to do this the first time. Work up to it easily and gradually.

"Place the hands a little below the hips and twist the body around from left to right in a complete circle. Then from right to left.

"Place the hands on the hips. Bring first one knee and then the other up as high as possible for ten counts. Then repeat, bringing the knees up from the side.

"Place hands on hips and bend backwards

Keep your BABY SAFER

THIS NEW WAY—AS HOSPITALS DO

"WITHIN the last few years, hospital nurseries have discovered a way to keep babies lovelier, happier—and, above all, safer. Of course, you want your precious darling to be just as safe at home as during the first days of his existence in the hospital. So, mother, do as hospitals do: use Mennen Antiseptic Oil all over baby's body, every day; and, later, when baby becomes older, use Mennen Antiseptic Borated Powder.

"Then, you will be following the modern scientific method of protecting and caring for the baby's skin.

"More than half of all the hospitals important in maternity work now give their babies a complete body-rub, from head to foot, at least once a day with Mennen Antiseptic Oil. These hospitals have proved that it gives baby a lovelier, smoother, healthier skin—and that it keeps baby safer—'bathed in protection'—guarded against many infections. Thousands and thousands of doctors recommend it, advising that the daily oil-rubs be continued during at least baby's diaper age. So, mother, follow this recommendation for your darling's greater safety.

"Then, when you gradually discontinue the daily antiseptic oil-rubs, dust baby's body with the baby powder—Mennen Antiseptic Borated Powder. It's a superfine baby powder—prevents chafing—makes the skin satiny smooth—temptingly lovely—and, in addition, it's antiseptic. It continues to protect the skin against germs—as does the oil.

ten times. Then forward ten times.

"Stretch the hands downward as far as possible, touching the right hand to the left toe and vice versa.

"Lie flat on the floor and kick the legs up one at a time. Now lie flat on the stomach and kick backward over your head ten times.

LIE flat on your back and brace the hips with the hands and elbows, keeping the legs straight. Bend knees and start into a bicycle exercise moving faster and faster.

"Lie on the left side and kick upwards with the right leg. Alternate.

"Place hands on back of chair, turning sideways. Kick outward with the leg as far as possible. Alternate.

"Now run around the room three or four times in the manner of a professional sprinter with the arms and legs moving violently. This gives a natural swing to the body.

"These exercises should be taken for an hour each day, preferably before eleven A. M. And when you have complete control of your body, you will not need to envy anyone poise and grace.

"But, above all, remember always to be yourself. Don't try to imitate anyone else, no matter how attractive that person is. Capitalize on your good qualities and try to correct the bad, but don't lose your own personality. After all, it is that quality which in the long run constitutes charm."

Well, there you are! I think that is grand and most practical advice from Zee Silvonia. Certainly, she answers all the questions you raised this month. But if there are any more just step right up and ask them. Address your letters to Katherine Albert, MODERN SCREEN'S Dramatic School, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y., and don't forget that self-addressed, stamped envelope for reply. Otherwise I can't answer you.

And now how about forming a dramatic club of your own? All you need to do is follow instructions given on the coupon below. The folks who have really begun their clubs tell me they're having more fun than they ever thought possible. Write and tell me how your club is getting along. And don't hesitate to ask me anything that will help you to gain a thorough knowledge of dramatic art!

Do you want to organize a dramatic club in your own community? Katherine Albert, the director of MODERN SCREEN'S Dramatic School, has prepared complete, detailed instructions about organizing such a club. Here is an opportunity to have a lot of fun and to do something really worth while. Fill in the information asked for below (please type or print plainly) and send it, with a stamped, addressed return envelope, to Katherine Albert, MODERN SCREEN Dramatic School, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Beauty Advice an extravagant number of them. Here's a list of the minimum traveling essentials: Toothbrush, dentifrice, brush and comb, deodorant (both liquid and cream), depilatory, hand lotion, small manicure kit (the ten cent store comes in very handy there), soap, cleansing cream, a good lubricating or nourishing cream, plenty of tissues and cotton squares, a skin freshener, talcum powder, face powder, a loose powder compact with rouge and lipstick, extra lipstick and rouge (both cream and dry), for compacts have a way of slipping out of hand, an eyewash, and your glamorous eye make-up aids tucked safely away as aids to conquests when you arrive. Cretonne bags that are lined with rubber are nice for the washrag and soap, and the breakable bottled cosmetics. Tubes, jars with covers tightly screwed on, and leakproof bottles are essential. I once made an attractive kit out of a candy box that was made to look like a book (you know the kind), and there were certainly a lot of make-up plots concocted out of it that summer. Use your ingenuity!

IF you're going to the seaside, there are other important accessories you'll need besides the ones I've mentioned. You'll want a big, roomy, waterproof beach bag for your towels, your sun oil, and so forth. You can make one yourself, but they're very inexpensive to buy. The thing to remember about your beach pursuits is that an ounce of sunburn and freckle prevention is worth a pound of cure, and two pounds of bemoaning to the mirror, "Oh, I'm a wreck. Look at me!" You will need a plentiful supply of protective oil, and for those more dressy occasions on the beach when you don't want to shine with oil, a good foundation cream, and plenty of powder in a darker shade than you generally use. Soapless oil shampoos are slick about keeping your hair from getting as dry as the back of the brush. Carole Lombard told me that they're favorites out in Hollywood. Frequent hot oil treatments are also advisable.

You'll want to give your toes the same attention you do your fingers since they'll be so conspicuous in beach shoes or evening sandals. Get out your manicure kit, and use manicure scissors for trimming the nails, emery board for smoothing the edges, and cake polish or toilet pumice stone to remove any nail ridges. Then apply liquid polish to harmonize with your fingers. However, it is well to avoid bright shades if your feet can't stand too close beauty inspection.

There are two things that I think most vacationers are inclined to neglect—the eyes and the feet. If your feet suffer, your face will suffer. Here's the most refreshing treatment I know of for feet that are worn out from sightseeing, but must go "on with the dance" in the evening. Stop by the corner drugstore and get some Epsom salts, and soak your feet in warm water in which you have dissolved a generous amount of the salts. Then wring out a small hand towel in cold water, wrap it around the feet, and then pass a piece of ice briskly over the feet until they tingle. Dry your feet, dust them with foot powder, and lie flat on the bed for five minutes, placing the pillow under your pedal extremities. This is a routine similar to that followed by the clever Ginger Rogers. You may not be able to dance like Ginger after this treatment, but you will feel like dancing the whole night through.

BRIGHT EYE IDEAS

by Jane Heath

SUMMER EYE-OPENERS

PROBABLY your face is a picture in your mirror at home—but how does it look on the beach in the sun? You have only to look at your friends to know! You can't trust nature unadorned! Sunlight makes eyes, especially, look pale, small and "squinched up." But that's easy to remedy! Slip your eyelashes into KURLASH! (It costs only $1.) A few seconds' pressure curls them into lovely fringed eye frames which catch entrancing shadows making eyes look far larger and brighter.

Sun Shades

So much color and sparkle in the sunlight! What can you do to keep your eyes from looking faded and "washed out" in contrast? This: apply a tiny bit of green or blue SHADETTE ($1) on the upper lids to reflect the colors of the landscape! So subtly, it restores the lovely color, depth, size of your eyes!

and Shadow

Beauty on the beach is simply the art of looking natural. Certainly eyelashes that disappear in the sun must be darkened! Liquid LASHTINT (it's waterproof) does the trick so convincingly! Use it more heavily in the evening. Black—brown—or blue. $1.

Kurlash

Jane Heath will gladly give you personal advice on eye beauty if you write her a note care of Dept. G-8, The Kurlash Company, Rochester, N. Y., or at The Kurlash Company of Canada, Toronto, 3.

HERE'S a grand treatment for your eyes, especially after coming in from the beach or after a drive against the sun. Pat a good nourishing eye cream on the eyelids or around the eyes. Then take two small pads of absorbent cotton, soak them in hot water, and lay them lightly over your eyes until they cool. Remove the pads, pat on a bit more cream, and again apply the pads which have been once more saturated in hot water. Lie back in a comfortable chair or on a couch during the cooling process, and relax so that you feel as limp as ZaSu Pitt's hands look. Finish off with a generous splashing of the eyes with cold water. Your eyes will sparkle as happily as your feet will dance that night.

Because we started out this article with a mention of "glamorous" vacations, we're going to make you a glamorous offer. Free for the asking is a special booklet all about the eyes, "Lovely Eyes." It tells you simply everything you've ever wanted to know about eye make-up. Learn the tricks of eye allure, and then maybe "over somebody else's shoulder, he'll fall in love with you" at the dance. Just fill out the coupon and send it in. And remember we're always eager to help you with your beauty problems. Send a self-addressed stamped envelope to Mary Biddle, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

Three Score Years and Ten

wonders why they didn't show that scene in the picture "Cavalcade."

Such are the memories of C. Aubrey Smith, and perhaps it is having lived in such an age that gives him, today, that fine old-world gallantry, that soldierly bearing, that substantial grip on life. For he lived in a time when the world knew dignity and decorum, when men were brave men or cowards, when women were good or bad.

And so the small C. Aubrey went to school at Charter House in London and, later, to Cambridge. And he was familiar with his father's surgery, to which came, as to an altar of healing, the lame, the halt and the blind, the rich and the poor. To the kindly doctor in his old-fashioned surgery they came, bringing their bruised bodies and their bruised hearts, sure of help and healing. And the tall young C. Aubrey watched and listened and decided that he could never become a doctor—pain was too painful.

Today, he will pause to care for a bird if he finds one wounded. He gives of his time, his purse, his heart to all who come to him for aid. He never leaves his house in the morning that he does not stop to feed with his own hand his birds and cats and dogs.

AND this seems as good a place as any to tell you about a very poignant experience I had in connection with C. Aubrey Smith. The day after I'd lunched with him in his dressing-room on the M-G-M lot I was in the studio again and was told that his valet was very anxious to see me. He did see me. His face was eager. We went into an empty office on the lot and he sat on the edge of his chair, a German, his heart in his eyes, and said: "Please, Madam, I wanted to tell you how wonderful he is. People don't know. I was there, in the next room, while you were interviewing him yesterday. I knew that he wasn't really talking about himself. He never does. He can't.

"He is a very great gentleman, a real gentleman. I have worked for other people, picture people, too, who pretend to be ladies and gentlemen, but Mr. and Mrs. Smith really are. I wish you could know, I wish the world could know, how kind they are. When I had influenza last winter I would wake up out of a fever three or four times a night and find Mr. Smith bending over me, rubbing my chest and back. And he was working at the time, too. He is so kind—and kindness to a servant in your house is the truest kindness of all. Believe me, Madam, I know. I am not married myself, but I often pray to my God that if ever I am, my marriage may be like Mr. and Mrs. Smith's. I have been with them for four years and I have never heard one word in that house that wasn't kind and affectionate. And she always must know when we leave the studio, so that she may have his Scotch and soda for him by the open fire. She is a real wife and he is a real husband. I hope you will forgive me, Madam, and I hope he will, but I had to tell you, so that you could tell the world what a great gentleman he is."

And I do want to tell the world. I also want to add that my eyes were pretty dim when this earnest young German left me, after paying his nervous, secret, painfully sincere tribute to an English gentleman.

AND so, as a young lad in his father's surgery, C. Aubrey knew that he could never endure the sight of constant pain. But he also knew that he would like to minister in some way to the human race, so badly in need of being ministered to. And somehow, curiously, the thought of the theatre came to him, there in that non-theatrical family atmosphere. He doesn't, today, know how or why the idea came to him. Certainly he does not think of it as a "mission in life." He is far too typically and reticently British for anything so florid.

While at Cambridge he became a cricket champion and, later, toured South Africa and Australia with his championship team. And with the tenacity of the man, which shows in every deeply graven line on that fine face, he still plays cricket, here in Hollywood, at the age of seventy-two. He not only plays himself but he has organized teams and clubs, conditioned and reconditioned cricket fields so that Boris Karloff (a friend of his) and Clive Brook and other Englishmen may still know spots "that are forever England."

Also while in Cambridge he went in extensively for amateur theatricals and became a member of the Brighton Greenroom Club. It was to this club that a London manager came one day in the year 1892 and, as C. Aubrey quaintly phrases it, "invited me to go on the stage."

He said: "One of my most vivid recollections is of the night in my father's surgery when I told him I had accepted that invitation. There was the silence of death in the room where, so often, my father had pronounced sentence of death. And now I was pronouncing it, the death of tradition, of all the things the crusading, doctoring Smiths had stood for. I still recall vividly my father's set face, my mother's shocked eyes, and hear, as though it were yesterday, her voice cry out tremulously, 'But, my boy, what will your sisters do?' The mere thought of two young Victorian maidens having to acknowledge a brother on the stage threatened dire disgrace. But life moves in a mysterious way," laughed C. Aubrey, "because my sisters preceded me on the stage, both of them! At any rate, my parents were, perforce, reconciled to this eccentric exodus of all their children, and I lived to see the day when my father sat in a theatre stall, applauding me and enjoying it hugely."

Most of the great plays of the past generation have carried the name of C. Aubrey Smith on their programs. He used, he says with a quizzical smile, to play the part of "the strong, silent man" a great deal. There were such immortal works as "Bootles' Baby," "The Prisoner of Zenda," "Lady Windemere's Fan," "The Notorious Mrs. Ebbesmith," "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray," "The Light That Failed," "Alice Sit By the Fire," with Ellen Terry; "Legend of Leonora," with Maude Adams; "Morals of Marcus," "Hamlet," "The Runaway," with Billie Burke; "The Lie"—plays which cover half a century and call the roll of the most glamorous names in the theatre world.

He first came to "The States" in 1895 with Sir John Hare in "The Notorious Mrs. Ebbesmith." Then again in 1904 with Forbes-Roberton, playing the Ghost in "Hamlet" and Torpenhow in "The Light That Failed." He loved Boston in those early days, but was homesick in New York. He made his first picture in England in 1915, starring in "Builder of Bridges." Then, after several other English talkies, he came to Hollywood in 1930, under contract to M-G-M, where he repeated his stage role in Marion Davies' picturization of the play, "The Bachelor Father." And he has been here ever since, free-lancing and moving his make-up box from one studio to another.

Jan Kiepura, of "Be Mine Tonight," will thrill you again with his delightful singing in "My Song for You." Aileen Marson is with him in this Gaumont-British production.

TAKE YOUR MIND OFF YOUR NOSE!

Any Face Powder

THAT NEEDS REPLACEMENT IN LESS THAN 4 HOURS ISN'T WORTHY OF THE NAME!

By Lady Esther

I get over ten thousand letters a week. Among them are not a few from men. And most of them have the same thing to say—or rather, the same kick to make.

It's this nefarious habit women have of constantly daubing at their noses in public and in private.

In a radio talk a few weeks ago, I said I wondered what young men think when a perfectly lovely girl takes out her powder puff and starts to dab at her face and here is the letter that answers my question from a young man of Detroit, Michigan, who signs himself simply "Dave."

"Dear Lady Esther: Your radio talk last night hit the nail squarely on the head. I know many of us would like to voice our opinion but can't. I hope you will repeat your message to the women of the world so often that not one will miss hearing you. What can be worse than seeing a woman using her make-up box in public, on the street, in the stores, at the table where she dines. Please, Lady Esther, I hope you will be the means of putting a stop to this."

Shiny Nose, No Longer a Bugaboo

There is no question that it is annoying, if not a wee bit disgusting, to see a woman constantly peeking into her mirror or daubing at her nose. It suggests artificiality! But to be perfectly fair to women there was a time when they were justified in worrying about their noses. The only face powder they could get did not cling or hold. It was no sooner put on than it was whisked off, leaving the nose to shine before the whole world.

But when I brought out Lady Esther Face Powder, I ended the bugaboo of shiny nose. Lady Esther Face Powder is distinctive for many things, not the least being that it clings! By actual timing under all conditions it clings perfectly for at least four hours, not needing replacement once in that time. Yet, as adhering as it is, it does not clog the pores. It goes onto the skin, but not into it.

In other words, while this face powder forms a veil of delicate beauty over the skin, it lets the skin breathe. This not only permits the skin to function, which is essential to true beauty, but it also helps keep the powder intact. This is one reason why Lady Esther Face Powder does not cake or streak on the face.

All 5 Shades FREE

You may have tried all kinds of face powders, but none like Lady Esther. None so soft and smooth. None so adhering. None so flattering. But I don't expect you to accept my word for this. I expect you to prove it to yourself at my expense! So I say: Accept a generous supply of all the five shades in which I make Lady Esther Face Powder. Let your mirror prove which one is the most becoming to you. Let your clock prove to you that this powder stays on for four hours or longer and still looks fresh. Mail coupon today. dry rouge
STAYS ON ALL DAY

. . . or all night!
Savage Rouge, as your sense of touch will tell you, is a great deal finer in texture and softer than ordinary rouge. Its particles being so infinitely fine, adhere closely to the skin. In fact, Savage Rouge, for this reason, clings so insistently, it seems to become a part of the skin itself . . . refusing to yield, even to the savage caresses its tempting smoothness and pulse-quickening color so easily invite. Try it. You'll see the difference instantly! Four lovely shades.

A TREASURE-TROVE of memory, this long, long road . . . the memory of Ellen Terry who never could learn lines . . . "none of the Terrys could learn lines," said Mr. Smith, with a tender reminiscent chuckle. "I recall so well when we were rehearsing Sir James Barrie's play, 'Alice Sit By the Fire.' We rehearsed, in those days, from six to eight weeks before we began to be ready. It was winter, I remember, an English winter, raw and cold, and Sir James would sit in front of the house, wrapped to the ears in a great coat and shivering, less from cold than from Ellen's inability to learn her lines. She had a habit of not taking her cues and then, of course, she would improvise a bit and go on. Ah, she was delightful, a delightful woman and a very great artist. At last, toward the end of those rehearsals, she went out to Sir James one day and asked him if he objected to her changing one of his cue lines. Then, for the first and only time during all those weeks did he utter one word. He said: 'I don't care what you say, Madam, but for God's sake say something!'

"And there was the kindness of Bernard Shaw who, of his own volition, cut one of his own plays to fit a program I was producing. We were giving a play called 'Instinct.' He came to see us, was impressed by 'Instinct,' realized that we had to cut somewhere to fit our time and suggested that he cut his own play for us, which he did. An unusual thing for an author to do, so willingly, so graciously. Great artists of all kinds," said C. Aubrey, "are usually temperamental, but they are invariably kind."

He remembers Maude Adams when they played together in "The Legend of Leonora," by Sir James Barrie, in 1912. "An obstinate little creature, she was," smiled C. Aubrey; "something of the schoolmarm about her. She always handed her cast little slips of paper with suggestions for the changing of a line, exactly like a schoolmarm handing out correction slips." And I gathered that Mr. Smith feels that the mystery of Maude Adams and her retirement is no real mystery at all, simply that with the passing of Charles Frohman passed, too, Maude Adams, the Trilby to that kind Svengali.

THEY say in Hollywood that the peak of a star's career is five years. How do you account for—for you?" I asked this grand gentleman.

C. Aubrey smiled that deep and tolerant smile of his. He said: "Luck has a lot to do with it. Sheer luck. I have always regarded my part of Torpenhow in 'The Light That Failed' as the most important single event in my career. And that was absolutely luck. I happened to be in a railway station in London one evening, on my way home after a game of golf. Sir Henry Forbes-Robertson and his wife were on the other side of the station, also returning home after golf. He was in the midst of casting for 'The Light That Failed.' He hadn't thought of me. His eye happened to light on me, across the tracks, and he called to me to come and see him. I did. And got the part. I was lucky.

"Luck and the love of what you are doing, these are the two things which make for a long career. And to be kind to those about you—grateful for favors received, earnest about your own part in things, so that people will want you about, will think about you warmly.

"I came to Hollywood and I have stayed here because it seemed to be good business to do so. I am not able to give the full-bodied characters I would like to give, but I enjoy what I do and I can always hope, of course.

WE are building our new home here, my wife and I, and we are taking great pride and pleasure in all of the details. We have many friends and we read and play bridge, and there is cricket . . . We had our home for many years in West Drayton, outside of London, in the vicinity of the fine old home of Oliver Cromwell. Our daughter grew up there. Our lives were rooted there and our memories live there. Then they tore down Cromwell's fine old lichened house and built hideous, semi-detached villas where a monument should have been. The gas station came in—the machine age, which is so convenient and so charmless—and our daughter married and a cycle had passed. The old life was gone and a new life is to be made over here. We are building our new home in Cold Water Canyon here in Beverly Hills, on the gentle crest of a hill because the sun sets so magnificently there—"

"The sun sets magnificently—"

As I shook hands with this grand old-young man of seventy-two, with the raking nose and the piercing gray eyes and the richly beautiful voice, as I wished him "bon voyage" on his trip to England, to be present at the birth of his grandchild, I felt my throat contract a little . . . "The sun sets magnificently . . . "

Edward G. Robinson, Prince Bernadotte, Frank Morgan and Jean Hersholt said, "Down the hatch."

Women Can Be Loyal

"You must have some ambition—"

"What good would ambition do me?" The girl waved crudely manicured hands toward the tiny garage, the only living quarters on the two and a half acres.

"You can work!" Ann said.

"I work here."

"Listen!" Ann grew impatient. "Let's sit down. Do you know who I am?"

The girl shook her head in negation.

"Well, I'm Ann Dvorak. I work in motion pictures. How would you like to work in pictures?"

The girl smiled. A slow smile. One which said, much more plainly than any words, "Don't be ridiculous!"

"I'm serious. I mean it. You are very much more beautiful than I am. You should have your chance. You just can't stay here the rest of your life. You can't! I can't let you. Now, if you'll agree to my proposition I'll help you—"

And that proposition was not easy. It was made more than a year ago. Today—

"You must do exactly as I tell you," Ann ordered. "To take a beautiful girl into Hollywood is a grave responsibility. I shall probably be sorry I did it. Hollywood is no worse than any big city, but it would be a grave responsibility for me to take a beautiful young thing like you into any big city. If I do it, you must be responsible to me. You must tell me every little thing that happens to you. You must remember what you owe me—not because of me but because of you. You will have to work and work hard. You will have to learn everything there is to know—how to wear clothes, take care of your hands, your hair, your face—and, above all, yourself. And you will have to let me show you. I don't know exactly why I'm doing this, but I just can't see anyone as lovely as you spend the rest of her life here."

AND that is how Helene McAdoo became the "stand-in," or double, for Ann Dvorak.

I suppose one would expect the next sentence to say: "And now she's an actress. She's a starlet. She's proven herself to be a dramatic genius—"

But she isn't. And that's what makes this story worth telling. At least, to me. She's still Ann Dvorak's double! Many, many people on the Warner Brothers lot will point her out to you as the most beautiful girl among them. They'll say, "Isn't it a shame they keep her being a double? She's prettier than any star in the business."

She began by dressing with Ann in Ann's lovely star dressing-room. Ann spent weeks teaching her how to put on make-up. Then she went to lines. "Now, Helene, although it will probably be a long time before you speak a line in a picture, you might as well begin to learn them now. I want you to take a script home and learn every word of my part. Then, while we are here in the dressing-room, together, you can say it for me."

Then there were the lessons upon conduct. For long months Ann drove the girl to the studio and took her home each evening. Helene's father, a retired army man, did not want his daughter in motion pictures. He had not wanted her to have dates with boys or take a position in the city. He knew the dangers which confront beauty. It had taken Ann Dvorak and Leslie Fenton many weeks to persuade this old-school father that motion pictures might spell opportunity. But when they had guaranteed her protection, he had consented. It was not until she had made five pictures that Ann agreed to her buying even a second-hand Ford and driving without her to the studio.

"There is no more need for a girl to do what is wrong in Hollywood than in any other place," Ann told the father and the girl. And added, to the girl: "It isn't that you would do wrong. But you cannot do two things at once. You cannot fall in love and have a career, too. Not in the beginning. You must make a definite place for yourself in pictures before you can think of husband or home. You are young. You are lovely. It is natural you should want romance. If you haven't the courage to turn it from you now—" Ann shook her head. "Look at the really successful actresses and check up on when they married. Before their first successes or after?"

Helene said she understood. It was easy for her to say that while her eyes looked into Ann's and saw visions of big cars, smart chauffeurs, tiled swimming pools and gleaming evening gowns. It was a simple thing to promise—then.

He was just an extra; socially like herself. He chanced to stand next to her on the set. Ann walked on. Helene turned to him. "Isn't she wonderful? Isn't she lovely? I never knew such a wonderful woman."

An innocent enough habit of this child—talking to anyone who happened to be near when she saw the one who had taken her from a garage on a chicken farm to the modern fairyland, called Hollywood. She always did it.

But he did not look at Ann, as Helene had expected. He looked at her; their eyes met. It was spring. Youth and spring. A combination Mother Nature intended for love.

HELENE did not go out with him. That is, not in the evening. But they did talk. They did have ice cream sodas. They did answer that springtime challenge.

Finally, with hundreds of people around them, he told her, "I love you. You love me—I know it. We must marry. We are only young once. We were made for each other. I am doing well. I shall have a bit in the next picture. You don't need to stop working for Ann; not altogether and not right away."

Then Helene told Ann the whole story. "I love him, Ann. We just couldn't help it. It just happened. What can we do about it?"

I wish we had a record of the talk between these two women—Ann, herself, so few years more than twenty! "I cannot decide this for you, Helene," she said. "It is your life. This crossroad comes to all modern women. Especially does it come to each girl trying to have a success in pictures. You can't do both. Not yet. No one wants you to promise never to marry, women should marry. But will this boy be the man you want, five years from now? If you go on to success, would you pick him? If you fail—" Ann sighed. "No one can promise you success, today. No one knows. You may fail and regret all your life you did not marry when love first whispered—"

Perhaps it is just as well we have no record of that night, when Helene had finished talking with Ann. Back and forth across that scarred linoleum on the garage-house floor. Ambition battling love. New to her, but as old as the stage itself, to those who have played upon it. Should Joan Crawford have married Michael Cudahy? She was little more than a Helene McAdoo when she was forced to the decision. Clara Bow and Gilbert Roland. Lupe Velez and Gary Cooper. Ah, we could go on forever. And those who had repudiated love and then failed in ambition? We have no records. They are not important enough to have records because failures are never important.

And the next day, Helene told him: "I do not want you to speak to me again, nor look at me, nor even think about me. I am going to take the chance which luck and Ann Dvorak gave me. I am not going to have even a date for five years. I cannot talk about it. I—I" And she ran to Ann, who understood so well that she did not speak, and she did not try to bring comfort when she knew there could be none immediately.

I TALKED with Helene today, in the little house which was once a garage. She did not know that she is to be put into stock and given lessons. I knew it, but I did not tell her. "In a year maybe," she told me. "I don't suppose anyone knows how much there is to learn about being an actress. Why, it took Ann years and years. Dancing lessons—everything. You just can't think of anything else. I don't know whether I'll ever get there!"

I don't know, either. Even Ann Dvorak doesn't know. She makes no promises. But Joan Crawford didn't know either when she gave Ann Dvorak a position as her stand-in—or Katharine Hepburn when she started Maxine Doyle in the same position.

Helene is Hollywood material in the raw. Her beauty is still as uncompleted as Joan Crawford's was when I first saw her. I can't tell you how stunned I was by the hour I spent with this youngster. Writing about Hollywood for so many years and still I had never realized the truth about our Cinderellas until this experience. Helene is a Cinderella. But she cannot become a princess overnight as even I, an old hand, had been accustomed to believe.

Perhaps I can explain best by saying, I went from Ann Dvorak's home to Helene's. Ann was in tennis shorts, eating breakfast. But even in shorts there was a glint, a polish, a smoothness about her that made you wonder if your own collar was quite straight and your shoes looked shined. And there was a poise, a control of muscles, expression, even attitude which made you sit a little straighter while you drank your cup of coffee. Of course, I didn't realize all this then. The poise, the smoothness, the lacquer was so natural that your reaction to it was equally normal. But it was only when I sat before Helene and watched the nervous little gestures of her hands, the self-conscious pitching of her voice, the obvious effort at ease that I understood about Hollywood Cinderellas. Every star I knew (who had not come from the stage) had been like that once. One after another they flitted across my memory. Ann, herself, when I first interviewed her. And she had finished "Scarface," too, and was the graduate of a boarding school; Jean Harlow, when I first saw her and she was divorcing a millionaire; Joan Crawford, with Broadway success to her credit; Norma Shearer, before stardom caught up with her. And suddenly I knew that polish is not natural but acquired. That stardom is not accidental but accomplished. That fame is not a come-hither proposition but the result of learning to wear well a golden slipper. And I knew that Helene McAdoo had told me a true story of Hollywood. If she can follow Ann's advice to the letter, and does not weaken in five years, she will have become a true Hollywood Cinderella. Today she is only one, a very lovely one, in the making.

Dick Powell would appreciate having that price tag removed with which Hollywood has labelled him, after acclaiming his as the biggest snap in the marriage market. Nor is Dick trying to strut the Prince of Wales stuff. He "jest ain't interested." And that's that.

That house he built lately set plenty of tongues wagging, but Dick claims that was just for the amusement of his friends. Well, it's plenty amusing. There's a disappearing wall in his library where Dick always serves drinks. He then distracts his guests' attention while the wall is rolled back, books and all. It's a swell way of economizing on liquor for the second round of drinks is invariably passed up.

Herbert Marshall revels in the role of strong, silent man on the screen. And non-pictorially, Mr. Marshall is still strong—but noisy; as evidenced by the rumpus he created in the Biltmore Theatre lobby, not so long ago. With Miss Gloria Swanson on his arm, he was beating a hasty retreat from the theatre, attempting a Garbo on the camera sleuths. He had outwitted 'em, all and just reached the door in safety, when one eagle-eyed photographer spied the couple, aimed his trusty weapon and shot. With a yelp of rage, Bert shook off Gloria and made a lunge at his adversary. "Gimme that plate, or I'll see that you lose your job!" he screamed, shaking the clever, young man 'til his clever teeth rattled. Now, the thing that has us puzzled is why a movie star should suddenly develop cameraphobia. 'Course, if there's good reason to be camera shy, that's his own affair—but why pick the Biltmore lobby to hide in?

You can't kid Bob Armstrong these days or get his goat either. The nanny was given to him and Bob is giving her the best of care. He's built a real Swiss goat house for his pet with elevated milking stand and all.

Paula Stone, of the "Stepping Stones" family, is headed now for a screen career. Recently she was rehearsing for a "short" out at RKO Studios, in a scene where she gets so huffy about her fiance's antics, that she pulls his ring from her finger and hurls it at him. Coming back from lunch on the day the real "take" was to be shot, Paula slammed her car door on her hand, with a result that all five fingers swelled up so that she could not even get the ring off! Make-up had to be applied over the ring, and another made, at least three sizes larger, for her to yank off in fury.

Helen Mack, the littlest girl with the biggest eyes in Hollywood, is at last honeymooning. Married last winter in an awful hurry to Director Charles Irwin, they planned to start their wedding trip that very weekend; and if you know anything a-tall about movies, you could appreciate the humor in such a situation. But the Irwins didn't see anything funny about it as month after month rolled by and still they could not get away more than a day at a time from their respective studios, and then never on the same day! But they're now in New York on a two-weeks leave of absence.

"YESTERDAY IS TODAY"

BY DOROTHY DOW

Some people are lucky enough to live their whole lives through without ever finding out that yesterday becomes today. Some people wake suddenly from a golden haze, to see a figure confronting them—a face from the past! Something forgotten and done with, suddenly come to life; something alarming, dangerous! A figure from Yesterday saying: "Ah, you can't forget me. You can't pretend that I didn't exist. Because I am here. I am something real." Could the past break up the one great love that had come to her?

Can a Man Be True to One Woman?

known that it was there and had never given it a thought. One night my valet was holding my coat for me and in some fashion the pocket inverted and the gold-piece rolled out onto the floor. We searched for it, casually at first and then with increasing zeal. The search became more and more futile. Until, finally, we were in a sweat of exasperation and the gold-piece had become the primary factor in our lives. We didn't find it and gradually I came to suspect my valet of having found it and concealed the finding from me. I began to suspect chance acquaintances who dropped in. Until at last that commonplace, unimportant little piece of gold assumed staggering proportions in my mind, tarnishing my relationships with my servants and friends, inciting me to suspicions I had never thought of entertaining before.

IT was not, mind you, the value of the gold-piece. For it had had no value to me when I knew that it was safe in my pocket. It haunted my dreams at night and preoccupied my mind by day only because I did not know where it was, only because I did not know who had it. It was rolling gold and it had become abnormally valuable to me because of this.

"So," said Paul, "so had that woman I had loved been rolling gold to me. I did not know where she was more than half of the time. I knew that she was flirting with this friend of mine or that. I didn't know which one and so," Paul smiled that worldly-wise, woman-wise smile of his, "so the woman who would hold a man must be rolling gold. Or he must think that she is. She must keep him forever a little uncertain, perpetually on his hands and knees, trying to find her. For, obviously, the man who is on his hands and knees searching for one woman has no time, no eyes and no heart to search for another.

"But that quality of elusiveness," said Paul, "is not enough. If that is all a woman has to offer it becomes tiresome in time. To be forever on your hands and knees becomes more than tiresome, it becomes ugly. No, the woman who would hold a man for all of his life must also be able to give to that man the sense of home.

"Perhaps few women realize it, but homing is one of the strongest instincts in the soul, the heart, the body of a man. Whether he be an adventurer, an actor, a digger of ditches, a Casanova or a Lincoln he will want, sooner or later, to go home. And to the woman who gives him home he will go, always, inevitably, at last. He may flirt. He may visit the exotic salons of exotic women. But sooner or later he will remember the days of his boyhood when, after a day's hard play he wanted to go home to his mother. And did go home. He will turn back, the grown man, instinctively, to the woman who gives him what once his mother gave, warmth and lighted lamps and food and peace and sympathy. It may be a case of 'I have been faithful to thee, Cynara, in my fashion;' but it is fidelity.

"In my marriage," said Paul, lowering his voice, "in this second and supremely happy marriage of mine, I have found the two qualities. And so when I tell you that even now I flirt, well, you may know that I am hopeless, a bad boy. Now I will tell another little story on myself to illustrate the fact that there is rolling gold in this marriage of mine. If I were wise I would not tell such a tale on myself. But what man is wise when he talks of woman and what man would want to be?

AT any rate, when I went to Europe last year I had to go alone because Daisy, my wife, had been very ill and was unfit to travel. While I was abroad I cabled her every other day and when I was ready to return I conceived one of those ideas which playwrights, such as Molnar and Schnitzler, use very successfully in their slightly naughty plays. I decided to stage a surprise return. To this end I had a friend of mine in Europe continue to send Daisy cables signed with my name. I reached New York and travelled to the Coast by devious means, planes and trains alternatively. I even chartered a special plane out of Texas in order to reach Palm Springs, where Daisy was staying, that much sooner. She had no idea that I had even left Europe.

"And so I arrived in Palm Springs late at night and drove at once to the apartment where she was staying only to be told that she had motored up to Beverly Hills that morning. The manager, recognizing me, allowed me to enter the apartment. Even then I was very nervous. Why had she suddenly gone to Beverly Hills? For what reason? I entered the apartment and found her bedroom door locked. Immediately I was seized with premonitory and melodramatic terror. Why was the door locked? Why? As frantically as once I searched for that bit of rolling gold I now searched for a way to enter that locked room. Finally, at risk of life and limb I managed to climb around the coping of the building and enter the room by the window. I looked about me, the look, no doubt, of one who expects to see a ghost. Finally, on her desk, I saw a scrap of note paper with some words written on it in her handwriting. With the horrid shamelessness of the suspicious male I read some such words as these, 'Thank you, dear, for all the bliss I have known in your embrace."

Paul laughed, a bit shakily. He said, "It was ridiculous. I had never had the shadow of a reason to suspect my wife of anything but the utmost fidelity, fondness, love. She had given me warmth and sympathy and affection and home. Perhaps because she had given me so much accounts for my unreasoning terror at any threat of losing her. Whatever the explanation, I was threatened with an actual vertigo! I felt sick and cold. My limbs were lead. I dashed out again, hired a car and drove like a madman all the way to Beverly Hills, making that insane run in less than two hours.

"I got to my house, rushed to my wife's room and all but frightened her to death! She couldn't, naturally, imagine who could be crashing in on her like that at the unholy hour of just-before-dawn. She began to scream and then when she realized that it was I, she sobbed and threw herself into my arms telling me of her relief, her joy at having me back again. And all the while I, still cold and sick, thought grimly, 'Ah, you behave like this when all the while I have this piece of paper in my pocket!' And then, unable to bear my choking agony in silence any longer I dramatically produced the piece of paper and confronted her with it.

"At first she was dazed. Then she began to laugh. Then she became, and rightfully so, indignant with me for daring to question her. She told me that the words were those of a popular song which Bing Crosby sang on the radio and which she had started to write down! Without further ado she arose, put a record on the victrola and while I stood stupidly by, played back to me the very words written on that scrap of paper. Then, carefully, as one explains a simple fact to a child, she told me in words of one syllable why she had locked the door of her room—because she had left some of her best gowns, hats and ornaments there and wanted to make doubly sure they would be safe while no one was in the apartment."

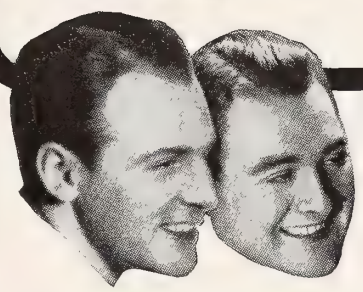
Paul smiled, a little shamefacedly. He said, "That is a sorry tale for a grown man to tell on himself, isn't it? And a man married for several years, too. But silly as I felt, there in the dawn, in my wife's boudoir, my sense of relief was greater. And this does make the point of our discussion—a man can be faithful to one woman for all his life, providing she gives him the illusion of rolling gold and providing she gives him . . ." Here his voice trailed off, suddenly.

DAISY LUKAS came into the living-room of the apartment at this moment. She promptly ordered coffee for us and some delicious little Hungarian cakes. She adjusted a shade so that the sun would be softer. She touched the vases of flowers here and there. She said, kissing Paul an affectionate good-bye, that she was off to house-hunt again. She remarked to me that they were tired of apartment life, they wanted a house of their own again, a spacious kitchen, a garden. She reminded Paul that he had an appointment with the doctor at five and then she was gone. She is young and tailored and trim, with clear gray eyes and a wide red mouth, and her slight Hungarian accent matching Paul's, is really charming.

When she was gone he said, "She has finished my story for me. I was about to say that a man can be true for all of his life providing he meets the woman who can give him the illusion of rolling gold and the sense of home. I have told you of the rolling gold. Daisy, without words, has told you of how she gives me the sense of home. And she does . . . in every phase of the relationship between man and woman, our marriage is perfect, and yet," and Paul made a self-despairing gesture, "and yet I am flirting, a little, here and there . . .

"It is like this: On the stage or screen an actor is only as good as the part he plays and the picture he plays it in. Consider 'Little Women' and my very small part in that—yet because the picture was so fine it did me more good than many a larger part I have played. I am now under contract to M-G-M and I pray not for stardom, not even for very large parts, but for small parts in very fine pictures. Parts that I can do justice to.



"So it is with fidelity, with marriage. A man is only as good as the part his wife requires him to play and the environment of home she creates for him to play that part in. There too, the role must be adapted to the man.

"That woman in Budapest—she was only the rolling gold. My first wife was an actress. She did not give me any sense of home.

"If a man meets the woman who gives both and meets her early enough in life he can be true—forever. I am convinced of that.

"I," laughed Paul, that naughty something in his gray eyes, "I did not meet Daisy early enough!"

shipboard, at the festival in Panama, in Cuba.

"These pictures are frightful of Frank," she said indignantly, letting her luncheon grow cold. "Look at this! And do look at this! Why in this one he doesn't even look shaved! He mustn't pose for the news photographers again. They never make him look himself at all."

There also were clippings, clippings which heralded this trip as a second honeymoon.

"A second honeymoon," Irene laughed. "As if there ever could be such a thing with the same man!"

I asked exactly what she meant. And she told me, as simply and directly and honestly as it is her habit to say the things she thinks.

"A honeymoon is wonderful, of course," she went on, smoothing her sweater contemplatively. "It's the time two people go off alone and do their utmost to remain alone. Not only because they are so new and exciting to each other. But because it is their chance to draw closer and prepare for the intimacy of the every day married life which lies ahead of them.

"However, feverishly romantic though it may be, it's also apt to be something of a strain. Because the two people haven't yet learned to relax with each other. Because they haven't had time to become truly good friends. Because they don't know all the little things about each other which only the intimacy and affectionate understanding of years brings."

She began pulling a great flat package out from behind the sofa, untying the cord, crackling the big stiff sheets of paper which wrapped it.

"It's much more fun to have been married for a matter of years, I think," she went on. "Then you have a dozen little agreements about some things and a dozen differences of opinion about other things. Then you know more of what the other fellow is thinking and feeling, irrespective of what he may be doing or saying for courtesy's sake or some other good reason. Then you're both interested in meeting new people and speculating about them later when you're alone. Then everything that happens to you, even a trifling event, is enriched by some similar thing you've already shared."

She had the package undone. In it were architect's drawings of a house to be built in Holmby Hills, provided the studios remain in Hollywood. Holmby Hills lies beyond Beverly and Bel Air. It is where Freddie March has built his charming new house. And where, just across from the Griffin acres, Claudette Colbert is breaking ground for her new home.

THERE was one view of the house from the front. Another showed the side and the patio. There were views of the lawns and gardens. And detailed views of the different rooms as they would look when the house was completed and they were curtained and furnished, with fires burning on their hearths and flowers from the cutting garden standing about in bowls.

"Home of Doctor and Mrs. Francis D. Griffin," was lettered on each drawing. Not "Home of Irene Dunne," mark you. And not even "Home of Irene Dunne and Doctor Francis D. Griffin." But what it really is to be, what their architect knew it would be after talking to these clients of his only a few times. For away from the studios, in spite of all her increasingly bright fame, Irene Dunne isn't at all the movie star, the celebrity. She is Mrs. Francis D. Griffin. First, last and always. Which undoubtedly has a great deal to do with the greatest friendship in the business world which I'll come to in good time.

I kept remembering, a day or two previously, when Irene had entertained representatives of the Irene Dunne Fan Club at a tea party. There had been a pretty girl there who came with the Yonkers contingent, a pretty girl of about fifteen, with eyes as deeply blue as the dress she wore. A dozen times that afternoon, with an adoring nod in Irene's direction, this girl had gone out of her way to explain "She's my aunt, you know!" And later when I asked her, "How does it feel to have a movie star in the family," Dorothea Griffin admitted with lovely naïveté, "Well, sometimes I wish Aunt Irene wasn't a movie star. I get jealous when I have to share her with a lot of people. Like this afternoon, for instance."

And I had thought that movie stars, if not prophets, sometimes are appreciated in their own countries, even in their own families. And that's something!

"You'll notice," Irene indicated the patio on the drawing, "that we've planned this as an extra living-room. We like to have breakfast outdoors on Sundays. And to read outdoors on warm evenings. It's enclosed on two sides by the wings of the house and on the third side by the loggia. The front looks out over the lawn straight to the ocean. See, the hill drops off here, just beyond our property. There never can be anything to block our view, to shut off the sea."

Frank Griffin won't be in California to live in that house all the time. Many months of the year he is obliged to be in New York where his practise is located. But it pleases him, sentimental as the next Irishman, to think of Irene in their home. And to look forward to the years ahead when they'll both find lives less busy and be there together all the time.

IRENE and I talked of her marriage. Of how she had taken what so easily might have become a marriage of inconvenience and shaped it into something fine.

"I admit," she said, "the separations are pretty lonely at times. They'd be unbearable, really, if it weren't for Frank's frequent telephone calls, put through after midnight when we can afford to talk much longer. But now that we're together for the time being, and I'm able to view our months of separation with some perspective, I'm not sure but that they haven't served us well.

"Perhaps if we'd been together all the time during the last four years we wouldn't be such good friends. Perhaps together all the time we'd have come to take each other more for granted; and find less zest in each other's company. How can anyone tell? Frankly, I'd almost be afraid to have things any other way than they have been. For fear it wouldn't have worked out as much fun.

"A month from now, of course, when I'm back in California and Frank is here and I'm missing him more than ever because I've just left him, you'll find me singing another tune. I'll be complaining that it's absurd for married people to permit three thousand miles to separate them. For the hysterical moment I'm even likely to be considering giving up my work. Although I know in my heart that I couldn't, that it's become too much a part of me."

As she talked I remembered some of the things which have forged the bond stronger between her and Frank Griffin. There was the time, some years ago, for instance, when she spent an entire Sunday rehearsing for her screen tests of "Cimarron" which she was to take the next day, although RKO were giving her these tests simply to please her, having no idea that she, a musical comedy star in their minds, could properly play Sabra Cravat.

On that day Frank Griffin remained with her closed in her room. He knew how much this meant to her. He watched the different effects she tried out and, now and then, helped with a suggestion. His cronies kept the telephone ringing constantly. They wanted him to join them on the links. Suppose Irene did have to work, that was no reason why he had to stay home. They didn't understand.

I also remembered Irene's frantic trip across the continent after the telephone call which advised her he had been rushed to the hospital for an appendicitis operation. At this time the newspapers insisted that, under cover of being in New York because he was ill, she had come on to ask for a divorce. Considering Frank Griffin's temporary weakened and depressed state those stories might have caused an upset. But because it was Irene who read him those stories, sitting close beside his bed, laughing, joking, meeting his eyes with her own eyes level, they could do no harm.

So it goes. It isn't, after all, so much the number of hours two people spend together as what they do with those hours. For with the years, her marriage to Frank Griffin has grown into that which can only exist in marriage and is at the same time the ultimate of marriage, namely the greatest friendship in the world.

Confessions of an Extra Girl

the heart of Hollywood was from Los Angeles. In Hollywood I went to the Plaza Hotel, because a friend of ours back East had stayed there. I left my bags and started out to look for an apartment.

When I signed the hotel register I wrote my name and then afterward wrote "actress," which will show you how silly I was. I get hot and cold when I think about that now and I wonder what that clerk thought of me.

THE next morning I moved into a cute little furnished apartment, for which I paid forty dollars a month. Before I unpacked I wrote on a piece of paper, "If I am not a star," and then I crossed that out and wrote, "If I am not a leading lady one year from today, I will go back home." The trouble was that I did not write the date down, so it is always a year from today. I am not a leading woman and that was five years ago. I am still in Hollywood—an extra girl!

I asked the lady at the desk of the apartment house how to get to Metro. At the studio I walked up to the gate and asked to see the casting director. He said that wasn't the right entrance and told me where to go. As I was standing there I saw a big black car drive up and I looked inside it and saw Garbo. It was strange, but I wasn't thrilled. I said to myself, "One year from today I'll be riding through this gate in a big car." Well, I did—and the car was bigger than Garbo's. It was a bus filled with extras going on location—and I was one of them!

ARE YOU SICK?

—Physically —Mentally
—Financially?

IF you are sick, whether physically, mentally or financially; if you are discouraged and if life has ceased to hold attractions for you; if you have tried everything without obtaining relief, then I have the answer for you. I can show you how to regain your health and self-respect, and how to gain prosperity—how to get what you want.

The answer is simple, definite, scientific law and unfailing. I have been the instrument through whom many have been saved and restored to happiness. I can do as much for you with my six "Lessons in the Law." This course of lessons is an original copyrighted system—nothing else just like it. It has stood the test of time. Hundreds testify to its effectiveness.

This is your chance—do not pass it up. Six lessons, complete, five dollars, sent postpaid; or, if you are doubtful, you may first send twenty-five cents for details and intensely interesting pamphlet, "Making Use of Heaven."

LUCY CARPENTER HARRIS
P. O. Box 1450-P San Diego, California

At the casting office they said I didn't have a chance. Then I went to all the studios and got the same story. I think it was about the fourth day and I was very discouraged when I met a woman at one of the studios who told me to go to the little company where I met the director I've already told about.

Now, maybe because I've told you that I'm still an extra after five years, you'll think that you're going to read all about how I struggled for a beginning, etc., etc., but my story is a little different from the average extra-girl story. I got into the movies with a bang—but the bang didn't keep up.

At this time long skirts were just coming in and only very ultra-smart women were wearing them. The rest of us had our hemlines just about at the knee. I remember that I had read an article in which Alice White said that no matter what other girls did she would always wear short skirts. And I thought I agreed with her.

One day I was coming home on a bus from Metro (I still persisted in going to the studios and begging for work) when a man came and sat down beside me and, when he spoke to me I thought that Dad was still right about Hollywood, because what the man said was, "You have very beautiful legs."

THAT, you must admit, is rather a unique way for a man to begin a conversation and I must say that I gasped and edged away from him because I was afraid of a repetition of the director episode.

Then he continued, "I'm an artist—a commercial artist—and I'm doing an ad for a local company—a stocking ad. Here's my card. Come to my studio tomorrow morning at ten o'clock. I pay a dollar an hour."

"But tomorrow's Sunday," I said.

"Yes, I know," he answered. He was a very handsome man with dark hair and deep brown eyes and I was afraid of him. I had heard of white slavery and all those things and besides I was in Hollywood to be an actress, not an artist's model. "I'm afraid I can't make it."

He shrugged his shoulders. "As you like, but if you change your mind come along." And then he moved to another seat in the bus.

He seemed so indifferent that I suspected a sinister trap. Besides, working on Sundays seemed most unusual. And just asking a girl in a bus to pose—well, that was all very irregular. So I had no intention of going to his studio. But fate meant otherwise.

That night when I got home and started out to do my little marketing I looked in my purse and discovered that instead of the ten dollars I thought was there there was only fifteen cents. I frantically searched in my coat pockets and everywhere that I might have put the money, but it was gone. Either my bag had been robbed or I had lost it. And here it was Saturday night, not a chance of getting into the bank until Monday, not a soul I knew to borrow from (even the woman who ran the apartment was away for the week-end) and I with fifteen cents. Besides, since I did marketing for several days on Saturday night, there was nothing in the house but some coffee—no bread, no sugar, no cream.

I looked at the artist's card and realized, from the address, that by street car it would cost me six cents to get there and another six cents to get back in case he wasn't there. So I went to bed that night having drunk just a little coffee (black) and woke up the next morning with my stomach growling.

At ten o'clock I presented myself at his studio and there had, I think, one of the most curious experiences of my life. How strange fate is! Had I not lost the ten dollars I wouldn't have gone to his studio. And going to his studio was the act that started my career in pictures!

some way, we accomplish that awesome distance from the bar to a couch. Bergner sits straight in a corner. She is meeting the press.

Schenck walks across with some things on a plate—tiny canapés of caviar, salmon, anchovies. Bergner looks at the plate. She doesn't ask what it is. Score one for Schenck.

The press are arriving. They are arriving in droves. Chairs are drawn up in a semi-circle around Bergner, sitting so quietly in the corner of the lounge. The chairs are placed so that one thinks we are shortly to play a parlor game and Bergner will be "it."

The press begin to ask questions.

"Who is your favorite actor?"

"I would rather not say."

They persist. "But surely there is no harm in mentioning your favorite. If we asked you to say which one you didn't like that would be different."

"No, no, I say no favorites."

But the press will not let her off. They are stubborn now. They insist she answer. Schenck insists.

"All right. I say my favorite. Charlie Chaplin."

It is like a name from the past. Suddenly it is as if the little man in his derby hat, his enormous shoes, his flexible cane is standing in the room. Charlie Chaplin. Why, we had almost forgotten that he existed. Is she kidding? No, you can look at her face and tell that she isn't.

"Diss ordeal," she says. "I have not slept for two nights. I worry about diss ordeal. For six years I have no interviews."

Ah, the ordeal, then, is meeting the press.

"And is it as bad as you thought it would be, Miss Bergner?" a reporter asks.

She looks at him straight. "Worse."

We feel uncomfortable.

Someone asks her about her new play, the one Sir James Barrie has written for her.

"I cannot say what it is like. I must not say. No."

"Is it a modern play?" someone asks.

"No, no, not modern."

"Is it whimisical?"

"No, no, not whimsical."

"Is it very dramatic?"

"No, no, not very dramatic."

Schenck, standing behind the lounge, leans over and asks, "Is it mineral?"

Now that is rather funny. But the crack gets a much bigger laugh than it deserves just because we all want to laugh and relieve the tension. We laugh. Oh, we laugh a great deal.

THEY try now to make her speak of her personal life. We edge our chairs forward.

"Do you like having your husband direct you in pictures, better than if someone else did?"

Bergner shrugs her shoulders. "I cannot say. No one but my husband has directed me."

That washes up Bergner's personal life.

"Are you going to Hollywood?"

"No, oh no, my contract is for Europe."

"Would you like to go to Hollywood?"

She smiles, "I feel dat I am not for Hollywood."

"Why?"

"I do not know. I cannot explain. To see it, yes, I should like to see it quietly. But work dere—no."

She has seen nothing of New York—only her hotel room, and the theatre—she cannot say whether she likes it or not. Many lies have been said about her. That she brought a cook from Vienna, (she did not bring a cook from Vienna.) That she spent her time between performances walking her dog. (Her dog is safe at home in Vienna.) True, that she is frightened of interviews. Will she wait six years to give another? It depends, she answers, upon the outcome of this one.

Her first performance of any play is always bad, she says, because she is so nervous. And she is nervous on succeeding nights if there is someone in the audience she knows. She is, you see, shy.

And yet as I sat there watching her, a little thing in an unbecoming frock, sitting in one corner of the couch, evading the questions shot at her by the hundreds of people sitting on uncomfortable chairs, it occurred to me as strange that anyone so truly shy would choose the acting business as a profession. For any girl knows that she must face people, that she is bound to be stared at, that she will be asked questions if she decides to go on the stage or appear before the camera. Are these shy ones then, really shy? Or are they—oh, perish the thought you wicked woman—just putting on an act?

Act or not, Bergner's is effective. The reporters next day after the "interview" described her as small, vivid, vital. They said she was nervous at first but quickly overcame it.

I sat there wondering if she really were nervous. Heaven knows, I'd be, having all those people sitting around staring at me. But I'm not an actress. I'm one of the ones who sit around and stare.

If you must know the truth, I'm getting a little weary of shy actresses. There are so many professions in the world which don't make one nervous. But—and do the girls consider this?—these professions do not pay the magnificent salaries paid to screen stars.

Gable Flipped a Coin

would take him. He wished that he might turn this offer down, but he could find no other work and he reasoned, sensibly, that beggars must not be choosers.

The contract was ready for him. Sorry that events had forced him to sign it, he set out from his boarding house to go to the office and put his name on the dotted line.

Some carpenters were working in the hall. He hurried past them and in so doing his coat caught on a nail and he heard the disheartening rip.

CLARK examined the tear. He could certainly not appear in any manager's office in a coat like that, and the discouraging part was that he had but one other suit. However, there was nothing for him to do but to change his clothes.

He went back to his room, got out his other suit and just as he was leaving the house once more, being very careful of the carpenters' nails, the telephone rang. The message was for him. His agent told him that he had just been offered a nice part in a good legitimate company!

So if he had not been delayed by having to change clothes, if the nail had not been there, he would have been out of the house when the call came and his name would have been affixed to the vaudeville contract and there would have been nothing for him to do but to give up the good role and go on the road. Fate? Chance? What?

Number four: Had a flipped coin not turned up heads Gable might never have come to the attention of the Los Angeles producers.

He had been in Portland, Oregon, after a stroke of bad luck, working as an adtaker on the Oregonian, a newspaper there. Stranded by a defunct stock company, he had taken the job to ward off starvation. Meantime he kept in touch with friends in New York who were instructed to notify him when new casting for stock companies began. A letter came, urging him to return to New York. He had no money and was wondering how it would feel to ride the freights when a friend of his, an actor, turned up in Portland. This man was bound for Hollywood in a ramshackle car. He invited Clark to come along. Reluctantly, Gable went.

He searched desperately for work in the theatrical world and was at last offered a bit part in "What Price Glory." He thought himself worthy of a better break. After all, he had played leads in stock. After all, he was an actor, not a bit player. If he took this role, it would be as if he had started from the bottom again. And, heaven knows, he had fought his way desperately already. But he needed money. He had to eat. Should his career or his stomach come first?

He decided that this time he would trust utterly to luck. He flipped a coin. "Tails I take the bit, heads I don't." The coin spun in the air and rested on the back of his hand. He looked at it. It registered heads!

WITH a very empty feeling in the pit of his stomach he refused the part. And for two weeks regretted the coin's decision. Yes, he regretted it for two weeks only, for at the end of that time a second unit of the show was formed and Clark was offered a good part. And the strange thing was that the second unit soon became, in reality, the first. Furthermore, it played in Los Angeles while the other company was on the road.

And thus Clark came to the attention of the producer, Louis MacLoon, who gave him the ranking male lead of Sgt. Quirt when Hale Hamilton left the company.

Number five: If he had not had faith in the first flipped coin and put his trust in another, he might never have been seen by the movie moguls.

On the New York stage, Gable had gained some fame in a play called "Machanal," a Broadway hit. MacLoon wired Clark asking him to take the lead in "The Last Mile" at a salary bigger than any he had had. At this time, Clark wasn't in need of money and, of course, the Broadway theatre is much more important than the Los Angeles stage. Again, what to do? Make extra dollars on the Coast and perhaps miss out on a Broadway show, or hang around the Big Town waiting for a part? The coin had steered him straight once before. Perhaps it would do so again. He flipped a quarter. It advised him to go West. And it was because of this role that he got his first screen test.

The rest is woven inextricably into the pattern of movie history.

If, if, if . . . How many "ifs" are there in your life? Are all of us—you and I and Clark Gable—predestined, and are these seemingly casual occurrences that vitally change our lives simply fate working in her mysterious fashion? Or is it just chance and luck?

I leave it up to you. What do you think?

The Modern Hostess

black coffee. This is not because Myrna is dieting or counting her calories, but because she thinks desserts as a steady thing lack interest, preferring the piquant taste of a perfect salad to set off her meal. If you were invited to dinner at the Loy apartment (Myrna does not own her own home, living at the moment in a swanky Beverly Hills apartment hotel), chances are that Myrna would have Carolina initiate you into the mysteries of her spicy "Taquitos." The only concession to the conventional dinner would be a cooling ice at the end of the meal. The Loy menu, as made out for me by Carolina, would read something like this:

Consommé
"Taquitos" A favorite salad
Fresh Raspberry Ice
Coffee

This would be followed by a bit of conversation and then an evening of rapt attention to Myrna's new phonograph which plays twenty-four records, continuously, without its proud owner laying a finger upon it. You'd hear Ravel's "Bolero" and symphonies directed by world-famous conductors, if you were Myrna's guest. Myrna owns a thousand records!

It all sounds simple and unstudied, doesn't it—especially the dinner. But the consommé would be clear as an unclouded crystal ball, the "Taquitos" would be superb in their rich tomato sauce, the green salad would be a masterpiece, the ice a frozen nectar and the coffee black, steaming, pungent, with perhaps a dash of cognac!

Simplicity, in itself, is often a highly cultivated art, you know, an essential truth which Myrna has discovered in the midst of her astounding success. Above all she realizes that the best part of success is not that it brings her sables and square-cut emeralds, but that it allows her the rare privilege of doing just what she prefers to do. And that is to read, listen to fine music, idle away her leisure hours as she wishes, and partake of delightful meals of her own choosing.

But let's get back to Myrna's salads, about which I promised to tell you. For Sour Cream Salad, Carolina buys French endive. Following the washing and chilling ritual described above, she removes the endive, crisp and cold from the refrigerator, mixes it with a simple French dressing made in a bowl which has been rubbed lightly with garlic, and arranges the leaves like a giant sunflower on a flat dish. In the center of the dish, nestling in decorative chicory, is placed a smaller dish of sour cream to which a dash of salt has been added. In serving, a spoonful of sour cream is placed on the dressing. You can see how it looks from the photograph. This salad was made up for picture purposes by Carolina, just as she makes it for Miss Loy.

THE other salad pictured is one that Carolina serves often, as Myrna enjoys having it as a solitary dish for a refreshing summer lunch. Choosing a large avocado, Carolina washes it carefully and halves it lengthwise. The halves are then placed, without removing the shell, on lettuce leaves. The large seed is removed, of course, and in its place is inserted half of a hard-cooked egg, cut in half lengthwise. The entire salad is then drenched with French dressing.

As another summer luncheon dish Myrna frequently asks for Salad Caviar. For this Carolina takes a head of lettuce and shreds it. She chops radishes, celery, green onions, green peppers and ripe olives very finely and adds them, together with some minced parsley, to the shredded lettuce. And now comes the final touch that makes this a very distinguished salad indeed—a little dish of mayonnaise covered with caviar in the very center of the salad bowl!

Just as Carolina is inflexible about metals in salad-making (except for the sometimes necessary chopping knife), so is she insistent about using her own mayonnaise. This she makes up in large quantities, storing it afterwards in the refrigerator. When Thousand Island Dressing or Russian Dressing is wanted, Carolina just adds the necessary ingredients to her "Special Mayonnaise." If you want to have her recipes for all three of these dressings as served to Myrna Loy and her guests, all you have to do is send for this month's recipe folder.

Another of the cards in the Modern Hostess Leaflet will give you directions for making that "Salad De Luxe" that I mentioned before. This salad borders on sweetness, but, despite that fact, it is one of Myrna's favorites. I was delighted, therefore, to be able to get the recipe for you. It combines unusual ingredients, but is most simple to make. Fnd out for yourself how good it is by sending in the coupon for your free copy of the recipes.

Salads, of course, are not the only dishes that make their appearance on Myrna's luncheon table. "Waffles Carolina" bob up with great frequency too, I learned. It seems that once you have sampled a "Waffle Carolina," like an elephant, you never forget!

"I have never eaten anything like them!" Myrna told me. "I never cared much about waffles until my secretary asked me to let her make some by her own special recipe. I said 'yes' casually—but my enthusiasm after tasting them was positive. It must be the corn meal that makes them unlike anything I ever ate. I am going to ask her to give you exact directions for making them," Myrna promised. "They are simply grand for any moment of the day, from breakfast to a midnight snack."

Well, I did get the recipe, and if you send for it I can guarantee that you'll find these waffles just as good as Myrna declared them to be.

THE final dish on the list of Loy favorites is a bit complicated but it's well worth trying. It's a recipe for those Mexican "Taquitos." With their spicy seasoning and delicious sauce, they are guaranteed to stimulate the appetite for an otherwise ordinary meal. If you want to make a tired husband happy or make dull guests sparkle, serve this exotic dish, made according to directions given me by Miss Loy's Carolina. The recipe calls for "Tortillas"—an Indian equivalent for American bread—which can be bought in the Mexican quarter of many cities, but which also can be made at home very simply. A West Coast milling company—the Globe Mills—has worked out an excellent Tortilla recipe which I have included with Carolina's directions for making the special chicken filling and extra special sauce that change "Tortillas" into "Taquitos" to the betterment of both!

Salads with sex appeal, originality and a sense of humor, did we say? Well, wait until you taste "Taquitos"! They have downright glamor! And why shouldn't they have—they're a Myrna Loy favorite.

Just think, recipes for not one but four of her favorite foods are included in this month's Modern Hostess Recipe Leaflet—"Taquitos," "Waffles Carolina," "Salad De Luxe" and Carolina's "Special Mayonnaise" with two variations, "Russian" and "Thousand Island" dressing. So send for your free copy now—at once and forthwith. If you don't you'll be sorry. And so shall I be, that you missed out on this extra-special chance to eat the same foods that Myrna Loy likes, made by just the same recipes that are used in that charming star's Hollywood home.

All About the Great Mae West Marriage Question

think he wanted to pose for phony pictures. I think he meant to take a picture of Mae and put one of his pictures next to it, and to state honestly that it was a composite, showing them as they appeared twenty-four years ago. But it did sound funny.

So much so that the Editor told me to investigate the story and find out whether or not Mae was married, and if so, was this Frank Wallace her husband.

Come along and play detective with me. We'll find out some strange and startling facts.

First we go down to the Court of General Sessions, where on September 19, 1927, Mae was sentenced to ten days in jail on the immoral performance charge. They show us the copy of the pedigree, to which she swore. "Married?" it asks. "Yes," Mae answers. "Age?" and she replies, "Twenty-six."

NOW if Mae were telling the truth, under oath, she would have been ten years old in 1911, when the supposed marriage took place—and ten-year-old girls aren't getting married in Milwaukee, where the minimum age for brides with parents' consent is fifteen, and without it, eighteen.

But what about her statement that she is married? We'll go and ask Clarence W. Morganstern, producer of the banned play, who was sentenced at the same time.

"I've known Mae since she was eight years old," says the veteran producer. "I first met her when she was playing in stock at the Gotham Theatre in Brooklyn. Roles like Lovey Mary in 'Mrs. Wiggs' and Little Eva in 'Uncle Tom's Cabin.' At that time she was about eight or ten years old. When was it? Well, I started working with her in 1913, only two years afterward.

"Mae never was in Milwaukee in 1911. The first trip she made there was only a few years ago, when she toured with the 'Diamond Lil' show.

"Don't forget, there was a different Mae West in burlesque. I knew her. She was a brunette—weighed about 135 to 140 and was about twenty years old in 1913. The girl in the pictures which so far have been printed in the newspapers is not the Mae West of the films. She didn't look anything like that."

"But," I interrupted, "Wallace says Mae was a brunette when he married her."

"Then it was a different Mae," Morganstern replied. "Mae of the movies was never a brunette, though her hair wasn't always as light as it is today. Why, you can prove it—she has a very fair complexion and violet eyes. Why don't you ask Ned Wayburn? He taught her to dance."

I took Mr. Morganstern's tip and called upon Wayburn, who used to stage the great Ziegfeld extravaganzas and has an international reputation for honesty and ability.

MR. WAYBURN was rehearsing the chorus for a new show when I called at his studio. I explained the problem to him. He let the girls sit down for a breathing spell.

"Mae was in the 'Folies Bergere,' which I directed. She was a principal. Let me think a minute. Yes, the date was about the spring of 1911, and Mae wasn't over thirteen at the time. She may have been younger; she was a hearty, well-developed girl, and we always said she was older than she really was, because her extreme youth might have caused comment."

"Was she a blonde or a brunette then?"

"Neither." He pointed at a girl. "Oh, Miss! You in the corner. Stand up, please." The girl rose. "That's just about the color Mae's hair was; judge for yourself."

The girl's hair could have been called either very light brown or rather dark blonde. But she certainly wasn't a brunette.

Then Mr. Wayburn continued, "You know, there have been several Frank Wallaces. Franklin Wallace was a singer and a good actor—but not a dancer. He never appeared with Mae. Another was a singing waiter at a Bowery cabaret. A third, now dead I believe, was in 'Diamond Lil,' which Jack Linder produced.

"I know that Mae was in vaudeville between stage show engagements, with Harry Richman as her pianist. And while I cannot take my oath that she was not on the road in 1911, I doubt it very much, as she appeared in a vode sketch called 'Hello, Paris' here in the East, and I doubt if it ever got west of the Mississippi."

That seems to substantiate Mae's story, but let's pay a visit to Jack Linder.

"I've known Mae only since 1928," says he, "but I'm inclined to believe that Wallace is telling the truth. He talks very convincingly, and Mae is old enough to have been seventeen or eighteen in 1911."

"Is it true that she got Frank Wallace a job in 'Diamond Lil'?"

"Yes—but it wasn't this Frank Wallace. It was another man by the same name. He's dead now, but while he was in the show, he stuck awfully close to her. Here's a picture of them." And he showed me a photo of Mae getting into her car—an unmistakable Mae, this time, with a man standing in the background. This man, Mr. Linder said, was the "Diamond Lil" Wallace. "Maybe they were married," he added, "but I'm inclined to think it was really the one who now claims to be her husband."

George Lederer, also a producer, broadcasts his "reminiscences" over radio station WINS, giving a dramatization of the West-Wallace marriage. In a radio sketch and talk he definitely stated that Wallace taught Mae to sing and dance; that they were married in Milwaukee; that Mae had a good job offered her and ditched Frank to take it. We call Lederer on the phone and make an appointment. It turns out that his entire "knowledge" of the case is garnered from reading the newspapers of a few days ago, save that he thinks he saw Mae once, twenty years ago. His whole testimony may be discarded.

But he has given us an idea. We look over the old newspaper files on Mae. The earliest we can find is from Variety of January 20, 1912, and refers to "her recent vaudeville appearances"—not with Wallace, but with the Girard Brothers. The World, about the same time, says that she is "new to vaudeville," but spells her name "May." Is it the same girl?

IN February, 1913, the Atlanta (Ga.) Journal prints a cartoon of Mae West, a blonde, playing the Grand Theatre there. The Columbus (Ohio) Journal, of November 4, 1913, calls our Mae "America's youngest temperamental come-

NATURALLY SKINNY FOLKS CORRECT IODINE STARVED GLANDS!

Add 5 lbs. in 1 Week—Or No Cost!

New Mineral Concentrate Corrects Common Cause of Skinniness—IODINE STARVED GLANDS

No longer need you go around as skinny as a rail, for Kelpamalt, the new mineral concentrate from the sea, gets right down and corrects the real underlying cause of skinniness—IODINE STARVED GLANDS. When these glands don't work properly, all the food in the world can't help you. It just isn't turned into flesh. The result is, you stay skinny.

The most important gland—the one which actually controls body weight—needs a definite ration of iodine all the time—NATURAL ASSIMILABLE IODINE—not to be confused with chemical iodides which often prove toxic—but the same iodine that is found in tiny quantities in spinach and lettuce. Only when the system gets an adequate supply of iodine can you regulate metabolism—the body's process of converting digested food into firm flesh, new strength and energy.

To get this vital mineral in convenient, concentrated and assimilable form, take Kelpamalt—now recognized as the world's richest source of this precious substance. It contains 1,300 times more iodine than oysters, once considered the best source. 6 tablets alone contain more NATURAL IODINE than 486 lbs. of spinach, 1,660 lbs. of beef, or 1,387 lbs. of lettuce.

Try Kelpamalt for a single week and notice the difference. See flattering extra pounds appear in place of scrawny hollows. Notice how much better you feel. And if you don't gain at least 5 lbs. in one week the trial is free. Kelpamalt costs but a few cents a day to use and can be had at all good drug stores. If your dealer has not yet received his supply send $1.00 for introductory size bottle of 65 tablets to the address below.

Manufacturer's Note:—Inferior products—sold as kelp and malt preparations—in imitation of the genuine Kelpamalt are being offered as substitutes. Don't be fooled. Demand genuine Kelpamalt Tablets. They are easily assimilated, do not upset stomach nor injure teeth. Results guaranteed or money back.

dienne," which lends weight to Mr. Morganstern's statement that she used to give impersonations of Lillian Russell, Eva Tanguay and other celebrities of the day. Other crumbly, yellow old clippings substantiate things Mr. Wayburn has told us, and others reveal further information, such as that she made her first Louisville appearance in 1914.

And a Wallace crops up in her life in the papers of 1927. This was James Garret Wallace, the District Attorney who prosecuted the play "Sex" and got a conviction against Mae. The next day the N. Y. Tribune says that Mae was "twenty-six and unmarried." In 1930, Sidney Skolsky does a personality story on her in the Daily News and says that her insurance policy gives her birthday as August 17, 1900. This corroborates Morganstern, Wayburn, the indictment and Mae's own word. It makes Wallace's story look thin.

And in a story published under her own signature in the Daily Mirror, Mae says she was known as "The Baby Vamp" in 1920. They might call a girl of twenty a "Baby Vamp"—but not a woman of nearly thirty. She also says she went to Wayburn when she was thirteen after playing vaudeville in the East—and Wayburn not only agrees on this, but dates it as being the spring of 1911.

Then we skip those clippings which deal only with her more recent stage and screen activities and leap right into the present case.

Lew Wallace, brother of the Frank who was with Mae in "Diamond Lil" says, in the Daily Mirror of April 23, 1935, that his brother Frank, who died on June 7, 1933, never was in vaudeville until 1918, and was only about sixteen or seventeen in 1911, anyway. Al Rigali, stage manager of the show, however, voiced his opinion that Mae was married—but to the Frank who died, "because he could always make a touch."

Harry Fields, an old-time burlesque man of Boston, stated in the same paper that "everybody" knew Frank and Mae were married. But it was impossible to learn which Frank and (more important) WHICH MAE!

ANOTHER story points out that Mae's mother would be only fifty-three if alive today. This means, if we accept Wallace's story, that Mae was born when her mother was only twelve years old, which is rather difficult to believe. However, if Mae is to be believed, Mrs. West was only eighteen at that time—surely old enough to become a mother. But the statement of Mrs. West's age is not confirmed by any other data.

Far from it! In an obituary published in the Times on January 28, 1930, two days after Mae's mother died, we find "Funeral services for Mrs. West, who was fifty-six years old, will be held at the Fairchild Chapel." Fifty-six in 1930. That means, "born in 1874." If Mae was born when Mrs. West was twenty, Mae was seventeen or eighteen in 1911.

This is further borne out by a Brooklyn shopkeeper, who knew the family since before Mae's birth. She said, "My daughter was a year or a year and a half old when Mae was going to school—and my daughter is thirty-six now, so Mae must be about forty or forty-two." Which would confirm the Times' figure, and the possibility of a 1911 marriage.

Miss Jean Gary, a writer for magazines, is also a former neighbor of Mae's. Jean's brother, John, was a good friend of Mae's brother, Johnnie. "I remember Mae on the stage of the Jamaica Theatre. It was the last year I lived in Woodhaven." says Miss Gary, "so that makes it 1917. Mae was not over seventeen or eighteen even then, I'm sure." And this corroborates other indications that Mae was far too young to marry anybody in 1911.

In February, 1933, the Daily News printed an interview in which Mae admitted being twenty-nine. The reporter commented that records show her to be 33, (which checks with what we have) and continues, "some Broadwayites say she is older." It adds that she played Little Marie in "Ten Nights," "Little Lord Fauntleroy" and similar roles from 1909 to 1912, in Hal Clarendon's Brooklyn stock company, thus further refuting Wallace's claim.

Another paper, the Sun, quotes an interview with Frank's mother, Mrs. Anthony S. Szatkus, whose husband is a carpenter. Lee W. Beilin (of whom more anon), Wallace's attorney in his suit to determine his marital status, confirms this as being Wallace's father's name. But on the marriage record, the husband's father is listed as "Joe Wallace"—a name very unlike Anthony Szatkus—though it does state he was born in Russia. And Frank does claim Lithuanian descent.

Mr. Beilin is firmly convinced that Wallace is really Mae's husband. What decided him is the photostat of the marriage certificate—some old pictures (including the one which Morganstern states is not Mae's)—and some "other documentary evidence." He wouldn't say what this was, because he does not want to expose his evidence until the case comes to trial—if it ever does.

But was the Frank Wallace of "Diamond Lil," the son of Joe Wallace and Anna Babria? I cannot tell you. His brother and sister, both of whom live in the Bronx, refuse to answer requests for information. Do you suppose he may have been, and that they do not want it known? Can you think of any reason for their silence if this is not the case?

Wallace has been giving his version of the Mae West marriage story in the New York Daily Mirror. In it he mentions names and dates. It's all very convincing.

But———

ONE of the people he mentioned as having appeared in a show with him and Mae in the days of their married bliss is Sophie ("Last of the Red Hot Mommas") Tucker. I called her to ask if she remembered the marriage.

The next evening her secretary phoned me. Miss Tucker couldn't comment. Why couldn't she comment? She had no recollection of the matter!

So another Wallace claim bit the dust.

Wallace also refers to Harry Richman, the radio and night club star. I called Harry at the Club Versailles and asked him what he knew. "I was with Mae in vaudeville for about a year and a half, around 1923. At that time I knew nothing about Wallace, or even any marriage of Miss West's. I never even heard of him until he made his statement in the papers."

And Harry Richman was Mae's pianist—actually in her act. If she had ever let a word slip about this supposed marriage, he would have heard it.

Art Egan, broadcaster over WMCA and associated stations, toured the same circuit with Mae and Harry, twelve years ago. He knew them both, as well as people who make extended trips together do get to know each other. "Mae was a regular fellow," says Egan. "Everybody liked her, for she was good company, even if she didn't smoke or drink. I've talked to her a lot—and there was never any indication that she was married to anyone. And remember, that was before Mae made her big success. She had no reason for hiding a husband then. If she had been married, I'm sure she would have mentioned it, for home life is a favorite topic among stage people. Her age? Well, I always thought she was about my age—not over a year or two older. And I'm thirty-six this year."

So, according to Egan, Mae couldn't have been over thirteen in 1911, just as others who know her well have said.

Wallace has also said that Mae divorced him in 1915 or 1916. This would be convincing proof of a marriage if Mr. Wallace could tell where the action took place. But now it is said to be a fraudulent divorce, for though Wallace claims the papers were served on him by Mae's own sister, Beverly, Mr. Beilin's search for the records in the three Long Island counties where it might have been filed has been unavailing.

In fact, Mr. Wallace has been very hazy on data which might be checked, and proved or disproved. He remembered a beautiful day—a week or two before the marriage—but could not recall whether or not it rained on the wedding day. "I was too happy to notice," he said. But the weather bureau could have told whether or not his recollection of the weather was correct. He could not remember what the judge who married them looked like—the judge is still alive and could have checked that statement. And so forth.

For that matter, the judge did, very kindly, agree to give MODERN SCREEN some information bearing on the case.

THE application for a license," said Judge Joseph E. Cordes, "was filled out by the county clerk's office, but it had to be signed by one of the parties. I am enclosing a copy of the certificate, showing how it was filled in and filed."

According to the best information I have been able to get, neither Frank nor Mae signed the application.

"Arthur Shutkin," Judge Cordes continued, "was the clerk at that time and sent quite a few out-of-town couples to me—I haven't any independent recollection of the event."

And when I asked Mr. Shutkin, he could recall nothing about it, either.

Nor, for that matter, did Martin T. Plehn, who was County Clerk when somebody or other got married in Milwaukee in 1911. But Mr. Plehn not only confirmed the salient facts given by Judge Cordes, but contributed a vital piece of new evidence. He sent along a tracing of the signature which the Frank Wallace who really did marry a Mae West, signed to the legal documents. Here, at last, was something to prove or disprove the present Wallace's claim that he was the same man.

I phoned Attorney Beilin and asked for a copy of this Wallace's signature, as he writes it today. Mr. Beilin said that he didn't see any reason why he should let us have it. We certainly could not have it unless he could see our copy of the old signature first. Unfortunately, our copy was being photographed for a cut. But we wondered whether Mr. Beilin doubted that the two signatures might be similar, and whether we could get a copy of this Wallace's signature if it was very unlike that which Mr. Plehn had supplied. Oh, how we wondered!

Mrs. Szatkus says her son married "a Mamie West." Frank says he married her in 1911 when she was 16 or 17 (note how the age has shifted since his first story). One paper states that Mae and Frank were playing the Gaiety Theatre in Milwaukee at the time of the alleged marriage; another quotes the Charles Fox Theatre manager as saying, "I have looked up all my old records. Miss West did not play here in 1911. Neither did Wallace."

Mae, on getting that information, remarked, "Well, I guess that settles it."

And I guess it does—except that the Milwaukee Journal carried a review of the Gaiety Theatre's show in April, 1911. It mentions "Mae West and FRED Wallace, singers and dancers."

My money says it was two other people, or at least one other.

Wanna bet?

★★★ Hooray for Love (RKO)

Here's just another musical comedy, using the tried and true formula of backstage plottings and front-stage entertainment. We could have enjoyed ourselves just as well by not going back-stage, as the goings-on there were pretty dull. Gene Raymond is the young producer, with just one idea on his mind—Ann Sothern. Ann looks like a million and acts when she gets a chance. However, the orchids should be distributed for the musical and dance numbers. Bill Robinson flashes dem eyes and dose feet in the hottest jazz routine he's done to date—which is saying something; while Maria Gambarelli floats through a contrastingly ethereal ballet number with remarkable grace. Pert Kelton steals the comedy honors with her swell performance of an awful performance as the self-appointed star, being convinced that her "ingenity" will save the show. There are a couple of catchy tunes besides "Hooray For Love" that are destined for popularity. If dancing and music make up for the lack of a good story, in your opinion, you'll not go wrong on this number.

Tapper Bill Robinson's career has been as cullud as his complexion. Claims he was "jest bo'n lazier'n ten debbils" and that his famous feet just dance by themselves. Never went to school—couldn't see the point of head-learning when his brains were in his feet. Had a go at several "positions" in his youth—shoe-shining, crap-shooting, etc., before he got his feet on the first rung of the success ladder back in a Harlem night-club—and he's tapped his way up steadily and gracefully ever since. . . . Maria Gambarelli's worked like ten other debbils to get where she is. . . . Starting out as a child to become a concert pianist, she worked her small fingers to the bone. Deciding it was through dancing she could best express herself, she worked her small feet into the same condition. . . . However, they were still good 'nuff to bring her over to the Roxy at 15 where she became the premiere danseuse. . . . See "Good News" and Bad for Mr. Raymond. . . . Pert Kelton's the Female Menace of Movies—she'll steal any picture given just half a chance. She roused the Bennett (Connie) ire once. Not a hard thing to do, but a hard thing to take.

★★★ Murder in the Fleet
(M-G-M)

Now we have mystery and murder, chills and thrills moved into the Navy, with all the action taking place on one of Uncle Sam's battleships. It seems that a fire control gear for guns has strayed or been stolen and everybody and everybody's friend is under suspicion. Nat Pendleton and Ted Healy are the only two nobody wonders about, and when you see their antics, you'll realize why. The only thing that pair would be capable of stealing is the picture—which is certainly no mechanism for a sixteen-inch gun! However, there are plenty of people to worry about and the suspense is upheld right through to the final sequences. Robert Taylor, Metro's new leading man, once again gives a fine account of himself and Arthur Byron makes a convincing commander. Una Merkel is the gal who loves a sailor—or any number of them—and is as pert and peppy as usual in a now familiar role, and Jean Parker is, of course, the ingenue.

Preview Postscripts

The big battleship you'll see in this picture is, when stripped of its decks and funnels, Set 15 on the M-G-M lot. Disillusioning? That's us—always spoiling somebody's fun! However, the location shots were made on a real boat anchored just off San Pedro. A lot of people said there was a real romance aboard, too—Robert Taylor and Jean Parker. But, truly, they are in love with a coupla other people. Disillusioning again? Yep, that's us— a "tearer-downer." Metro found Bob in a college play. They feel they have a future Gable on their hands. We feel that they're right. Bob's without temperament and with ability, so he's starting out well annahoo. . . . If little Miss Parker cut out the gooeyness, she'd have a better chance. You can't be as sweet as a chocolate cream all the time without sating the public. Jean's chaperone orta point that out to her. . . . Una Merkel, praise be, isn't the cheeky, little number she plays on the screen. She's a lady "what likes to act lady-like.". . . And Mr. Healy, well, any of you who remember vaudeville when it was a two-a-day proposition instead of something with which to surround the feature picture, remember Mr. Healy.

★★★ The Nitwits (RKO)

If you have a taste for comedy served up raw, you'll relish this one. If your preferences run to having it rare and well done, however, this latest Wheeler-Woolsey slapstick will be hard to take. Besides using their usual giggle-getter gags, W. and W. have enlarged their histronic field by including thrill'n'chill-getters in their repertoire, as a good juicy murder occurs in this story and our heroes are tangled up puh-lenty in it. There's nothing slow about the action, either, what with all the Keystone cops on the trail of the Wheeler-Woolsey gang and resulting in a couple of first-class, free-for-all, knock-down, drag-em-out battles. The very good supporting cast includes Hale Hamilton, Evelyn Brent, Fred Keating and Betty Grable. Mr. Keating's a crook after our own heart and Charlie Wilson must've done some real detectiving on the side in days gone by, for he's that good as a reel detective.

Bleeve it or not, Mr. Ripley—but Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Woolsey are as funny off the screen as on. On every set they've ever worked a few cracked ribs to the other actors are practically guaranteed. In fact they can even make each other laugh. And after being a stage comic team for several years before crashing the movies six years ago, these two should certainly be on to one another's antics. The only thing Wheeler doesn't think funny about Woolsey is the daily dozen cigars he consumes, and the only thing Woolsey gets griped at is watching Wheeler do away with several dozen apples per day. Production costs were cut down considerably on this flicker, since the director kept the boys so busy running away from the cops that there wasn't much time to indulge their weaknesses. . . . Fred Keating's another genuine cut-up. Famous for his magician's tricks out here in Hollywood, he can make anything disappear but that state tax on fillum. . . . Betty Grable's the collitch boys' weakness—and no wonder. Started singing those bluesy, woosey songs with orchestras, landed at the Cocoanut Grove with a famous orchestra, and in one week was signed at the studios. That's Betty—snappy. . . . RKO held Old Home Week the day Evelyn Brent arrived on the set. Everyone was humming "Auld Lang Syne" or were busily "remembering when," for Evelyn used to be one swell actress, then got lost in the shuffle some six years ago, and's just now back in pictures.

★★★ Public Hero No. 1
(M-G-M)

Seems as if this country is still at the mercy of gangsters. Though Chicago finally cleaned up on 'em, they're still running rampant in the movies. Dillinger's gang is provided for our entertainment in this one and as if that weren't bad enough, the plot leans toward the improbable in too many spots. There's some good acting, though, in spite of the story difficulties. Chester Morris does a nice job. If we say too much about his role, we'll spoil the whole story. Joseph Calleia is Public Enemy No. 1. Mr. Calleia, a newcomer to the screen, goes calmly about his business of wholesale slaughter, robbing banks and stealing the show. Lewis Stone as the prison warden and Lionel Barrymore as the doctor who extracts bullets from the gangsters' tough hides, give their chronically good performances. Jean Arthur has one of those tough-but-okay roles and she certainly manages to get in some good acting between gun-plays.

Chester Morris is Hollywood's Dirty Deal man—but at the receiving end of the line. Although displaying marked ability, Chet has had little opportunity to capitalize on it, due largely to poor management of his affairs. Seems to act best in prison surroundings (not compulsory ones, however) as his last good role was in "The Big House." Just for luck he wears the same uniform and number in this flicker. Mrs. Morris with the two Morris Hopefuls in tow, visited Daddy on the prison set one day. On the way home his young son confided that though he didn't think his Dad was exactly good looking, at least he wore the prison uniform with more of an air than Dillinger. . . . Lewis Stone's name on the screen always brings a round of applause from preview audiences. But Mr. Stone is used to it, having been a matinee idol yars and yars ago. Married to a young lady attractive enough to be in pictures herself, he spends every spare moment sailing the seas with her in the family yacht. . . . Lionel Barrymore's too well known to waste any explanations on—but didja know that his fine etchings have taken prizes in exhibits all over the country? . . . Joseph Calleia isn't well known in movies a-tall—but just give him a few more pictures! This is his first, having just haled into Hollywood from the stage.

★★★ Under the Pampas Moon (Fox)

Here is a peppy little picture that is going to insure a pleasant evening in the theatre, no matter how warm the weather. You see, the story's atmosphere is guaranteed to be slightly hotter than the thermometer and with plenty of colorful characters, Warner Baxter, with an accent, Veloz and Yolanda, a dance team bound to thrill you, a gorgeous rhumba tune—well, stop us if we become too enthusiastic! True, the plot is as slim as you wish your figure to be and the comedy, as broad as you're afraid it is (the figure again), but somehow you don't quibble about these items when there is so much there with which to entertain you. The picture features its quota of newcomers, all of whom manage to score nicely, as do our old favorites, John Miljan and Jack LaRue, and Ketti Gallian also is among those present. The cameraman rates a bow for some beautiful photography and the director for injecting so much action and laughter into a yarn that merely deals with a gent who is on the chase for a horse that has been stolen. Then, of course, there are the tunes!

Preview Postscripts

When Warner Baxter gets tuned up on those airs from "old May-hee-co" he makes every man and woman in the audience long for a serapi or a mantilla and a grilled balcony in Old Spain. Warner's not so young, but he's still romantic. Been married a good many more years than you'd care to believe—and to the same woman. Would rather play his guitar and sing love songs to her than to Garbo. Spent a good deal of time and money recently on his Malibu Beach home, getting it into shape to sell. Went down there t'other day to close the deal at a profit, and fell in love all over again with the place—of such is sentiment. . . . Ketti Gallian's a recent import, having only one other picture to her credit (or whichever way you want to look at it). On location, up in the Northern woods for some particular shots, her maid brought along Ketti's black crêpe-de-chine sheets and proceeded to use them on her camp bed, explaining that it was a European custom to bring one's own bedding while travelling. "Whassa matter?" queried the director, "do they have vermin sheets in Europe, that they have to drag their private supply along?" "But no!" exclaimed Ketti, "we never use ermine sheets in Europe.". . .

★★ Age of Indiscretion (M-G-M)

Well, it's the woman who pays and, believe us, she should in this little drammer of divorce and what leads up to it. Of all the double-dyed meanies, it's Helen Vinson, who once again crashes through with a swell performance of same. How a gal like Miss V.—well, it's for purposes of plot, my dears! Paul Lukas takes the punishment and gives a sincere performance of a man who has been done far from right by. This character could very easily have been overdrawn, but in the capable hands of Lukas manages to escape the maudlin category. Young David Jack Holt comes in for his share of honors and indeed steals a scene or two when his elders are not looking. Madge Evans and May Robson round out the fine cast and, yes, let us not forget a newcomer-to-the-screen, Catherine Doucet, who is pretty elegant in the role of a slightly goofy novelist. The story itself is diverting and novel in that the man (for a change) suffers, and the dialogue is good.

Paul Lukas and little David Holt are real buddies since appearing in this picture. After hours on the set, they'd continue playing together—boating, fishing, pillow-fighting and all manner of things were included in their fun. . . . Helen Vinson is the young leddy who could've had every minute of Hollywood time filled if she had wanted to play "wicked women" roles. But after doing them so beautifully that her fan mail was mostly from indignant wives, she drew the line on cinematically seducing any more husbands. . . . Remember that little girl who dangled her heels off a cake of Fairy Soap in the dear, dead days? Well, that was our smooth Madge Evans of today. Madge is a dependable actress and claims she likes everything about Hollywood, including Tom Gallery, of whom ZaSu Pitts once washed her famous hands. . . . May Robson is everybody's idea of a truly Grand Lady. Ask anyone in town—including directors, stars, cameramen, technicians, extras, and Garbo—they'll all propose three rousing cheers for this Grand Great Grandmama of the screen.

★★ Chinatown Squad (Universal)

With this picture's background in San Francisco's murky, mysterious Chinatown, a few knives in a few backs are inevitable. There are a couple of weird murders and enough anxiety about possible killings to satisfy almost anyone's craving for thrills and chills. Lyle Talbot is the young man who gets all the lowdown on the dirty work for us. Having been a former detective on the "Chinatown Squad," he sets out to show up Hugh O'Connell's deficiencies as his successor—which isn't difficult, but certainly is hilarious. Besides contributing his good looks to the screen, Mr. Talbot shows that he can turn in some good acting, while Hugh O'Connell plays H. O'C. with his usual abandon. Valerie Hobson is the gal in the case, who's kept breathless all through the picture, by climbing fire-escapes, finding secret panels and admiring the squad's former detective. Andy Devine is good in a role which gives him credit for having a thought once in awhile, and he does well by it. The Chinese characters and background are convincingly done, and in all, it's pretty sure to qualify as fair entertainment.

You won't see many smiles in this one—there wasn't time for such nonsense. This picture was a "quickie" with better results than usual under the circumstances. One Tom Gubbins was really the most important character in the whole business. He's the Chinese gentleman who hires all the Chinese extras for these tales of the distant Orient taken on Set 12 at the studio. Mr. Gubbins has an office in Chinatown, where he rounds up from one to sixteen dozen Chinamen, with or without pigtails, for background in studio emergencies. Mr. Gubbin's work is not ended here—not by a long shot. For, every direction given while working must be translated for the "extras" into their native chop-suey. . . . Lyle Talbot's usual pep is slightly conspicuous by its absence, you'll notice. Seems our hero was just a little worn down, having trekked to the studio every day via foot and street car, since his auto license was suspended for six months for driving when feeling extra peppy. . . . Perc Westmore, famed Hollywood make-up man, can take three bows in quick succession for that job he did on Valerie Hobson. When she appeared on the set in oriental make-up and brocaded p. j's, a nice young Chinese actor with a beautiful pig-tail rushed up to her and asked her for a date that very evening. At least Valerie thinks that was the proposition, being a little vague on her Chinese.

★★ The Glass Key (Paramount)

When you realize that this picture is based on a story by the astute Mr. Hammett of "Thin Man" fame, you may think you're facing an evening of brain strain. But never mind the aspirin, as this murder-mystery dwindles down to monotony. George Raft is cast as the ultra-modish and super-courageous hero, who is so devoted to the town's biggest politician, Edward Arnold, that he not only risks his life to save him from disgrace, but makes the supreme sacrifice of offering to teach Mr. Arnold how to dress snappily. Raft's role, however, gives him a better opportunity to display his versatility than he's had in many a moon, while Edward Arnold is as satisfactory as ever.

The love story is more tangled up than the murder motives, since Mr. Arnold is in love with the sister (Claire Dodd) of the murdered man, and she thinks Mr. A. is the meanie who "done him away," while Mr. Raft, not to be outdone, falls in love with Mr. Arnold's daughter (Rosalind Keith) who's violently enamoured of the murdered man. On second thought—mebbe you'd better bring along that aspirin.

Preview Postscripts

George Raft has oft been heralded as the second Valentino, but the only real resemblance seems to be that patent leather pompadour. However, it's nothing against George, for he's a pretty good guy even if he doesn't remind us of the Great Lover. He's the answer to the haberdasher's prayer—buys anything and everything in that line if expensive enough. Would sooner be caught dead than in a pair of unmonogrammed suspenders. Lives in Hollywood's snappiest penthouse, equipped with the last gasp in chromium bars—but never drinks himself. In spite of which, his alibi on arriving at the studio late the other morning was that a herd of pigeons had flown through his window and landed on the bedpost. It had taken a good hour to shoo them out. . . . Edward Arnold has two hobbies—hunting and motoring, and owns the prize collection of guns in Hollywood. . . . Rosalind Keith's story should never be breathed in the presence of movie-struck girls, for 'twould result in Hollywood Blvd. being overrun with coyotes on a leash with a blonde. Which is the attention-getting device this Missouri girl employed after getting the cold shoulder from casting offices for a month of Sundays. She's happy now, except for occasional weeps over her peroxided locks and "Gottlieb" (the coyote) whom she periodically loses.

★★ Headline Woman (Mascot)

Here's another picture bent on glorifying the gentlemen of the Fourth Estate. Roger Pryor is the star reporter with an amazing nose for news and a dashing new mustache, all of which features prove irresistible to Heather Angel—and being's how she's the boss' daughter this should have led to a snappy, happy ending. But the course of true love doesn't run any smoother here than in other places we've heard about, so Heather's papa isn't aware of Roger's sterling qualities. However, when he steps in where the other reporters fear to tread and sleuths out a couple of murder mysteries, to say nothing of saving his Angel's name from being dragged in the mud, everything is okay. Pretty painful as to plot, the picture is saved by Mr. Pryor's good performance.

Bill Nigh directed this flicker with his usual flourish. He has a flexible cane without which he's lost, directorially spikkin, which weapon he brandishes around in a menacing manner and gets action from his actors. However, he was stumped on this one. The scene was in the City Room of a newspaper office, and seeing one young man sitting at his desk, with nary a fleck of dust, a piece of paper or a cigarette butt in sight on its gleaming surface, he waved said cane and yelled, "Hey, you, doncha know what a reporter's desk should look like? How long you been acting, anyhow?" The young man regarded him calmly, then replied, "Just started acting—been working for the past twelve years on the New York Times.". . . Roger Pryor's noted for his cool, calm and collected air—besides that mustachio. But he weakened in one crisis. Roger had painstakingly rehearsed his scene of picking up an egg and remarking jovially, "Well, hope this egg's okay." But the ninth time, the egg slipped from his numb fingers, and crashed on the table. 'Twas a "prop" egg—and slightly the worse for wear. Roger fled with the rest of the cast from the set. . . . Heather Angel (yeh, that's what she answers to) is an English import. Married these past few months to Ralph Forbes, a Chatterton "ex," she's now enjoying a British vacation—alone.

★★ Alias Mary Dow (Universal)

You'll have to have the faith of an extra bent on stardom to believe this one. It's about the mother who goes through the years lamenting the loss of her strayed or stolen baby. When, in her dying hour, she calls for the child, her husband goes to a coffee shop and induces a slangy, young waitress to pretend she's the returned Mary. Hard to take, you'll admit. That is, to everyone but the authors and Katherine Alexander who is paid to take it. The dialogue in the story is as impossible as the plot, the characters actually making speeches in lieu of conversation. Sally Eilers, who should lose ten pounds, is best in the dance hall sequences. Henry O'Neill and Katherine Alexander play her parents with nice restraint and Chick Chandler and Lola Lane give fair accounts of themselves. Then there is Clarence Muse, sincere and sympathetic, in a small role.

The only time the Harry Joe Brown family ever saw one another while this picture was being made, was at the studio commissary for lunch. Sally was busy 'til all hours, Harry was frantically grinding out another film at a neighboring studio and "Sonny" was the next thing to a complete orphan. Ray Milland looks like an Arrow Collar Lad (ad. gratis) but honestly would rather resemble an ex-pugilist. For this 6' 2" Adonis craves rough, tough roles—claims he'd rather wear a strait-jacket than a dinner-jacket. . . . Katherine Alexander is a familiar name to Broadway. This very handsome lady has been on the stage since she was a mere cheeild. Married Producer William Brady, Jr., some time later, and to date hasn't regretted it. Clarence Muse has "sung for his supper" ever since he can remember—some forty years now. As talented a song-writer as a songster, he's credited with several hits of the past season.

★★★★★ Oil for the Lamps of China (Warners)

We found this an admirable and unusual picture for many reasons. First, because, having read the novel of the same name, we did not see it as picture material, excellent though the book was. Score one for Warner Brothers for choosing it. Then, we did not expect that the rather even pace of the book would provide enough action and emotion for a screen drama. Score one for Director Mervyn LeRoy, who so superbly crystallizes the very deep feeling of the story into a series of tense and tender scenes. Third, we were delighted to see Pat O'Brien, so long confined to cigar-chewing and wise-cracking roles, given a really worthy dramatic part—and doing splendidly in it. And fourth, there is Josephine Hutchinson—a young dramatic actress who is so real and appealing and convincing that you will wonder where she has been all your lives.

Briefly, the story concerns the business pioneering of a great oil company in the Orient, the back-breaking and heart-breaking struggles of the company's employees in their efforts to sell more "oil for the lamps of China" and the loyalty and heroism of one of those employees—O'Brien—and his game little wife—Miss Hutchinson. See the picture by all means. It's completely worth while.

"Oil for the Lamps of China," another triumph for Warners and its stars, Josephine Hutchinson and Pat O'Brien.

A CHALLENGE TO ALL SCREEN HISTORY!

Think back to your greatest film thrill! Recall the mightiest moments of romance, action, soul-adventure of the screen! A picture has come to top them all! For many months Hollywood has marvelled at the stupendous production activities at the M-G-M studios, not equalled since "Ben Hur"; for many months three great film stars and a brilliant cast have enacted the elemental drama of this primitive love story. Deeply etched in your memory will be Clark Gable as the handsome seafaring man; Jean Harlow as the frank beauty of Oriental ports; Wallace Beery as the bluff trader who also seeks her affections. "China Seas" is the first attraction with which M-G-M starts its new Fall entertainment season. We predict its fame will ring lustily down the years to come!

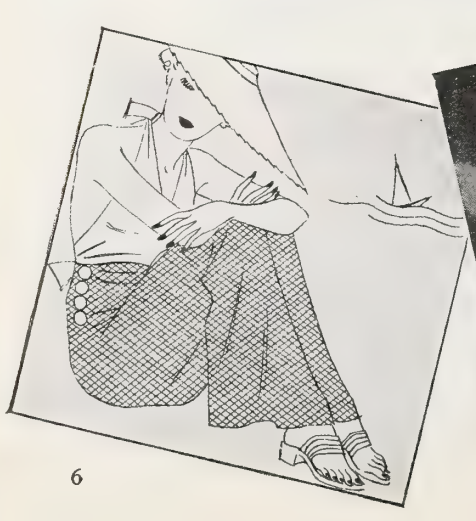
Beauty Advice

by Mary Biddle



A SYMPHONY of legs helped to make the musical "In Caliente" a success. But then what musical comedy hasn't featured a symphony of beautiful legs, of supple, graceful ankles in intricate dance patterns? Speaking boldly, at least it would be speaking boldly if it were back in the days of the full skirted bathing suit, Hollywood legs must have "It." When we see what literally seems to be mile after mile of slim, shapely limbs, we come to realize how important it is for even the extra girls in the chorus to measure up to ankle standards of pulchritude. If one of the studios happened to be casting for a night club scene, or a bathing beach number, would your legs entitle you to a job as an "extra" in the crowd? Or would the casting director be inclined to say of you after a glance footward, "Sorry, you won't do"?

It's an old Hollywood custom for screen notables to make their footprints in the cement forecourt of the Chinese Grauman Theatre in Hollywood. And there the footprints stand in something more enduring than the sands of time. How would your footprint look, without benefit of shoes, if it were sculptured in cement? Would it show a fat pudgy foot and fallen arch? I know from many of your tragic, despairing letters just what kind of an unfortunate footing you've been on at the beach this summer. Some of you have been developing inferiority complexes over thick ankles, and others over skinny legs, and still others over ugly nails and callouses. What between evening sandals, sport sandals, beach sandals, and no sandals at all, our feet are very much in the limelight nowadays, so let's see what we can do about acquiring lovely feet, and shapely ankles and legs.

Feet first into a beauty routine!

Some famous pedal extremities—can you guess who's who? Well, read down from the right as follows: Frances Drake's with toes untinted, Ruby Keeler's busy tapping ones, Carole Lombard's with the red nails out of sight, a back view of June Knight's—and notice those smooth, pumpless heels, Dolores Del Rio's pretties—and those of Constance Cummings'.

Gary Cooper and Ann Harding in a scene from the Paramount Picture "Peter Ibbetson" directed by Henry Hathaway

Romeo and Juliet!...Antony and Cleopatra!...Tristan and Isolde!...Dante and Beatrice!...Heloise and Abelard! ...Lovers all—out of the scores upon scores of lovers who down through the ages have fired the imagination and the creative artistry of bards and minstrels, poets and playwrights, painters and writers.

Without end are the enduring love stories of the world —those transcendental, inspiring romances that reach into the hearts, souls and minds of people—to lift humans out of themselves for one brief, thrilling instant in the scheme of things and make them kin to the gods in Paradise!

Taking its place alongside the immortal love romances of all time is the touching, tenderly beautiful story of Peter and Mary in Du Maurier's glorious tale, "Peter Ibbetson." Here was a love truly beyond all human understanding—a love that endured through childhood, manhood and old age—a love that flamed with a brilliant intensity—a love that burned even beyond the grave.

As a novel, "Peter Ibbetson" left an indelible imprint on all who read it. As a stage play, and then again as an opera, idealized with music, it entranced those fortunate enough to have witnessed its performance. Now it is being brought to the screen by Paramount, with a devotion to casting and direction that promises to further deify, if possible, what is already recognized as an immortal work.

Gary Cooper has been chosen to portray the sincerity and manly manliness of Peter Ibbetson, while Ann Harding has won the coveted role of Mary, who was the Duchess of Towers. The screen play has been placed under the lucid and understanding direction of Henry Hathaway, who guided the destinies of "Lives of a Bengal Lancer."

As a living, breathing canvas that recreates the glamorous scenes and the passionate interludes of Du Maurier's story, the photoplay "Peter Ibbetson" gives every promise of presenting another screen masterpiece in this story of a love that will last through all eternity.

ELVIRA FERRI, Detroit, Mich.—The gentlemen with the lovely table manners in "Naughty Marietta" were Abe and Zeke played by Harold Huber and Edward Brophy respectively. Write them both at M-G-M. A great many of the stars have clauses in their contracts which permit them to make one or more pictures outside their own studio. Others are merely loaned by their own studio in exchange for a player from the other studio. Both of these instances apply to actors and actresses who go to England to make pictures.

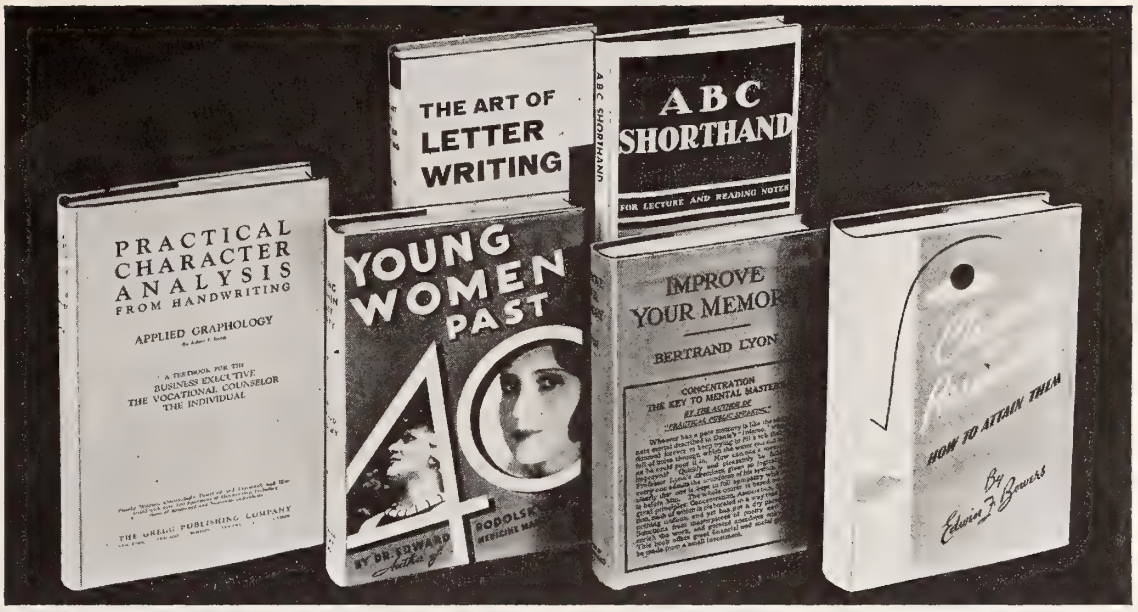
HELEN T., L. I., N. Y.; BETTY CULLEN, Alliance, Ohio; MARY POWERS, New York, N. Y.; MILLIE ITOEN, Hamilton, Canada; PATRICIA BIGGINS, University, Mo.; DOT TONE, Tonkawa, Okla.; LUCILLE LESER, Bay City, Mich.; RUTH DIX, Buffalo, N. Y.; GRACE GANG, Newark, N. J.; ANNA JEAN HOLLAND, Duluth, Minn.; FLORENCE STOCKHAM, Syracuse, N. Y.; BEATRICE HEILMAN, DOROTHY CARNEY, Philadelphia, Pa.—Franchot Tone's life has been as varied as the numerous and sundry roles he has portrayed on the screen. Born in Niagara Falls on February 27, he is the son of Frank J. Tone, an industrial executive. He has one brother four years older than himself, Frank Jerome Tone, Jr. Franchot attended small private schools and then entered the Hill school in Pottsdam, Pa., to prepare for Harvard. His brother, then attending Cornell, arranged for him to enter that University. He finished the course in three years, attended a summer session at the University of Ronnes in France, was president of the Cornell Dramatic Club while there, and served as an assistant to the head of the Romance Language Department, specializing in French. After graduation he joined a stock company in Buffalo and later appeared in a number of New York productions. When he was appearing in the Group Theatre production of "Success Story" he was signed by M-G-M to a long term contract. His first talking picture role was with Joan Crawford and Gary Cooper in "Today We Live." His favorite sports are golf and swimming. He sees all the movies he can and enjoys dancing in the evening for recreation. He plays an excellent game of bridge, and is a fiend for mystery stories. Officially speaking, he is not married, but rumor has it that he and Joan Crawford tied the knot some time ago. Even if rumor's wrong, he's still pretty fond of the gal. He is 6 feet tall, weighs 160 pounds and has light brown hair and hazel eyes. His next picture, "Mutiny on the Bounty," will give him a he-man role. Write him at M-G-M.

KEN McCORMICK, Garden City, N. Y.—You have every right to be impressed with the work of the office boy in "$10 Raise." Fox was so pleased with his (Bill Benedict's) work, that they have assigned him a role in Will Rogers' next picture. The lad is only 17, and his work in the aforementioned picture was procured by the strategic measure of telephoning to a casting director all the way from Oklahoma. Colossal crust—but profitable!

VIOLA SMITH, Greenwood, Del.; ANNREA NEILL, New York, N. Y.; R. C. MARKINS, Oshkosh, Wis.; SONNIE NORTON, Tampa, Fla.; MARGUERITE ARDOIN, New Orleans, La.; MARGARET EMERY, Warren, Ohio; NANCY LOWRY, Storm Lake, Iowa; DOROTHY CARLSON, MARY RUTH, L. I. City, N. Y.—The truth of the matter is that Randolph Scott was headed straight for an engineering career, but was sidetracked into the movies when on a vacation in Hollywood. Break for us! Born in Orange County, Va., on January 23, 1903, he was educated at Georgia Tech and the University of Virginia. His intention was to follow in the footsteps of his father as an administrative engineer. After the completion of his courses he spent a year in Europe and returned home to work in his father's firm for two years. Then came vacation time, and Hollywood his destination. Quite naturally he caught the "acting bug" and though he joined the Pasadena Community Playhouse group merely as a lark, he became so intrigued with the work that he stayed on for eight months. Seen by a Paramount executive in one of the plays, he was given a screen test, a contract and an assignment in "Sky Bride." Then followed a series of "horse operas"—Westerns to you—and it wasn't until he played in "Roberta" that the big-wigs discovered he could do something more than ride a horse. Since then he has appeared in "Village Tale" and "She" in straight acting roles. His next big break will come when he is seen opposite Margaret Sullavan in "So Red the Rose." He played football at Georgia Tech and that and travelling are still his two chief hobbies. He is 6 feet 2 inches tall and weighs 185 pounds, has light brown hair and hazel eyes. He is not married. You can reach him at the Paramount Studios, Hollywood, Calif.

ANNETTE MANO, Racine, Wis.—Yes, John Beal is married to a non-professional—and a very attractive wife he has, too. It is hardly necessary for Mae West to use padding—those curves are her very own. She is 5 feet 4 inches tall and weighs 116 pounds. Joan Crawford weighs 110. The lad who sang "Object of My Affection" in "Times Square Lady" was none other than the composer of that popular tune, Pinky Tomlin in person. He'll be in "Smart Girl" and "King Solomon of Broadway."

ELISE GAINES, New York, N. Y.; MISS A.R.E., Detroit, Mich.; HELEN WEINBERG, Springfield, Ill.; MISS S. ANDERSON, Chicago, Ill.; FLORENCE ROSER, Glen Rock, Pa.; MRS. LAURA GENE KRUM, Washington, D. C.; JOSEPHINE SCHLOTTER, Colorado Springs, Colo.; NELDA CARTWRIGHT, East Liverpool, Ohio—Charles Boyer, theatrical idol of France, is fast gaining the same reputation in these parts. Born in Figeac, France, on August 28, he graduated from the Sorbonne where he earned a degree in philosophy. Although his family wished him to take up a trade, he registered at the Conservertoire de Drama on the day of his graduation, and remained there for two years gaining an education in the theatrical classics. He was then engaged by the Theatre Antoine and his success was instantaneous. Paris, London and Berlin were eventually at his feet—and now America. He was horribly disappointed in his first picture, "Caravan," which he considered "silly." But the two following, "Private Worlds" and "Break of Hearts," have made him feel a little better about Hollywood movies. His most recent picture is "Shanghai" in which he appears with Loretta Young. At present he is in Europe, having sailed with his wife, Pat Paterson, two months ago. There he will stay for four more, in the belief that more than six months at a time in Hollywood would "smother him." He studied the violin for 9 years, but says he "knows nothing about it." He is 5 feet 9 inches tall, weighs 140 pounds, has brown hair, brown eyes and an olive complexion. Write him care of Paramount Studios, Hollywood, Calif. (Aside to Nelda Cartwright—The piece supposedly composed by Katharine Hepburn in "Break of Hearts" was written especially for her and has never been published.)



MILDRED LEACH, Bakersfield, Cal.—Robert Young's most recent picture is "Calm Yourself," in which he appears with Madge Evans. Jackie Searle played the part of Curtis as a boy, and William Henry that of Curtis grown up, in "A Wicked Woman." Bob Steele was born in Portland, Ore., on January 23, 1906.

HUBERMAN, Phila., Pa.; JOAN DEAL, Cynwyd, Pa.—Jeannette MacDonald one of the three talented daughters of Daniel and Anna MacDonald, was born in Phila., Pa., on June 18, 1907, of Scotch-American descent. There she attended grammar school, but completed the rest of her education in New York City, where her family moved. As a child she studied dancing and singing, and appeared in Ned Wayburn's Revue at the Capitol Theatre. When she graduated from this, she played a small part in "Irene," and then became understudy for the leading feminine players in "Tangerine." Jobs being scarce after that, she posed for commer-

PRACTICAL SHORT CUTS TO KNOWLEDGE - CULTURE - CHARM!

1. CHARM AND PERSONALITY—by Dr. Edwin F. Bowers

In this remarkable book the author, a prominent physician and psychologist, reveals the secret of acquiring charm through the development of a warm, magnetic personality. He believes that every woman can acquire a charming personality, and he tells you exactly how to go about it without torturous hours of study and effort. Some of the subjects discussed in this book are: The allure of beauty. . . . Laws and tricks of attraction. . . . A successful personality. . . . The charming art of being loved. . . . Life's thousand joys. . . . A design for living. It is a book you will read and re-read and find infinitely more helpful as time goes on. 250 pages, bound in special artcraft cloth binding. Price $2.00.

2. THE ART OF LETTER WRITING—by E. J. Strong, B. S.

Have you ever wanted to write an interesting, readable letter when you're on your vacation—and ended up by writing the usual "Having a wonderful time—wish you were here"? Here is a book that teaches the fundamentals of sound letter writing—business as well as social—in a very interesting, entertaining fashion. If you have a job, it will help you learn to write your own letters and make yourself more valuable. It is worth many times its cost to secretaries, sales correspondents and those to whom letter writing is an unknown art. Everybody wants the letters they write to be unusual—to compel respect and attention—and this book makes it simple and easy to acquire the art of writing such letters. 224 pages, carefully bound in cloth. Price $2.00.

3. IMPROVE YOUR MEMORY—by Bertram Lyon

Professor Lyon has written an extremely helpful book of great practical value. It has been written especially for those who are being unconsciously handicapped in their social and business lives by a poor or failing memory. The clear, concise directions in this book will enable you to improve your memory. It will stimulate your mind and make you mentally alert and progressive. The complete course, bound in this single volume, is based on the three great principles of concentration, association and repetition. A good memory increases your judgment, your vocabulary and your ability. 256 pages, bound in cloth. Price $2.00.

4. PRACTICAL CHARACTER ANALYSIS—by Albert J. Smith

Graphology is the science of reading character from handwriting. It is not a theory or belief, such as astrology, but an exact science. Handwriting experts are respected witnesses at civil and murder trials; many large corporations use their services in analyzing the handwriting of all applicants for positions. This book teaches you how to analyze handwriting—how to read character and form accurate opinions from the handwriting of any person. The book is profusely illustrated with over 300 specimens of handwriting, including those of renowned and notorious individuals. 200 pages, cloth bound, specially priced at $2.00.

5. A B C SHORTHAND—by William Allen Brooks

How often have you wanted to make notes in a hurry—to place on paper some important thought that came in a flash? How often have you felt that shorthand could help you in many ways—small and large? Here is an entirely new and different method. A B C Shorthand is written with the familiar letters of the English Language. No puzzling signs or symbols to memorize. You acquire such speed in 12 lessons as writers of other systems seldom acquire after months of tedious drills and practice. With the A B C method you do not require any instructors or school attendance. In 12 simple lessons you can learn shorthand yourself—in the comfort of your own home. Writers, students, secretaries—even busy housewives—use the easy-to-learn A B C shorthand for jotting down notes and ideas. The demand for this book has been so great that we have printed an unusually large edition, which enables us to reduce the price of the 12 lessons, complete, bound in cloth, to only $1.00.

6. YOUNG WOMEN PAST 40—by Dr. Edward Podolsky

The woman of 40, and the younger woman interested in learning the approaching problems of middle age, will find this book one of the most fascinating, instructive volumes ever written. The problems of the change of life are answered completely. The many questions that confront women at this time are answered frankly and authoritatively. Here you will find page after page of sound, practical advice—yet not a line wasted on theories, fads and long-winded discussions! It is a book you will find difficult to put aside once you start reading—it is practical yet fascinating; it spells the difference between illness and disease, misery, and happiness, old age and youth! Some of the 24 vital chapters are Wider Horizons . . . Food and health . . . Beautiful women past 40 . . . Plastic Surgery . . . Love in the middle years . . . Menopause, the great change . . . Unmarried women. "Young Women Past Forty" is a monumental volume. Bound in artcraft cloth binding. Special price $2.00.

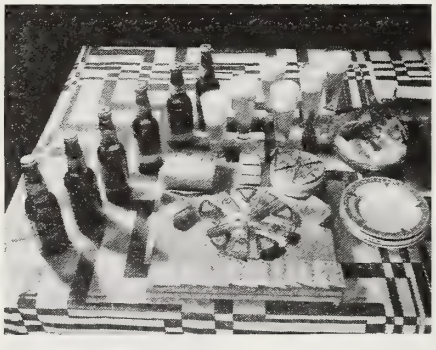
The Modern Hostess



Warner Baxter lunches lightly on beer, crackers and cheese in the studio commissary on a hot day.

ARE you a modern hostess? If you are, then you have wisely adopted, as I have, the new Hollywood way of entertaining in an easy, informal manner. There was a time, perhaps, when the film colony went in only for impeccable butlers, passing cocktails and trim maids dispensing canapés. But nowadays —and this is especially true in summer—a "party" among the film folk consists of a gathering of congenial souls at a barbecue in the garden, a corn roast at the beach, a Sunday supper at the ranch or some such affair where hosts and guests make their appearance in simple sports attire and the food served is as completely innocent of frills.

The Warner Baxters, I had heard, were famous for just such informal get-togethers at their beach home in Malibu. So, with the necessity for giving a party myself to spur me on, I decided to find out what kind of food Warner and his charming wife, Winifred Bryson, think appropriate to such an occasion. I finally cornered Mr. Baxter at a table in the studio commissary where he was just finishing a quick mid-day snack between scenes for "Blue Chips" his latest picture for Fox.

"I see you are lunching on beer and cheese," I remarked brightly as I seated myself opposite the attractive Mr. Baxter and surveyed the luncheon table very much as a general looks over the terrain before a battle. Not that I expected to battle with Warner, but you never know just how difficult this business of extracting food preferences from a movie star is going to be—especially when said star is a man! Imagine if I should say that Warner Baxter, the Cisco Kid, the gay Gaucho, likes dainty soufflés and fluffy desserts! Wouldn't you hate that? Wouldn't he! But don't be alarmed, I'm not going to tell you any such thing. No, Warner Baxter's tastes run rather toward substantial, typically masculine dishes and his wife gives orders that he shall always be served the kind of foods he likes.

Cold beer, all kinds of cheese, and potato salad are ideal for beach parties or light snacks.

By Marjorie Deen

When entertaining, especially, Mrs. Baxter always plans to have one or two of Warner's favorite dishes for she knows from experience that those foods will make a hit with the male guests. And do the women forget their calories and take a second helping? They do! And you won't be surprised when you hear more about these delectable treats.

But let's get back to Warner: we left him, you remember, busily spreading tasty cheese on crisp crackers, with a bottle of beer at hand—as it should be for such a meal.

"Our parties are not only informal but so are the refreshments we serve," replied (Continued on page 66)

cial photographers and worked as a fur coat model. A small part in a Greenwich Village production gave her a new start, leading up to prima donna roles in "Sunny Days," "Yes, Yes, Yvette" and "Angela." While appearing in the latter she was offered a movie contract but was forced to refuse because of her stage contract. But a year later Ernst Lubitsch signed her for Maurice Chevalier's leading lady in "The Love Parade." After the expiration of her Paramount contract, Jeanette went on a long concert tour through Europe, and on her return signed with M-G-M and is still under contract there. She is 5 feet 5 inches tall, and weighs 120 pounds. Her hair is red-gold, and her eyes are green. Her real name is Jeanette MacDonald, she has never been married, but seems to be permanently engaged to Bob Ritchie, her manager. She likes to meet new people, see new places, is fond of swimming, dancing, riding and the theatre. She plays the piano, reads mystery novels, and collects tiny figures playing musical instruments. Her next picture has not been definitely announced at this writing, but she will make another soon.

EDITH VERDE, Amsterdam, N. Y.—Richard Quine played the role of Jackie Shaw in "Dinky." He also appeared in "Dog of Flanders." He is free lancing, but you may be able to reach him at M-G-M.

Y.; MARY REPELLA, Mahanoy City, Pa.; HELEN ELIZABETH HAY, MARY ELLEN MALACARA, New York, N. Y.—Here, at last, is the "what's what" on Richard Cromwell. Starting from the very beginning, he was born Roy Radabaugh on January 8, 1910, in Los Angeles, Cal. He is of Dutch-American descent and has three sisters—Ann, Dorothy and Lillian—and one brother, Hudson. When Richard was eight his father died, and after having attended Long Beach public and high schools (where he devoted himself to amateur dramatics and art) he won a scholarship to the Chouinard Art School in Los Angeles. Meanwhile, he earned his living jerking soda. He eventually opened a studio which was patronized by many of the stars, and through them he heard indirectly that someone was needed to play the title role in "Tol'able David." He applied for the job on his own merits alone and, what's more, landed it, to his everlasting success. He was immediately signed to a long term contract by Columbia and it has been renewed each year since 1930. Dick is 5 feet 10 inches tall, weighs 150 pounds, has blue-green eyes and blonde hair. He has built himself a house in the Hollywood hills, and lives there alone. Says he has no desire to marry for several years. He plays tennis and swims; his favorite garment is a pair of old corduroy pants; eats oranges between meals; can scramble eggs (but that's all); dislikes having his picture taken; never misses a legitimate show; spends his free time writing and painting; and is forever hopeful that he will some day have time to travel. His next picture, on a loan to Paramount, will be "Annapolis Farewell" with Tom Brown and Sir Guy Standing. You can reach him at the Columbia Studios, 1438 N. Gower St., Hollywood, Cal.

JEAN MORT, Swissvale, Pa.—Gordon Jones played the part of Tex in "Let 'Em Have It," which was his first picture. Before that he had been a college football and track star in Los Angeles. You'll probably see him again before long.

REGINA LAYDEN, Roslindale, Mass.; ALICE HARKINS, Conshohocken, Pa.; JAMES GAFFNEY, Jersey City, N. J.; BETTY McKINNEY, Gary, Ind.; M. J. LUCKRITZ, Dubuque, Iowa; BERNICE MAZE, Tooele, Utah; M. BURNS, Pittsburgh, Pa.; SARAH YANELLO—Russell Hardie was born on a certain May 20 in Buffalo, N. Y., the son of William Hardie, a horseshoer. While attending Canisius College in Buffalo, and St. Mary's later on, young Hardie suddenly had a desire to take up acting. So, scarcely out of his 'teens, he joined a Buffalo stock company and for the next three years played stock in Atlanta, Memphis, Newark, Birmingham and Kansas City. Then came the day when he crashed Broadway in "Criminal Code," which was followed by four or five more important plays. When appearing in "St. Wench" with Helen Mencken, M-G-M offered him a contract. He clicked in "Men in White," and many more pictures which followed it. His very first picture, though, was "Broadway to Hollywood." He enjoys swimming and reading books on psychology. For relaxation he plays the piano and goes to the theatre. He's one of the biggest leading men on the screen, weighing 175 solid pounds and standing 6 feet 1 inch in his bare feet. He has curly brown hair and brown eyes. There is no Mrs. Russell Hardie. His next picture will be for Fox—"In Old Kentucky," which is Will Rogers' next. Write him at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.

Why Ex-Lax is the Ideal Hot Weather Laxative!

VACATIONS are made for fun. Every moment is precious. But often a change of water or diet will throw your system "off schedule"...and you need a laxative.

Ex-Lax is the ideal summer laxative for the following reasons given by a well-known New York physician:

1. In summer you should avoid additional strain on the vital organs of the body, even the strain due to the action of harsh cathartics. Ex-Lax is thorough but gentle. No pain, strain, or griping.

2. In summer there is a greater loss of body fluids due to normal perspiration. Avoid the type of laxatives that have a "watery" action. Don't "dehydrate" your body. Take Ex-Lax.

And Ex-Lax is such a pleasure to take—it tastes just like delicious chocolate.

So be sure to take along a plentiful supply of Ex-Lax. Ex-Lax comes in 10c and 25c boxes at any drug store.

★★★ Becky Sharp (Pioneer-RKO)

Not since Douglas Fairbanks made "The Black Pirate" years ago have we seen a feature-length color picture until this one. If for no other reason than that, you won't want to miss "Becky Sharp." The color is almost natural. We say almost advisedly, for it is vivid and very definite as yet, even in its nearly perfected state. However, Robert Edmund Jones, responsible for the picture's beauty, is due a deal of credit. The story is rather a character study than a plot, revealing the highlights in the varied career of a designing damsel of the "what I want, I take" school. Miriam Hopkins plays the woman convincingly, so convincingly in fact, that it almost seemed she must be temperamentally well cast. A bravo for Miss H! First acting honors, however, go to Nigel Bruce in the role of the rather dull-witted cinematic brother of the sweet Frances Dee, a trusting lass who was forever turning the other cheek. While Alan Mowbray gives a polished performance, we should like to have seen a more romantic-looking gentleman supplying the love interest, and why Mr. Mamoulian, director, has the cast screaming in a manner that put the spectator in training for a headache, is something that is entirely his secret. However, there is much to recommend "Becky Sharp"—and most of it color!

Looked like a jinx was hanging around this set for awhile. Through one disaster and another, the picture was held up for a coupla months. Miriam Hopkins was ill and just returned for work when Director Lowell Sherman suddenly died. Rouben Mamoulian was called in, but didn't use one foot of film shot by the former director. Mamoulian is Armenian by birth. He directed theatrical and operatic plays in that country and in England. Brought to America by Mr. Eastman, he was in great demand for Broadway plays and inevitably treked Hollywoodward. Directs only the brightest stars, however, and at one time was reputed to be Garbo's man of the hour . . . Miriam Hopkins is a favorite on Broadway and the screen. Has a son, Michael, four years old, and an ex-husband, Austin Parker. Continually on the wing between here and New York since she can't make up her mind which place she likes better. Frances Dee's story is too good to be true, but actually is. While out from Chicago visiting friends, she toured a studio and was prevailed on to sign up before leaving. Married to Joel McCrea, who swore he'd never marry a movie gal. They live on a huge ranch outside Hollywood, and have so far raised one son and several hundred head of cattle . . . Nigel Bruce is considered one of the best of the Britishers when it comes to acting. When it comes to acting up he's the international tops. The fact that Californians still speak to him is proof that he's pretty swell, for Nigel first saw the light in Ensenada, Calif., moved to England almost immediately, and, Native Son notwithstanding, can hardly wait to finish a picture before returning to his adopted shores . . . Alan Mowbray took to the air before the stage and was just as successful. Had the first air-mail pilot license in Canada and his own route for three years. In those days acting was only a hobby . . . Robert Edmund Jones is the real power behind the picture. He has designed all the stage sets, costumes and color schemes. Since his graduation from Harvard, Mr. Jones has been considered the finest stage designer in the country. His only other venture in the movie field was a colored short, "La Cucaracha."

★★★ No More Ladies (M-G-M)

Here's another Crawford glorification of the way of a modern miss in a modern world. And although the dear old censors have regulated Joan's activities, they don't seem to object to Bob Montgomery leading the gayest and giddiest of lives. So it's still good entertainment. This play was a success on Broadway and is handled expertly on the screen with a capable cast which includes Edna May Oliver, Charles Ruggles, Franchot Tone and Vivienne Osborne. Miss Oliver is simply grand as the shock-proof grandma who has two interests in life—her granddaughter and her highballs. She manages both with great astuteness. Charles Ruggles can have himself a better time while under the influence of Demon Rum than anyone we've yet seen and as the family pest he provides some grand comedy. Franchot Tone has very little to do or say, but he does it with a charming suavity and a more than charming smile. La Crawford swishes about in an array of glad rags that you won't want to miss and a new haircut that you won't want to copy. Her acting is notable for its restraint. However, Bob Montgomery walks off with the picture. He has his best chance at sophisticated comedy in a long time and makes the most of it.

Joan Crawford is the fan's idea of a "modern" woman. Though that famous flair for clothes she is credited with is really due to Designer Adrian, Miss C. deserves a few laurels for being able to take it. Famed as a glamor gal, Joan is noted around Hollywood for her good sense, pluck and generosity. Divorced from Don Juan Fairbanks,

TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

(Below) You've heard about "Becky Sharp"—Mowbray, Dee and Hopkins. (Bottom) Fred MacMurray, David Holt and Madge Evans in "Men Without Names," another G-man film.

(Below) The much-censored "Nell Gwyn"—Sir Cedric Hardwicke and Anna Neagle. (Bottom) Mary Ellis' and Tullio Carminati's singing in "Paris in Spring" will delight you.

Jr., Miss Crawford seems to find Franchot Tone sentimentally satisfactory. That immense ring weighing down her ring finger is not paste, but a star sapphire belonging originally to Franchot. . . . Mr. Tone, not so long ago, was seen ambling across the Cornell campus, bedecked in mortar board and flowing robes. Having accomplished that, he gave the Little Theatres the benefit of his talents and was soon traveling Hollywoodward. . . . Robert Montgomery revels in portraying young men who're as modern as tomorrow. Sometimes he does it pretty well, too. Admits that he was a very precocious child and we guess he's right, for his friends say that Bob is even "amusinger" off than on the screen. . . . Edna May Oliver, though she delights in her Early American home crammed with antiques, is never seen in anything but the last gasp in modern apparel—lurid pajamas, briefest of bathing suits and modish gowns. Miss Oliver has been a familiar figure on the stage for years and is as popular on Broadway as in the fillums. . . . E. H. Griffith, credited with directing the picture, actually only completed half of it before coming down with pneumonia. Probably just got homesick, though, for his ship-shape house is his favorite hobby. Looks like an ordinary house from the outside, but many a guest has become acutely seasick on stepping inside. Every room is built like a ship's cabin, while a huge mast runs right through the center of the house. . . . Charles Ruggles has been in pictures so long that he's lost count of the years. Still likes 'em, too. But his favorite occupation is raising dogs at the See Are Kennels here in Hollywood.

★★★ The Arizonian

Well, whether you laugh with it or at it, this picture is gonna provide you with some good, clean fun! Mr. Dix is the hero—and wotta hero! Fastens the villain with a gimlet gaze and fairly hypnotizes him into submission! Of course, there are moments—many of 'em—when his trusty rifle does the trick, and on one occasion, when the smoke screen erected by gun fire is raised, Rich is found surrounded by his enemies—all of them dead.. The boys have a treat in store in this one, even though it is a bit hard to take, viewed through adult eyes. Margot Grahame plays the cabaret singer with a British accent you could cut with a knife. The story's locale, remember, is strictly nineteenth century Western. Some fun, eh? But who is to quibble over a bit of miscasting when the outlaws are always upon us? Preston Foster, as usual, gives a nice account of himself, as do Louis Calhern and James Busch. Yep, if you like action, here it is—with a little self-sacrifice and a lot of love interest thrown in for good measure.

"SURPRISE!" SHIRLEY SEEMS TO SHOUT GLEEFULLY. For what a joy package of surprises this picture will be!

"Curly Top" is completely different in story and background from all the other Temple triumphs. This time, Shirley plays the mischievous, lovable ringleader of a group of little girls, longing for happiness and a home. Once again, she dances—she sings—in that winsome way which captured the heart of the whole world.

And . . . SURPRISE! . . . Rochelle Hudson, as Shirley's faithful sister, sings for the first time on the screen, revealing a rich, beautiful voice in a song that will be the hit of the year. Her song duets with John Boles—their wealthy and secret benefactor—lead to a love duet that ends in perfect harmony!

"Curly Top" is tops for Shirley . . . and that means tops in entertainment for the whole family!

A STAR OVERNIGHT . . . Henry Fonda zooms to stardom as the son of the soil who works on the canal to earn money for a farm.

JANET GAYNOR SCORES the greatest performance of her career as the fiery canal boat girl who accuses the man she loves of COWARDICE!

YOU... who loved "State Fair"... HAVE ANOTHER TREAT COMING!

Set in a dramatic, colorful era of American life now shown for the first time . . . when the speed of the railroad doomed the picturesque waterways . . . this story is a refreshingly new, vital, heart-warming tale of simple folk on the great Erie Canal, when it was one of the world's wonders, the gateway through which civilization took its Westward march . . . when its lazy waters rang with the shouts of swaggering boatmen, bullying their women, brawling with their rivals.

Through it all threads the romance of a kissable little miss who hides her sentimental yearnings behind a fiery temper . . . while a dreamy lad, homesick for the soil, contends for her affection with the mighty-fisted bully of the waterways.

The Countess Dorothy Di Frasso, famous for her entertaining proclivities, has departed for Europe. The Countess, you know, if you are up on things socially and cinematically (and even if you're not) has what it takes to put on a party—namely, shekels and wit. And puh-lenty of the latter! She it was, so legend hath it, who sent Gary Cooper that bright telegram some years back which so intrigued him that he looked up the lady in her Eye-talian villa one sunny afternoon and remained as the house guest of her and the Count for six weeks. That, you'll admit, comes under the head of being one of the most remarkable blind dates on record! However, now they don't even speak! Anna-hoo, while the Countess is doing the Riviera, Marlene Dietrich, having rented her Hollywood hacienda, is holding high the entertainment torch. Yep, the Dietrich is doing things in a big way socially since Von Sternberg is no longer her director. More power to her and it's about time, sez we!

The hard-hearted landlord who owns the apartment building in which Mae West resides has decided to be rough on dawgs—and rough on the tenants who own 'em. Yep, either you get rid of your hound or he gets rid of you. Ida Lupino, June Clayworth and several other beauties have obeyed the No Canine rule, but Mae will neither park her pups nor leave home. She's superstitious, is our Miss W., and has been so lucky since living in her present abode that she doesn't want to move. Besides, she's had the whole bloomin' apartment redecorated at her own expense in full length mirrors and white satin. Some show case in which to set off Diamond Mae!

It could only happen in Hollywood! Though the town is noted for its strange romances, the latest sample of love-in-bloom is the pay-off. The principals involved—and we mean involved—are the languorous Estelle Taylor and flippant Lee Tracy! Yep, we haven't seen Estelle billing and cooing so earnestly since the Jack Dempsey days, and while Lee's just looked lovesick these many moons around Isabel Jewell, he now looks practically seasick.

If Garbo's a good girl and eats her liver, the studio is gonna extend her vacation a week and perhaps George Brent will send her another postal, all of which will please the Swedish lady no end. You see, she is still said to be carrying the torch for Georgie who, like all males, occasionally fails in small attentions. For instance, one of the chief topics of conversation still around these parts is how Mr. Brent went airplaning the afternoon Greta invited him to play tennis. Well, maybe it's lack of interest and then again, maybe it's just technique!

Everyone says that some day Claudette Colbert is going to marry her physician-beau and everyone says that some day Norman Foster will wed Sally Blane and that, at last, Cesar Romero has found true love in the companionship of Betty Furness, and that Wendy Barrie now admits her "engagements" are strongly on the publicity side. But everyone said that Norma Shearer's new baby was going to be a boy—and everyone was wrong, so how can one be sure about what everyone says? Don't bother to answer.

Carole Lombard not only threw a party the other eve, but threw her guests around, too. The plot of the party evidently sprung from the Lombardian funny-bone rather'n her brain, for she rented the whole fun-house at the Venice Pier for the shindig! Of course, all the guests had to submit to the entertainment or be considered softies, and you should've seen the screen's glamorous gals and handsome he-men turned upside down, blown to bits and swirled in dizzying swoops on the various contraptions! But did they take it! You couldn't have kept Marlene Dietrich, Dick Barthelmess, Connie Bennett, Clark Gable or any of 'em away from their hair-raising fun. Several sprains, bruises and headaches were noted as the festivities progressed, but nothing daunted, they carried on. BUT the next day! Practically every actor and actress in Hollywood was reported ill at ease if not actually sick abed.

Even though Patricia Ellis has now taken an apartment of her own with her childhood nurse serving as chaperone and mentor, she is still a big baby and "taking it" from her friends. Seems that one night recently, Paula Stone invited Pat to "stay over." After settling the affairs of the industry, the two gals hopped into bed and were soon in the arms of Morpheus. Much later, Paula was awakened by a loud, resounding thud and discovered her erstwhile bedfellow in a heap on the floor. "Well," remarked Pat's unsympathetic hostess, "you can come in again, but the horse'll have to go!" And Miss Ellis has been dieting so strictly of late, too!

Seems like Will Rogers is Fox's "problem child." Mr. R. simply won't stick around on the set between shots. He's either off somewhere having a sandwich or writing his newspaper column or swapping stories with an electrician. Sometimes the director is ready to go "cuh-razy," but Will-to-you is a star and, even though he doesn't have to be handled with kid gloves, one can't exactly ask him to "stay put."

Fay Wray tells about the expert technical advisor on one of the pictures she made in England. He was allegedly well versed in all American customs, so when one scene called for a hot water bottle his objections were strenuous. American audiences, he said indignantly, wouldn't know what a hot water bottle was! Fay was intrigued and later inquired just how long he'd lived in America and where. The expert hesitated. "We-e-ell, y'see, all my time in America was spent in travelling. Ah, that is, travelling between New York and—and, er, M-G-M." Guess that explains everything.

'Member the blustering politician who made such a fuss about granting an interview, then cautioned the reporter to spell his three names correctly? Well, 'twould seem some film stars work like that. Joan Bennett for one. She's always acted like a distracted mother hen if photographers approached her while she had either of her daughters in tow. Joan even taught the offsprings the fancy art of ducking whenever a camera popped up. But recently a picture appeared in the newspapers showing the younger child and Joan. Later, Joan met the photographer who scooped the picture. She looked puh-lenty wrathy. "Lissen," said she, furiously, "if you want to keep your job, you'd better learn to spell Melisande's name correctly!"

Mrs. Richard Barthelmess has her troubles too, photographically speaking. Whenever the cameramen show up at parties and request her husband to pose with other guests, Mrs. Dick keeps them at bay 'til she's snatched cushions from various chairs and planted her husband on them. Three sizable cushions is her usual quota for making Dick look tall enough.

Mrs. Temple is as clever a business woman as she is a child-bringer-upper, evidently, as noted recently. One of the fan writers had thought up an excellent angle for a Shirley Temple story and approached Mrs. T. with the idea, showing her the advantages to Shirley from such favorable publicity. Mrs. T. understood all that, however, and the only thing she was concerned about, 'tis said, was whether the writer understood that from now on every writer who uses her little girl for a subject, must fork over 10% of the resulting pay-check! Curly Top must be savin' for that collitch education!

Perhaps you'll be treated to the Oakie charms for the next Tarzan picture! Seems that Jack has it on his mind that he either is Tarzan or should be. The other noontime, Jack wandered into the Paramount lunch room attired in a wildly designed woolen bathrobe. In a mood which matched his robe, he suddenly let out a war-whoop, and made a flying swing at the overhead chandeliers yelling, "Yippee! I'm Tarzan!" There was a mad rush for the door from several feminine lunchers—for Mr. Oakie had on only the bathrobe.

Richard Dix is going into the "Ole Pappy" business in a big way. It seems that Rich and his pretty wife had a hunch that Doc Stork would deal 'em out a little girl, and instead the Old Bird got generous and presented them with twin sons. You've doubtless heard that by now, but did you know that the day after the boys' arrival Mr. Dix was (Continued on page 54)

Norma returns

Temporary absence from the screen to have little Katherine has only made Norma Shearer more beautiful and glamorous. Now she is back at M-G-M making "Romeo and Juliet" and her fans await eagerly her return as the tragic Shakesperean heroine.

Tip-Top . .

Gingers Rogers having rested her tapping toes with a brief dash into the comedy-drama of "Star of Midnight" is back deftly following Fred Astaire's intricate pace and Irving Berlin's snappy music in "Top Hat." And it's top stuff!

New Find

Myrna Loy's hasty exit from the cast of "Escapade" was more than a lucky break for this charming Viennese, above. Luise Rainer is a bright new personality of rare beauty—don't miss her début.

Miss Glory

Although Marion Davies has had her make-up kit parked with the Brothers Warner for some time, "Page Miss Glory" marks her début under their regime. And did you ever see a more perennial charmer than Marion? All her sparkle and talent will be abetted in this gay opus by the singing Mr. Powell.

Dark Angel

Remember Vilma Banky in the silent version of "The Dark Angel"? Now it's exciting Merle Oberon who plays it with Herbert Marshall and Fred March.

G-Man.. Hello Again

It's quite some leap from being a grim member of "G-Men" to cavorting about as "Bottom" in Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" —but James Cagney takes it all in his stride and will uphold Erin next in "The Irish In Us."

And glad we are to see you back on the screen which has missed you these many years, Buddy Rogers. All your old fans and a host of new ones wait eagerly for "Old Man Rhythm." How about you and Mary Pickford . . . Huh?

Happy-go-Lucky.. Clean-Cut

If you think Bing Crosby is worrying about such trivial matters as a little extra girth, you're silly! With a nice Paramount contract tucked in his pocket and "Two for Tonight" scheduled, he occupies himself jovially with fishing tackle!

Old ladies and young are prone to murmur, "That nice Joel McCrea!" And that's what he gets for looking so darn wholesome. Anyway, Joel manages to live it all down with swell performances. His next is "Manhattan Madness."

We Disagree

Mrs. Temple says

JOEL McCREA was used to playing leading man opposite famous lady stars. In fact, Joel has been leading man to so many of Hollywood's most famous he thought none could surprise him.

Then he was cast in "Our Little Girl" with Shirley Temple!

Now, all leading men learn that certain "something" necessary to please the great stars with whom they emote. They learn those little tricks. In a long shot, the feminine star must stand nearest the camera if the man does not rate equal billing. In close-ups she must have that little edge in the lighting. On the set there is that hint of deference, that is perhaps slight, but nevertheless carries through the definite class distinction.

Hollywood is something like the army, you know. The extras on the set are the privates; the bit players the second lieutenants; the average members of the cast are first lieutenants and the leading man to a star is a major. But the star is the general.

And if you don't quite understand, I wish you could drop onto a set where Franchot Tone is playing in a picture with Joan Crawford. Off the set, Franchot may be the lead. Joan may listen to his every word as though it were a pearl of real wisdom, since it drops from lips trained by college professors. They may even be married, as so many suspect, and he may be her true lord and master at home. But on the set Franchot Tone is playing opposite Joan Crawford and no one ever forgets it, least of all Franchot Tone or Joan Crawford. It is just Hollywood's oldest custom—as is the distinction in the army.

If Shirley knows she is famous, no one else guesses and that is one mark of her true genius. Below, a cross-section of the merriest tapping toes in Hollywood. This is a pedal preview of "Curly Top!" You can call it the "Curly Tap" and learn it just by following the pictured positions.

I've gone to some lengths to make this situation impressive because it is impressive. And it explains the amazement of Joel McCrea after his first few days playing opposite Shirley Temple. Joel told a friend, "Well, there's certainly one place where Shirley Temple is not a big shot. On the set. She's a star, but nobody would ever know it. Least of all, Shirley Temple."

The friend said, "Joel was dumbfounded. He couldn't get over it. He kept talking about it. To play opposite a feminine star who was not a big shot—well, it couldn't be, yet it was!"

AND IT is! The little girl who gets more fan mail today than any man or woman in Hollywood; the diminutive blonde who holds a world laced between her chubby fingers—is the one Hollywood star who feels no social distinctions.

She must know. She can't help it. Shirley is too bright, too quick to grasp the portent of what is happening around her not to understand her own importance. And yet she is the one little woman who never, never makes anyone else feel it.

A great deal of credit has been given Mrs. Temple. It should be. Much has been attributed to Producer Winfield R. Sheehan, who's order is a law: Do not spoil Shirley Temple. Likewise, it should be. But I believe too little credit has been awarded Shirley Temple!

After all, it's Shirley Temple who makes you feel her personality—makes you aware or unaware she is the most popular young lady in the world of today. Although every precaution was always taken by mother, grandmother, producers and directors to keep Jackie Cooper natural—and although Jackie, himself, has always done his best, I can assure you that no one working on a Cooper picture ever forgets Jackie is a star.

"Shirley is not a genius," Mrs. Temple has said again and again.

And I am going to have the temerity to disagree with the mother of Shirley Temple. For I truly believe the tot has the rarest genius of all—the inborn knack of knowing how to please other people.

Not so long ago, Shirley Temple (on the set of "Curly Top") wanted coca cola. Her mother told her she might have some, but she could drink only down to a certain letter on the bottle. When she had gurgled through the straw (Shirley loves straws) to that letter, she looked at her mother and then placed the bottle carefully on the set, ready for the time she would be thirsty again.

Now, this was explained to me carefully as a crowning example of Mrs. Temple's discipline. "She lets Shirley have just so much 'rope' and if she steps over the line a fraction of an inch Mrs. Temple pulls in the 'rope,' figuratively speaking, and Shirley understands that her mother disapproves of whatever it is she has done."

ALL TRUE! But if you had seen Shirley's look—well, it was the look rarest to humans, the look of one who wants always to please rather than to be pleased! Shirley is too lively, too courageous, too full of real animal spirits to be just disciplined. If it were discipline, alone, she would frequently kick over the traces. She would go just a tenth of an inch over that line, like the majority of six-year-olds. There would be that natural spirit of daring. Shirley can dare just as well as any youngster, but where she differs is that she cannot dare if her intuition warns her that to dare is not to please another person.

You have read, of course, of how she makes paper baskets, colors pictures from magazines, weaves paper mats, etc., on the set between scenes. You know she adores it. But do you know why she adores it?

The moment she finishes one of her little works of art she runs and presents it to her leading man, her mother, her stand-in, a prop boy, her director, an extra! Her work is always neat, done with almost prim, childish precision. And anyone can tell you there is nothing prim about Shirley Temple. But a gift that is to please someone else must be neat. Perfect as she can make it. It cannot be hastily daubed. If Shirley were doing these little bits of handcraft because she liked it, wouldn't she be a bit careless? If she were just "working," as she calls it, wouldn't she rush, now and then?

I presume Shirley adores (Continued on page 83)

By Madame Sylvia

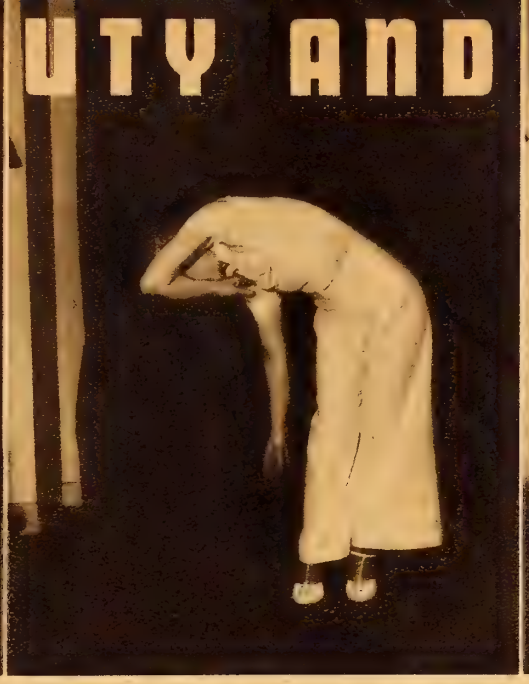
You'll be wearing your dresses two sizes smaller, if you do Sylvia's illustrated hip exercise daily for one month. Above, Sylvia and her feline companions, Finka and Kala.

WELL, darlings, here I am! All you fat gals, all you skinny gals, all you people who want health, happiness, success and vitality—this is Sylvia speaking!

I'm sure there are hundreds of you who have never heard of me, but, babies, we're going to get acquainted fast. Just wait until I start telling you how to slice off your hips, add weight to your thighs, get rid of that spare tire around your middle. In short, remodel your figure and face any way you choose. You're going to be healthy! You're going to be slim! You're going to be beautiful! Every one of you. How's that for you?

However, hundreds of letters that have poured in tell me that there are many of you who do know me already —people who have read my articles in other magazines, those who have heard me on the r[illegible] who have read stories about the work I did with the stars of Hollywood. To you I say, now that I'm with Modern Screen, just watch my smoke! I'm going to give you something new and different, tell you things I've never told before and give you a brand new stunt to try.

So-o-o, to the readers of Modern Screen, greetings!



That sounds like a Christmas card or the beginning of a lecture, doesn't it? Okay, we'll let it stand because I'm here to give you not only a Christmas present, but an all-year-'round present. And along with the gift you'll get a lecture such as you've never had before.

It's all yours. Can you take it? I've remodeled the figures and faces of hundreds of motion picture stars. What I did for them can be done for you. But I warn you that you're going to work just as they worked. There will be no ifs, ands or buts—they're out! You will snap out of your lazy, sluggish ways, use your common sense and follow my instructions exactly.

I WON'T hand you a lot of soft soap. I won't flatter you and call you "milady," as a lot of beauty writers do. That isn't my way. For years I gave it to the stars, straight from the shoulder. I was honest, frank, sincere. I got results. They took it from me because they had to, because beauty was their stock in trade. Well, let me tell you something. Your biggest seller, no matter what job you do, is your face and your figure. When you have a lovely, slim figure, when your skin is smooth and clear, when your eyes radiate vitality and pep, the world is yours!

You don't need classic features. If classic features were the only requirement, plenty of our biggest movie stars would be pounding the pavements. But what you do need and what any woman from eight to eighty can have is slenderness, energy and health.

Are you ready, girls? Will you string along with Sylvia? Will you let me bawl you out and take you down and build you up? You will? That's swell. Because this I know: if you've got the courage and the will power and the stick-to-it-ive-ness, you can be anything you want to be, have any boy friend you like, get the jobs that suit you! Beauty and success are within the grasp of every woman.

And now I want to tell you about the present I'm going to give you. As you know, I treated Jean Harlow. The girl who came to me several years ago and the girl you see on the screen today are almost two different people. What I did for Jean any girl can do for herself. I'm going to show you the way, so that's why last month the editor of this magazine asked every girl who thinks she looks anything like Harlow to send me her picture.

You don't need platinum hair, either. Jean didn't always have it. We can change your hair, make it red or blue or green, if you like. No, your hair can be black or brown or dark blond so long as your face or your figure bears some resemblance to Harlow, the movie star, or Harlow, the little girl who first came to Hollywood.

But Jean isn't the only one who has changed completely in the last few years. Look at Joan Crawford. Study her face and figure carefully. Would you like to be as she is today? Very well, then, all you girls who think you look like Crawford send in your pictures. When all the pictures are in I'm going to select the girl who is basically the most like Joan Crawford. To the one that wins I'll send a long personal letter, telling her how to keep the beauty God gave her and how to remodel what needs remodeling.

AND I'M going to do more. I'm going to print that girl's picture in this magazine. Having your very own picture in MODERN SCREEN is a thrill, isn't it? And who knows to what it might lead? Girls have been selected by their photographs alone for Hollywood stardom many times. Norma Shearer posed for commercial photographers, as did many others. Having your photograph in MODERN SCREEN might be the open door to success, because lots of times when stars get temperamental the executives sign up girls who resemble them as a sort of whip. Anyhow, we'll see. So all you girls who bear a resemblance to Crawford send me your pictures. The more I receive the better I'll like it. I'll announce the winner in a couple of months.

And now to show you that my heart's in the right place I'm going to lead off this series with a brand new exercise for reducing the hips, an exercise I've never printed before. Also I'm going to give you a grand diet. No, I don't like the word "diet." When you say that everyone immediately thinks of starvation—poor women with hollow cheeks, drawn faces and haggard expressions. I'd rather call what I give you "sensible eating." For in my routine you get enough chemicals to satisfy the system, to give you clear, pure, rich blood and strong nerves that will pull your muscles in place.

Summer is about over. You're anxious to look fine in your evening clothes for the winter dances, but you've put on weight. On the beach you've taken improper exercises that make muscles instead of tearing them down. You've done hand-stands and thrown beach balls and have done a lot of swimming. And that has made you hungry, so you have gobbled a lot of hot dogs and have drunk a lot of soda pop. Oh, boy, what that sort of food will do! Do I need to tell you or can you look in the mirror and see for yourself? You're especially big around the hips, aren't you? (Continued on page 77)

REALIZING everyone would like to visit Hollywood, MODERN SCREEN wants you to know exactly what you should see in Hollywood and what it will cost you to stay there one week, one month or one year. This is a tourist's guide of exact information.

Three railroads, two transcontinental airlines and a large number of bus lines serve Los Angeles. This writer's family has just travelled from coast to coast by auto. The gasoline and oil for a six-cylinder, medium-weight car cost $57.77. Tourist camp accommodations ranged from $1.25 to $2.50 for three people, inclusive. There was no town or city on the Lincoln Highway where one could not secure an excellent meal for fifty cents. In many smaller towns, hotel accommodations were less expensive and better than tourist camps. The trip from New York to Hollywood takes from nine to fourteen days, depending upon weather conditions. Total cost of trip for three adults and one large dog: $152.24.

If you travel by rail, do not expect to see Hollywood celebrities en route unless you pay $10 for the privilege of riding on "The Chief." Although there are many luxury trains to the coast, this is the only "extra fare" one and is designed principally for Hollywood studio travel. The stars do not patronize it because it costs more but because they are more protected. When Olive Borden was one of the most popular and highest-paid actresses, I travelled across the country on a non-extra fare train with her. Although Olive liked the crowds at the station, the friendly passengers who knocked continually on the drawing-room door, the host of reporters who swarmed on at the cities, we were both so exhausted when the trip was over we scarcely could be courteous to the friends who met us.

Most Hollywood celebrities enjoy attention. It is the final proof of fame, their goal from the beginning. But they have just so much strength and can only protect it by privacy when they travel so you will not meet them on busses or every-day trains.

Now, aeroplanes are different. If you board a swift, transcontinental plane you are likely to run into some "big shot" from Hollywood. Connie Bennett flies across several times yearly, usually accompanied by Rex Cole, her business manager, for company. Somehow, there's a feeling of comfort, when you are 10,000 feet in the air to have someone you know up there with you. Mary Pickford, Gary Cooper, Katharine Hepburn, Wally Beery, Margaret Sullavan, Ruth Chatterton, Kay Francis, George Brent usually fly. The accident which killed Senator Cutting, injured director Richard Wallace and others of the Paramount company, happened on the day before Myrna Loy was to wing eastward. Friends urged her to change to the train but Myrna only laughed and boarded the plane. You'll find that most Hollywoodites are fatalists. They depend instinctively upon the lucky or unlucky break. Myrna waited nearly ten years for a "Thin Man" to make her a star. It would come or it wouldn't! She would be killed or she wouldn't!

BUT IF you expect to meet Myrna Loy on a plane, you'll have to be an extra-clever detective to make certain ahead of time because the aeroplane companies won't tell. Their passenger list is a deep secret until the take-off. Then the publicity breaks and a star, traveling via air, gets twice as much publicity space in the newspapers as one spending four days on a train being courteous to fellow-passengers, autograph seekers and reporters.

Whether you reach Los Angeles by train, bus or plane, you land at least eight miles from Hollywood. The plane sends you to your destination by bus but you must provide your own transportation otherwise. Taxis are expensive. You should allow at least $5 round trip (including tips). You may have your luggage sent by truck for approximately $1 (one way) and take the red-car (ten cents) which runs directly down Hollywood Boulevard.

Hotel accommodations vary, naturally, according to luxury and location. The Roosevelt hotel, in the center of Hollywood, has some rooms that are living quarters by day and bedrooms by night. All with private baths. Cost: approximately $6 daily (double). Other hotels dot or edge the boulevard (The Christie; the Plaza, etc.) where accommodations may be secured from $3 to $5. If you come in your own car, parking by the night is fifty cents but special rates may be secured in fire-proof garages for as low as $6 monthly or for $4-$5 in private, wooden garages.

Small, little-advertised but comfortable hotels may be found on side streets, running from the boulevard, for $2 nightly or $50 monthly. Although the "swank" is missing, the rooms are clean, comfortable and have private baths. To find them, take the Los Angeles telephone book, look under hotels in the classified advertising section and ask any drug store attendant to help you place the localities. You will find the average clerk in Hollywood extremely courteous as long as he may put in his plug for the "unusual weather." Here is a tip: Never discourage a Californian (Continued on page 89)

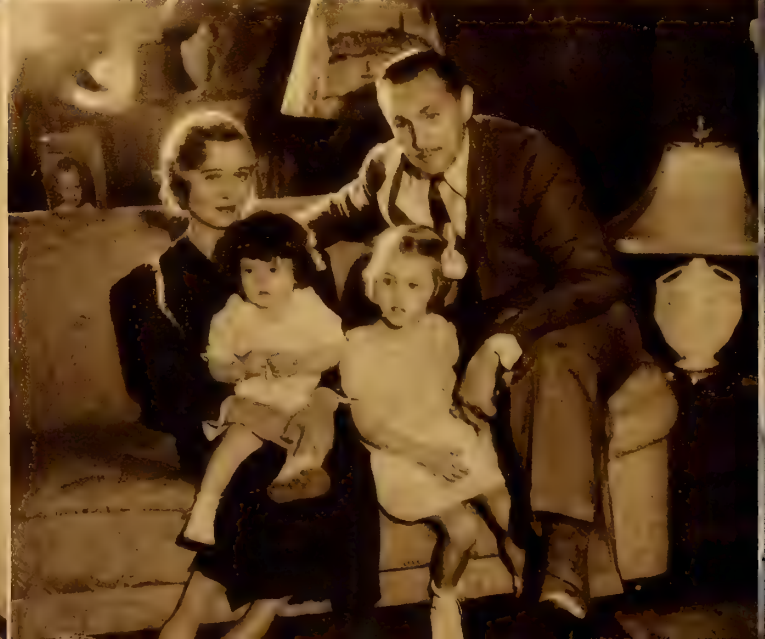
His marriage to Dolores made a different man of Jack Barrymore —but this was not to last.

The Most

SHE was the most beautiful bride I have ever seen. Her face was as delicate as the lillies-of-the-valley clasped to her shoulder by a diamond pin. Her personality was as dainty as the spider-web lace draped over her bisque slip. Her eyes were great moonbeams shining with faith from their heaven.

When she had been pronounced the wife of John Barrymore, I slipped away to see her father, Maurice Costello, who had not been invited to the wedding.

He was ill in bed. He clutched the worn coverlet in one hand and the battered bedside with the other. There were tears in his eyes, on his cheeks, in the whiskers of an unshaven chin while he talked.



"I did all I could to stop that marriage. God knows, I lost my home, job, the affection of my children in trying to stop it. Why, John Barrymore is of my generation—not Dolores'."

He did not paint a pretty picture. I did not write one word of it—then. Who could tell that radiant young girl, who had just taken the most sacred vow of life, her father's grim story?

Today, it seems as though Maurice Costello may have been a prophet. This is the story he told me.

"I was not in Hollywood when my family first came. They had been here nine months when I arrived. Dolores was already playing in 'The Sea Beast' with John Barrymore. I objected to his association with Dolores as I would have expected a father to object to my association with a very young girl under the same circumstances.

"Funny, my divorce was granted on Dolores' birthday, September 17. Everyone says I'm going to sue John Barrymore for alienation of my children's affections. My lawyer helped me write them a letter which should answer that. It ended, 'I have given my forgiveness and blessing for a long and happy wedlock. Lovingly, Dad.'

"I am something like John Barrymore myself and that is the reason I do not want him for the husband of my baby. Barrymore's contract is typical of the man. No one has anything to say except Barrymore. He has the final word on everything: cameramen, extra girls, electricians. He always will. God help Dolores!

"Barrymore was standing one day on a balcony arguing with one of the Warner brothers. Dolores chanced to walk out. Barrymore said, 'Who's that girl?'

" 'Dolores Costello.'

" 'All right, I'll have her as my leading lady in "The Sea Beast."'

"That ended that and this began. One morning I, came down to breakfast, not long after my arrival. I can remember that conversation word for word. Like to hear it? All right. Dolores, Helene and her mother were there.

"I began, 'I am going to step out of my character for a moment.'

" 'What character?'

" 'The character of minding my own business. John Barrymore is no man for Dolores. In the first place, he's old enough to be her father. In the second place, he's a married man. (Michael Strange had not yet divorced him.) In the third place, he's a gigantic mass of contradictions. He comes just too close to being a really great man.'

"My wife answered, 'Why, John Barrymore's made Dolores a star.' (Continued on page 78)

Advance Model

She's not of the glamor school; she's 'way ahead of it, something zippy, gay and new. An exciting personality is Rosalind, Hollywood says she'll go far. And she's well on her way in "China Seas" with Clark Gable and Jean Harlow.

Meet Rosalind Russell, a sprightly new version of young-star-to-be!

By Faith Service

STREAMLINE stardom—airflow lines—advance model—that is Rosalind Russell!

"She's going places," that's what they say of her—the critics, fans and studios—here in Hollywood and elsewhere.

In "Evelyn Prentice," "The Night Is Young," "The President Vanishes," "The Casino Murder Case," "Forsaking All Others," "China Seas," "Reckless"—she's had fattish parts and fervid recognition in all of them.

Her next role will be opposite Bill Powell in a Loyish part. "Ha," they say—the types who always insist that Little Willie is the spittin' image of Great-Aunt Belinda—"ha, she's like Myrna!" But she isn't. Nothing mysterious or enigmatic about "Roz." Her brain does a perpetual somersault, her tongue a sprightly marathon. She's not like anybody yet jelled in gelatin. She has no predecessors. She's bound to have "descendants." She doesn't copy. She will be copied. We may be in for a Russell rash. She is an original, others will be carbons. She's set a new style in stars—advance model—this girl.

'Ware there, all the old established stars, the new model is out!

BACKGROUND? Uh-uh, no contest winner, no foreign importation, no dark lady willing to give all for her art. None of the old legends. But this:

A rambling, jolly family home in Waterbury, Connecticut. A spacious Park Avenue apartment for the winter seasons. Seven children in the warm and gracious family circle. A mother and father so profoundly in love that they blushed when they looked at each other, after twenty-five years of married life. Real marriage. A home where love lived—that was Rosalind's background.

Memories of that delightful, dear home when the seven were children together—riding, all seven of them, each on his or her own horse. "We looked," said Rosalind, "like the Connecticut Cavalry in action."

Mother and Dad going off on their annual six months' trip together—'round the world, to Europe, to South America, always honeymooning. The sudden decision to go; it was always sudden. Then the children dragging down luggage, helping to pack, the lusty Irish woman who could be "trusted" and who stood guard while Mother and Dad were away. Mother's birthdays and the family ritual—the seven children summoned to Dad's office, asked, each in turn, what he or she had planned for Mother's gifts. Small Rosalind's turn: "I thought a black suede bag." Dad's quick nod, "That's good—how much will it cost?" Rosalind blandly, "Twenty-five dollars."

Of course, she told me, it wouldn't cost that much and she knew it; ten at most. She said, "We were demons." Then the seven going shopping and returning to Dad's office while he inspected each (Continued on page 68)

The Theatre's Loss

Walter Huston turns movieward after a successful year in "Dodsworth"

By Adele Whitely Fletcher

HAVE you ever stopped to think how the least decision we make can change our entire life? How a chance word or a chance act can turn an unhappy pattern into a happy pattern. Or vice versa. The threads upon which our destinies hang are so very slender.

Take, by way of striking example, the case of Walter Huston. But for a chance activity in a school dramatic club he would be an engineer today, not an actor.

I saw him when he was in New York recently, en route for England, where he will play the title role in "Rhodes, Empire Builder," for Gaumont-British. The hotel suite in which we talked, over Scotch and soda, might have been a stage setting for a sophisticated man about town or a more typical matinée idol. Beyond the windows, hung with stiff gold taffeta, the towers of Manhattan formed a severe, geometrical pattern against the spring dusk. The walls were black, gold striped. The ceiling gold. The carpet black. And there were red and gold parchment lamps of a formal Empire design to light the scene.

Walter Huston didn't look as if he belonged in any such room. His gray eyes have the narrowed look which comes from long stretches in the sun. In his slightly weather-beaten neck there are deep wrinkles. When he laughs deep lines radiate from his eyes. There are patches of iron gray in his hair. And if you notice his clothes at all it is because of their excellent tailoring. He looks so much more like the engineer he started out to be than like an actor.

Walter Huston didn't look as if he belonged in any such room. But he enjoyed being in such a room. Because he is an actor. And as an actor has learned to enjoy life and all the luxury and beauty and charm it has to offer. And as an actor hasn't been obliged to spend his life adjusting himself to practical, routine demands, and to pay for his success—as too many business men do—by his very joy of living. Also acquiring in the bargain a holy horror of anything not one hundred per cent conservative.

All of which he knows himself. For he's intelligent and analytical enough to realize that he has come to a much fuller, richer life than he ever would have known had he continued in the engineering world. Or in almost any other world.

"I'm darn grateful for that school dramatic club," he says, "because it whetted my appetite for the theatre to such a degree that I couldn't stay away from it."

He talks very quietly. He isn't even slightly the exhibitionist who loves the sound of his own voice.

"Acting," he went on, leaning back in the small black satin sofa which stood in the embrasure of a window, "you touch the highspots of living. For instance, I go to Washington and I'm invited to meet the President. I play a submarine commander in a certain film and for weeks I'm working with high naval officials and learning a tremendous amount about the sea, about submarines. I come to New York now, on my way to England, and Mr. John Hays Hammond invites me to spend an evening with him and we talk of Rhodes and of Africa until I leave steeped in all that adventure and romance. In England I'm to make a presentation of some kind to the King.

"One interest leads to another. Constantly. Life is stimulating and colorful. (Continued on page 82)

Walter Huston could have long-term contracts galore, but he prefers to do a movie or a play, as he desires.

From the stage play "Dodsworth" with wife, Nan Sunderland. And now he's in "Rhodes, Empire Builder," for G-B.

Gary Cooper isn't the shy, timid soul he used to be. The change which has come over him was first apparent in his animated characterization in "Lives of a Bengal Lancer." As a result of his excellent work, Paramount cast him opposite Ann Harding in "Peter Ibbetson." He will be Marlene Dietrich's leading man in "The Pearl Necklace."

In a single year Gary Cooper has become a changed man. Here's why Hollywood has a new Gary Cooper! He is not, of course, a completely new human being but an adult who is the outgrowth of the bashful, gawky, restless recruit who stumbled accidentally among us ten years ago. Ten years is a long time but it has taken a long time for the boy-Gary to become the man-Cooper.

Men are usually slow in slipping from tempestuous adolescence to the more intriguing maturity. Some never make the transition. Many of us feared Gary was fated to the perennial youth which has helped to wreck the personal happiness and professional career of many an actor. And I believe there was this very real danger until that invisible Something which controls our destinies wielded three influences marking a terrific change in Gary, reshaping his life into a new pattern.

Marriage! "The Lives of a Bengal Lancer!" A series of fan-magazine stories!

Since all three came in a single year, it is impossible to segregate their influences. We must look at them together, as they were handed to him.

Gary dislikes to have anyone write about him in his relation to women. In the old days, he hesitated to talk about them because he did not know what to say. He did not understand them and was afraid of sounding dumb. Today, he refuses because he believes his private life is nobody else's business. A proof in itself that he has graduated from fearful boyishness to firm adultism.

But Gary understands, today, also that all men either grow up or remain like "little boys" largely because of their experiences with women. To the boy, women are mysterious, ethereal creatures never quite understood. They are on that "other side" of an invisible wall which they continually try to climb. Until they do, they are boys. If they never manage to scale the top, they are still boys.

Naturally, woman is clever. She does not want man to make that jump—to come to really know, completely understand her. For when he does, woman loses her most adroit weapon in bending man to her will and her whims. She loses that czarina domination!

Gary began wondering about women in Montana. They were even more wondrous, more mysterious to him than they are to most boys because Gary was raised on the plains where his only companions were tough, hard-drinking, story-spinning cowboys, scurrying chipmunks, wise-eyed owls, threatening coyotes, and his Victorian, idealistic mother and father. No sisters, one brother. He understood these—he dreamed of women as he dashed like a whirl of wind itself on his saddleless ponies. And he dreamed them to be more delicate, more wonderful than any boy who has played hide-and-seek or jumped rope with the neighborhood girls. It was only natural he should become easily influenced by what he had dreamed to be God's most marvellous creation.

A woman influenced Gary to enter Grinnell College in Iowa. A white-haired, tender-hearted woman yearning in her schoolroom over the destinies of other women's children. A girl influenced Gary to seek a security-for-living in the big cities where quick advancement for quick marriage seemed more assured than the former rustling cattle, guiding tourists through national parks or sitting in small offices in small Montana cities. He considered New York. "I couldn't bear the thought of walking in those chasms between false walls or watching the imitation pinnacles of skyscrapers after the real chasms and pinnacles of nature in our mountains in Montana," he once told me. He heard that Los Angeles sprawled over mountain top and desert, so he went there.

He had intended to write the girl in Grinnell College daily letters. But a man who stumbles, half-starving, during the day from door to door selling—or rather not selling—photograph coupons can spend little energy writing letters at night. And when he stumbled, through sheer accident, into his first extra role as an archer in a Tom Mix picture, wearing a pair of green tights and with feather in cap, he caught sight of Billie Dove, Tom's leading lady. Now the sight of Billy Dove, with her truly exquisite beauty, has made the greatest male cynics decide they know little, after all, about women. Gary decided to remain in this strange, new pasture into which he had ridden.

I do not know that he ever saw Billie again. But it wasn't very long before all the women in Hollywood were eyeing this tall, well-knit figure who ambled around Hollywood with a combination of wistful (Continued on page 80)

Gary admits that he owes a lot to women. Above, Sandra Shaw, his charming wife.

The Confessions

She wanted to be a great path thorny. Continue

Part 2

THIS IS the second of a series of articles written by a Hollywood extra girl, who, since she is still working in pictures, must not reveal her name. As her story progresses you will realize how important it is to her career that her confession remain anonymous.

Last month she described her arrival in Hollywood, determined to become a star in a year's time. Discouraged when a cheap director of a small "quickie" company insulted her, she decided that she would steer clear of the offer made to her on a bus by an artist, who wanted her to pose for a stocking ad. But when she discovered on a Saturday that she had lost ten dollars and only had a few pennies to last her until Monday morning, when she couldn't get in the bank, she went to the artist's studio early Sunday morning, thinking she would make a few dollars. Now go on with her exciting adventures.

WHEN I arrived at the artist's studio the door was opened for me by the man I had met on the bus. It seemed as if he hardly recognized me. Hurriedly he said, "Oh, yes, it's you. Come in." And then he turned, leaving me standing there looking foolish, and went on talking to the other man I now saw in the room.

"But I tell you," the artist said, "it can be done. Acting is a spurious art. It is imitative, not creative. The stars simply do what the directors tell them—and that's all."

Standing in the cluttered studio, unnoticed by the two men in the room, I looked about me. There were the usual artists' materials, the easel, pallette, tubes of paint, sketch books, model throne, etc. In one corner sat the artist and another man—an older man, grey at the temples, well dressed. They were having not only breakfast, but a violent argument. Although the smell of hot buttered toast and bacon tantalized me—for I had not eaten since noon of the day before—I stood quietly in the middle of the room and awaited the next move.

I HEARD the older man saying, "You're all wrong, Bradley. A good actor combines technique with emotion. It is as fine and as subtle an art as a painter's."

"Nonsense," said the artist, "the actor's emotions are pseudo. His technique is a bag of cheap, clap-trap tricks." I waited patiently. Suddenly he turned and looked at me. "Now, take this girl here," he said to the older man, "young, inexperienced—never had a real emotion in her. Give her a good director and she can act as well as your greatest stars."

"Take this young girl, she's never had a real emotion," said the older man to Bradley.

I was terribly hungry. And I was mad, too, at being left standing there while these two star but she found the her exciting adventures had an argument and ate breakfast. "You're a liar," I shouted. "I have had real emotions. Right now my most real emotion is hunger." And I began to cry.

They both laughed. Without introducing me to the other man, the artist made a place for me at the little card table, buttered some toast and poured a cup of coffee. They both looked at me as if I were something under glass in a museum. "I'll tell you what I'll do, Bradley," the older man said, "we'll make an experiment. Do you consider me a good director?"

The artist nodded.

"Then we'll give this little inexperienced girl, with or without emotion, a test. You claim she'll be a great actress. I say she may or may not show a little native ability and that's all."

"It isn't fair," the artist protested. "She needs background, setting, any number of things."

"Backing down?" the director laughed. "What you're saying is just what I'm saying, that one must have technique to be a good actor. But you were arguing differently a moment ago."

The artist laughed now, too. "All right, my original statement goes. We'll give the kid a test."

NOW CAN you movie-struck girls imagine my mooted emotions at this point? Can you imagine how I felt hearing these two men deciding, so it seemed to me, my fate; holding the thing I wanted most in the world, a screen test, in front of my nose, then jerking it away and then dangling it again; doing it all perfectly casual, over a breakfast table argument; acting as if I were a piece of furniture; paying no attention to me as a person at all and yet giving me a glimpse of hell and paradise all in a few short minutes.

I sat quietly by. I had made a mistake during my first week in Hollywood by being too impetuous when the "quickie" director offered me a role. This experience was almost too good to be true and I was determined not to spoil it. One word from me might make them change their minds. I could not keep my hand from trembling as I put the sugar in my coffee, but I could certainly keep my mouth shut.

I was there, so I thought, to pose for a stocking ad, but I did not mention it. I had been hungry a moment before, but I was hungry no longer, for the director said, "Come on, then, we'll take a run out to the studio and shoot the test right away."

My heart leapt. This was too good to be true.

The artist said, "But I've got some work to do."

My heart sank. Would I lose this, my only, chance?

"Backing down?" the director asked again, with a broad grin on his face.

My heart stood still. I couldn't imagine how this would end.

"You're a liar," shouted the girl. "Right now my most real emotion is hunger."

Making people laugh is Edna May Oliver's fate

How can you help liking her?

By Franc Dillon

THE company making "No More Ladies" at M-G-M had gone to lunch. The set was dark on the huge sound stage and, I thought, deserted, until I heard unmistakable sounds of an argument coming from an obscure corner.

My reportorial temperature rose when I recognized the voice of Edna May Oliver. "A fight!" I breathed to myself, as I tiptoed closer to hear what was going on.

"Why do you eat that stuff?" Miss Oliver demanded of Oliver Marsh, the cameraman on the picture. "Why don't you bring some sandwiches from home?"

Oliver was sitting on a stool just off the set, eating his lunch from a tray and, apparently, was just as surprised as I was at this sudden onslaught.

"I don't have time," he replied weakly.

"No time! No time!" she repeated with a scornful sniff. "You have a wife, haven't you? You've been home sick with stomach trouble for three days and look at you—eating those soggy-looking sandwiches and drinking ice-cold milk! Why don't you eat whole wheat bread? No wonder you're sick!"

And, with a gesture of exasperation, she walked away.

To the casual observer she seems fairly to bristle at times, and to those who don't know her it would seem she is a meddlesome person. But to Mr. Marsh, or anyone who knows her, that incident is just another proof of her concern for the welfare of anyone with whom she has the slightest contact.

"That poor boy is sick," she explained to me. "He should have something hot for his lunch."

Another side of Edna May Oliver had been revealed to me.

Making people laugh is easy for her. In fact, they'll generally laugh whether she wants them to or not. This fact was illustrated a few moments later when the entire company of actors, including Joan Crawford, Franchot Tone, Robert Montgomery and others returned from lunch and work was resumed.

"I smell smoke," Miss Oliver said suddenly, stopping in the middle of a scene, wrinkling her nose (you know her wrinkling system) and sniffing dramatically in every direction.

Now, a fire any place within the confines of a studio is a very serious thing, but everyone on the set began to laugh.

"I do," she insisted. "I smell smoke. Something is burning!"

Continued and louder laughter was her reward.

"Well," she said resignedly, "I suppose the place could burn down and no one would believe it if I spread the alarm. No one takes me seriously."

The fact that there was smoke, which was caused by some crossed wiring, made the situation even funnier to Edna May's co-workers. They gleefully accepted the fact that she had noticed it before they did as a humorous tribute to the efficacy of her characteristic, high-powered sniff.

Edna May Oliver, comedienne, came into being when the discovery was made that (Continued on page 74)

Miss Oliver wanted to be a dramatic actress but—

Edna May's humor never fails to delight audiences.

Baxter's Best Girl

Did you know that Warner's mother, pictured with him below, has handled all of his fan mail since 1915? And she wouldn't give up that job for the world.

by Harry T. Brundidge

A SCENE as touching as anything he ever played upon a screen was enacted just the other afternoon in the palatial home of Warner Baxter, atop the rugged Bel-Air Hills. Baxter had a showdown with his mother, the beloved Mrs. Jennie Barrett Baxter, a widow since Warner was three months old. The showdown had to do with Warner's fan mail. Now it must be understood that ever since that day in 1915 when Warner received his first fan letter, Mrs. Baxter has been head of his fan mail department, and has watched it grow from a letter a month to thousands each week. She has read and handled every letter! And now Warner had heard that his mother, just turned sixty-six years, had been to an eye specialist—was having trouble with her eyes. Thus, the showdown.

Mrs. Baxter, in answer to her son's summons, tripped up the soft-carpeted stairs to his study on the second floor.

"What's on your mind, son?" she inquired.

"It's about the fan mail," he began.

"Well, what about the fan mail?"

"Mother," said Warner, softly, "I've heard about your eyes and while I hate like everything to tell you this, I've decided to take all the mail off your hands. It's time you retired." Warner grinned, and put his arm around her.

For a moment she said nothing. Then she began to choke up, and her eyes filled with tears. "Warner," she said, "don't do it! I can't darn your socks, wash your shirts—do the things mothers do for their boys—but if you take that mail away from me, Warner, it would kill me."

So Mrs. Baxter remains at the head of the fan mail department.

At the risk of being crowned by my friend Baxter, I'm going to disclose that Warner, in recounting that tale to me, did a little choking up himself! "As a matter of fact," he said, "mother has more vitality than her son. She drives her own car, has a full, busy day, every day, is never ill, and at sixty-six finds that life is getting very interesting indeed. And speaking of her vitality, I'll tell you something that isn't generally known about her. Not so long ago she jumped from the third floor of a burning building into a net spread by firemen, and suffered neither shock nor bruises!

"As you know, mother, ever since my marriage in 1917, has refused to live with us. Her contention has always been that no house was big enough for a man, his wife and a mother-in-law. From time to time, in the intervening years, Winnie (the lovely Winifred Bryson, who was a famous stage and screen star) and I have tried to get her to live with us, but she refused, point blank and cold-bloodedly, insisting that she loved the privacy of an apartment, with a kitchenette, where she could cook for herself when she desired home cooking. So, when Winnie and I built this house, convinced that it would be easy now to get her to come and live with us, we planned a big surprise for her. We built into the house a little apartment for mother. Remembering her plea for privacy, we arranged an entrance (Continued on page 93)

The Truth About The

If it had not been for

Myrna Loy, once doomed to playing half-caste roles, now enjoys being a normal American.

WHEN HER father died, Myrna, her mother and her brother David left Helena, Montana, and settled in Culver City, California. Myrna's mother was not in very good health, and it wasn't long before the freckled-faced, red-haired Myrna was assuming the responsibility of taking care of the family. Always interested in dancing, Myrna decided to take it up seriously and eventually start a class of her own. Inside of a year, this is exactly what she did do. However, the revenue from this work was very small and Myrna got herself a job in a revue at Grauman's Egyptian Theatre.

While Myrna was doing a number, Henry Waxman, a photographer at Warner Brothers, noticed the red-haired miss and offered to photograph her. The pictures turned out beautifully and one day while Rudolph Valentino was in his studio, he asked Waxman to introduce him to her. Impressed with her rare beauty, Rudy decided to test her for a part in "What Price Beauty" starring Nita Naldi. Of course, Myrna was thrilled over this bit of good fortune. When she appeared to take the screen test, Rudy made her up with his own hands and Natacha Rambova, his wife, brought her her own clothes to wear. Myrna will never forget the kindness and friendliness of these two people. And she was so anxious that the test be a success. But, alas, she was bit-the men in her life, Myrna would not be a star

By Gladys Hall

terly disappointed. Her spirits downcast, she did not want to go back to dancing. Myrna thought she might obtain extra work at M-G-M. Day after day she sat on the narrow wooden bench in the Casting Office, determined to get a break.

MYRNA SAID, "When that voice called to me that day in the casting office—that day after so many, many days—'Hey, you there in the blue suit—wanter work today?' it was precisely as though Sandolphin, the Angel of Glory, had, with dulcet accents, beckoned me through the heaveny portals to reign there forever . . .

"I have had a great many charming things said to me since then, flattering things, poetic things, but never words so winged and wonderful as those!

"I walked through that humdrum wooden door and it was a Golden Gate to me. I walked onto that lot, for the first time in my life, on shoes a little run down at the heel and my feet seemed not to touch the earth they trod.

"Visions of sugarplums danced through my head. Perhaps, I thought, my hidden genius had burned right through that little wooden grille and I had been 'discovered!'

"I was sent to the wardrobe department. I there found out that I was to make a costume test. They didn't want me, Myrna Loy. They wanted a body. Any body weighing less than one hundred and twenty pounds on which to drape the leper costume Kathleen Key was to wear in 'Ben Hur' starring Ramon Novarro! A figure for a leper costume—that was my grand entrance into motion pictures!

"They didn't want me to use make-up. They weren't concerned with my face. They were testing the costume in color and the costume was all they cared about. But my vanity rose up in its majesty at the thought of being photographed, even from the neck down, with all my freckles in their ungarnished glory. I demurred. They finally told me to go ahead and fix my face, it really didn't matter. I did. And when I reached the set, lavishly daubed and mascaraed, Lillian Rosine, the make-up expert, took one long look at me and cried out, 'Migod, where did you get the false face!' and propelled me off the set forthwith. She made me up, professionally, as she has done so many times since, and there's many a time that we have laughed together over my first appearance.

"I sat around waiting to take the costume test. And as I sat there I was conscious that Christy Cabanne, directing one of the units of 'Ben Hur,' was watching me. I couldn't figure out whether he had perceived the camouflaged freckles and was fascinated or whether he was intent upon my undiscovered genius. Still he looked kindly. He was extremely kind to me.

"Later he came over to me and asked whether I was a member of the studio stock company. I told him, 'No, this is the first time I've been able to get my foot on this lot. I'm—I'm just about to try on a leper costume!

"He then explained to me that he was looking for a Madonna type to play the Virgin Mary in the picture. He would like to make a test of me for the part. And so, directly the color stuff of the leper costume was made, it was whipped off me and I was draped in white robes and a blonde wig and tested for the Madonna. I was thin enough and anxious enough and haunted enough, I suppose, to look holy.

Across the top of the page we go in a smart whirl of Ginger's new costumes—you not only see the finished costume but also Bernard Newman's original sketches. First left, the Piccolino dress of white starched chiffon besprinkled with silver paillettes. Next, a light blue satin trimmed with matching ostrich feathers (the whole studio had to pick them up after each dance!). Then Indigo blue and white striped woolen for daytime. The cape comes off, leaving a jacket. And Ginger's stunning pajamas with tunic coat of metal shot taffeta. Lower left, dusty pink lace with silver thread tracery. And last, Ginger and Newman approve her riding habit—the last word in equestrian correctness.

. . New clothes

School clothes are a major subject this time

By Adelia Bird

JUST about this time of the year there is an off-stage tolling of bells—and, if you are of the campus age, they ring like a knell in your ears! The only compensation for vacations ending is, for the feminine contingent, the immediate possibility of going on a clothes binge. No woman can stay depressed for long with new clothes in the offing—even if they are school clothes.

But don't stop reading if you aren't headed for either a high school or college scene because these fall fashion tips, though aimed at you school-minded readers, are just as applicable to the rest of you.

A well-known Hollywood writer remarked to me, one day at lunch, that she thought, of all the younger Hollywood actresses, Anita Louise was the most clothes-conscious. She went on to say that Anita didn't have just a superficial flair for style but that she really studied herself in relation to her clothes with results that were decidedly smart. Remembering this conversation, I asked Anita Louise "bones up" on the way to class. Amber-colored sweater over a brown skirt and tricky green scarf.

Beige jersey for a classic subject—the shirtwaist dress. Note the cute striped bow tie under the tailored collar.

Off to a big date! Anita Louise in a white kidskin fur coat. Brown or gray is a more practical choice.

Academically Speaking of Year so Anita Louise picks some that rate high!

Anita to pick out the sort of clothes she would take off to college, if she were going this fall. She had great fun doing it but explained that she had picked them with a California school in mind and that with slight changes in fabric, her selections are much the same as she would imagine other college girls would wear.

Every college has its own pet fads and it isn't until you get there that you get on to them. For this reason, it is well to choose a few classic campus costumes and leave the extras until you have been on campus awhile and know what the others are wearing. However, if there is a store in your town that features a college shop, it is well to go there and chat with some of the representative college girls who have been invited to help you choose the right clothes for your specific school.

Anyway, to get back to Anita Louise, the two pages of her college selections offer some good basic fashion ideas for you.

She rates a tailored suit as important. Hers is in brown covert cloth. Anita explained that she picked

A jaunty swagger coat in gay steamer rug plaid for campus and week-ends.

At least one tailored suit should be on your school list. Anita Louise's is brown covert cloth.

This is a double date evening frock—can be semi-formal with the cape, or quite formal without it!

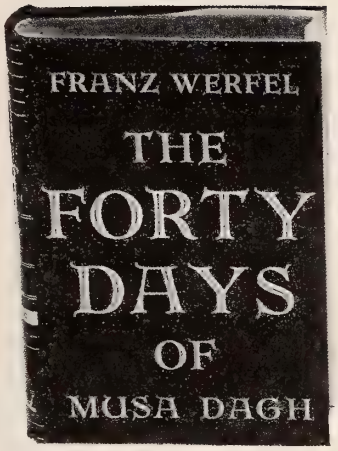
Above are five good fall ideas whether or not you are campus bound. Top left, Virginia Bruce's brown and beige tweed ensemble with three-quarter length flared jacket. And right, her smart camel's hair coat in double-breasted style with wide beaver collar and tie belt. Below left to right, Florine McKinney's green velvet coat and muff with corded detail. Next, Betty Furness in checked wool cape over a matching jacket and plain wool skirt. Fay Wray in slate blue woolen and taffeta.



covert cloth, rather than tweed, because it is better suited to California's climate. However, you, who live out of a warm clime, will undoubtedly choose from one of the stunning new sports woolens of rustic weave. They are very new and smart, looking a great deal like the coarser linens and cottons that you adored so this summer. They are perfect for young daytime suit fashions.

Anita's suit is a more formal version of the tuxedo, one-button suit. The jacket is bound in braid and has wide, sharply pointed lapels. She thinks this type of suit is ideal for the school girl who will be making week-end jaunts because it is perfect for traveling and can be worn under a top coat or fur coat later on. Her accessories are brown—her stitched fabric hat has a slightly peaked crown. And she tucks a silk scarf into her neckline, Ascot fashion. That giddy boutonniere is made of California's best brand of straw flowers.

Simplicity in all school clothes is Anita Louise's dictum. Wisely, she thinks nothing is sillier than girls teetering around on very high (Continued on page 70)

$2500.00 CASH PRIZE CONTEST

Get in on this contest. You may win top prize

ONE HUNDRED PRIZES

FIRST	$1,000.00	SEVEN AT $50.00 EACH	350.00
SECOND	500.00	NINETY AT $5.00 EACH	450.00
THIRD	200.00	TOTAL—100 PRIZES	$2,500.00

Here's all you have to do. Write a short letter answering this question: "What do you consider the greatest moment of this story?" Selection of one of the scenes illustrated on this page will qualify. Whatever your selection, give your reasons why.

CONTEST RULES

Print your full name and address in upper left-hand corner of first page; the total number of words you have written in the upper right-hand corner. Prizes will be awarded for the letters which best describe the selection of the writer. In case of ties, each contestant will be awarded the prize tied for. Neatness will count.

Send your letter in any ordinary envelope you wish. Do not use special mountings or unusually decorative letters or envelopes as they in no way will influence the judging.

No correspondence can be entered into regarding letters submitted to this contest. All letters, upon receipt, will become the property of MODERN SCREEN MAGAZINE.

Do not send letters of more than 150 words. This applies only to the main text of the letter, excluding salutation and signature.

This contest is open to everyone except employees and former employees of the Dell Publishing Company, Inc., Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Company, The Viking Press, Inc., and members of their families.

The contest ends at midnight, Eastern Standard Time, September 30, 1935. Address your letters to The Modern Screen Forty Days of Musa Dagh Contest, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y.

100 PRIZES FOR THE 100 BEST LETTERS

MODERN SCREEN offers $2500.00 in prizes for the best 100 letters submitted during the months of June, July, August and September, 1935. This great contest gives everyone an opportunity to claim one of these magnificent prizes and also a chance to express an opinion on the greatest moment in the book of the century, "The Forty Days of Musa Dagh," which is being made into a tremendous picture of adventure and romance by the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Company.

This is a simple contest to enter—all you have to do is write a letter of no more than 150 words. You may select any situation pictured on this page or, if you prefer, you may write about some other "great moment" from the story.

If your letter is selected as one of the 100 prize winners, you are assured of at least $5.00 or possibly $1,000.00. Isn't this a simple way for you to earn some extra money? Think what you could do with one thousand dollars!

Gabriel offers to lead the peasants in defense of their lives and faith.

The peasants before leaving their village forever bury the Church bells.

An avalanche comes down the mountainside and forces Turks to flee.

A child leads Gabriel to a spot where he finds his wife with another.

Gabriel's son drives a platoon of Turks away and captures their howitzers.

Gabriel's wife refuses freedom, stays with her husband on the mountain.

The Turks attack and are driven back in a fierce battle—many lives are lost.

Turkish forces lead a group of Armenian peasants into unwilling exile.

Gabriel and a peasant girl fall in love, think they'll be killed, agree to die together.

In Constantinople the Turkish war-lord refuses mercy to the Armenians.

Next month Jackie Coogan comes into the enormous sum of money held in trust for him until his twenty-first birthday and they do say that the engagement to Toby Wing is on again! Jackie would like to make some movies and Toby would like to rate some real roles instead of posing in publicity "stills," before keeping that date at the altar. However, the breaks haven't seemed to be theirs in that direction thus far. Paula Stone and Henry Willson are a coupla more young 'uns with feet headed toward the bridal path.

Having nothing to do one afternoon on the "Dark Angel" set, the actors began swapping yarns about their various narrow escapes from death. Several men were World War veterans and had some harrowing tales to tell; others had barely escaped death in airplane, automobile and train wrecks. There was a pause in conversation, when suddenly little George Breakston piped up, "I've seen four men shot down at once."

The grown-ups smiled indulgently. "But I have seen four men shot down at once," persisted George. "My mother sent me to the grocery store the day the gunmen killed a child in the Bronx. The police had chased them out to our end of town and opened fire at our corner. Four men dropped—they left 'em, too—lying in the gutter for a long time. I hid behind a potato barrel and was pretty scared!"

Needless to say, George won the prize for the day's narrow-escape stories!

Guess what Henry Hull's favorite literature is? The Sears-Roebuck catalogue! In spite of being a gifted actor, linguist and an authority on almost any intellectual subject, Mr. Hull would rather give up every other form of entertainment, than sacrifice the joys of his mail-order catalogue each month.

Y'see, Mr. Hull has a farm in Old Lyme, Connecticut, which is his pride and joy. So like all good farmers, who want to stay that way, he consults the catalogue as he would an oracle.

For six long years, Stuart Erwin has carried a pair of battered pennies about for good luck pieces. But awhile back Stu was the most miserable man in Hollywood—he'd lost a penny! Convinced that his bad luck was about to begin, Stu sadly went to the studio to report for work—found his first job for the day was signing a brand new contract with a fat salary increase. He went home at night to find that his small son had captured the kindergarten commencement prize and that two of his own dogs had won first prize at the San Diego Exposition showing! Whereupon Mr. Erwin hastily tossed his other copper into the fish pond.

Merle Oberon can do something else besides look dangerous! Right now she's busily scribbling away on a screen play based on the life of Ann Boleyn. She has Korda or Goldwyn in mind for buyers, but claims she's not even going to try to sell them on the idea—just charm 'em! Well, when strong men like Howard Hawks and David Niven have no sales-resistance, you can plan on seeing Ann Boleyn's life in the fillums soon.

Imagine Fred Astaire's s'prise to be the recipient of a "shower" recently! No, he isn't getting married, or planning any of those events for which shower parties are generally given. He and his wife were just down at the depot, embarking for a trip to Bermuda when it-all happened. Just before the train departed, a messenger appeared and poured dozens of candy bars into Fred's lap! Seems Fred has a passion for nickel bars, so Joan Crawford bought five dollars worth as a bon voyage gift.

Looks like the Ann Sothern-Gene Raymond feud is cooling down since they're both to appear in "Believe Me, Beloved," named after that swell song hit. But Gene really looks more burnt up than ever these days. He appeared at the studio the other day with his face the color of ripe tomatoes and his eyes and lips a swollen purple. But nope, it developed that Ann had nothing to do with this burning question. Gene had fallen asleep down at the beach and slept peacefully through the hottest afternoon seen down there!

A certain famous blonde star was shopping at one of the local Hollywood markets. An alert photographer who happened to be hovering in the neighborhood spotted her walking out with a bag of groceries clutched in one hand and her small son's hand in the other. The lady in question spotted him, too, just as he snapped the picture. Furious, she approached him, and yelled, "You're taking unfair advantage of me—you know I never allow a picture taken of me and my adopted son! You have an awful nerve!"

"Nerve, huh!" snapped the camera sleuth. "What I call nerve is for a dame like you to bring up a child that's the spitting image of yourself, and then call it adopted!"

All aboard! Catalina, Malibu and San Diego, Scotty's been traveling!

Jane Withers is the newest "child wonder" out at Fox. She displays somewhat the same certain sumpin' that La Temple has—but seems to be just a bit more impressed with her success. She and little Jackie Searl are together in "Ginger" and Jane suggested to Jackie that she would be glad to present him with an autographed picture of herself. Jackie didn't object, so Jane presented him with an almost life-size portrait of herself the next morning. In firm, round letters was inscribed: "To my first leading-man with every speck of my love, Jane Withers, Fox Contract Player." That's dotting the "i's" and crossing the "t's" for you!

Raquel Torres and Stephen Ames can give the biggest parties in Hollywood with the least effort. If they send out invitations for a lawn, tennis or swimming party and it rains or becomes chilly, the party is painlessly transplanted to the huge amusement room where indoor tennis, pool, ping-pong, marble games and many other kinds of diversion may be enjoyed. But the prize strain-saver device is an amusing contraption that spares Stephen the bother of shaking his own cocktails! They're two immense liquor containers, in which a key is inserted when the guests are thirsty. This winds up the machinery and away it goes 'til the outside is thickly frosted and your cocktails are done to a T.

Was Binnie Barnes' face red! Listen to this story and learn, you gals who go in for skin-tight rubber swim-suits. Binnie suddenly felt a yearning for the wild waves one Sunday afternoon, so she hopped into her brand new rubber suit, then into her roadster, and so to the beach. The beach was jammed with people, but Binnie picked her way through them and found a place to drop her coat on the sand. Then she leaned down to unfasten her slippers—when suddenly an agonizing and terrific RIP rent the air, followed by smothered giggles from all the bystanders and by-lyers. Hurriedly straightening up, Binnie's horrified gaze noted that not only was she wearing a backless TOP—but the shorts were backless, TOO!

And are we relieved! That Lillian Bond and Sidney Smith have finally gotten married! This has been the most on-again, off-again, gone-again affair that Hollywood has seen in many a moon. Smith's a well-known New York broker, but hasn't done much business this year, what with following Lil to England, to New York, to Hollywood, to Paris and back again. Most of us keep our squabbles for homework, but Lil and Sid made theirs an international affair. The newlyweds are planning to make their home in New York.

Stu Erwin has been fired with a Great Cause of late. He wanted to do something really constructive for his children as proof of his devotion, so he decided to build them a lovely playhouse in the backyard. He hammered and he chiseled and he sawed for many weeks 'til finally it was completed. BUT the little Erwins still have no playhouse! Seems it looked so very nice when finished, that Stu immediately moved in a magnificent bar and is using it for a grown-up playhouse.

The Brown Derby's the best place to feel the pulse of Hollywood romance. Found lunching in dim corners several days in succession were Virginia Bruce (Mrs. "Ex" Gilbert) with Count Carpegna; Toby Wing with Cesar Romero and Sue Carol with Nick Stuart and their little daughter. Looks like their daughter's parents are falling in love all over again!

Wotta life! moaned Hugh O'Connell the first six months he was in Hollywood. The sudden change from Broadway was just too much for the poor man, accustomed as he was to sleeping all day and working all night. Hugh was too much for the directors, too, for the minute he was not watched, the comedian would fall to slumbering behind a convenient camera. Finally, in desperation, the studio hired a special trainer to look after the Broadway Bad Boy, so that any time signs of drowsiness were detected, the burly trainer could rush him showerwards! These Spartan measures are having their effect, for the victim is now discreetly retiring before midnight for the first time in some twenty years.

All brides are beautiful, but Esther Ralston sort of topped the list the recent Sunday afternoon she became the wife of the handsome crooner, Bill Morgan. The ceremony was held in a tiny sylvan dell on Lucille Morrison's Bel Air estate, the whole setting being reminiscent of "Midsummer Night's Dream." Mrs. Morgan—Esther to you—was gowned in shell pink lace and the groom wore a Palm Beach suit, or was it blue gabardine?—oh dear, who ever looks at the poor groom anyway? Mary Brian appeared in her now familiar off-screen role of bridesmaid and Esther's brother served as best man. Here's wishing the young Morgans much happiness!

"Are Blackheads due to Faulty Cleansing?"

YOUNG WOMEN ARE ENDLESSLY TROUBLED BY BLACKHEADS. THEY FREQUENTLY WRITE: "ARE BLACKHEADS JUST DIRT? IF SO, WHY ARE THEY SO STUBBORN? WHAT CAN I DO TO GET RID OF THEM?"

Here is an answer that sets these questions at rest. It explains the real nature of this common difficulty, and the approved method of combating it.

BLACKHEADS are not "just dirt"—that is, dirt from the outside.

Did you ever press a blackhead out? Behind that black speck on the surface came a little plug of cheesy matter. That cheesy matter came from the oil glands inside your skin. It choked and clogged the pore opening just like a tiny cork. Till finally outside dirt lodged in it—You had a blackhead!

Proper cleansing will remove that blackhead. Cleansing and stimulating will prevent new blackheads.

With clean finger tips, spread Pond's Cold Cream liberally over your face—pat it in briskly till it has made your skin warm and supple. Pond's sinks deep into the pores and softens the thickened accumulations in them. Wipe the cream and loosened dirt off. Then, with a clean cloth, gently press the blackhead out.

That is all! Do not force it. Do not use your bare fingers. A stubborn blackhead is better left alone. Or, it may yield after hot cloths have been applied to the face, to relax the pores further. You can close the pores after this by bathing the face with cold water.

Now this rousing Pond's treatment does more than clear the pores. It invigorates the underskin! Stirs the circulation. Wakes up the faulty oil glands. As the underskin functions actively again, further clogging of the pores is avoided.

These Common Skin Faults all begin in your Under Skin

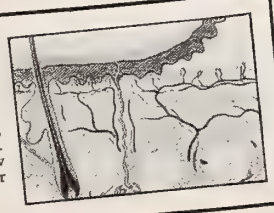
Practically all the common skin faults have their start in the underskin. You can ward them off with the steady use of Pond's Cold Cream.

EVERY NIGHT, give your skin this pore-deep cleansing and underskin stimulation. It flushes out every speck of dirt, make-up, as well as waste matter from within the skin.

IN THE MORNING and the daytime before making up, freshen and invigorate your skin again with a deep-skin Pond's treatment. It leaves your skin satiny, ready for make-up.

Just send for the special 9-treatment tube offered below. See your skin grow clearer, fresher—smoother.

Pond's is absolutely pure. Germs cannot live in it.



Marjorie Gould Drexel

now Mrs. John Murton Gundry, Jr., daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Anthony J. Drexel and granddaughter of the late George Jay Gould, says: "Pond's Cold Cream cleanses every pore and smooths away tired lines. I am never without it—even for a day."

If you could see into your underskin, you would discover a network of tiny blood vessels, nerves, fibres, fat and muscle tissues, oil and sweat glands. When these grow sluggish, look out for skin faults!

1. LINES form when underskin grows thin.
2. PORES stretch and grow larger when clogged by impurities from inside the skin.
3. BLACKHEADS form when the pores stay clogged with matter from within skin.
4. BLEMISHES follow when the clogging matter is not removed from the pores.
5. DRY SKIN occurs when oil glands cease to supply oils that make skin soft, supple.
6. TISSUES SAG when circulation slows, under tissues grow thin, fibres lose their snap.

Between You And Me

If you are enraged or delighted with a star, a movie, or a bit of gossip, write us about it

From Across the Sea

If Joan Crawford is so ambitious, why doesn't she learn how to act? I'm sick of seeing her in one smart picture after another doing nothing but wearing a series of incredible clothes which would be utterly impossible for ordinary people to wear in ordinary life, and sporting a different hair style in each scene. She is the essence of artificiality, both in her screen roles and in her highly publicised "private life."

It makes me furious to read of people running down Shearer because she usually has well-known actors playing opposite her. Look at Crawford! In "Chained" she had Gable and Kruger; in "Dancing Lady," Gable and Tone; in "Sadie McKee," Tone again, and the grand acting of Edward Arnold to save the picture from being a ghastly flop; and now in "Forsaking All Others," she has Gable and Montgomery. Crawford leaves all the acting to her leading men, and just struts about in fantastic garments, pouting that ridiculous mouth of hers.

It seems this glorified clothes-prop is a tremendous favorite in America, but believe me in England we prefer people who can act, and films that have some resemblance to real life.—Star-gazer, Cornwall, England.

Orchids to Norma

A great load of orchids to incomparable Norma Shearer for having attained a home, husband and babies entirely minus ballyhoo and without endangering her career. Truly the very perfection of Twentieth Century womanhood.—Iris Billing, Manchester, England.

Dream Lover

I have recently seen "Scarface." I missed it when it played several years ago but by special request the theatre that I patronize happened to show it again and I made up my mind to see it. Yes, Paul Muni was magnificent but I had eyes only for George Raft. The moment I saw him my heart just puffed up so full of emotion and everything that it hasn't got back to normal yet and that was nearly two weeks ago.

I am a very emotional person and have many moods. I go into my rose and gold castle and dream of the ideal lover that someday I hope will come along—in my dream world, understand—and until I saw George Raft in "Scarface" there had never been a dream lover, but now I am content.

I never miss a picture he plays in; if I do the family and boy friend have to put up with my nasty temper for a good while. —A Devoted George Raft Admirer, Exeter, Rhode Island.

No Hokum

I have just finished reading "I Have Said Good-Bye to Youth" in your July issue. I have never before been interested enough in a press story to comment on it. Stars are made out to be something more than human, glorified in every possible way and interviewers seem to vie with one another to put forth a dish of nothing but plain hokum and expect an intelligent public not to get indigestion. So it was with a sense of appreciation and gratitude to come across a story sans hokum.

This article dealing with Richard Barthelmess was of interest to me because I had for a while back been fed up on parts Mr. Barthelmess played. I had always "liked" Barthelmess on the screen, then, due to the roles he played, I had no desire to enter a picture house where he was featured. Then I saw "Four Hours to Kill," mainly because of the other players in it. However, I came out with one thought in mind: I have seen gangsters played often but never had anyone played the part as Barthelmess played it. When you feel admiration where once was disinterest, it certainly proves that an actor gave a wonderful performance. Dick was acting a part suitable for him and not the too young roles that had turned me away from him.

So in "Good-Bye to Youth" I found plain truths. Truths, because I knew the facts from my own deductions. Mr. Barthelmess must be in real life a man with plenty of common sense and the ability to face facts as they are and to act accordingly.—Mabel Hughes, Williamsport, Pa.

More About Crooners

There seems to be a lot of furore between the Crosby-Ross fans and Marie Rippel. I do not believe she thought very much before writing what she did about Bing Crosby and Lanny Ross. As a matter of fact, I thought she was very unjust, but I think the people who write replies to her were still more unjust.

No doubt Janice Bronson has no crows handy, so she has to listen to the next best thing, which, it seems, is Dick Powell. How sad! My condolences to you, Estelle, and I wonder what you'd look like on a string!

And Romaine Fox, you say Dick isn't "fit for sea gulls to listen to," but he is fit for you since you've listened to him. I wonder how regularly he bores you!

You must have been brought up on something worse than "limburger cheese" when you say that about Dick, Evelyn Sachs.

Why couldn't everyone have been as sensible as Estelle Myers who merely said: "While I agree with her in what she said about Dick, her comments on Lanny and Bing were unjust." And also orchids to Sue Albizati, Betsey Seipel and Lillian Ohr, for writing such intelligent replies.—Robert Bradford, New Bedford, Mass.

Jolly Irishman

For over two years our family has enjoyed the interesting manner in which your magazine portrays the screen world. Previous to our acquaintance with Modern Screen we were of the opinion that one could not expect much of interest in a ten cent movie magazine. But you have certainly changed our thought on this subject. The pictures of the movie stars always do justice to them. The articles and comments about them help to give us greater appreciation of their talents and lives. There is one member of the screen world, however, whom we enjoy seeing so much on the screen and who seems to pep up every picture in which he plays that I am wondering how it is he has been overlooked by your good magazine during these past two years.

I refer to Frank McHugh, that jolly Irishman who is so full of fun and whose quaint laugh never fails to give us a kick. So many of our friends feel as we do about him that I am sure an article about him would be greatly appreciated by your readers.—James Taft, San Diego, Calif.

Romance comes to the girl who guards against COSMETIC SKIN

SMOOTH, LOVELY SKIN wins romance—and keeps it. So how foolish it is to let unattractive Cosmetic Skin destroy the loveliness that should be yours!

Cosmetics Harmless if removed this way

It is when cosmetics are not properly removed that they choke the pores—cause the ugly pore enlargement, tiny blemishes, blackheads, perhaps—that are signs of Cosmetic Skin.

Lux Toilet Soap is especially made to remove cosmetics thoroughly. Its ACTIVE lather goes deep into the pores, gently removes every trace of dust, dirt, stale cosmetics. Use all the cosmetics you wish! But to protect your skin—keep it lovely—use Lux Toilet Soap ALWAYS before you go to bed at night and before you renew your make-up during the day. 9 out of 10 screen stars use Lux Toilet Soap!

USE ROUGE AND POWDER? YES, OF COURSE! BUT THANKS TO LUX TOILET SOAP I'M NOT A BIT AFRAID OF COSMETIC SKIN

Preston Foster's the biggest man in pictures. Just six foot two, with a chest expansion of forty-six. Which record beats every he-man on the screen by a good many inches . . . Richard Dix hails from St. Paul, Minnesota, but has been a confirmed Californian for a good many years now. The last scene on this picture beat a few records for speed, since Richard's wife, formerly his secretary, was being rushed to the hospital. She waited an hour for him, though, and then delivered the famous twins. "Broadest shouldered boys I ever saw," brags the proud papa . . . Louis Calhern, James Busch and Richard Dix all used to play stock in the old Belasco Theatre in days gone by and had their first reunion on this picture in years . . . Margot Grahame is an English star who appeared in forty-seven pictures abroad. This is her first Western and was she thrilled by it-all! Most of the picture was made at the RKO ranch in San Fernando Valley. Dix's horse, "Benny," is just a leetle bit wild! He almost stamped Mr. D's stand-in, George Lollier, to death. Mr. Lollier was also assistant director on the picture, and what with that responsibility and the fact that he'd been secretly married the day previous, Mr. Lollier wasn't in any mood to be stamped on . . . Charles Vidor, the director, noticed that most of his cast were not paying much attention to what was going on around the set one day. The company was on location at Vasquez Rocks when their attention began wandering. Mr. Vidor turned sleuth and discovered a nudist colony having an outing on the adjacent rocks. . . Karen Morley is Mrs. Vidor and they have a young son who shows signs of following his famous father's footsteps. At least he directs everything at home.

★★★ Paris in Spring

(Paramount)

Here is a lighter-than-air musical, punctuated with charming tunes, beautiful girls and a cast of principals thoroughly grounded in the ways of histrionics. The deft touches of Director Lewis Milestone, too, are conspicuous; in fact, there's nothing wrong with this picture that an application of the shears won't remedy. Occasionally, funny sequences are dragged out far beyond the laughing point. Would Tullio Carminati's attempted suicide amuse you? Yep, it did us, too, until it went on for so long that we felt like shouting, "If you don't jump, pal, we'll push!" Mary Ellis is given the opportunity of her cinematic career in this one and she clicks like the proverbial camera, both photographically and vocally. Mr. Carminati plays a familiar role familiarly, and a newcomer, James Blakely, is excellent in the juvenile role. We had hitherto been of the opinion that the young man's chief claim to fame was as a member of Barbara Hutton's (Princess Whoozis to you) social entourage, but it seems, no! The lad can act. So can Ida Lupino.

Preview Postscripts

Tullio Carminati is the screen's supersophisticate. That accent, even without its accompanying bored expression, makes him heir to the title. Speaks nine tongues fluently, but never bothered with the Amurrican slanguage 'til forced to learn it or give up his talkie career. . . . Mary Ellis made her début at the Metropolitan Opera but she prefers acting to just singing. She's appeared in many stage plays in London, a few here, and one other picture, besides this one, "All the King's Horses." She was kinda tired making this, and no wonder, for she couldn't sit down all the time she wore some of those fancy costumes. . . . Ida Lupino's as interesting a movie starlet as you'll find out here—ask Mr. Carminati who presented her with a watch-compact at the end of the picture; or inquire of Lewis Milestone, the picture's director, who coached her after hours at the nite spots.

IMPORTANT—READ!

Unlike many other oily polish removers that seek to imitate it, Cutex Oily Polish Remover leaves no film to dim the lustre of your nail polish and shorten its life. This is because it contains a very special oil that cannot harm the appearance of your polish or affect its wear. Avoid imitations!

Modern Screen's Dramatic School

Directed by Katherine Albert

Una Merkel, one of the screen's most reliable comediennes, is this month's guest lecturer.

DURING the past month I've had a lot of letters from folks who want to make the world laugh. Several have told me that in planning this course of instruction I lean too heavily on the dramatic side of acting. So—as I've explained to you, this is your department and your wish is my law—this month I bring you Una Merkel, one of the greatest comediennes on the screen. She is not only a splendid actress but a gracious and charming person and I'm sure that you'll find what she has to say not only instructive but entertaining as well.

Incidentally, before I go on, let me remind you that there is still plenty of room for MODERN SCREEN Dramatic Clubs. Those who have already formed them tell me they're having the time of their lives. So the rest of you should get in on the fun. Write to me, care of MODERN SCREEN's Dramatic School, 149 Madison Ave., New York City, enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope and I'll send you full instructions for starting a club in your community. Also I'm more than willing to answer any and all of your personal dramatic problems.

And now for Una and her perfectly slick lecture.

"It's an almost daily wonder to me that I won success by being considered funny. Although I always loved fun in others, I'm not funny at home and my folks never thought of me as a comic. So, perhaps it boils down to this: Don't be yourself, be your opposite. If you want to be funny, be serious. If you take yourself seriously, you will flop just as I did at the start.

"If you happen to be cursed with an inferiority complex, as I am, conquer it by doing the things you don't wish to do.

"And now I will answer the question, how did I become a comedienne? Audiences may think I was born that way. On the contrary, I had to make myself over, once I got the idea of screen fun.

"AS A child, I was a straight-laced little piece. Always scrubbed a bright pink, I wore the largest of hair ribbons, and rarely went outside to play. Even today I am methodical and almost prissy.

"I was bitten by the acting bug at an early age. I can remember plaguing my family to listen to lectures I delivered while I was holding the family dictionary—to make it seem authentic. I'd dress up in mother's clothes and put on shows. One night a cousin of mine laughed in the wrong place. There was no show that night. I walked off the platform to stay. That was, I believe, my first and last display of 'temperament.'

"The love of acting followed me throughout my school years, and when I was graduated, I decided to go to a dramatic school. I think such training most valuable.

"I had no idea of making acting a career. I had hopes of some day being able to teach dramatics, and I still have the book in which I wrote down copious notes covering everything I learned from my lessons. You see, I figured they might be valuable to pass along to my pupils in the future.

"When I worked in silent pictures, they compared me to Lillian Gish, and I did my best to live up to that comparison. My first roles on the stage were Gishy things. I soon learned, however, that seriousness and this voice of mine just wouldn't mix. I just didn't go over as a dramatic actress.

"As I've come along, I've conceived the philosophy that all of us with inferiority complexes strike a better medium of expression by doing the type of thing that is directly opposite to our natures. Mine is one of many such cases.

OF COURSE, there are general rules to consider if one is to be a success in any line. But in acting one has to find out many things for himself. Every comedian has his own way of working. Often the best results are achieved by doing a thing the wrong way.

"Charlie Butterworth, Stuart Erwin, Ted Healy and all the comedians I know have a way all their own of going about a thing. They use their physical selves, or rather their personalities, to project what they have inside. Each one could be given the same scene with the same lines, yet because of their personalities each performance would be entirely different.

"To be successful, salesmen must believe in their product, even if they have to kid themselves into it. The same thing applies to comedy. It is better to create a reason for believing in a thing, than to have none.

"I do not advise working out a comedy situation, for I think spontaneity is best, as far as comedy is concerned. The biggest laughs come when you don't think of humor. It's fatal to try to be funny. I (Continued on page 91)

The Confessions of an Extra Girl

NO, by God," the artist said. And while he was getting his hat and coat I heard the director calling a familiar number (that of one of the biggest studios in Hollywood, a number I had called dozens of times with no success); heard him give his name to the operator—a name I knew well, that of a famous director (I'll call it Nolan); heard him say he didn't care whether it was Sunday or not that he wanted some workmen taken off a set he knew was working that day and to make a test of a girl he had just discovered; heard him order requisitions put through for cameras, lights, everything; heard him call his secretary at home and ask her to come to the studio with the make-up man, who it seemed was a friend of hers. Yes, there I stood hearing such exciting orders given. I was to have a test. I, who had struggled to get a test for weeks, was to have one to settle a silly argument between a couple of men.

Can you possibly imagine how I felt? That was some five years ago and yet as I write about it now I get gooseflesh. And they said I had no emotion!

We were whisked to the studio in the director's car. Trying to keep myself from being too excited I listened to the conversation between these two and discovered that the director was the artist's uncle. So this was a family fight. Well, hurray for family fights!

The gate was opened for us, the magic gate I had been unable to crash. The lot was quiet, it being Sunday. Only one company was working, but I was taken directly to the director's office where the make-up man and the director's secretary were awaiting us. The director started to introduce me to his secretary and then realized that he didn't even know my name. I had to tell him what it was. I wondered what that girl thought of me.

I was in a daze. Make-up was slapped on my face. We hurried out to the test set. The secretary gave me part of a script and told me to memorize some lines. How I ever did it, I'll never know. I discovered that the lines were a speech in which I was supposed to be talking to an imaginary lover who had left me for another woman.

I DON'T know how I got through with that scene, but somehow I did and when it was over the artist turned to his uncle and said, "Well, I win." My hopes were high, for the artist had claimed that anyone could act. Then the director said, "Not so fast, Bradley, wait until we see it on the screen."

They started to walk away, leaving me standing there. I rushed after them. "Don't you want my address?" I asked. "Er—in case you might need me for a part or something?"

The director looked down at me. I saw that I had been merely an experiment. "Oh, yes," he said, "it might be a good idea. Give it to my secretary."

I had to keep back the tears as I scribbled my name and address on a piece of paper and handed it to the girl. She smiled sweetly at me but I could not smile back. I ran off the lot before I realized that I had gone to the artist's studio only to make a little money to tide me over until Monday and that instead I had had a screen test. But it was Sunday, I was miles away from home and had just nine cents in my pocketbook. I stood at the gate bewildered, not knowing what to do next. And then I saw the secretary in a little roadster. She motioned me to hop in.

I was too upset to speak. She smiled at me. "Listen, dear," she said. "Don't let Hollywood get you down. It isn't always like this. In fact, this is all very unusual. It just happens that Mr. Nolan is one of the most eccentric directors on this or any other lot. His nephew is just about as crazy. Mr. Nolan wanted to give Bradley a big job at the studio, but Brad wouldn't take it. They argue all the time. Mr. Nolan gets away with more nonsense like this episode this morning than any man in town, but because he's such a wonderful director and makes so much money for the company they give in to his whims."

I told her then how I happened to meet him. She laughed. "That's typical," she said. "Say, we'd better get some lunch, and here's half a dollar for you for dinner tonight." I thanked her. She laughed again. "Gosh! That Nolan. Imagine him dragging me to the studio today for this."

"I'm sorry," I said. "It was my fault." And I began to cry.

"Forget it," she said. "Forget everything, dear. I'm sorry to disappoint you. This has all been fun for you, but you'd better forget the test, too. You'll never hear from it again."

I don't know how I spent the rest of that amazing Sunday. I'm sure I did a lot of crying.

MONDAY morning a box of flowers was delivered to my door. The card read, "You're a sweet kid. Let me take you to dinner tonight." It was signed Bradley. I was furious. I wouldn't even telephone him, so I sent him a wire saying I had an engagement.

I tramped around to the studios all day that Monday but I was terribly discouraged and when I got home that night I found Bradley sitting in the little lobby waiting for me.

"I told you I had an engagement," I said. "I never want to see you again, anyhow. You and your funny uncle shouldn't be allowed to do things like that to girls—get their hopes up and then dash them away. I don't like either of you."

He took my hands and looked into my eyes. I had noticed that he was handsome when I first met him on the bus but I didn't realize how good looking he was until now.

"I'm sorry," he said. "It's too bad when I like you so much and stop by to tell you that if you're foolish enough to want to work in pictures, report tomorrow morning at nine on the set. It may be a pretty good part."

My heart pounded but I said, "I don't want to work for your uncle. I don't want any favors."

"This isn't for my uncle. Someone else saw your test and liked it. No one is doing you a favor."

I didn't know until much later that my test had not then been printed and that Bradley had simply wangled a job for me because he thought he had done me an injustice and because he liked me a little.

And so I was happy because at last I was actually to work and—the picture was a Garbo film "Romance."

The Modern Hostess

Warner Baxter to the questions I asked along those lines. "My party specialty is Chili Con Carne. I use the word 'my' intentionally for I consider myself quite a master at the art of making a delicious Chili. And no praise for a successful picture performance rings more pleasantly in my ears than words of praise for my Chili or the one or two other dishes I really can make up myself.

"ANOTHER of these is Welsh Rarebit," he continued, as I urged him to tell me more. "My Rarebit is the smooth, hot, non-stringy, non-grainy kind that is made with beer as one of the necessary ingredients. The main dish for one of our parties probably would be the Chili or Rarebit I spoke of. These foods are so good in themselves that it is not necessary to serve numerous other dishes. Just serve plenty of the one, supply condiments and cheese, provide coffee and beer and watch the expressions of complete satisfaction suffuse the faces of your guests."

Well, there you are, you ambitious hostesses! While you've been wondering all the time what to serve at your next party—fretting over the number of fancy viands you'd have to supply, the expensive beverages you feared you'd have to purchase, smart people like the Warner Baxters, these days, go in for simplicity in entertaining. Just think how much of the time and expense of party-giving you would save by following the Baxter's example and the Baxter's recipes which I'll tell you how to get later on.

Of course, you'll agree with me, that Sunday night suppers and informal gatherings such as these seem just naturally to plan themselves around beer as the featured beverage. Somehow when men are present it seems a little wishy-washy to serve only iced tea or coffee, while it is beyond the means of most of us to supply a variety of liquors, high in both cost and alcoholic content. Fortunately almost everyone likes beer, especially the men folk who have learned to place a high value on this richly-flavored, foaming beverage.

IN planning refreshments to go with it, the clever hostess will bear in mind the popularity of the "free lunch" of another generation and will serve that type of man-sized portion of he-man food. The Warner Baxter recipes, of which more anon, will provide four suggestions for main dishes of this sort. Only one "made" dish is necessary for this kind of party, the other refreshments being of the ready-to-serve order such as delicious cold cuts, the perennial pretzel (although I have noticed a slight falling off in the popularity of this twisted version of the cracker family in recent gatherings), dill pickles, sauerkraut and cheese, of course—many kinds of cheese, with crisp, salted crackers.

The varieties of cheese suitable for such feasts are too many to name but those of outstanding merit are Chateau, Velveeta, Snappy, Swiss, Camembert, the appropriately named "Buffet," good old store cheese and extremely pungent Liederkranz known as "the man's cheese." Cream cheese is not recommended since sharp rather than bland flavors go best with beer. For this same reason creamed foods, whipped cream and sweet dishes are not advised; salty, tangy foods being best. However, if you feel that you must serve a dessert, plan on having an apple pie, cheese cake or pastry of the German Coffee Cake variety.

Germans, by the way, are convinced not only of the goodness of beer but of its health-giving qualities. They speak laughingly of "taking the beer cure." Both thirst and a sense of fatigue, they claim, are cured by a long stein of beer. Certainly they are not alone in that belief!

The use of the stein originated for a very good reason, I discovered. The thickness of the stein (from the German word for stone) was intended to aid in keeping a long refreshing drink of beer cold—much on the same principle as the present day thermos bottle. Those who take their beer-drinking seriously go so far as to chill the stein thoroughly before it is put into use—a good thing to remember to do. But don't make the mistake of having the beer itself too cold, for intense cold impairs the flavor since it benumbs the taste nerves, making the beer have an insipid taste in consequence.

Historically, beer can be traced back as far as 7000 years B. C. A brewery, buried for thousands of years, was unearthed in Mesopotamia. But the beer that we know today was probably made first by the monks of Bavaria.

Beer, it is said, first arrived on the American continent as a passenger on the Mayflower. Yes, many families trace their origin to the arrival of that famous ship at our shores; the Beers, it would seem, among them. It is a far cry indeed from the few barrels brought over in that ship to the present day, vast modern brewery, turning out of its enormous glass-lined tanks 137,000 barrels a day.

Where whole volumes are given to the origin, history, uses and manufacture of beer, complete chapters also are given to containers from which it should be quaffed. Personally I am of the opinion that, if one is thirsty, it matters little or not at all whether one uses a stein, a glass mug, a long thin goblet or a plain water tumbler. The proper service is a means, not an end—if it makes the hostess happier to do the "correct" thing by all means let her make the comparatively small outlay necessary for the "right" glasses or mugs. But the very nicest thing about parties of the kind we have been discussing is the complete informality that should characterize them—the wooden cheese board, the gay colored table cloth, the paper napkins, and the casual assortment of glasses (if you haven't enough of one kind to go around).

And now let's proceed to the very important subject of the featured main dish—which might well be one of the Warner Baxter favorites, especially the Chili Con Carne so highly spoken of by that debonair star. Warner parted with the recipe for this concoction of his rather reluctantly. After all, when you are famous for a certain culinary triumph you hate to broadcast the ingredients that have gone into earning you your fame. But after some persuasion on my part the complete cooking directions were mine. They can be yours, too, if you want to have them, for Warner's Chili Con Carne recipe is printed on one of the cards in this month's Modern Hostess recipe leaflet. You'll find directions how to get your copy a little later on (if you do not already know). Another card in the leaflet contains the Baxter Welsh Rarebit recipe which turns out to be as easy as any and more "fool proof" than most.

Still another card will bring you, this month, a knockout Potato Salad—the kind that Winifred Bryson Baxter has made up in huge quantities when numerous guests are expected. There are Potato Salads and Potato Salads as you yourself doubtless have discovered. This particular one is made with homemade dressing and has several odd and interesting things added to make it seem like a real company dish. The male members of the party will give you a vote of thanks for this he-man concoction.

And they'll call you "pal" for sure, if, instead of "putting on the dog" you serve simple, delicious "Party Dogs" for which directions will be found in the leaflet. After all no party of this kind is complete without hot dogs, just as no hot dogs are complete without the addition of mustard (which supplies their bark and their bite). This recipe provides easy directions for making up these novel sandwiches.

WHY not satisfy your curiosity about all these swell sounding foods by sending for this month's leaflet which contains all four of these delicious Warner Baxter recipes. You will please your family and thrill your guests by making up the splendid dishes described therein.

And, whether you serve the Baxter Chili Con Carne, the Warner Welsh Rarebit, the Company Potato Salad or the Party Dogs you are bound to add to your reputation as a cook and hostess. So be wise! Write for your free copy of this month's leaflet immediately, send out your invitations, get in some pickles, cheese and crackers, order your case of beer, follow one of the four Warner Baxter recipes which we will send you promptly and wait confidently for praise! I'm ready to guarantee that if you follow this advice your very next party will be a wow!

The coupon that brings you the recipes follows this simple recipe for "Cheese Fingers" which you also can serve at your party as a tasty accompaniment for the Potato Salad. So cut out both the recipe and the coupon and use them, soon!

CHEESE FINGERS

3 (¼ inch) slices of bread
1 egg
1 tablespoon melted butter
¼ teaspoon Worcestershire sauce
¼ teaspon salt
grated cheese

Remove crusts from bread slices. Cut each slice into 3 or 4 thin strips or "fingers." Beat egg, add melted butter, Worcestershire sauce and salt. Dip bread fingers into this mixture and roll them in grated cheese until thoroughly coated. Place on greased cookie sheet. Bake in hot oven (400° F.) until cheese is melted and fingers are a golden brown (about 10 minutes). Drain on white paper kitchen towels. Serve hot.

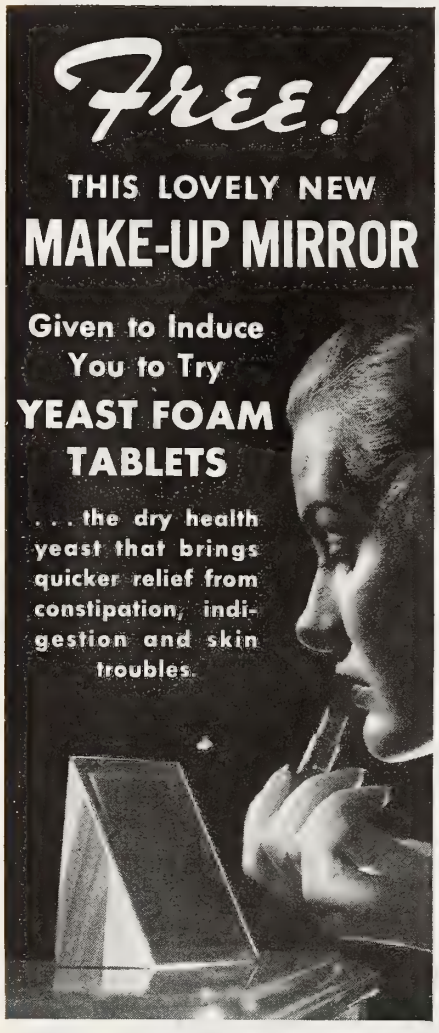
Here's a spaghetti he likes better than mine



AND SO DO I — THE SAUCE IS GRAND!

"I THOUGHT I cooked pretty good spaghetti — at least my husband often told me so. But I cheerfully admit that Franco-American chefs can do it better. When we tasted theirs with its perfectly marvelous sauce, I decided then and there I'd never bother with home-cooked spaghetti again. Franco-American saves me time and trouble — costs less, too! And it's the best spaghetti I ever ate. You'll say so, too!"

Skilled chefs prepare it, using eleven different ingredients in the sauce. Big, luscious tomatoes. Prime Cheddar cheese. Spices and seasonings that give delicate piquancy . . . subtle appetite allure. No wonder women everywhere declare that even their own delicious home-cooked spaghetti or macaroni can't compare with the zestful, appealing taste of Franco-American.

All the work has been done; you simply heat, serve and enjoy. A can holding three to four portions never costs more than ten cents — actually less than buying dry spaghetti and ingredients for the sauce and preparing it yourself. Ask your grocer for Franco-American Spaghetti today.

YOU'LL be delighted with this new kind of mirror that you can get absolutely free with a purchase of Yeast Foam Tablets. It's tilted at an angle so that you get a perfect close-up of your face without having to hunch way over your dressing table.

of the gifts, personally supervised the wrapping, each package matching the other.

Rosalind said, "Romances? I've had them, of course. Here and there. I haven't met up with marriage yet. Love my family too much, perhaps. Besides, I couldn't, you know, ever contemplate the 'if-it-doesn't-work-there's-always-Reno' sort of thing. Not after Mother and Dad.

"Dad died, several years ago, in his office. Of course, for Mother—well, she has us. And she is not the sort to whine—"

Out of these seven children—there had been ten—of James E. and Clara Knight Russell, the small Roz attended a primary school in Waterbury and, later, Marymount private school at Tarrytown-on-the-Hudson. Then college and after college, dramatic school—six months of it.

HER father, an eminent and successful lawyer, gave all his children the advantages of school, college and travel. And he made it clear, from the beginning, that drones in the hive would not be tolerated. He taught them, early in their lives, the sturdy beauty and dignity of labor. It was not, he told them, necessarily a question of working for money, it was a question of working for self-respect. "I don't care," he'd say, "whether you only make two dollars a week and spend that two dollars for silk stockings so long as you are producers."

The result of this is that one of Rosalind's sisters is Fashion Editor of Town & Country. Another sister, recently graduated from Sarah Lawrence, in New York, now teaches economics there. Two brothers are lawyers, a third brother graduates from Yale Law School in 1937 and a younger sister is graduating this year from high and enters college in the fall. And Rosalind chose the stage. But the screen chose Rosalind!

She said, "I studied dancing when I was a youngster. I was about fourteen when I had my first offer of a job. A chance to go West with a troupe of dancers. Mother was aghast. She said, 'Why, Rosalind, of course not! I wouldn't dream of having you in one of those backstage dressing-rooms with gas jets, gin bottles and swearing women!' Some years later, when mother paid me her first backstage visit in a Boston theatre I said to her, 'I can't manage a gas jet for you, dear, but with a little effort I think I could work up a gin bottle and a couple of swearing women!' Of course, she denied absolutely ever having said such a thing. She flattered me. Could I have made it up? Would I be likely to forget it?

WHEN I entered dramatic school—the American Academy of Dramatic Arts, formerly the Sargent Dramatic School—I told Mother I thought I'd be a teacher. She said that would be very nice work for me, she was sure. She had visions of her daughter intellectually instructing classrooms in the proper delivery of the Gettysburg Address or Hamlet's Soliloquy, no doubt. But I eased into it that way. The six months over, I had a leading part in the school play, won a prize or something and had two offers, then and there, of parts on Broadway. One from Crosby Gaige. I turned him down. I said, 'My good man, are you mad? I couldn't do it. I haven't worked enough, haven't had the experience. I wouldn't dream of it.'

"Mother said, 'Were you offered one hundred a week?' And I said, 'Of course, why not?'

"My first job was with a tent show. I mean, a real tent show. Up at Lake Placid. I heard about it in an agency. Two actors were sitting there talking about it, I edged up and listened in. I got the manager's name, Edward Casey, and the fact that he lived in Forest Hills, Long Island. I eased out, called him on the phone and made an appointment to meet him. I told him a lot of little 'Great White Way' lies, of course. Sort of murmured things about my stock experience in Hartford, Erie, here and there. He liked me. That's why he gave me the job. I was with that tent show for two summers and loved it. Swell time. Grand people.

"Then stock, lots of stock. I tried to get one-night stands and couldn't. Best I could do was split weeks and three-a-week. But it was grand and the people were elegant. I stepped off Broadway, later on, and went on the road on more than one occasion. Just because I wanted to. In the small towns they really want good theatre and know it. Broadway audiences—well, they have the same out-of-towners, tourists, but they also have jaded first-nighters and critics.

"I'm a regular Chamber of Commerce actress. I always attended all of the Chamber of Commerce luncheons and dinners in all of the small towns. I met all of the women I could meet. It was good business. I was getting a percentage of the profits and the audiences were the profits. I've looked in the mirror once or twice and said to myself, 'Beauty won't get you there, my girl, other things may, but not beauty!" Having decided that I had to think what would bring 'em in. I decided that clothes would do it—clothes always bring women into the theatre. And so, I wore clothes they'd talk about and want to see.

"Then there were Broadway plays—'Talent,' starring Mady Christians. Theatre Guild things. The 'Garrick Gaieties,' in which I sang in my very odd voice and manner both of which are strictly tabu at home. Then came 'The Second Man,' starring Bert Lytell and that one bought my ticket for Hollywood. I had an offer. My agent conferred with me, so I named my price. She said they'd never pay it. That was all right, I said. But they did—and I came. I don't give a rap for stardom. I want to make money. I want to make money for the company. If I don't, they should drop me and probably would. I doubt that I'll be here ten years from now—Lord, what a thought! Progress has always been what interested me most—going on—"

She laughed, so slender, black-clad, brown hair and eyes accented by vivid lips. Slender, yet eating her head off as we sat at tea in the Beverly Brown Derby.

ADVANCE model—

Forthright, frank, amused—knowing nothing of "glamor" and caring less. Scrapping the sticky old gods and bowing down to no new ones, she takes her "Art" as a "job," blows expert smoke into the face of the old tabus and laughs off as preposterous the notion that a gal must ogle a producer in order to get where she wants to go.

No special reverence for Broadway, she prefers the sticks—and favors farmers over first-nighters for audience. She is, undoubtedly, the first Thespian who has not genuflected to the "Great White Way."

She's told the most powerful Broadway producers that what they should ask an aspiring actress is, not what Broadway hit she has been in, but how much stock experience she has had, how many real parts, how much real work she has done. It's far more valuable and means infinitely more, says Rosalind, to have really worked in stock than it does to have brought in the mail or parked a cup of tea on a table in a Pulitzer Prize Play on Broadway, doing something a dog could be trained to do. To know your job, says Roz, that's the winning ticket. Or should be.

She drives around Hollywood, Rolls-roycey Hollywood, in an antiquated Ford, vintage of '29 and minus a cover, because she's fond of the old dear and likes the wind in her hair. She was once advised to profess, for publicity, a yearning for orchids, a dislike for such folksy beverages as milk and tea, a passion for champagne and exotic thises and thatses. "I couldn't," said Roz, "live with that person for five minutes!"

She is a sound business woman, drives a hard contract, expects to make money for the company she is with in order to earn it. She uses her own high-powered brain to think with and pays no attention to what others are doing, or have done.

She scoffs at the idea that an actress must be an exhibitionist when she is Miss Faith Corrigan, brown-eyed but fair-skinned, uses Pond's Rose Cream Powder. (below) Mrs. M. Bon de Sousa, medium blonde hair but creamy skin, uses Brunette.

What shade powder shall I use?

Consult your Skin, not your Hair, Optical Machine Answers

BROWN HAIR AND EYES—and a skin as white as a baby's. Medium blonde hair—dark brown eyes—and a skin with a creamy undertone.

Brunette and blonde. But a brunette powder would dim the first girl's skin. And a blonde powder would make the second girl's look chalky.

THE FIRST THING to do in choosing a powder is to study your own skin. Is it fair? Or dark? Is it sallow? Does it need brightening up? Or toning down?

Whatever it is, there is a Pond's powder shade that will bring to it just what your skin lacks.

With an optical machine, Pond's analyzed the coloring of over 200 girls—every type. They found the secret of the sparkle in dazzlingly blonde skin is the hint of bright blue in it. The creamy allure in brunette skin is due to a touch of brilliant green hidden in it.

They found what each girl's skin needed to give it life! They blended these colors invisibly in their new powder shades.

Over 200 girls' skin color-analyzed—to find the hidden beauty tints in skin, now blended invisibly in Pond's new powder shades.

Send for these shades free and try them before your own mirror:—

Natural—makes blonde skin transparent.
Rose Cream—gives radiance to fair skin.
Brunette—clears creamy skins.
Rose Brunette—warms dull skin.
Dark Brunette (Sun-Tan)—gives a lovely sunny glow.

Notice how smoothly this powder goes on—never cakes or shows up—How natural it looks on. And it stays that way for hours! Fresh—flattering!

off the stage or screen. She loathes cheapness, debunks the idea that you must know "the right people" or attend bibulous parties and smile pretty for the front office in order to get along.

She thinks the Park Avenue debs who crash the stage or screen for the thrill of it, putting up their own money in order to get into a show and, thereby shoving some needy working girl out of the picture, are vermin. And says so.

She has been to one big Hollywood party in the eight months she has been here and found it "somehow tragic." "Do you know," she said, "no one really laughed!"

Rosalind really laughs, really talks, really lives. Her job is vital but it isn't all of her life. If she didn't have a stage or screen job, she'd find work elsewhere. "I'd probably go in for merchandising," she said. She believes firmly in the dignity of labor, any kind of labor so that it is honestly performed.

She laughs at the idea that Hollywood may "change" her. It is rumored to make changelings of them all. She says, "How could it?" She's got her job and it's swell. After the job is done, she slams down the lid of her desk and goes home to other things—to read, to write letters home, to talk with her brother who has been spending the past six months with her.

She doesn't believe that success is handed to anyone on a silver spoon. Least of all in Hollywood, hotbed of hot competition. If it is, the silver spoon soon slips and is your mouth empty!

She thinks the picture people are swell, likes them all. None of this snooty attitude of "looking down" on movies and movie makers. None of the silly attitude, either, of looking up to them. A job to be done, that's all—fellow workers, good sports. She has two or three old school friends out here, knows a couple of doctors and their wives, often drives to Caliente by herself. She likes Ronald Colman on the screen and wants to meet him.

Well-bred, well brought up, sane, ambitious and American—that's Roz. She talks like a lady. She thinks like a man. She expects to give good measure and to get good measure in return. She trims her sails to the advantageous winds. She's sleek and slick and smart and alive. She's regular—and remarkable.

She's headed for stardom, streamline stardom—the new way.

New Clothes, Academically Speaking

heels and dressed to the teeth at all hours of the day. You should look casual and comfortable. To such an end is her second selection, a beige jersey shirtwaist dress, trim as to detail and workmanlike as to its purpose.

You can go a bit on the gay side in a topcoat, if you wish. She loves the big steamer rug plaids and selects one in tones of yellow and brown for a swagger topper for daytime clothes. With this she wears a brown felt sports hat and medium-heeled, widely strapped shoes. Some of the new fall topcoat textures for sportswear have a very fleecy look as contrasted with the smoother surfaces of recent seasons. They are flattering, no end, and are worth keeping an eye out for.

The sweater and skirt combination is practically a uniform for collegians and other school-goers. You can match bright sweaters to bright wool skirts or you can go in for contrast as Anita Louise does. To flatter her lovely blonde coloring, she contrasts a beautiful amber-colored sweater with a brown woolen skirt. Her sweater is a twin combination but in our picture Anita wears it without its extra jacket. The self-fringed green wool scarf is amusingly held by a class ring! And Anita adds that if it is the ring of your best heart beat, so much the more thrilling! Here's a new fad for you to try.

IF your budget permits the extra stretching that it takes to include a fur coat, Anita Louise thinks it's a good investment. She has a white kidskin one that has the simply cut, rather tailored lines that she thinks are right for school. Hers, she explains, is white because she finds more use for a white one in California, but for other climes, gray or brown would be more in order. It's grand to wear over dresses for tea dates, perfect for football games and will double as an evening wrap, too.

A black net evening gown is a good all year round item for formal use. It isn't dated in fabric by the season and can do for both formal and semi-formal duty when topped by a self cape as in the choice of Anita Louise. Of course, later on, you may want to have one grand prom dress in one of the stunning velvets or sheer metals. And, of course, there are always the popular satins for cocktail and dinner dresses. You will be intrigued, too, by the new wooly looking silks for that indispensable afternoon dress to wear to sorority teas and fraternity after-the-game dances.

I was talking with Bernard Newman the other day—he, you know, does those smooth clothes for Ginger Rogers and Katharine Hepburn. He is an amusing and sophisticated gent who knows more about women's clothes than they do themselves! He thinks that a new era of fashion is breaking in Hollywood because the designers are going to cease worrying so much about the dramatic quality of the costumes and think more about what you, in the audience, are going to want to wear.

This idea is in line with Adrian's and Joan Crawford's recent announcement that her new costumes will be simple, much the sort of thing she wears off screen and not the over elaborate costumes which have characterized her recent pictures. Joan thinks an actress's facial expressions should be more eye-compelling than her clothes. And as you know, watching recent films, you can't concentrate on the acting when your eye is constantly distracted by a flamboyant costume.

And now for some fashion tips you'll want to guide your fall shopping. Travis Banton, just back from a trip abroad, and to Paris in particular, says that he is going to use less fur on his new screen creations. He is going to put more energy and imagination into intricate details of design and less into large splashes of luxurious furs.

Banton brought back some fabrics from abroad which he will use in making costumes for Colbert, Lombard and others. These are fabrics which he thinks were indirectly inspired by California's scenery. There are intricately woven woolens with the graceful tracery of palm trees visible in them—some have feathers and others tropical motifs discernible in the weaves. This definite fabric interest probably accounts for Banton's intention of letting the design, rather than the trimming, carry the costume.

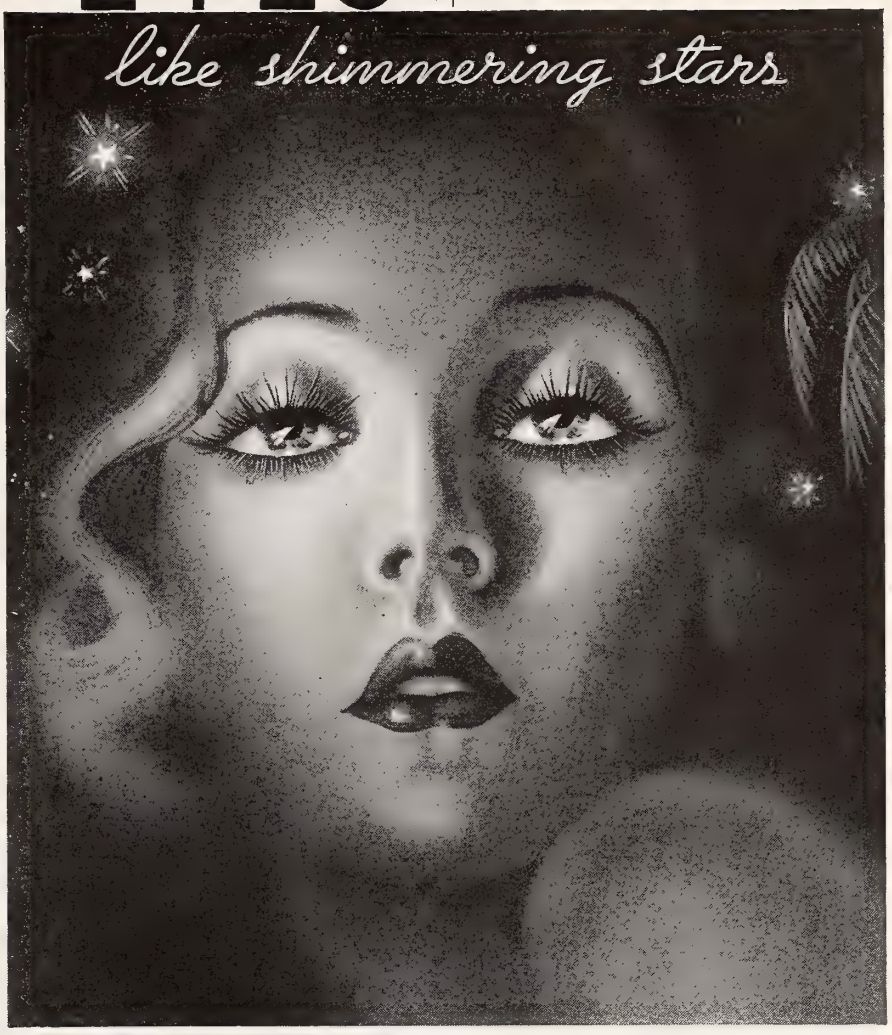
You'll be intrigued to know that Mr. Banton sees shorter skirts coming in. He reports British women wearing very short daytime skirts and that Parisiennes are definitely interested in the trend. Do you suppose he will influence Hollywood in this?

KAY FRANCIS has been favoring Paris with some expert shopping. Kay always has liked imported clothes although she wears the Hollywood product most of the year. Her pet contention is, you know, that she doesn't give a hang about clothes at all—but listen to what she picked out at Schiaparelli's while abroad! A black crinkly silk ensemble trimmed with silver fox. Into the neckline is tucked a chiffon scarf embroidered in rhinestones. Another costume is black crepe with a jacket of white crepe through which runs a woven design of black clover. And a third is a two-piece affair in silk with stripings of two tones of dark red and black. You notice that Kay sticks to the black theme which she finds so becoming.

You will find black big on the fall color card, too. Red in varying tones, quite a lot of purple, olive green and red-browns are sure to be great favorites. This will give you some idea of the color direction to follow in buying your first new things.

Besides Anita Louise's college suggestions, I have picked several other costumes that are suited to campus activities or for early fall use anywhere. There's Virginia Bruce's stunning tweed ensemble composed of a short flared coat in dark brown over a tan, severely tailored dress of the same tweed pattern. The coat is one of those grand things you can wear with any number of other costumes— the large patch pockets and deep cuffs giving it a lot of dash.

Virginia's camel's hair coat is slick, too. The wide beaver collar and the double-breasted cut lift it away from the usual polo coat class. It's an excellent all winter coat. Virginia has a golfing outfit that I haven't shown but which would make another perfect campus outfit for all of you. Over a sweater and skirt of coffee brown wool, she wears a trim tan pigskin jacket that buttons up to a small turnover collar. Slash pockets extend down from the shoulder yoke and have slide fastener openings. On the right side there is another little pocket above the belt and a larger flap pocket below. A matching beret and tan and brown sports shoes finish this off with smartness.



Then there's Fay Wray's simple slate gray tweed dress pictured. This has unusual pocket detail, too. And the taffeta collar and cuffs give this a more dress-up look. A perfect dress to wear under your fur coat to the game because it will look right at a fraternity party afterwards.

Capes are not out of the picture this fall, especially not for young things. Betty Furness wears a smart one in two tones of gray plaid over a matching jacket and a plain gray tweed skirt. Her alligator shoes and soft felt hat are nice extras.

And Florine McKinney's velvet evening wrap with matching muff is one of those good looking but not too elaborate evening things you should have. The unusual corded treatment at the front and on the sleeves makes a simple wrap look very luxurious.

I've hardly been able to touch adequately on school fashions in a limited space but it does give you a start and you probably have loads of good ideas of your own.

EYES like shimmering stars

TATTOO YOUR EYELASHES with this new form of mascara
NO WATER - NO PREPARATION NEEDED

HERE is a mascara that gives an effect vastly more fascinating than that obtained with the ordinary, old-fashioned cake or liquid darkeners . . . for, it doesn't impart a rough, "grainy" look to the lashes.

Tattoo applies so smoothly; it colors the lashes so evenly from lid to tips, that the lashes, instead of shouting "mascara," are merely a part of a lovely illusion; a stunning illusion in which your eyes appear as shimmering stars, surrounded with mysterious darkness . . . your lashes seeming to be twice their real length . . . each lash like a shaft of star-light reaching out to show the way to "heaven"!

Tattoo comes in a tube, ready for use. No water—no preparation needed. Simply whisk it onto your lashes with a brush. So truly easy to apply that your very first try yields a perfect result. Really waterproof—smart-proof—harmless. Tattoo your eyelashes! Black, Brown, Blue. NOW ON SALE AT ALL TOILET GOODS COUNTERS.

How Can You Help Liking Her?

she could, without lifting a finger, make audiences rock with laughter. A good comedienne, being as rare as quintuplets and fully as profitable to a theatrical producer, her fate was sealed.

"Ever since I was a child I've wanted to act," she said, "but I wanted to be a great dramatic actress and I'm sure I was at the age of five," she laughed.

"My brother and I had a theatre in the backyard. I wrote all the plays, directed and acted in them. I insisted upon being the boss. Not only did I insist that they do what I told them but also that they think the way I thought."

During her childhood there was one person who encouraged her in her ambition to act. That was a cousin, who now lives in Hollywood, and is Miss Oliver's only living relative.

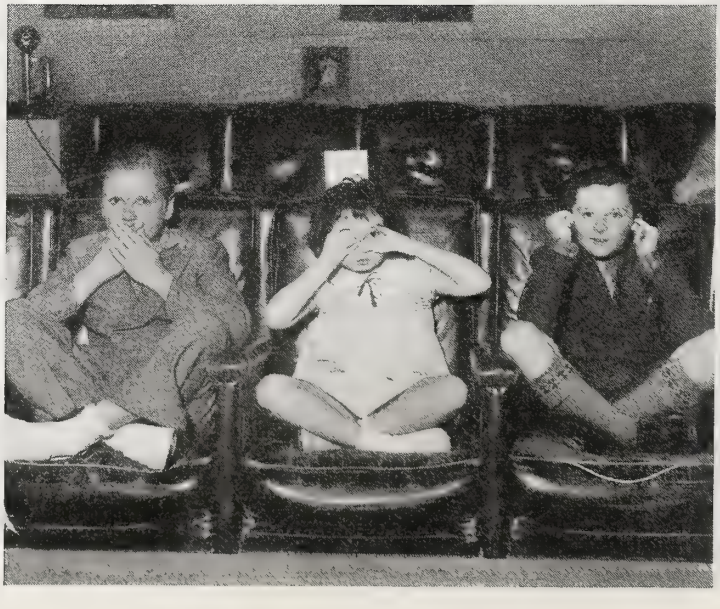
"She told me to keep on, never to stop, that she was sure I would be a great actress some day. She was the only person who believed in me," Miss Oliver said solemnly, and a tender note crept into her voice as she remembered back to the lean, hard years when a little encouragement meant so much.

The kindness of this older girl has never been forgotten and over a period of years she has been the object of Miss Oliver's lavish affection. Material gifts in the way of trips to Honolulu and Europe have also been provided by the generous Miss Oliver.

AT the age of fourteen she was singing in a church in Boston, her birthplace, and soon after she toured the New England states with an open air opera company. Her burning ambition at this time was to become a great singer and, possessed of a beautiful singing voice, she had reason to suspect she might succeed. But her hopes were blasted when she lost her voice and was forced to turn to the dramatic stage. She decided to join a stock company in Boston.

Getting a foothold was not easy. Her physical appearance was against her. Young, unformed, shy, inexperienced and, although still very young, she was taller than most men, a handicap difficult to overcome. It was not always that she could get work in the theatre.

At one time, unable to get the work she loved, and forced by absolute necessity to do something, she worked in a dressmaking establishment for three dollars a week. And another time in a millinery shop at the same meager wages. It took her four years to save forty dollars, the amount she thought necessary to take her to New York, where she expected to be a sensation. The forty dollars dwindled and one day she hid behind a trunk in her room to avoid facing an irate landlord to whom she owed eighty dollars.



Of course, there were good times mixed with the bad and the list of her successes on Broadway suggests nothing of the heartaches which preceded them. Miss Oliver was on the stage thirty years before she received what is referred to as "big money." But she never lost her sense of humor. She never lost her courage for a moment.

Of all the disappointments she had to face during her career, the most heartbreaking one was the realization that she must spend the rest of her career in making people laugh. Particularly was this a bitter pill in view of the fact that she had proven herself a great dramatic actress in "The Master," "Icebound," and other plays on that very same Broadway.

"Of course, I don't like to be laughed at," she will tell you with some asperity. "I don't think anyone does. However, there are two distinct kinds of humor. One is genuine—the laughs you get from a ridiculous situation, by funny remarks or—looking comical. The other kind comes from the so-called wits, who keep you in stitches with their bright remarks, which are always directed at some unfortunate person—wit at the expense of somebody's feelings."

Miss Oliver may relax, secure in the knowledge that her humor will never be followed by hurt feelings. Except her own, possibly, and she tries hard to hide that.

"We never let on that we don't like to be laughed at," she said. "There is a side of us that we keep to ourselves, that we never give to the public."

'Member the three monkeys? Here they are—Jackie (Speak no evil) Cooper, Cora Sue (See no evil) Collins and Freddie (Hear no evil) Bartholomew—viewing M-G-M's color cartoon, "Three Little Monkeys."

Fortunately, Miss Oliver has been able to maintain a private existence that is cloaked in virtual anonymity so far as the general public, or even Hollywood in particular, is concerned.

It has enabled her to preserve a personality that is at once unique and charming. So today Edna May Oliver stands as one great Hollywood institution that has escaped being absorbed by Hollywood. She is as definitely herself today as she was the day she arrived here three years ago, following a successful two years as Patty Ann Hawks in "Show Boat" in New York and Chicago. She has become a truly important figure in the Hollywood scheme but is never present on the Hollywood scene. As a matter of choice she would probably avoid Hollywood parties, anyway, but, as matters stand, she is just too busy to devote time to social events.

AFTER all, her job is such a big one—the job of bolstering up pictures that have, so to speak, flat feet. For producers are well aware that her name in a cast is a magic remedy for a weak picture, and she is in demand for twice as much work as she is able to do.

Miss Oliver probably has fewer acquaintances and more real friends than any prominent actress in motion pictures. This isn't an effort to make it appear that she lives a hermit's existence. On the contrary, although she declares, "I live simply," she goes every place and sees everything of interest. She entertains charmingly with small dinner parties and often takes her guests to a good show or a concert later. But you will never see her at one of the gay night spots.

"There is so little time in life to do the things you want to do," she explains. And one of the things she apparently wants and tries to do is to help anyone and everyone in distress. She has the most amazing capacity for giving of herself.

But I do not conclude from this that Miss Oliver is easily taken advantage of by undeserving persons or that she hasn't a proper conception of the value of money. Anyone who has ever tried to cheat her can testify that her indignation in actual life can be quite as forceful and effective as she has depicted that emotion on the screen.

She told me of an incident concerning the manager of an apartment house where she had gone to rent an apartment for a friend. After agreeing on the price, she wrote a check for that amount. When the manager saw the signature, "Edna May Oliver," on the check he said there had been a mistake, that the price was twenty dollars higher.

"Not of my money," declared Miss Oliver, as she tore the check to bits and stalked out in quest of another apartment.

"I'll give away fifty dollars—anything—but I won't pay one cent too much if I think anyone is trying to cheat me," she declared.

Well able to take care of herself in her home land, our heroine is unable to cope with avaricious tradespeople, porters, waiters, cab drivers, etc., when travelling abroad because she refuses to bother to learn foreign languages or how to count foreign money.

So, arguments over money matters in foreign lands invariably end with Miss Oliver dramatically emptying all the contents of her purse into her lap and screaming, "Take what you want and go away."

Extremely shy, she admits her worst fault is physical cowardice.

"I am," she declares solemnly, "afraid of everything. Every time I come on a

HOW DOES YOUR SKIN STAND THE TEST?

By Lady Esther

Every man instinctively plays the part of a beauty contest judge.

Every man's glance is a searching glance. It brings out faults in your skin that you never thin'k would be noticed. Even those faint lines and those tiny bumps that you think might escape attention are taken in by a man's eyes and, many times, magnified.

How does your skin meet the test? If it is at all dry or scaly, if there is a single conspicuous pore in your nose or even a suggestion of a blackhead anywhere on your face, you may be sure that you are gaining more criticism than admiration.

Many common complexion blemishes are due to nothing less than improper methods of skin care. You want to be sure to really clean your skin. You don't want to be satisfied merely to remove the surface dirt. You want a method that will reach the imbedded dirt. At the same time, one that will lubricate your skin and counteract the drying effects of exposure to the weather.

The Care The Skin Needs

The care your skin needs is supplied, in simple form in Lady Esther Face Cream. This cream does more than merely "grease" the skin. It actually cleanses. It reaches the hidden, stubborn dirt because it is a penetrating cream. There is nothing stiff or heavy about Lady Esther Face Cream. It melts the instant it touches the skin and gently and soothingly penetrates the pores.

"Going to work" on the accumulated waxy dirt, it breaks up and makes it—all of it—easily removable. At the same time, as Lady Esther Face Cream gently cleanses the skin, it also lubricates it. It resupplies it with a fine oil that overcomes dryness and scaliness and keeps the skin soft, smooth and supple.

When you give the skin this common sense care it's remarkable how it responds. Blackheads and enlarged pores begin to disappear. Those faint lines vanish. The skin takes on tone—becomes clear and radiant. It also lends itself to make-up 100% better.

Make This Test!

If you want to demonstrate the unusual cleansing powers of Lady Esther Four-Purpose Face Cream, just do this: Cleanse your skin as you are now doing it. Give it an extra good cleansing. Then, when you think it absolutely clean, apply Lady Esther Face Cream. Leave the cream on a few minutes, then wipe off with clean cloth. You'll be amazed at the dirt the cloth shows. This test has proved a source of astonishment to thousands of women.

At My Expense!

Let me prove to you, at my expense, the exceptional qualities of Lady Esther Face Cream. Let me send you a week's supply free of charge. Then, make the test I have just described—the clean cloth test. Prove the cream too, in actual daily use. In one week's time you'll see such a difference in your skin as to amaze you.

With the 7-day tube of cream, I will also send you all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder. As you test the cream, test also the shades of face powder. Find out which is your most becoming, your most flattering. Learn, too, how excellently the cream and powder go together and what the two do for the beauty of your complexion.

To get both the 7-day tube of Lady Esther Face Cream and the five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder, all you have to do is mail me your name and address on a penny postcard or on the coupon below. If you knew what was in store for you, you would not delay a minute in clipping the coupon.

EYE IDEAS

by Jane Heath

EYES BEHIND GLASSES!

Lots of women we know hesitate to wear glasses because they believe them unflattering. Not a bit, if you beautify your eyes! Glasses make them look smaller—so enlarge them . . . with Kurlash, the little implement that curls back your lashes lastingly between soft rubber bows. Your lashes appear longer and darker. Your eyes look larger, brighter, deeper! Opticians recommend Kurlash because it keeps your lashes from touching your glasses. $1, at good stores.

Hold the Line

Don't neglect your eyebrows, either! Tweezette, which "tweezes" out an offending hair at the touch of a button, is the easiest way known to shape your brows, painlessly, at home. Make them conform to the upper curve of your glasses, and the latter will be less noticeable! $1, also, at your drug store.

First Aid Kit

Behind your glasses, you can use eye make-up liberally and defy detection! Try Shadette, at $1, to give your eyes size and allure. And the little marvel Lashpac to travel in your handbag everywhere. set I look around and wonder which of those big lamps overhead is going to drop on my head, or which way I should run if there should suddenly be an earthquake."

She has a particular dread of airplanes. The members of the company who worked with her in "Murder on a Honeymoon" still chuckle remembering what ensued when, as Miss Oliver was sitting in the cabin of a large plane, the motor was started. Terrified at the thought of the plane possibly leaving the ground, she raised her umbrella, broke the nearest window and started to climb out.

Yet, fearful as she is, she loves to swim and often goes to the ocean alone and ventures far beyond what her loving friends believe to be a safe distance from the shore.

ONE time I was thoroughly frightened in the water," she told me. "That was one day when I was swimming in the Mediterranean. From the hotel window the water had looked invitingly blue, and I couldn't see the seaweed, which began to tangle itself around my arms and legs like the tentacles of an octopus before I had got very far from shore. I began screaming.

"Then I remembered that an astrologer had said I would never die by drowning, so I said to myself, 'Swim, Oliver. You'll never die here.' And finally I reached the shore safely."

Being ordinarily a fearful person, she is naturally a cautious one and when she was packing to make a trip to Italy last year she decided not to take any chances on foreign citrus fruit. She took a supply of lemons with her.

The lemons on the boat proved to be up to the most exacting standards and when she landed in Italy, the land of lemons, she found no need to unpack hers. Six weeks later, when she started home, she still had her five dozen lemons intact.

Arriving in Los Angeles harbor, she was informed by the customs officer that she couldn't bring any fresh fruit into this country from Europe. And, in spite of her protests that they were California lemons, that she had merely taken them on a trip to Europe, they were unceremoniously dumped into the harbor.

It was on that trip, incidentally, that she had a little adventure that set the whole city of Florence to chuckling. Late one afternoon, wearied by a round of sightseeing, she entered the magnificent tomb of one of the Medicis and seated herself to enjoy in leisurely fashion the contemplation of the fine sculpturing in the tomb. How long she sat there is not a matter of record, but she suddenly found herself roused from her reveries by the shouts of guards and frantic friends, who had been searching for her. She had been locked in the tomb after it was closed for the day, but didn't realize it until the arrival of the rescue party.

She dislikes attracting attention but unwittingly does so. No matter where she travels, everyone recognizes her. In Italy little children ran after her on the streets and, pointing their fingers at her, screamed delightedly, "Edna May Oliver!"

"It's this face of mine," she wails. "No one can mistake it."

She has an impulse to run when accosted by strangers, a feeling brought on by actual terror plus New England reserve.

"If I were a dramatic actress, people wouldn't dare approach me as they do," she says with a sigh. "Being just a comic, they come up to me wherever I am and ask me anything!"

She loves to cook and she loves to dance, but in nothing is Miss Oliver so feminine as in a charming inconsistency which keeps her friends guessing as to what she will do next. Having often declared she would never buy a home, she has bought one. And scarcely was she settled in it than she decided to take a trip. And scarcely was she on her way when she began to lament, "Why did I ever leave my nice, comfortable home? If I ever get home again, I'll never, never leave, I promise."

SHE really does love that home of hers, however, in spite of her periodical urges to gather some of her friends up and take them on trips with her. She has a touching pride in it, for it is the first home she has ever owned. And in its exquisitely simple elegance it reflects a trait that few picture-goers realize she possesses. She has excellent taste and likes only the best.

Her pride in her home is illustrated by a little story told on her by one of her neighbors.

Each morning, according to the story, a dilapidated old car was parked in front of the neighbor's house. There it would sit all day and sometimes until late at night. One day, seeing Miss Oliver's chauffeur, the neighbor asked him if he knew to whom the car belonged.

"It's my car, ma'am," he admitted readily enough, "but Miss Oliver told me not to park the old wreck in front of her house." Her servants adore her and if she only knew it, she could no doubt hire them for half the money she pays them. Recently she spent several days on a distant location where she would have no use for her chauffeur, so she gave him a week off. She departed for location and the chauffeur left for San Francisco. The next day she was surprised to look up and see him standing at her elbow.

"Where did you come from?" she demanded. "I thought you were having a vacation. What does this mean? Is something wrong?"

"I thought you might need me, Miss Oliver," he explained, "so here I am."

Such loyalty in servants is indeed rare, but, you see, Edna May Oliver arouses it.

An accomplished pianist herself, one of her greatest pleasures lies in attending musical events and she is a dependable patroness of all worth while artistic ventures in Los Angeles. And it is when dressed for these events that Miss Oliver will give the greatest surprise to those who know her only from her screen rôles. Attired in the most flawless taste, she has what many beautiful stars have not and would give the world to possess. That is distinction.

She is often seen in company with the beautiful Virginia Hammond.

"I like to be with Virginia because she is so beautiful," Miss Oliver explains, adding laughingly. "You wouldn't expect me to want to look up and see a face like mine, would you? I like to look at beautiful things."

That same modest realization of the basis for much of her screen fame was illustrated in her answer to a query as to whether she was the heroine of an episode reported by a columnist recently.

The story said that when a bandit attempted to hold up this actress, she gave vent to a scream which she had often used in mystery plays, letting him have it fortissimo. Whereupon the bandit dropped his gun. "Please, lady," he pleaded, "don't scream like that. Just forget the whole thing, will you?" and disappeared into the darkness scared out of his wits, no doubt.

"If that actress was me and the robber got a good look at my face, he's probably running yet," Miss Oliver replied grimly.

How can you help liking her?

Work With Me for Beauty and Health

I know girls who think they can reduce the hips by artificial methods. And to them I want to say, forget it. Sweat baths and steam cabinets are the bunk! You need your strength or you'll never reduce in spots. And when you reduce artificially the muscles—awful, old flabby muscles—will still be there.

NOW go about it the right way. Study the pictures with this article and do exactly as I'm doing. Follow instructions carefully. Stand with the feet straight but slightly apart. Raise your arms above your head, then bend the right arm. Now, as you do this, bend your body to the left with the left arm straight. Keep your knees stiff—and that's important. Pull those hip muscles and pull them hard, pulling and bending very, very slowly until the finger tips of the left hand touch the floor. Repeat on the other side.

Feel those muscles pulling? That's swell, baby, that's getting after those hips with a bang. Sure, I know you'll be sore after you've done this exercise. But don't complain. You're using muscles you haven't used for ages. Just remember that what you're doing is shaving off your hips as if you had taken a razor blade to them, that you're flattening out the muscles and breaking down the fatty tissue beneath them. Isn't that worth a little soreness? I guarantee that if you take a size sixteen dress now, you'll be able to wear a size fourteen if you do this exercise religiously for fifteen minutes a day for one month! How's that for a promise? But it works. I know it. I take that exercise. But be sure that you feel those hip muscles pulling, pulling. When you're doing it correctly the pull begins just below the waist and goes down into the legs.

And now I want to give you a sensible eating program along with a grand dessert which I gave Jean Harlow for the preservation of her gorgeous complexion. It will work wonders on your skin. Besides, most of you gals who are reducing yell and scream for dessert. Well, here it is. Eat it. Twice a day. It's good for you.

Wash in cold water but do not seed, three pounds of cherries. Place them in a double boiler with just a little water in with them. Let them simmer until they're soft enough so you can press out the juice. When this juice is very hot—but not boiling—pour in a package of gelatin. When gelatin is dissolved add three tablespoons of brown sugar. Pour this into moulds that have been rinsed with cold water. Cool off and chill in refrigerator. Serve with a few chopped un-salted almonds and two tablespoons of top milk on each mould. This is not only perfectly delicious, but it is a blood producer as well. It will give you pep and plenty of it.

And now for a sensible eating menu to tide you over until next month. Here it is.

AND now you girls who bear a resemblance to Joan Crawford, get busy and send your photographs to me. Every one will have my personal attention. Address, Madame Sylvia, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York City. Next month I'm going to ask the girls who look like Constance Bennett and after that the girls who look like Claudette Colbert to send in their pictures. So you had better not miss a single one of my articles. Anyhow, I think we're going to have a lot of fun and I know you're going to learn how to make yourself as you've dreamed of being.

Also you are at liberty to write me regarding any problem that worries you. I'll tell you what to do and how to do it.

I'm thrilled to have this opportunity to talk to MODERN SCREEN readers. I can't help it if I sound hard boiled as I give you the devil for being too lazy to reduce. The truth is I know so well how grand you can look, if you will, that it breaks my heart to see any woman carrying a burden of excess weight. My fingers tingle to start digging into those ugly muscles. I can't do that but I can tell you what to do for yourselves. And if I get you out of your sluggish lethargy, if I can give you a good mental shaking up, and can make you work with me toward beauty and health, then I'll be perfectly happy.

Come on, darlings, snap into it!

The Most Tragic Love Story

"That was not true and I told them so. All the press notices gave Dolores the credit. He gave her a chance. She made good. She did not have to go on being grateful to John. We've all given girls breaks. Some make good; some don't. She was a star in her own right, now, and she could have told Barrymore to go to ——

"As to love . . ." his voice softened. "You remember the first man who ever made love to you, don't you? The man who awakened your feeling of romance, made the stars seem nearer and the moon something besides a useless ball in the heavens? John did that to Dolores. You can never quite forget the first man; you can never believe another will give you quite the same lovely yearning. Dolores thinks this is love. Look at her. Of course, she thinks it. As for John, he isn't capable of that kind of love anymore. And when she awakens . . .

"Dolores is not a grown woman yet. She's a young girl living in a young girl's dreamland. But underneath, she's stubborn. Like her mother—and father. I hope it works out, but when it doesn't—"

THERE was more, much more. Making allowances for the ancient rivalry between the Costellos and the Barrymores (a rivalry dating far back into theatrical history); making allowances for Maurice Costello's jealousy of a Barrymore who had supplanted him in the bosom of a Costello family, still there was an urgent ring of sincerity to his words that made me shudder, only an hour after the most beautiful screen girl had married the handsomest screen lover.

His description of the youngest Barrymore sounded weirdly like two birds of the same plumage exchanging honest self-appraisals. There was not much he did not tell of the history of the erratic John from his love for his monkey to his fondness for rich foods and garlic. "My wife's a wonderful cook. No wonder John liked to live at our house. He got used to eating there before I returned to discover a Barrymore had replaced a Costello. I wish now my wife and I had separated fifteen years ago. We only stayed together because of the children."

I thought I would never forget the bitterness, the anguish of that father's denunciation of the man his daughter had just married.

And yet, with the rest of Hollywood, I did forget him and the other prophets. They were so happy. John Barrymore told everyone of the peace, the quiet joy, that had come to bless him. Dolores, although seen seldom, appeared equally content. Her eyes still shone with faith.

In fact, Hollywood had seldom seen such a complete metamorphosis in one of its people. The Barrymore monkey was forgotten. The people who worked in pictures ceased to fear Barrymore and began to treat him like another human being. Less than three years ago, a press agent told me, "I would rather go to John Barrymore's to make pictures than any other star's estate. He's so human. He and Dolores don't care particularly about publicity but they are always pleasant. You feel like a guest rather than a worker." This about the man who had been formerly notorious for insulting press people!

Even the famous Barrymore profile, which had caused cameramen so many sleepless nights when he first entered pictures because of his fear that it would not be photographed from the proper angle, was forgotten. He laughed about it.

In other words, John Barrymore mellowed. He became the father of two adorable children who made him realize what a poor substitute are monkeys.

The Barrymores were seldom at their lovely estate when John was not working. Their yacht, "The Infanta," carried them from the South Seas to the Arctic. Dolores' love had been a first love, as her father said, and a first love is always anxious to prove the depth of its devotion. So when John wanted to roam, she wanted to roam with him. Perhaps Dolores learned to really enjoy yachting. Love can teach a woman to thrill to what she has despised before love. I remember her telling me, a few months before they were married, that she did not care for the sea. Possibly she has never learned to like it. Then her mad packings, her readiness to go to sea upon a two hours' notice, are more to be admired.

ALTHOUGH the divorce suit came as a surprise to the world, it shocked, but did not surprise Hollywood. I suppose no marital situation has been more closely guarded from unfavorable publicity than this. Rumors began sneaking their snakey ways around the luncheon tables more than two years ago. But no one could check them. Then, Dolores began appearing infrequently in public for the first time since she dedicated herself to a secluded life with her husband and babies. She looked so radiant no one could believe she was not happy. I believe now this was the secret of her circulating again amongst us. She was turning a bright face to the world so the gossips could not revive old wives' tales about her Barrymore husband.

Then John Barrymore became very ill—he was on the verge of death! Hollywood shuddered. Barrymore's studio, RKO, denied it. They even announced, via radio, that John Barrymore and Dolores Costello were on a third honeymoon in the Arctic.

We know now John was ill. Just how ill, no one is certain. There are rumors of a strange illness, a curious one, that includes a memory which may have faltered. Surely, the man has changed again. Whether he has returned to the erratic, genius-like personality which his father-in-law so feared for his daughter, or whether genius has slipped into an entirely new cloak, as a genius keyed too highly sometimes does, no one can tell, today. But whatever it is, the tragedy lies naked—unable to be longer hidden.

I doubt if Dolores Costello Barrymore would have hinted of divorce or spoken of her problem had not pride and self-preservation been literally whipped into action. After all, she has protected him for more than two years with the most superb acting of her career. I knew this quiet, refined girl during her first days in pictures and I believe she would have suffered without a murmur if John Barrymore had not dashed about the seas in their yacht on gay parties; if he had not announced in black type he would no longer be responsible for debts incurred by anyone but himself.

A woman's love, no matter how great, has always two vulnerable points. Pride and a love for her children. A pride can be insulted just once too often—a mother love will always spring to defend its young.

The newspapers talk of another young girl, Elaine Barrie, in the life of John Barrymore, the great screen actor. Reporters quote this young girl's father as saying John is interested only in her screen future. A "protégée" they call her.

Ah, Dolores was that, too, in the beginning. She was the beautiful child given an opportunity in "The Sea Beast." She was a protégée professionally speaking.

And as I read the quoted words of the father of this protégée, I hear the words of the father of the first protégée ringing in my ears:

"My family live just up the hill, above me. I can see their home from here. I often look up there. If the pillows in my car could speak they would tell you a great story. I used to drive into the hills and cry myself to sleep. Sometimes, I would take a newspaper and read myself to sleep in my car and awaken in the morning. Sometimes, I have cried myself out of the idea of murder. I would wake up there in the hills and look at the sunshine and decide this was better than San Quentin, that after all—John Barrymore was not worth murdering."

One emotional genius speaking of another. One emotional genius speaking as a father of a son-in-law, somewhat like himself.

When a Costello married a Barrymore, the two greatest theatrical families of our generation gave Hollywood its greatest love tragedy. But from this cross should come the world's greatest actors of tomorrow. John, Junior, and Dolores, little son and little daughter! From tragedy often comes life's greatest promise.

"I SUFFERED BY DAY I SUFFERED BY NIGHT

No One Will Ever Know the Agony I Underwent in Silence!"

IF there's anything will make you miserable and wear you down, it's Piles. The person who has Piles can't walk, sit, stand or even lie down in comfort. The agony writes itself on your face and makes you look years older than you are.

The worst part about Piles is that, on account of the delicacy of the subject, many hesitate to seek relief. Yet, if there's anything in need of medical attention, it's this trouble, for it can develop seriously.

Piles may vary in form. They may be internal or external, painful or itching, or both. They may be bleeding or not. Whatever form Piles take, they are something to be concerned about and something to treat promptly.

Perfect Comfort

Effective treatment for Piles today is supplied in Pazo Ointment. Pazo is quick-acting. It is reliable. It almost instantly relieves the distress and restores comfort. Pazo is highly efficacious for the reason that it is a scientific formula of threefold effect.

First, it is soothing. This tends to relieve soreness and inflammation. Second, it is lubricating. This tends to relax drawn parts and also to make passage easy. Third, it is astringent. This tends to reduce swollen parts and to stop bleeding. Thousands have used Pazo with success when other measures have failed.

Now in 3 Forms

Pazo Ointment now comes in three forms: (1) in Tubes with Special Pile Pipe for insertion high up in the rectum; (2) in Tins for application in the ordinary way; (3) in Suppository form (new). Those who prefer suppositories will find Pazo the most satisfactory, as they are self-lubricating and otherwise highly efficient.

Try It!

All drug stores sell Pazo in the three forms as described. Get it today in the form you prefer and try it out. Your money back if it doesn't more than amaze you with the relief it affords.

Gary Isn't the Same

and restless demeanor. I have always thought it was his great capacity for silence rather than his virility which thrilled Hollywood's army of women. Men had always talked to Clara Bow, Evelyn Brent, Lupe Velez. In fact, woman has always had to lean forward, elbows on the dinner table, and listen eagerly to man. But here was a man who listened. He was like a great sponge absorbing each word of theirs as though it were a precious drop of clear wisdom. By his very silence he made them feel important and made himself mysterious and "different."

It is strange to watch Gary's effect upon women. Take Lupe, for example. Lupe is always a cartridge in the constant act of exploding but she has never exploded so graciously as when she was with Gary Cooper. People who visited at her dinner table were wont to comment, "Why does she not sit at the head of her own table?" She would answer, "I cannot see Gary, then. Flowers and dishes and things are in the way. He never says anything but I am always watching him to see if I can know what he is thinking."

Clara Bow did her best work while she was in love with him. Remember when they played in "It" together? Evelyn Brent reached her greatest success, too, while she was playing opposite Gary.

And the effect on Gary? Gary had slipped away from the ranks of the extra in "Wings." He had become a leading man in "It." The most glamorous girl in Hollywood (Clara) had fallen in love with him. He told me, then, "I don't just see how all this could have happened to me but it did and I've just got to make good and prove I deserve it."

There is pathos in the gratitude of the very young. Imagine a barefooted straggler welcomed into the regular army and made immediately into a sergeant. How much he believes he owes that army! He must prove even to himself his right to such honor.

The duty of Hollywood's army is making pictures. After his miraculous, storybook beginning in "Wings" and "It," Gary made pictures. One monotonous, humdrum picture after another. Many pictures that seemed exactly like those he had made before. Certainly nothing noble; not one to make him feel he was becoming a great actor. He found himself making love on the screen, making love off. His fame as a lover had spread around the world. Everything he did off the screen—whether he was escorting Clara, Evelyn or Lupe—was photographed and broadcast in the magazines and newspapers.

It was then that he made two very startling statements to me. First, "I would not dare to marry. I've been married so many times on the screen that I'd feel I was doing something I'd done before. I'd feel it was just another piece of acting. It wouldn't mean anything." And second: "All women are alike. I don't know what they want but they all say the same things trying to get it."

Most people believe the change in Gary came when Lupe Velez drove him to the train in Pasadena and saw him off on his secret, run-away-from-Hollywood trip to the hot sands of Egypt. Gary was ill. Most ill. The strain of one picture after another with no rest in between, with not even a very good picture to relieve the monotony, had taxed his strength until the doctors told him he must skip. And still the young boy, he slipped away without telling anyone, not even his studio. Only Lupe.

Gary had changed outwardly when he returned to us. His clothes were from Bond Street, London. His manners were from homes of the smartest nobility of Italy and England. I ate breakfast with him one morning soon after his return. He repeated his remark about women. "All women are alike—"

Certain European women were planning on following him to Hollywood. Gary was half-planning to dash away to China to get the Pacific Ocean between himself and the women of America and Europe! He was half-planning to leave pictures forever because he couldn't understand himself, pictures or women.

When he didn't go, Gary took his first firm step out of boyish adolescence. He didn't step far. He still ran a yellow car at breakneck speed. He even courted Sanda Shaw in it. But he was beginning to think in terms of life as it is rather than as he had pictured it in Montana. I talked with him shortly before he married Sandra. He was trying to find his way back into his proper niche in Hollywood's army of actors. That is not easy when one has been away as long as had Gary.

"I guess the producers know their business, after all," he smiled, a bit crookedly. "When I had a little success I thought I should do something big. I hated doing the same old thing over and over but, after all, just what did I know about acting? I was learning by that routine, only I didn't know it. I still want to do something big. I'd like to do 'The Bengal Lancers'!" His eyes lit with a yearning I had never seen in them even when he was working on "Wings!" "Why, I couldn't even wear clothes. I was going through a course of training. Necessary training. I didn't like it. None of us do. Perhaps I'll be able to act so well someday that I won't really act at all but just be natural. If I do, how much will I owe to that necessary routine I hated!

"I don't know much more about women. But I do owe them a lot. I still remember the face of my dream girl in the clouds. Always one woman. One who was different. If I could find her now—"

And only a little later, he decided he had found her. Not a Hollywood woman, whose pictures would circle the globe in newspapers, but a girl from social circles who detested newspaper notoriety.

I talked to him a few days after he returned from their honeymoon. The transition was definitely beginning. Gary Cooper was either to grow up or slip back into a permanent, happy-today, unhappy-tomorrow, boyish adolescence. This statement showed he was standing on the bridge of life: "I don't know about marriage. I don't want to talk about it. It's between us. It should help. A married man knows where he is going to be. He has time for his work because he has found routine in his private life just as he must have found it in his work if he is to be successful."

But Gary had always hated routine. He had side-stepped it in Montana. He had hated it when he was in school in England. He had even hated the English gardens because they had been so formal. "Flowers couldn't grow their own way," he had told me. He had hated the Hollywood training, the formality of his membership in Hollywood's army.

Marriage is a routine. He didn't know it yet. But I did. And Sandra Shaw was the product of a routine of America's finest and highest culture. What would Gary Cooper, the boy who had raced at will with coyotes and dashed ahead of rain and wind storms for the thrill he felt from mere dashing, do about it?

He was cast in "The Lives of a Bengal Lancer."

Five magazine stories were written questioning the permanence of Gary Cooper's marriage.

I wrote two of them. I don't pretend I wrote them to help Gary. I didn't. I wrote them because the magazines would pay for them. Gary was furious. He was angered as I have never seen him angered. "This marriage is my own. Who in Hell are you to mix in it?" Not only to me but to all the other writers. He gave out a statement to the newspapers, "I will never see another magazine writer and these five stories are the reason." I noted my two among the list and I am afraid I chuckled. For I knew then that Gary Cooper had squared his well-formed shoulders, buckled his belt firmly around his slim waist and decided to run his own life without interference.

And then he started work in "The Bengal Lancers."

NOW there's no need for thousands to be "skinny" and friendless, even if they never could gain before. Here's a new treatment for them that puts on pounds of solid, naturally attractive flesh — in just a few weeks!

Doctors now know that the real reason why great numbers of people find it hard to gain weight, and suffer with indigestion, constipation and a blemished skin, is that they do not get enough Vitamin B and iron in their daily food. Now with this new discovery which combines these two vital elements in little concentrated tablets, hosts of men and women have put on pounds of firm flesh — in a very short time.

Not only are thousands quickly gaining normal good-looking pounds, but also naturally clear skin, freedom from indigestion and constipation, new pep.

7 times more powerful

This amazing new product, Ironized Yeast, is made from special ale yeast imported from Europe, the richest known source of Vitamin B. By a new process the yeast is concentrated 7 times — made 7 times more powerful.

But that is not all! This special vitamin-rich yeast is then ironized with 3 kinds of iron which strengthen the blood, add wonderful energy.

If you, too, are one of the many who simply need Vitamin B and iron to build them up, get Ironized Yeast tablets from your druggist at once. Day after day, as you take them, watch flat chest develop and skinny limbs round out to normal attractiveness. Skin clears to natural beauty, digestive troubles from the same source vanish, new health comes—you're a new person.

Results guaranteed

No matter how skinny and rundown you may be from lack of enough Vitamin B and iron, this marvelous new Ironized Yeast should build you up in a few short weeks as it has thousands. If not delighted with the results of the very first package, your money instantly refunded.

Only don't be deceived by the many cheaply prepared "Yeast and Iron" tablets sold in imitation of Ironized Yeast. These cheap counterfeits usually contain only the lowest grade of ordinary yeast and iron, and cannot give the same results as the scientific Ironized Yeast formula. Be sure you get the genuine. Look for "IY" stamped on each tablet.

Special FREE offer!

To start you building up your health right away, we make this absolutely FREE offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out the seal on the box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results guaranteed with the very first package—or money refunded. At all druggists. HERE ARE THE LIPS TULLIO CARMINATI SAW

UNTOUCHED PAINTED TANGEE

Movie star tells why Tangee lips were most appealing

• Tullio Carminati, makes the lipstick test between scenes of the Paramount picture, "Paris in Spring."

● "Her lips were natural and rosy... not coated with paint," said Tullio Carminati of the girl with Tangee lips. That's because Tangee accentuates your own natural color. It can't make your lips look "painted," because Tangee isn't paint! In the stick, Tangee is orange. On your lips, through its magic color principle, it changes to the one shade of blush rose meant for you. For those who prefer more color, especially for evening wear, there is Tangee Theatrical.

Try Tangee. In two sizes, 39c and $1.10. Or send 10c and the coupon for the special 4-Piece Miracle Make-Up Set offered below.

You saw Gary in that picture. You knew it was a new man before you. Gary Cooper was no longer a young boy looking the well-trained lover. There was no woman to love in the picture. He was a man proving he is a well-trained actor.

And when he was finished, he went to the mountains to shoot lions. His wife, not much more than a bride, remained at home, waiting for him to bring his trophies to her.

And I knew then, Gary and Sandra had adjusted that difficult problem of marriage. Although I did not see the scene, I imagined it clearly. The new, grown-up Gary standing solidly on two feet, seeing his little woman as she is—not a dream but a real person to admire him for wanting to shoot lions and get away, alone, once in a while, to the freedom of his chasms and pinnacles of Nature.

Gary Cooper was never able in the old days to refuse a woman—not even an interview to a woman reporter. When a lady friend hit him with a slipper, he let her hit him. When a studio overworked him, he took the overworking until his health forced him to run away. That was the little boy from Montana learning his practical lessons. But he learned them! And when we are big enough, fine enough, unselfish enough and intelligent enough to learn from the cards shuffled by life, we become real men and women. Gary had grown up and the man who stands firmly straight today and says "No" and means it, is twice as interesting, romantic and exciting as the boy who intrigued you rather than commanded your sincere admiration.

The Theatre's Loss

Exciting. I tell you if I had to choose between being only a moderately successful actor or a supremely successful anything else I'd choose to be the actor. For life's sake."

The gratitude he feels because he became an actor is in his face. As all the emotions he knows are in his face which is like a sounding board against which life beats to leave its marks.

"Living," he said later that afternoon, "takes a lot of understanding!"

It would for him. It always must for anyone who is sensitive. So sensitive they feel for others as well as for themselves. In self-defense such men and women must search for a balm to ease the things they know. And there's only one such understanding.

On Walter Huston's writing table there was a photograph of him and Nan Sunderland, his wife, taken on the porch of their ranch house at Arrowhead. While a picture is actually in production he goes down to Hollywood and stops at a hotel. The rest of the time he's up in this "ranch house gone luxurious," as he describes it.

His wife wasn't going to England with him. She had stage work to keep her here. But it was planned that she might join him later, if her activities permitted. He never asks her to fit her career in with his. He knows that with any career worth having this cannot be done.

"And after all," he says with a nice slow smile, "I've never seen the guy get very far who takes the attitude, 'You're my wife and you must do what I want!' Very far, from a happiness standpoint, I mean."

Not long ago, for instance, when he was busy in the studios he realized that Nan was becoming restless, unhappy. He knew she needed to have work to do.

"Find a play and go to New York and do it," he told her. "If it's something I can play in later on when I finish this picture, fine. If not, you do it alone."

He said, "She would have stayed with me had I asked it. But she wouldn't have been happy. And neither would I."

He's so convinced a recent Hollywood split-up never would have happened if the husband, a motion picture star, had taken the same attitude. But when this man's wife, who previously had been successful on the stage, was offered a tempting role he objected to her leaving him.

"YOU know," Walter Huston said, "that if he had told her to go ahead, wished her luck, when she reached New York and had the lonely times which are inevitable when we're separated from someone we love, she would have been anxious to get back to that swell guy who had proven so unselfish and understanding. Less anxious, too, to leave him the next time. They'd have been together today. Together and happy. Instead of separated and unhappy. Disillusioned also because something they had once thought was pretty grand had turned sour."

The modern woman he counts a boon to men.

"Goodness knows she asks little enough," he said. "She only wants the truth. And it's only when she doesn't get this—because a lot of men haven't grown accustomed to the idea that women can take the unvarnished, unembroidered truth—that misunderstandings and mix-ups occur."

I asked if he always understood his wife, if he always knew why she reacted as she did or wanted what she wanted or felt as she felt. He shook his head. With the bewilderment all men feel about all women at times.

"But I try to understand," he said, leaning forward.

"And when you still can't understand," I asked him, "what then?"

He grinned. "Well, I'll tell you. I remember all the times in my life when the strong feelings and instincts I had about certain things were totally incomprehensible to others. And then I tell myself that, of course, it's sometimes impossible for any human being really to understand another. But the fact that one feels a certain way commands respect for it, whatever it may be or however inexplicable."

Often, I'm sure, Walter Huston must puzzle the ambitious members of the film colony who count success in terms of princely yearly salaries, estates which crown the innumerable Beverly Hills, jade swimming pools, imported motors and all the rest of the luxurious fanfare. When he leaves Hollywood flat, and the fabulous money to be earned there, to trek to New York and to appear on the stage for a year because the Sinclair Lewis character of "Dodsworth" happens to be a role after his own heart and he likes stage work. (He'll do this for the screen after "Rhodes, Empire Builder" likely enough, incidentally.) When he goes out and buys a new thirteen-hundred-dollar car, American family model, and gets a bigger kick out of it and its performance than many get out of their thirteen-thousand-dollar cars, chi-chi foreign models. Because he lives up at Arrowhead, contentedly turning out chairs and beds and tables on his own lathe, reading from dinnertime to his early bedtime, with Nan Sunderland sitting on the other side of the big fireplace where great logs blaze. Because he refuses to have a telephone installed in this "ranch house gone luxurious." And says quietly to those who insist that really he should have a phone, "Ever try living in a house without one? No? Well, it's marvelous!"

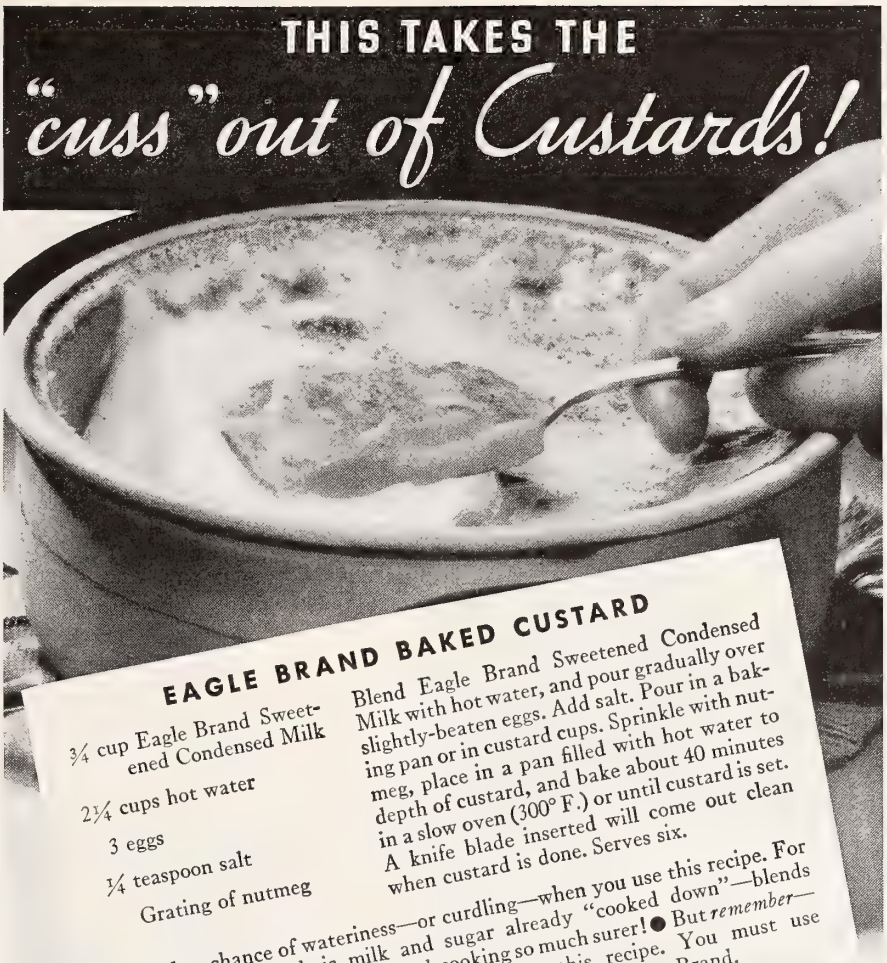
He measures success differently than most people, you see. He counts it getting along. Putting something aside for those years which aren't so apt to yield an income of their own. Never losing track of the things you really want to do. Doing some of these things always. Finding your happiness day by day.



He's quite right, of course. Living takes a lot of understanding. And he has this. More of it than anyone I've ever known. Which accounts for him being such a swell human being. And results in him being such a superb actor that there are thousands who rejoice with him that years ago fate up and did a cartwheel which landed him in the theatre and put his engineering days definitely behind him.

We Disagree With Shirley's Mother

bunnies, most children do. But, if she had hated the little rabbits—in their brand new hutches—which Winfield R. Sheehan gave her for Easter, I'll wager not a person, not even her mother would have known it. Shirley Temple instinctively would have made everyone believe she wanted to play with the rabbits because she instinctively would have known it pleased her nice "boss" for her to play with them.

TAKE her so-called passion for autographs. She has one of the finest collections in the country and it will probably be the finest before she is finished. Now, on the face of it, a child who was just six on April 23, is too young to really appreciate the significance of autographs. But friends on the lot, like Jack Donohue, Fox dance director, began asking for hers. And Shirley knew if he wanted hers, he might like to have her want his. So she asked

EAGLE BRAND BAKED CUSTARD

¾ cup Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
2¼ cups hot water
3 eggs
¼ teaspoon salt
Grating of nutmeg

Blend Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk with hot water, and pour gradually over slightly-beaten eggs. Add salt. Pour in a baking pan or in custard cups. Sprinkle with nutmeg, place in a pan filled with hot water to depth of custard, and bake about 40 minutes in a slow oven (300° F.) or until custard is set. A knife blade inserted will come out clean when custard is done. Serves six.

● Far less chance of wateriness—or curdling—when you use this recipe. For Eagle Brand—which is milk and sugar already "cooked down"—blends smoothly with eggs, makes custard-cooking so much surer! ● But remember—Evaporated Milk won't—can't—succeed in this recipe. You must use Sweetened Condensed Milk. Just remember the name Eagle Brand.

Shirley Temple has a way with all her leading men. John Boles is the latest slave to the Temple wiles and here you see them in a scene from "Curly Top."

for his autograph in return. He, and those others who sought hers, were pleased. They smiled. She had pleased them so she began asking everyone to sign her autograph book for her.

Incidentally, here are a few random examples from the big book with its lovely leather binding which was a birthday present from director David Butler ("Little Colonel," "Bright Eyes," "Curly Top")—

"You're sweet
"You're cute
"You're swell
"You're grand
"Good luck—"
(Signed) Jimmy Dunn.

Adolphe Menjou wrote: "To Shirley, a talented Artiste."

Madge Evans: "To Shirley: A lovely little girl and a great film actress."

Sir Guy Standing: "To Shirley: With whom it has been an honor and pleasure to play."

WITH these and hundreds more like them; with each one read to her, of course, Shirley Temple knows her own importance. I repeat, she can't help it. But she also knows the way to make others happy is to make them feel important.

Why, a child far less intelligent than our Shirley would grasp the significance of a stand-in. And I know few stand-ins in Hollywood who do not grasp the significance of their own positions as orderlies. And yet Shirley's stand-in is just another little girl with a chance in motion pictures because Shirley treats her like one—more as a playmate.

When she played in her first pictures, Shirley was a prompter. When Jimmy Dunn or another "friend" forgot his lines, Shirley piped up with them. She was helping out. She doesn't do that, now. Which one it was who gave the first flash of quick resentment at a six-year-old's learning and remembering, not only her own lines, but the other fellow's, too—we shall never know. Perhaps Shirley didn't even notice the first time but it didn't take long. And now Shirley busies herself with her handwork, her lessons in spelling or reading or French and pretends she has forgotten about the other fellow even though she may be just aching, in her helpful little way, to cover his slip or bad memory.

After watching this situation over months, I asked someone, who is often on Shirley's set, why no one, not even a leading man, ever remembers Shirley is a star when he has worked with her for a day or two. She answered, "If any person tried to kowtow to Shirley it would be embarrassing for that person because it just wouldn't—wouldn't—" she hesitated, "synchronize. It just wouldn't fit in with Shirley Temple."

And there you have your answer from one who has watched each step of the amazing career of this still almost-a-baby. To make a class distinction between Shirley Temple and others would not synchronize with Shirley Temple.

LIKEWISE, to make that class distinction does not synchronize with Garbo or Helen Hayes. For those who actually have worked with Garbo, adore her. Garbo is always trying to please those around her. I dined once with her. And that is the one memory I carry foremost—her intuitive effort to make me, a comparative nobody, happy and this despite the fact that she had not wanted to see me. Helen Hayes has the same intuitive regard for everyone else's pleasure. Will Rogers has it. And also Clara Bow, Gloria Stuart, Clark Gable.

Of course, there are others. But those names flash first. I wonder why. I wonder if, after all, real genius is not that fourth-dimensional sense of knowing how to please either one person, on a set or at a luncheon table, as well as thousands sitting before a stage, in either a legitimate or motion picture theatre? Instinctively to know how to please others—is that not the true secret of entertainment, and therefore, of true genius?

So, when the mother of Shirley Temple says the child is not a genius, I take my reportorial nerve in hand to argue. I think she is the rarest of all geniuses, Mrs. Temple—the one who is born with the spark to which no one can be entirely trained.

And that does not detract from the training of Shirley's mother. It adds to it. For one born with kindness, unselfishness and all the other virtues may be trained out of them. Bad habits can ruin even real genius. The genius in Hollywood's favorite star has been nourished correctly. But the first credit does go to the little lady in person no matter what anyone says.

The Truth About the Mysterious Miss Loy

the back lot—an extra—playing the part of a trollop. Christy Cabanne came out to the set. He looked jubilant, the bearer of glad tidings. He laughed and said, 'It seems rather odd to tell a trollop that she is to play the Madonna but that is just what I've come to tell you. The test was okay. The part is yours.'

"I don't know how I registered as a trollop for the duration of the day. I was so filled with Christian beatitude. It seemed to me, then, that all of my work and worry, the long months of dancing at the Egyptian, the dancing-school work, the dreary sitting on that casting bench—all of it was worth while since it had led to the playing of the Madonna! I even thought that this was, perhaps, a direct answer to my childhood prayers. There seemed to be something symbolic and sweet about it.

"Only one thorn rankled in my flesh that day. I had failed Valentino!

"Late that same afternoon Mr. Christy came onto the set again. This time he was the bearer of ill tidings. The sun was going down over the back lot, I remember, and I felt chilled as I looked at his face and thought, dramatically, 'The sun is going down on my hopes, too!' It was. Christy said that there had been some confusion of interests—a certain faction in the studio was 'pulling' for Betty Bronson. Another faction was 'pulling' for an unknown girl to play the Virgin. The unknown girl would be me. There appeared, also, to have been some sort of a previous arrangement with Betty and the sum total was that Betty got the part and I did not.

THAT was Terrible Blow No. 2. I should have felt fated, it would seem, after the Valentino fiasco and then this. I did feel a pang of self-pity. I had worked so hard. I had gone without all of the things that other girls live for, or by. I hadn't any beaux or pretty clothes or gay times or any of the laughing side of life.

"That night, as I left the studio and collected my $7.50 from Bob McIntyre who was the god in the grille—the casting director at M-G-M at the time. He opened the grille and spoke to me. He told me he'd hoped I would get the part of the Madonna and was sorry but for me not to worry because he was going to give me all of the extra work he possibly could. I was to report again in the morning. Many months later he told me that he gave me work, not because he believed in me as an actress but because he thought I was hungry. He said that I had haunted his dreams at night, sitting there day after day on that wooden bench, so thin and starved looking. I must have looked thin and starved to have penetrated the consciousness of the man who looked out upon personal tragedies and frustrated ambitions and fading hopes every day of his life.

"Bob was as good as his word, too. He did keep on giving me extra work. He even gave me extra work in 'Ben Hur.' And I was on the set the day Betty Bronson did her scene as the Madonna.

That was pretty hard to take. I remember now how I had to bite my lips and pretend to be laughing and kidding with someone near me in order to keep the resentful tears out of my eyes."

Myrna is absolutely convinced, she says, that luck plays the trump card in success. The older she grows the surer she is. For some whilom reason you happen to be here instead of there and some director or producer happens to see you and because he happens to see you he gives you a part. If she had played the Madonna, she says, her whole career might well have been completely different. She would very probably never have played the exotic roles which slanted her gray-green eyes and covered her with brown greasepaint for so long. "If," said Myrna, "is the most potent word in the tongue of man . . ."

And so there were extra parts in this and that picture. And the little girl from Montana used to watch the established stars go to and fro and she would stare at them in envy. She once passed Ramon Novarro on the lot in his costume as "Ben Hur" and nearly fainted. She thought she had never seen anything so incredibly beautiful.

"He was poetry, walking," she said. "If anyone had told me then that the day would come when Ramon and I would work together, would lunch together in my dressing-room on that very lot, would even be rumored engaged, I would have laughed (or cried) it off as feverish fantasy. All of which makes Life the enchanting volume it is. And yet another reason why I never bother about Tomorrow. Each Today is a page in the book and contains enough fascination, enough problems and interest to hold the attention without having it wander into the future . . .

"I was given a bit as one of the dancers in Joan Crawford's 'Pretty Ladies' next. Only because I could dance. It was Joan's first important picture. It was, in a way, the beginning of Joan. Lilyan Tashman was in that picture, too, and Gwen Lee. Joan was very friendly and very kind to me. And we became very good friends. I remember how she would lie on the floor, her head in my lap, in her dressing-room or wherever we happened to be, and worry and cry. Joan always worried terribly. I did, too, but I never showed it. I couldn't. I am a very inarticulate person unless I am given lines to read.

WE talked about our names, I remember, and I told Joan how Peter Rurick, a writer, had really rechristened me. He had been in Henry Waxman's studio one day when I was there and he told me that I should change the name of Williams. It was a very good name, he said, for a little girl from Montana, but it didn't fit the pictures Henry had made of me. It wasn't exotic enough. I thought that was funny because I knew that I wasn't a bit exotic. And it went through my head that the name of Williams fitted very well the girl who walked to and from work because she didn't have any other means of getting there, the girl who 'helped with the dishes' and sponged and pressed her own clothes and contrived makeshifts with her mother and worried about the education of her little brother.

"But I didn't, of course, tell him my thoughts and we—or rather he decided upon the name of Loy—Myrna Loy. I think he'd got the name of Loy from a book of Chinese poems. Anyway, that was just about the time of—of Valentino.

"But to get back to Joan. She used to ask me to go to the Ambassador for tea with her or to the Biltmore for dinner. Those were Joan's pre-Charleston days. She was doing, then, the correct, young-girl thing. But I didn't go. I didn't want to. Things like that bored me and still do. I have never had much use for small talk. There were too many years when I had to talk about vital things, necessary things, how-to-live-from-day-to-day things.

"Now and again, at that time, I went out dancing with Don Alvarado, I remember, and one or two other boys. I went, really, because my mother worried about me. She said to me that if all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy what would it do to Jill?"

It was just about then that Natacha Rambova suddenly sent for Myrna. The test had not been the awful flop Myrna thought it was. Natacha had intended from the beginning to call Myrna about it. She had never told her anything and she had no idea of the cold hell her silence had meant to the sensitive silent girl. Now she wanted her for the part of Intellect.

"I think," said Myrna, "that if Rudy and Natacha hadn't sent for me I would have gone all of my life with a sore spot in my ego, or in my heart. No later success could ever have healed that tender place. And so I went to the studio again and Natacha dressed me in a red velvet gown, long-sleeved, very tight, high at the throat; she dressed my hair in a cap effect with points of hair on my forehead, she slanted my eyes and, unquestionably, that bizarre role was the beginning of my artistic career.

"And then, again, Henry Waxman precipitated the next turning point in my life. He made pictures of me as Intellect and took them over to Warner Brothers. The result was a part in the picture, 'Satan in Sables,' which poor dear Lowell Sherman was taking part in. It was only a bit for me but a very showy one and on the strength of it I got my first contract with Warner Brothers in 1925."

Myrna felt, then, that she could draw a free breath for the first time since she had come out of Montana. She could buy a few pretty clothes, have a little relaxation. She moved, with her mother and her brother, out of the house in Culver City and took an apartment in Hollywood in order to be nearer to the studio.

And she fell in love.

To reconstruct the romances of Myrna is to deal with the very ravellings of rumor, an insubstantial substance. There have been hints and rumors, very vague and very veiled, but no one seems to know.

And so, all that her brief Boswell can record is hearsay—which does say that at about this time Myrna fell in love, really in love. Her first adult love. It was real, intense, serious and lasted, this I do know, for two and a half years. He was a young actor. She was a young actress. He didn't care for people, for small talk and partying. Neither did she. It was an idyll, a world inhabited by two beautiful young people under a cloudless canopy of blue sky. And then, well, and then it seems that he didn't quite measure up, this young actor, to the heroic ideals born, originally, in the heart of the little Myrna Williams on the plains of Montana, with tales of frontiersmen and pioneers still ringing in her ears. Gradually she came to realize, I think, that here was not a man, really, but a boy whose playtime was not over. And once again Myrna was alone, this time with her dream of a dream which is sadder than the dream. And the break in that young heart was worn, as once the child had worn it, under tightly squeezed eyes and the air of one having great fun!

Ralph Morgan is having his knitting problems with Betty Furness. A between-scenes shot on "Calm Yourself" set.

AND so she began, at Warner Brothers, her Oriental career. She played sirens of all nations—Chinese sirens, Malayan, Hindu, Javanese, Indian, Polynesian. For a time, she says, it was fun. It was not being herself and Myrna has always enjoyed not being herself. "Escape," psychiatrists would call it. At that time, she says, she believed her real personality would not photograph and would not register significantly if it did. And so, she threw herself into Orientalism as she had always thrown herself into anything that would aid her work. She steeped herself in Oriental philosophy, she dipped into the occult sciences.

She said, laughing, "It got so that I began to have nightmares. I spent the nights being pursued by fantastical dream creatures with horned hair and slanted eyes. I'd look into the mirror and see my familiar freckled face change to a strange and sinister one. I began to pray for the time when I could play a nice, normal American woman with nice, normal actions and reactions.

"It began to strike me as very funny . . . plain little Myrna Williams from Helena, Montana, as the femme fatale of all nations. And it began to seem very childish to me—a sort of throw-back to the days of make-believe out of which I had grown up. I became tired of it.

"Then, in 1930, I played Warner Baxter's leading woman in 'Renegade.' But the part wasn't big enough to break the, as it were, Javanese jinx. Director William K. Howard was heroic enough to cast me as the dutiful wife in his 'Transatlantic' and I really had hopes that I could put away the brown greasepaint after that and look a white man in the eye. But a few days after the picture was released a casting director said to me, 'Miss Loy, you were splendid in "Transatlantic," but the public is accustomed to seeing you in Oriental parts and so, your next picture . . .'"

It was after "Transatlantic," however, that M-G-M signed Myrna to her long term contract with them. And so, after five years, Myrna entered again the studio where she had begun as a holder-downer-of-benches and a leper!

She says that only recently did she learn that when Mr. Thalberg sent for her to sign that contract they really had it in mind for her to play in "Freaks." She was to have played the part Baclanova finally did. It would have been a neat sequence of events, Myrna thinks, to have entered those gates as an extra to play a leper and to enter them later to play in "Freaks!"

Modern Screen
The Life Story of Nelson Eddy

It looked for a time, then, as though her vamp days were really over. In "Emma," "The Wet Parade," "New Morals for Old" and a few others, she wore smart Adrian gowns and played straight dramatic roles. She got fan mail full of surprise that she really was an American after all!

But the hold of habit is a strangle hold and some of us never escape it! Almost without realizing it she found herself in the cast of "The Mask of Fu Manchu" with the "monster" Boris Karloff and then as the half-caste murderess in "Thirteen Women."

"There were more nightmares," says Myrna, "and then—and then 'Animal Kingdom' with Leslie Howard. I regard that picture as my final break with the 'exotics.' It was the first straight dramatic part I'd played of sufficient importance to really attract attention. I think that then and only then was I on my way to—this—" and Myrna waved her small, competent hand and indicated the de luxe star dressing-room bearing, in letters of gold, the name of Myrna Loy.

MYRNA has been very much in pictures ever since that eventful 1925 and—next to Garbo—less is known about her private life than about the private life of any other star on the screen. She is called a "Mystery Woman," but she is not a Mystery Woman in the banal and tabloid-paper sense of the word. She never refuses to grant an interview nor to pose for publicity pictures. She invites the Press to tea at her house. She is seen occasionally at the Trocadero or the Vendome, less occasionally at the Cocoanut Grove. She says that the majority of such parties are only fun if you want to drink and since she doesn't want to drink only boredom is to be gained. She doesn't dress exotically. She talks simply and with seeming frankness. She tells you anything you may think of asking about her external life . . . she moves every year, from house to house, because she is restless and likes new views, new furniture, new atmosphere. Her mother and brother live together now. She lives alone. She is careful and competent with money and squanders it only on the things that are of the essence of time and beauty—old brasses and etchings and water colors and porcelains. She likes Mexican food and the formalities of living. She likes to drive her own car and exceed the speed limit when possible. She always attends the recitals of Mary Wigman and La Argentina and she says that Norma Shearer is one of her favorite actresses and that Bill Powell has sex appeal. She is very proud of her brother and talks at length about his art work, the commercial art he is doing . . . All these things and many more we know of Myrna Loy. The life she lives with her mind, with her ambition, is plain to us. The life she lives in her heart is—in her heart.

Yet, she says, honestly, that she never would have become a star if it were not for the men in her life. She gives full credit to Christy Cabanne for his early interest in her, to Bob McIntyre who cared because he thought she was hungry. She says that E. H. Griffith can never be repaid for the part he gave her in "Rebound" with Ina Claire and, later, for her pivotal part in "Animal Kingdom." She says that Rouben Mamoulian is another who helped her. "When I learned," she told me, "that Mr. Mamoulian wanted me for a part in Chevalier's picture, 'Love Me Tonight,' I wasn't keen for so small a role but at least it would permit me to speak English instead of Senegalese and to wear sensible clothes. It was my first comedy role."

She likes to talk of W. S. Van Dyke and how his skilled hand has helped. "These men," she says, "gave me the one thing I most sorely needed—confidence in myself. They made me feel that my real personality did photograph on the screen, that I had a personality, that I didn't have to hide Myrna Loy under a mask of brown paint. They made me conscious that I was a person and not just a 'type.'

"It was Mr. Van Dyke who said, while we were making 'Penthouse,' that he had a prognostication to make. He said, 'I prophesy that you will be a star within the year. And not only a star but one of the most valuable box office stars. Well, I am. I mean, I am a star. I made 'Manhattan Melodrama' and 'The Thin Man' and 'Stamboul Quest' and Mr. Van Dyke's crystal-gazing came true. Here I am. But I would not be here if it were not for 'the men in my life' and the faith they have had in me.

YES, here she is giving a largesse of credit to the helping hands of men, to the believing judgments of men. But strangely, persistently silent about the interests, the men, in her heart. As is everyone else. She will insist, when pressed, that her lovers are screen lovers, her love words in her scripts, her adventures on the sets.

Still we have only the stuff of rumor to draw on . . . the hint of an older man described as an "intellectual interest" who wanted Myrna to marry him and live abroad. A man, we have heard, of profound culture and knowledge. But Myrna refused to marry him because she knew that she could never be happy away, for any length of time, from the Hollywood she worked so hard to conquer.

There was an artist, so we hear, who pleaded passionately with Myrna to marry him—an artist of the temperamental species and Myrna, also in love with him, refused to marry him because, when she does marry, she wants a home, children, domesticity and not a studio housing a star and a palette and brush. Unrequited loves . . . the wrong men . . . such are the rumors which seem to die, still-born . . .

The real story is that she is a star. And as she sat in her dressing-room the other day she said to me, "I have been away from the studio for several weeks, for the first time in years. When I came back this dressing-room suite was ready for me, decorated according to my specifications, lovely. And I admit that I had a definite thrill as I walked into it and sat down and looked about me. For the first time I got that sharp dramatic sense of contrast—between the days of the wooden bench in the Casting Office, the day when I was told to wear the leper costume for Kathleen Key and—and this. I think if Bob McIntyre had still been on this lot I would have sent for him so that we might have had a good laugh—or a good cry—together."

Yes, she has come a long way, this girl called Myrna Loy. And by the proud set of her small and shapely head, by the slight dilation of her nostrils, the low, sure pitch of her voice, the intrepid expression in her eyes, you know that she is the rightful heir of Grandmother Annabelle and of those other sturdy Scotch and Welsh forebears who drove their Covered Wagons to new, uncharted lands, through sloughs of despond and morasses of doubt. For she, too, drove a Covered Wagon containing her little family to a new uncharted land and with a firm hand and a steady spirit staked her claim in the flowering wilderness.

(This is the second of two articles on Myrna Loy's life.)

If You Ever Visit Hollywood

from bragging about his climate. The stranger who lends a willing ear and a gesture of agreement will get ten dollars worth of information for nothing.

"Why must we be close to Hollywood Boulevard?" is a question frequently asked by visitors. You needn't—although all the stars pass down the boulevard at one time or another. It is Hollywood's Fifth Avenue. However, the Ambassador Hotel with its gardens, swimming pool and famed Cocoanut Grove is a vantage point, mid-way between Hollywood and Los Angeles. There, you may sit nightly in the lobby and watch celebrities arrive and depart at the Grove. Almost any night may be the time chosen for a party by Joan Crawford and Franchot Tone, Sally Eilers and Harry Joe Brown, Joan Blondell and her husband, Kay Francis and Maurice Chevalier, etc. Many people prefer to spend less time and more money in Hollywood so they may live in the "luxury" hotels frequented by the stars.

If you can remain a month or more, a hotel is unnecessary, as Hollywood has more furnished apartment houses than any town in the world. The fashionable Chateau Elysee is a rendezvous for stars. Almost all of them have lived there for short or long periods. They go there while their houses are being renovated. Its rentals range a little under a hundred dollars monthly to several hundred. The dining room serves luncheons from fifty cents and dinners varying around the dollar mark —or you can cook your own meals.

TO give an adequate description of the variety of apartments would take a large-sized book. You can secure comfortable, cunningly arranged bungalow courts as low as $27.50 monthly; rooms in private homes for $15; adorably furnished apartments with full kitchens and baths in colored tile—everything furnished, including linen, silver and glassware—for $40. You can live in moderate "swank" for $50-$60.

Food is cheap in comparison to the balance of the United States. While New Yorkers are paying sixty cents a dozen for oranges, we are paying one penny a piece. You can usually buy carrots, beets and other bunch vegetables for two and three for a nickel and there are times in the summer when you pay only a penny a bunch. If you have a car, choose some such roads as Ventura Boulevard, running north from Highland Avenue (Hollywood and Highland Avenue form the center of Hollywood) and you will find wagons standing on both sides loaded with oranges, lemons, watermelons, potatoes, bananas, cherries, muskmelons, etc., according to the season. You will be amazed how cheaply you can purchase these wares.

While you are "in the country," watch for "Eggs For Sale," "Walnuts For Sale," "Fresh Chickens Killed While You Wait" signs on the tiny farms, which we call ranches. Buying from the little landowner is a popular pastime and is fun as well as a money-saver. Be sure and talk to those people. Everyone in California likes to chat intimately and you'll be surprised at what you can learn. You may stop at the same door where Marlene Dietrich's or Joan Crawford's chauffeur stopped for eggs the day before and you'll learn more about them.

Our "drive-in" markets are famous, of course. You park your car in the store and load up on everything from drugs to liquors to pies. They will sell you chop-suey, hot and ready to serve, for 25c to 30c a quart. "Pigeon blood" is ten cents extra but enough for a dozen servings! A family of three, paying $40 a month rent, can live comfortably for $125 monthly, if careful. I know because I have done it. This includes the running of an automobile because a car is essential to those remaining for any long period as the distances are so great and car and bus fare expensive (usually ten cents with inadequate transfer facilities). Gasoline usually averages, over a year, seventeen and a half cents a gallon.

IF we come to Hollywood, how much will we see of the motion picture people? Can we get into a studio? etc."

You will have to depend upon the breaks! Practically all the stars live in Beverly Hills, Hollywood, Toluca Lake or Van Nuys, the latter being the farming community where Ann Dvorak, Leslie Fenton, Paul Muni, Spencer Tracy, Buck Jones, Louise Fazenda, Al Jolson and Ruby Keeler have recently purchased or built homes. You will find automobiles parked along the roadways advertising trips to the stars' homes. Be careful. Although many are legitimate, I have taken trial trips and had Jack Warner's estate pointed out as Ronald Colman's. Hollywood, like any modern city, is full of rackets.

Almost anyone in Beverly Hills can direct you to Pickfair, Harold Lloyd's, Gloria Swanson's. If you go to "the circle" in Brentwood Heights, the average stroller can show you Barbara Stanwyck's and Frank Fay's place, across the street from Joan Crawford's. Elissa Landi's lovely new home with its pipe organ, is close by, as is director William K. Howard's artistic New England estate. You will find high-fences and "no trespassing" signs. We advise you to heed them as there are ugly watch dogs. The attendants are probably the only seemingly discourteous folk you will meet, with the possible exception of studio gatekeepers. They have to be! Kidnappers are more of a menace than the average person realizes. You can buy lists of addresses and telephone numbers. Again, we warn you. The stars protect their telephone numbers, change them the moment they are unprotected and, if you find one right one among a dozen, you are fortunate.

Again, a little tip. Find the "little fellow" in Hollywood who has lived there several years. Be friendly. Tell him who you are—and you'll be surprised. Again, I speak of the drug store attendant, the service station man, the small-shop clerk, etc. One girl has been behind a certain lingerie counter for ten years. She has sold dainties to most of the stars. She knows their habits from breakfast until breakfast. If you offer her pay, she'll tilt her saucy nose five inches higher. If you let her know you're a friendly stranger, hungry for a peep behind Hollywood's gauze curtain, she'll become a willing guide from a spirit of hospitality. She's a college girl, knows her home-town and her people. She cannot be patronized but she can be wooed. But she will have to be convinced you are not trying to sell, molest or steal from the stars. If you are really friendly and well-meaning, you'll buy stockings or lingerie but not as a bribe. She would see through that game at once. And there are hundreds upon hundreds like her.

No, you cannot get into the studios.

WHO WAS THE GIRL?

The stranger came to mystery range . . . where rode the girl with midnight eyes and the girl with two fast guns . . . and a Black Blizzard came with him. . . .

Tourists may still be driven through the Universal plant but will seldom see a picture in the making. And that "certain pull," which will slip you within, is becoming more and more difficult to contact. Your exhibitor at home is your best bet (may the theatre owners forgive us!) because he buys motion pictures, but you will find him very limited in the courtesies he may extend. Please do not blame Hollywood for this. Those of us who are allowed personally upon most motion picture sets understand, and, if we are honest, approve. The reason is simple.

THE average layman cannot realize that time is the most valuable asset in Hollywood. The newspapers have just reported Garbo's salary, on her new contract, at $250,000 per picture. Her last production took four weeks to make. Therefore, the studio pays out $62,500 per week (six days) or $15,625 a day while she is working. Since she only makes two pictures a year, the salary is not large for her talent, yet the studio is actually spending this huge amount for four weeks on Garbo, alone. To make a picture within a profitable budget, work must be rapid. And the least noise, the least hint of intrusion, is a disturbing influence on the set. It takes time. No one is ever allowed on a Garbo set, but if he were, he could not avoid costing the studio money.

A guest coughed while a shot was being taken. The studio people worked it out and discovered one visitor's cough cost $502 in actual cash. And the leading actor on that picture was receiving less than $1000 weekly.

Again, a tip. And may the studios forgive us! If you seriously want to see a picture made, watch the daily newspapers for information on "location trips." Although newspapers do not carry all such information, if you read all the columnists dealing exclusively with motion pictures and the two Hollywood trade papers, "Variety" and "The Hollywood Reporter," you will usually find them mentioned in one. Also, a cleverly-worded telephone call to a studio may elicit information as to "companies on location."

Although location shots are also becoming less and less frequent, there are still companies shooting almost daily at favorite spots in or near Los Angeles. Pasadena's huge estates are used very often. The San Pedro harbor, easily accessible to you via the "red-car"; Idylwild, Lake Arrowhead (a day for the round trip by auto or bus), the San Fernando valley, etc. Confidentially, I frequently follow a star on location for an interview. They are so much more informal away from studio regulations.

MENTIONING the trade papers—you will find it well worth your while to buy both while you are visiting Hollywood. (Five cents a copy.) They are to be found upon the breakfast table of practically every motion picture worker and are Hollywood's system of intercommunication.

Studios frequently advertise previews. Attend them. They are pre-showings for the purpose of discovering how an audience likes a just completed picture. If the public shows disapproval, the picture is returned for additional cutting, re-takes, etc. The stars usually attend if they are first previews. Naturally, some theatre managers advertise previews for extra pictures slipped-in. An advertising stunt! But this is seldom. Among the theatres most likely to run advance showings are "The Ritz," on Wilshire Boulevard, "The Uptown," on Western Avenue; "The Alexander," in Glendale. Get there early! Seats are usually sold out at least an hour before the picture opens.

Incidentally, if you are to attend the Fair in San Diego, the exhibition will not be a fake. Scenes from real pictures, with their working casts, will be made almost daily, although the week-ends will provide the majority of the "big scenes." Sponsored by the Artists' Guild, composed of Hollywood's biggest stars, the stars themselves are providing for this exhibition—not a commercial house, hoping to make money.

Naturally, your best "bet" for seeing stars is at the famous eating places. Sardis, owned and managed by Eddie Brandstatter (who gave us the Montmartre and Embassy, when Hollywood was growing up), is on the Boulevard near Vine Street, and is a favorite luncheon rendezvous. There is an excellent and most famous luncheon for ninety cents—the same that made the old Montmartre well known, only it then cost two dollars! The Brown Derby attracts more male stars, on the average. Wally Beery is there almost daily, when not working. Eddie Cantor, Al Jolson, Gary Cooper, George Raft, etc. Luncheons à la carte. Prepare to spend a minimum of seventy-five cents. Very minimum.

The Vendôme, on Sunset Boulevard (between Vine and Highland), is celebrity-crowded at the luncheon hour. You may see Dolores Del Rio, very chic in the latest creation, or perhaps Margaret Sullavan in slacks. By two-thirty the sidewalk is crowded with well-knowns waiting for their chauffeurs to get into line. A la carte. High priced. If you spend less than $2, you will not eat much. Excellent food.

Victor Hugo's is one of Los Angeles' oldest and most renowned eating places. It has just moved to ultra-ultra quarters in Beverly Hills. We also can promise you a peep at filmland there at rates comparable to the Vendôme. While in Beverly, slip into the Beverly Hills Brown Derby for tea and you are certain to catch some of the younger set—Joan Bennett, Mrs. Gary Cooper, Sally Eilers, etc.—for tea. And the English, if they do not happen to be teaing at home.

THE Trocadero at night, of course. That is, at the present. You can never tell when a Hollywood eating place will cease to be the "fad" and a new one catch Hollywood's restless eye. The history of Hollywood could be written according to the history of its ever-changing eating places. You should "dress" for the Trocadero and prepare to spend $10 upwards for two. But you will see the elite on dress parade, including Marlene Dietrich and, if you have a lucky talisman, Garbo.

From the Trocadero to a Pullman diner on Sixth Street, almost downtown, across from The Ferris Hotel. It looks like—well, an old, dismantled diner out of place. But what a steak! From seventy-five cents upward, sold by the pound—cooked. I doubt if there are many stars who haven't slipped behind its plain, wooden counter or tables. Don't go there in the summer. You'll find a sign, "Too hot to work. Gone fishing!"

The "drive-in sandwich shop" at the corner of Sunset Boulevard and Vine Streets (sandwiches twenty cents); Levy's, on Vine Street, just off Hollywood Boulevard (luncheon, seventy-five cents up); the big drug store in Beverly Hills; the shops, big and little, along the boulevard. Hollywood folk are at home and they go "into town" frequently like most of us. I have seen twenty-five headliners casually in a day and have not seen one in a week. It's the person who stays a month or more who sees Hollywood from behind its imaginary but nevertheless very high fences. And you will find Mae West at prizefights, big and little.

We frequently receive letters asking, "What clothes shall we bring for our visit to Hollywood?" And we Californians are always amused and dismayed at the way visitors do not bring coats. You need a coat the year around for the evenings. A medium weight for both summer and winter. Our cold nights are not fiction, although the statement we never have a warm one is. Sport clothes for the street, all seasons; slacks, tennis shorts (summer)—in fact, anything in the clothes line goes in Hollywood. We always shock New Yorkers because of our indifferent apparel and yet, when they have been with us three months, they are boasting about the freedom of Hollywood fashions. A visitor must be certain he is prepared for an extremely hot day and an extremely cool one, coming, perhaps, one after another. In the winter—rubbers, raincoat, umbrella. And we must not forget that group of visiting Masons who sat on our curbstones, sheltered by umbrellas, and fished in our overflowing gutters in the latter part of June.

"How can I get work in Hollywood!"—Have a job before you come! That is the only sensible answer to conclude a story that has attempted to neither enhance nor detract from the most interesting city in the world, but simply to tell you plain, little truths you may not know, but which you would like to know.

remember my first real comedy part in pictures. I was supposed to be one of those girls who might be either dumb or smart. I had fallen into the water, and they dragged me ashore and gave me a drink. 'There,' said my rescuer, 'how does that taste?'

"'Just as if I had been cut to ribbons,' I answered. I didn't think the line was funny at all, yet that got more laughs than any other line in the picture.

"Another time, when I played in 'The Impatient Maiden' I was supposed to get locked in a strait-jacket accidentally while visiting an insane asylum. The director told me not to rehearse the scene. I was just to imagine myself in that predicament and try to get loose.

"The scene lasted for five minutes, and I struggled, screamed and wrenched. I was black and blue when it was over, but the scene got a lot of laughs.

"A kindly spirit should be back of all laughs. Fun should come without malice. Comedians must guard against being fresh and always having an answer that tops the other fellow's. The most successful laughgetters are those who are always in a predicament. They get themselves into embarrassing situations and thereby find many kindred souls.

"Above all, I believe one must get an exciting reaction from one's work. It has always helped me to be happy and have a lot of fun while doing a part.

"Before starting a picture I get scared and nervous. Yet I wouldn't be relieved of that tension for anything in the world. The first day or so may be trying, and I worry about how I am going to be funny, then all of a sudden I realize I'm having a grand time. Having a sense of enjoyment helps others to enjoy a thing, too."

Thanks, Una, that's marvelous advice and I'm sure that all our Dramatic School pupils appreciate it.

And now, what do you want to know? Just write me your requests and they will be fulfilled to the best of my ability. All letters are gladly answered. Address, Katherine Albert, MODERN SCREEN'S Dramatic School, 149 Madison Avenue, New York City. And don't forget that stamped, addressed envelope.

FIRST of all let's start at the bottom. It's the feet that really have started things in a decorative way. Pedicures are very essential, whether for preparing the toes to wriggle in the sand, or to perform on the dance floor. Sandals that are cut low at the sides and cut out at the toes expose our toe-tips almost as frankly as our fingertips. Hence feet should receive their weekly pedicure as well as hands should receive their manicure, and you can work out a stunning ensemble when lips, fingertips, and toe-tips match. Have them match with the whole of your costume ensemble, or with some item of it. For example, a pink bathing suit would call for the harmony of a rose shade of liquid nail polish, and a soft blush-pink shade of lipstick. A pale blue evening gown, however, would be lovely with the contrast of a few items of coral jewelry, and a coral shade of polish and lipstick.

Speaking of lip, finger-tip, and toe-tip ensembles, I am reminded of Carole Lombard. Ever since I interviewed her, when she was vacationing in New York, people have been asking me in eager tones, "What was Carole Lombard like? And what did she wear?" Well, she was a glamorized, modernized Dresden shepherdess . . . like a painting in soft pastels . . . blue eyes, golden hair, skin like a roseleaf, and a costume of soft pink with dark red touches for color accent. Yet she was too exhilarating to be compared to a painting. She was as sparkling as a glass of champagne yet very human. . . .

CAROLE'S lounging ensemble was a thing of dreams. A beautifully made pink brocade coat, cut on full flowing lines and touching the floor all around, was worn over lovely pink satin pajamas. The costume was a dressmaker's masterpiece and a designer's inspiration. But the color ensemble that was worked out with it was Carole's inspiration. Her nails were tinted with a dark ruby shade of nail polish, and so were her toe-tips. Her ring was set with an enormous ruby. And tucked into the bow, at the neckline of the pajamas, was a deep red carnation. With all the flurry of orchids and gardenias out in Hollywood, it is pleasant to have someone dare a plain ordinary carnation, in an out-of-the-ordinary shade. Her lipstick exactly matched these ruby red touches.

Carole is individual, and that's a sure way to distinction in Hollywood . . . and everywhere else. This importance of individuality is one reason why I think different shades of nail polish are a godsend to clever women. There's no limit to the stunning ensembles you may work out for yourself with different nail tints as inspiration, and tinted toe-tips do have a way of making one feel deliciously wicked. Now I'm not being unreasonable, and expecting you to take nail polish off and on as you do a hat. If you're busy with housework or office work, you may find the logical solution to your nail polish problem to be the adoption of a colorless or natural shade that will go with any and all costumes, and that won't seem inappropriate, even with gingham aprons. However, there are sometimes late afternoon and evening occasions when you want to be startling and different and distinctive, when you want to forget that you're a wife or mother or secretary, and be just you. I'll send you my color chart of the different nail tints to choose with the different gowns.

And before I leave this fascinating subject of color, I want to remind you never to use lipstick that has an orange cast in it along with nail polish that has a red-blue cast in it. One clever manufacturer puts out a complete line of matching lipsticks and nail polishes, so you can't go wrong in your choice of shades. If you have reason to doubt your own color sense, better seek the results of this manufacturer's color analysis.

Before you can apply liquid polish to your toe-tips, you have to have the basis of a satisfactory pedicure. It can be a very simple one. First bathe your feet in warm soapy water, and if your feet are inclined to perspire, finish in cool water in which you have put about a handful of salt. If your feet are full of aches, try Epsom Salts in the water.

Here's a trick for callouses and rough spots that mar the beauty of your feet. Just moisten the callous with a good cuticle remover. Pat on the cuticle remover with a small piece of cotton, let it stay on a minute or two, and then rinse off with clear water. Pumice stone is also helpful for removing unsightly callous.

AFTER drying the feet thoroughly, trim the toe nails straight across. Never clip the sides or you'll have ingrowing toe nails first thing you know. Now smooth the edge of each nail with an emery board, and there'll be no rough spots to catch your brand new pair of hose. Then twist a bit of cotton around an orange stick, and dip it into your cuticle remover. Work it around the cuticle, pushing the cuticle back just as you do when manicuring your finger nails. Rinse, dry, and you're ready to apply your nail polish. One way to lengthen the life of a coat of polish is to put on two layers. Use a thin coat of colorless or light polish for the first layer. After this has dried, apply a heavier coat of bright polish over it. This gives the lacquer body and prevents it from chipping.

Treat your feet to a cold cream massage every once in a while after your pedicure or your bath. Curiously enough, it will do wonders for your face too—tired, neglected feet have a way of etching frown lines in the forehead. If you're going in for knee-high stockings, it is well to apply a little softening cream to the knees and elbows at the same time that you massage your feet. Incidentally, a tiny bit of rouge on the knees has been known to have devastating effects.

Now we've arrived at the business of considering your ankles, and some helpful advice from Ann Sothern, the lovely blonde Columbia star. Slim, strong, shapely ankles and straight feet need not be an unobtainable dream for any woman today. You have Ann's word for it. And the word of an eminent physical culture authority whom I interviewed on this very subject. This latter authority says that exercise (correct shoes and posture), massage, concentration, and infinite patience and hard work can achieve for you (unless there is a case of bone deformity) a regular Hollywood pair of ankles and feet. Moreover, he stresses the fact that children should never be allowed to grow up with flat feet, weak ankles, or heavy, clumsy legs and ankles, subject to strain and fatigue. Correct posture, dancing, exercise, massage, and properly fitted shoes will achieve for a child her birthright of beautiful legs.

LOOK at your ankles. Either they are shapely, or too thin, or thick and lumpy. If you possess the first kind, thank your fairy godmother and keep them that way with good shoes and enough exercise (not too much). If your ankles are thin, Ann Sothern advises that you try tennis, golf, hiking, bicycle riding, or anything that means working or playing on your feet. Ankles are easier to build up than to reduce, for anything that involves considerable muscular activity of the ankles will only tend to develop them rather than reduce them. If you're trying to bolster up a pair of skinny ankles and legs . . . walk, walk and walk.

If, on the other hand, you want to reduce thick ankles, avoid much exercising on your feet. Take your exercises sitting or lying down, with the feet elevated. The best exercise I know for reducing the ankles is one that I call the "Circle Stretch." You lie flat on the floor and cross one knee over the other. Then take the crossed foot first and stretch the toes over to the right as far as you can, then down, then to the left, and then bring them back toward you. It will take some practice, but eventually you'll be able to make the circle with ease and without strain. Concentrate on pulling at the flesh, not the muscles. Other simple exercises for reducing and building up the ankles, and suggestions in the way of self-administered massage are available in my exercise sheet which is yours for the asking and a self-addressed, stamped envelope. You'll find a coupon for your convenience at the end of these columns.

Just one word of warning before you start in on an exercise campaign. Remember that posture plays an important part in determining whether you have a graceful ankle or not. If you walk with the shoulders straight and the abdomen "pulled in," then the muscles of the legs are pulled straight, and those small revolving bones in the ankles act as a delicate piece of machinery, throwing the weight of the body gracefully from toe to toe. Much can be accomplished by sitting and standing correctly. The girl who walks well doesn't turn her feet out at right angles, or move her head from side to side, jerkily. She holds herself erect, her head well poised, and swings her legs from the hips, not from the knees. She doesn't mince or stride but walks with perfect grace. And I hope you're going to walk right into this picture of gracefulness with a set of exercises, pedicuring preparations, and a knowledge that you're putting your best foot forward. Let me help you.

Baxter's Best Girl

so she could come and go as she pleased, and recalling the home-cooking plea, we put in a kitchenette.

" 'It will be a cinch to "sell" her now,' we argued. 'With her own entrance, to use when she wants to use it, with her kitchenette, to cook when she wants to cook, it will be like living in an apartment and when she tires of living with us she can rush to her own secluded nook.' Now mother had been in the house dozens of times during its construction, but we had refrained from mentioning anything about her apartment. And so, when the house was finished and appointed, we drove to her apartment. 'Come on,' we said, 'we've a surprise for you.'

"We took her to the apartment. 'This is yours,' we said. 'You move in NOW.'

"Mother looked through the rooms. I could see the tears she was holding back. She examined everything, then, turning to Winnie and me, said:

" 'Listen, children, do you know why we three have been such great pals? Well, it's because we've never lived together. Let's keep it that way. I love the apartment—it's wonderful and I'll come out week-ends, now and then, and live in it. But as for living with you— say, what do you kids think I am—an old woman? Listen, I have my own life to live! Do you think I'm going to be tied down by a couple of kids? Not me!'

AND that," said Warner, "was that. She's out to see us every day or two, and spends an occasional night in the apartment, but continues to reside in her Sunset Boulevard apartment, which is only six or seven minutes away from us."

Warner Baxter is Hollywood's truest "mother's boy." This may be a revelation about the "Cisco Kid," but it is 100 per cent true. And the beautiful thing about it is that Winifred Baxter glories in the fact that her fascinating husband and his marvelous mother are the greatest pals in Hollywood! And let me say right here that Mrs. Warner Baxter's love for her husband's mother is just about one-tenth of a degree less than her husband's. For Winifred Baxter and Jennie Baxter are almost inseparable. They adore each other; even as Winifred and Warner adore each other after all these years, and if you don't think they do—you're nuts! Warner and Winifred are the happiest married pair in Hollywood, and you can make a bet on that. But I'm digressing.

"The relationship between mother and me had a very early beginning," Baxter grinned. "In fact, it dates back to the time when I was born at 830 North Hill Street in Columbus, Ohio. But I think we became real pals the time I painted the little boy next door with a lot of paint I found in the basement, and exhibited him, stark naked, for five pins, as the one and only 'Tattooed Boy.' It took a gallon of turpentine to get the paint off the boy and mother rightly promised his mother that she'd give me a sound thrashing. But mother couldn't control her laughter, and after we got home, and I'd given her my solemn promise to forget show business for ever, she gave me cookies instead of a beating. Needless to say, I didn't keep my promise."

Let's beat back a bit and peer into the past of Baxter and his mother—the past that tied them so closely together. I say that because his mother has been closely identified with his every step up the ladder to success! Warner's father, Edwin Baxter, died when Warner was three months old, leaving nothing but some unpaid bills. The furniture was sold and the widow moved with her lusty-lunged infant into an upstairs room in the home of a brother and sister-in-law. She put a card in the parlor window announcing to all Columbus that she did sewing of all kinds. The long, hard struggle for existence for herself and baby began.

"Mother sewed me through grade and high school," Warner told me. "But I realized she couldn't sew me into college, so I got a job with a farm implement concern and after a few weeks was given the office routine in connection with the sales territory of Ohio. My salary was $60 a month, but mother kept on sewing. And I kept on dreaming of a career on the stage. I spent my spare time backstage in the Columbus theatres. I engaged in amateur theatricals. At last I got a chance to go on the road in a vaudeville act. I quit my job, and went. I had four months of this, and during those four months, mother, who knew the old story of the boy who goes on the stage and never returns home, kept writing me to come back. I knew she was right, and went back to my old job.

"But once a trouper, always a trouper. I was no good to the implement company and when a representative of the Travelers Life Insurance Company offered to send me to the company's training school at Hartford, I accepted. For four months I listened to lectures and then was assigned to the Philadelphia office at $150 a month. Mother wrote, 'Warner, insurance is not your career.' I knew she was right. I quit. I tried the garage business in Tulsa, Okla. That proved a bust. Mother, who had disliked the idea of my going on the stage, finally agreed that my career lay in that direction. She encouraged me. I found a job at $25 a week in the North Brothers Stock Company, a tent show, and in two months was leading man at $35 a week. We toured Missouri, Kansas, Texas and Oklahoma.

THROUGHOUT this period mother was writing encouraging letters. I was sending a little money home each week, and she was forever writing glowing letters telling me how much money she was earning and pointing out that if I had any surplus to spend it upon my wardrobe as a promising young actor needs clothes. Late in 1913 I received a letter from her in which she said that a lot of motion pictures were being made in a place called Hollywood, Cal., and maybe I had better have a try at pictures. Now I, too, had been hearing a lot about pictures, and I wrote mother that I was going to Hollywood and that if things looked bright, I'd send for her."

Baxter, almost a pioneer in pictures, arrived in Hollywood in 1914 and began visiting the studios. In those days casting directors got rid of stage people by saying, "Sorry, but you're not the type," or "Too bad, you're a little late, you're just the type I could have used." Baxter heard this for weeks. He wrote and told his mother; she answered "Keep trying—there's a place for you." Discouraged, broke, and hungry, Baxter walked from studio to studio. Then one day a casting director looked at Baxter and said, "You're the man I've been looking for! I've a grand role for you. Report to me in two weeks."

Baxter walked on air—seven miles to his boarding house. He borrowed a dollar from his landlady to send a telegram to his mother. The message read: Great luck. Got grand part. Start packing. Meantime wire money on which to eat for two weeks.

"Mother sent the money," Warner told me, "and her son walked about in the grand manner! At the end of the two weeks period I reported for work. On that very day I learned something about Hollywood! The casting director who had hired me not only refused to see me, but refused to give me an explanation relative to his change of mind. It was then that my real struggle began. I wrote mother the truth.

"Do you know what happened? Well, the little lady who once made me promise to forget show business sent me a money order—money she could ill afford to send—and a little verse of poetry which had to do with the theme, 'Be not discouraged.' Well, I continued haunting the studios. I continued receiving money orders from mother, accompanied by words of encouragement. By the time she had sent me her last dime I was still without work.

"Then, faced by actual starvation, I learned that Frank Underwood, stage director of the old Morosco Theatre, needed a man for a small part. I went to see him. He offered me $25 a week. Hungry, without a dime to my name, I held out for $35 and got it. I would have taken it for $10. I borrowed a dollar to wire mother the good news. I received, in turn, a telegram which today would be interpreted as saying 'Give 'em the works.' I did!

"Three months of hard work followed. I sent a little money home, and received constant letters of encouragement. Then after 90 days, I was given a contract at $60 a week, and saved enough money to send for mother. A lot of things happened before she got here. Most important of all, I met and fell in love with Winifred Bryson. And I became a leading man.

"Mother arrived. Winnie and I met her at the train, and believe me, it was a joyful reunion.

"'Have you had dinner?'" I asked.

"'No, son,'" she answered.

THEN we'll hurry to the theatre, park your bags backstage, and the three of us will have dinner together.'

"'Grand,'" said mother.

"Now," said Warner, "I'm going to tell you a story that I had forgotten, but which mother told on me yesterday."

It was at that precise moment that Jennie Baxter walked into the brown leather and mahogany study.

She had overheard that last statement!

"Why not let ME tell it, son?" she laughed.

"Shoot, Mrs. Baxter," he laughed.

"I'll tell you," his mother began. "I got off the train, hot, tired and dusty. I'll have to admit, too, that I had a bit of an appetite, being tired of dining-car fare after so long a journey. But the thing that really thrilled me was the light of love that shone so beautifully out of the eyes of my son, and the pretty Winifred. They tried to be very casual about it. Imagine! But they didn't fool me, not even a little bit, and because they seemed so eager to take me to dinner, I agreed to go—just to worry 'em. They hurried me to the theatre, and parked my luggage, and then took me to dinner. I watched them, and read the signs, but, imagine my surprise when the waiter presented the check to Warner, and my son turned to me and asked: 'Mother, have you got any money?'

"Thank goodness, I had enough to pay the check!"

★★★ Broadway Gondolier
(Warners)

Here is a peppy little plot featuring the activities of those who do their stuff behind the mike, the Big Brains who sponsor radio programs and the poor execs who have to "take it" from temperamental talent. While the tale is plenty far-fetched, it is all done in the spirit of fun and you don't much give a hang whether or not you really believe that a Bronx taxi driver may become a great favorite masquerading as an Italian tenor, or not. While you're in the theatre, you're having a grand quota of laughs, which is just what counts when the story is labelled "comedy." The players are excellent; in fact, such swell performances are in order that it is difficult to name 'em in order of praiseworthiness. Dick Powell radiates charm, renders a few lilting tunes and, indeed, does himself proud. Louise Fazenda is simply guh-rand in the role of the wealthy Mrs. Flagenheim, sponsor of the odorless cheese hour. Adolphe Menjou is excellent in a character rôle and Joan Blondell, splendid, as the wise-cracking love interest. As if this were not enough in the talent line, the Warners have added Ted Fio Rito and the Four Mills Brothers. Yep, you'll want to see "Broadway Gondolier" and you'll be whistling its tunes for weeks to come.

"The play must go on" in most pictures, no matter what actor may fall ill. But when Adolphe Menjou was rushed hospitalward, this picture was held up one month. He's that good. What's more, Adolphe's a real trouper. With a nurse and doctor in tow he reported for work. The nurse—very pretty—hovered around constantly, armed with hot water bottles and glass tubes through which she fed Mr. Menjou every hour. Adolphe would rather be caught pantless than spatless. . . . Joan Blondell's famous not only for her screen characterizations, but for the fact that she's actually a happy Hollywoodian. Married to George Barnes, who was head cameraman on this picture, she lives in a Brentwood Heights mansion bristling with iron bars as kidnap-insurance for the new Barnes heir. . . . Dick Powell's the answer to many a maiden's prayer, if fan mail is any criterion. And a very busy young man, too, what with just having completed a small private hotel up at Toluca Lake, where he intends to spend his declining bachelor days. Joan will tell you that Dick's a meanie, though. That gondola scene, supposedly taken on a warm Venetian night, was in reality taken on a chilly California evening in March. Dick reported for work in a wooly pair of red flannels under his dress-suit, but poor Joan could only wear a chiffon evening gown. It was anything but a hot love affair to her. . . . Louise Fazenda is a pioneer of the Mack Sennett Bathing Beauties, but has just as much spunk and spirit today. She has three hobbies—antiques, a year-old son, and a husband, Hal Wallace, who's production chief at Warner's. Ted Fio Rito and the Mills Brothers are equally well known. Ted started on the way to fame via a college orchestra and is now one of the highest paid dance band directors in the country. The Mills Brothers are tops for quartet warbling on both radio and stage.

★★★ Hardrock Harrigan
(Sol Lesser-Fox)

Even if you're a drawing-room picture addict, you'll enjoy this rough 'n' tough type of flicker in spite of yourself. The rugged mountains of the Colorado River Aqueduct are fitting background for George O'Brien's broad chest and ready fists. Most of the other actors are superb specimens of rippling muscle and brawn vs. brain, too, but it's all convincing, hearty stuff with plenty of punch. The story would have got along very nicely without any love interest, but Irene Hervey as the gal in the case and the cook in the camp does an excellent job of being both. The plot's main interest, though, lies in the long-standing feud between "Hardrock Harrigan" (George O'Brien) and "Black Jack" Riley (Fred Kohler). What these two men couldn't think up to annoy one another, hasn't yet been thought up! You'll find real suspense in the outcome of their enmity, in the tunnel cave-in and the dangers of engineering projects three miles down in terra firma. The picture's an eye-opener to the average person who merely takes Boulder Dams, Colorado Aqueducts, etc. for granted. Take along the boy friend or friend husband to this one. He'll think your movie judgment is infallible—which is almost worth sitting through a completely he-man picture.

Preview Postscripts

Here's a picture where the scenery is all "real stuff." It was made at the Coachella Tunnel, part of the 220 million dollar project which is to be the Colorado River Aqueduct. All of the scenes within the tunnel are actually three miles from the mouth of the excavation, so even the perspiration beetling the brows of the heroes is authentic. The company lived at Camp Berdoo, close to the desert town of Indio, while making the picture and had "one swell time and sweller feed" according to Mr. O'Brien. George startled the real engineering crew by displaying a thorough knowledge of pressure drills. While a student at Santa Clara College, he worked one of those mysterious machines every summer to keep in football physique. He's the son of a former famed San Francisco chief-of-police, husband of Marguerite Churchill and proud papa of a brand new daughter. Started his movie career as assistant cameraman to Tom Mix in the good ol' days. . . . Victor Potel and Lee Shumway also remember "way back when" in the movies. They've been involved in the business longer than even they can recall. . . . Dean Benton, however, is a newcomer. Universal interviewed 3500 boys and girls with fillum aspirations about a year ago and selected 25 for training. Of these only two were given contracts, and Dean was one of them. . . . Irene Hervey's another young'un. Daughter of John Herwick, noted artist, Irene hopped into movies from high school. She had an awful time getting down into the tunnel for the pictures, since the men have a superstition that for every woman who goes underground, one man is carried out. But there wasn't one accident while the company was working there. . . . Fred Kohler's role is a new one for him. He's played the "dirty heavy" for yars and yars in Hollywood with nary a drop of sympathy. Good-looking Fred Kohler, Jr., is his son. Junior's in pictures, too—when he's not too busy beauing Anne Shirley around.

to be disappointed. Grace Moore does herself proud and warbles the sentimental arias of "La Boheme" with all the charm and beauty you could wish. Michael Bartlett, who sings Rodolph, acquits himself admirably but has only a brief glory. Leo Carrillo, the gambler-angel of La Moore, has the best break in years and makes the most of it. There are a few amazing bits of plot juggling, especially in the awarding of Carrillo to the heroine at the end, but it's all fun. You can hum "Love Me Forever," composed for the opus and you'll applaud your old opera favorites. Swell entertainment decidedly.

★★ College Scandal
(Paramount)

Chief attraction in these cinematic campus doings is Arline Judge; chief nuisance is a tow-headed youth whose name escapes us. There are a couple of mysterious student murders, the rehearsal of a school play, the song hit, "In the Middle of a Kiss," two or three love affairs and heaven knows what else in this movie hodge-podge. Just to put added strain on your gray matter on discredit your eyes or sumpin', a crazy servant girl is permitted to wander through the scenes. Knowing that one should never suspect the guilty-looking person, you realize immediately that this woman had nothing to do with the plot and her presence merely adds a thoroughly unwholesome touch. Kent Taylor is the in-love college prof, with Wendy Barrie, newcomer to the American movies, the object of his affections. In fact, Wendy is just the hit of the piece with all the boys. She's a fair-to-middlin' actress reminiscent of Mary Brian in appearance. Johnny Downs does a nice bit of vocalizing and is killed all too early in the picture. Then, of course, as we've said, there is Arline Judge who is sorta worth the price of admission to the whole silly business.

There really were scandalous goings-on on this set, what with practically every Paramount youngster drafted to appear in the picture! Each vied with the other on practical joking and general cutting-up, and when you consider that Arline Judge, Wendy Barrie —Gwendolyn Jenkins to her Ma—and Billy Benedict were among those present, you'll get some idea of the competition. Arline Judge is married to Director Wesley Ruggles, but could easily pass for his fourteen-year-old daughter. However, Arline has a two-year-old son, with the same sparkling black eyes and crisp curls as his Mama—and the same dangerous twinkle in those eyes . . . Wendy Barrie is the English girl who was given a contract just because a director admired the way she handled her knife and fork in a London restaurant! Made a hit in "Henry the Eighth" and was rushed to Hollywood. . . . Billy Benedict is that young man with the large tow-head and large nimble feet. Having made a success in vaudeville, he's now doing the same thing in the fillums. Nearly drove Director Elliot Nugent crazy, though teaching the gang the latest tap steps when they should've been acting. Mr. Nugent was practically cuh-razy, anyhow, what with having to contend with these kids and a brand new one at home.

★★★ The Raven
(Universal)

Your blood won't just run cold on this one, it'll freeze solid. As if Boris Karloff isn't demonish enough for one picture, the calloused director has added Bela Lugosi for good measure. To make the plot doubly potent, they have based the story on one of the classic incidents of hair-raising power—the mad love of Poe for his Lenore and the resulting torture which he inflicts on her when she does not respond to his ardor. Pleasant Mr. Lugosi is the cro-o-o-l villain who does the filthy, dirty work. And Mr. Karloff, who disfigures so beautifully, is the pal whom he selects to dress up and use for ulterior ends. We assure you, they beat all-time records for gruesomeness—and even their own past records!

Irene Ware, a comparative newcomer to the fillums, should rate a permanent position from now on. Although pretty enough, Miss Ware's claim to fame will rest largely on her extraordinary lung capacity. Her blood-curdling screams should make even Fay Wray hang her head in shame. Samuel Hinds and Inez Courtney add some terrible touches to the picture, too. If you are faced with budgets, taxes or homework, see this celluloider and you'll not lack time at night to work on 'em. The only thing you'll lack for a week or so is sleep.

Boris Karloff created the world's worst looking specimen of humanity—if Frankenstein could be called human. Mr. Karloff really is a very agreeable looking, nice-mannered Englishman, by the name of William Henry Pratt, who loves nothing better than to putter around with the nasturtiums in his backyard. Has a five-acre plot of ground around his home up in Coldwater Canyon and raises stock—particularly pigs. A friend of his sent him a china pig filled with dime-store perfume when he first moved on his ranch as a stock starter. Boris thought this such a swell idea that he's raised them ever since—flesh and blood ones, though, and unperfumed. Originally trained for the consular service, but thought it too dry. However, there are four other Pratt brothers still at it in England . . . Bela Lugosi runs a close second to Mr. Karloff as the gruesome "Dracula" originator. He lives in an isolated canyon above Hollywood and is married to a very devoted woman who doesn't seem scared to death, in fact, not even scared. They're both Hungarians . . . Irene Ware was once famous for her face and figger as she is for her vocal chords today. "Miss America" she was, some years ago.

★★ Calm Yourself
(M-G-M)

Like the cornbeef hash, this picture has everything in it. Slapstick comedy, an unwitting kidnapping, a man engaged to one girl and in love with another, a mad chase; well, just about everything you've seen before and which was done much better on that occasion. Granted the plot was constructed for laughs, but even so, a bit of plausibility would have been welcome. Robert Young and Madge Evans do their darndest, but their darndest isn't half good enough to make you forget the phony antics they are put through. Betty Furness is good in a small rôle, as is Hardie Albright. The story—and there seems little else to tell about this picture—is about a young man who goes into a Personal Service business. He volunteers to perform any little disagreeable task you might wish to put over, meanwhile advising you to "Calm Yourself" while he does the dirty work. Of course, all's well that ends well, and at the finish we have the familiar clinch with everybody happy, including the kidnapped baby, who looks as disgusted with the whole nonsensical business as the surrounding adult cast.

'Member the little girl kicking her heels on a cake of "Fairy Soap" some years ago? Well, that was Madge Evans, star of this picture. Still blonde and blue-eyed, Madge is well known and well liked in Hollywood—'specially by Tom Gallery, Zazu Pitts' ex, who right now is wearing a very long face due to the fact that Madge has departed for the British Isles to make her next picture. Outstandingly modish, Miss Evans stunned the feminine population of the world by doing every bit of wardrobe shopping right in her home town, before leaving for New York and abroad. Thinks Hollywood is the fashion center of the universe . . . Robert Young's the yokel boy who made good. Had his heart set on acting in pictures since a child in Hollywood. Finally crashed the gates and zoomed overnight to the high places. But the Young head remained unturned. He promptly married his high-school sweetheart, built a rose-covered cottage and's busy raising a family . . . Betty Furness hails from New York and flies back every chance she gets, without wasting a minute. In fact, never wastes a minute here, either. Never seen without a knitting bag, Betty outfits herself, her friends, her friends' babies and her toy bull dog with snappy worsted numbers . . . Nat Pendleton not only looks hefty enough to be a knock-out, drag-'em-out prize fighter, but was. A whizz at mathematics, Nat would get a bigger kick out of struggling with a geometrical problem than with Braddock . . . Ralph Morgan is brother of the illustrous Frank. They always visit one another's sets and give out weighty advice on how to play their respective parts. Besides being business advisers they're also swell friends . . . Raymond Hatton has been among the missing for a long, long time on the screen. Once one of the kings of comedy, he's back now and's still funny.

★★★ Men Without Names
(Paramount)

Here is a swell little picture, punctuated with fine performances, showing the G-men doing their stuff once again. If you think for a moment that crime could possibly pay you, you'll be quickly set right after seeing Fred MacMurray, Lynne Overman and their big bosses get their men—the biggest bunch of crooks that ever stepped before a camera. The picture is full of suspense and has its comedy moments, too, with a slight love theme, which would never be missed, running through the thrilling story. Fred MacMurray, as you are probably aware by now, is a screen "natural." He plays with ease and charm and looks like a regular guy rather than the stereotyped profile-boy hero of which the movies are far too full. An excellent performance is contributed by Lynne Overman, who really gets an opportunity in this picture, and small parts are expertly handled by such fine players as Elizabeth Patterson, Helen Shipman and Grant Mitchell. David Holt is more amusing than precocious in the child role, and anybody could have done what Madge Evans was called upon to essay as the "smarty" heroine. You'll like "Men Without Names."

Preview Postscripts

Fred MacMurray hit the high spots on a saxophone before hitting those places in the flickers. Earned his way through college via the sax route. Was going to be a criminal lawyer, but so many were the demands on his musical ability that he didn't, somehow, get much law study during those schooldays. When he landed a job with Libby Holman he definitely cast law and order out of his life. Fred made his first cinema success with Claudette Colbert in "Gilded Lily" and seems to be set for big things now . . . Madge Evans is as ambitious as she is pretty. Since just a baby, she has known the cold, cruel woild of the woikin' gal, and has practically grown up in front of a camera. She modelled baby bottles, hair-ribbons, lingerie and odds and ends before going in for moving pictures . . . Lynne Overman is on his way to film fame, for the same reasons that he won recognition on the Broadway stage. He's a swell person and the same kind of comedian. Lynne started out in life with aspirations to be the world's foremost jockey, and was pretty good 'till he discovered he was getting too big for a horse. Then he turned to warbling on the stage for his supper, but a throat infection put an end to that, so now he's just an actor . . . Elizabeth Patterson's the daughter of an old Southern family who staged another Civil War when they heard that their daughter had footlight fever. But Elizabeth's side won and Broadway got a grand character actress.

★ Make a Million
(Monogram)

Nope, this isn't a chain-letter plot, it's even more insane. Charles Starrett, an ex-prof of economics, decides to test his theories literally, so he advertises in the paper that he wishes to become a millionaire and everyone who is interested in seeing him accomplish this little trick may send him one dollar ($1). You can imagine the suspense of watching the plot thicken from there on. Watching Pauline Brooks, however, was almost as bad. Whether she can't act or just wasn't in the mood, we wouldn't be knowing. George Stone as the publicity man who is overflowing with brilliant ideas—all useless—does some good work, while James Burke is excellent as the hobo who gives the professor some valuable business pointers and arranges for his I. W. W. pals to furnish background. Monte Carter, Jimmy Aubrey and George Cleveland are among this elect group of panhandlers and provide an occasional good laugh at long intervals. But even they can't dim the fact that the picture is really as dull as the plot on which it's based, that the direction is slip-shod, and that the whole thing has been turned out too fast for even a "quickie."

Preview Postscripts

Charles Starrett understands the prof situation perfectly, having been entangled with it too often for comfort while at Dartmouth. He learned football but was also exposed to a higher larnin'. Made All-American in his junior year and in his senior, made the New York stage. Just a small part but it decided him on pursuing the stage for life. Claims he's just lucky, for a picture contract followed almost immediately. He was to go with the Viking expedition on that sea-voyage, but at the last minute was unable to catch the boat—which blew up in mid-ocean, killing thirty-three picture people. Charlie's luck is still good, for his biggest break is husky twin boys . . . Pauline Brooks has been around acting people all her life, and had small parts since she was old enough to toddle across a stage. However, she's not marrying an actor but a prizefighter—Jimmy McLarnin—for whose sake she rushed East on completion of this picture. Got there just in time to put ice-bags on Jimmy's head after that argument with Ross . . . James Burke is another one brought up on the stage. Vaudeville's his long line, though, and this is his first real chance in the flickers. Lives on nothing more nor less than ham and eggs. Always carries his own menu with him and hands it to waiters—whether at the Ritz or Sloppy Joe's . . George Stone will be remembered as the gutter rat of "Seventh Heaven," unless you've forgotten. Since then no gangster picture has been complete without Mr. Stone's decorative visage. Leads a very complacent existence in Hollywood as a bachelor . . . Monte Carter Jimmy Aubrey and George Cleveland are all left-overs from the custard pie days.

★★★★ Nell Gwyn
(United Artists)

They do some things especially well in England. Roast beef and Yorkshire pudding, for example, and men's tailoring—and historical screen dramas. "Nell Gwyn" is handsomely produced, beautifully acted, painstakingly directed and, added to that, it's a fine, robust, romantic story. You've seen Sir Cedric Hardwicke, who plays the tolerant and kingly Charles II, in several American pictures—notably, as the bishop in "Les Miserables." He gets the acting honors for the picture. Anna Neagle—the bewitching Nell—comes a close second. She's a tall and hearty girl—quite different from the usual Hollywood beauty. We think you'll like her lovely face, admire her graceful dancing, and laugh at her vigorous humor. The producers stuck as close to history as censorship would let 'em and give you a colorful pageant wherein you see Samuel Pepys; the designing Duchess of Portsmouth; Chiffinch, the perfect servant of the King's household; the Drury Lane Theatre, Whitehall, and the fascinating muddle that was London in the seventeenth century. See it, by all means.

Preview Postscripts

Speaking of censorship—which we're barely able to do without getting apoplectic with rage—the long, lean gentleman with the ingrowing moral sense (or is it merely a dirty mind?) had quite a hand in the history of this picture. It was completed in England, over a year ago, shipped over here, previewed with considerable pomp and circumstance shortly after its arrival—and then held up until recently. Finally, United Artists, who handled the release of the picture, were talked into making minor cuts in the film and adding a stupid, but fortunately short and unimportant prologue and epilogue—said additions showing Nell Gwyn on her deathbed, amid the utmost squalor. This you see, is supposed to convince audiences Nell was suitably punished for being the devoted mistress of the King. Certain spicy—but thoroughly charming and subtle bits—are cut. Thus the action may seem occasionally abrupt to you. Too bad, but such cuts are few and do not have any important effect upon the story.

★★ Mad Love (M-G-M)

Not being too ardent an enthusiast over these "horror pictures," we were impressed by the fact that this latest chiller held us enthralled. Peter Lorre, of course, is the whole works, but nevertheless the plot which forms the background is the most fascinating yarn yet invented for this type of flicker. It's as preposterous as all the rest of 'em, actually, yet so convincingly are the gruesome details presented, that for the moment, at least, they appear plausible. Photography, recording and timing are so artistically done that they lend a feeling of reality to the whole. Mr. Lorre tries a new stunt, this time to make your hair stand on end. He's a famous French surgeon who specializes on piecing together any part of the human body which has been blown to bits, mangled or deformed. When a famous pianist, Colin Clive, must have his hands amputated, the doctor replaces them with the hands of a recently executed murderer. From then on, Mr Clive has trouble with more difficult things than scales. Frances Drake, as his wife, does a nice piece of acting and a truly remarkable piece of screaming.

Even the cast had severe cases of chills while this picture was being made, what with the dank, eerie sets, the weird music and grotesque make-ups. Peter Lorre is actually a very gentle, kindly man, but he did enjoy scaring chance visitors on the set once in awhile. In one scene where he was working on a supposed corpse, stretched out on the operating table, Mr. Lorre suddenly swirled around and pointing his scalpel at a dear old lady visitor, he shouted, "You're next!" But it wasn't all fun for Peter, for the heat of the kleig lights was so intense on his shaved head, that he had to sit around in a chamois dripping with ice-water on his head most of the time. He and Frances Drake struck up a close friendship while working together and were always sneaking off for lunch and cocktails at odd hours, in spite of his "Mad Love" for her in the flicker. . . . Miss Drake is a case of a chorus gal who worked up in pictures. . . . Ted Healy's another one who has worked right up to his present place as a very popular comedian. Famous for his stooges in days gone by, Ted is now a comedian in his own right, having graduated with honors from the slapstick school . . . Keye Luke's a great favorite in this town. He came from China not so many years ago to study painting, on top of an excellent education obtained at Chinese universities. His art exhibit gained him so much publicity that studio directors heard of him and gave him a chance in fillums. He hasn't disappointed them, either.

★★★ Accent on Youth (Paramount)

Surely Playwright Raphaelson differs with Oscar Wilde, who is reported to have said, "Youth is so wonderful, it's a shame to waste it on the young." After viewing this one, you're apt to be convinced that young men should neither be seen nor heard. They're a humorless, stupid, conceited lot and the gent in the foolish forties is really the lad who has "what it takes." The picture is almost a replica of the stage play which, while a bit talkie at times, abounds in subtle wit, amusing dialogue and a novel situation. Sylvia Sidney and Herbert Marshall are excellent in the roles of a young lady much in love with an "old" man. However, Ernest Cossart, as the butler, sort of histrionically overshadows the rest of the fine cast which includes Phillip Reed, Astrid Allwyn and Holmes Herbert. The locale of the story is a playwright's New York penthouse, with a Santa Barbara sequence revealing a rather unusual honeymoon in which a young bridegroom and his equally young pal figure prominently for comedy purposes. Director Wesley Ruggles has done a neat job; in fact, everyone did, except the gent who designed Miss Sidney's clothes, which are pretty dreadful "creations" and give her more weight than a big fudge sundae.

Preview Postscripts

Sylvia Sidney claims she was "born serious." Not that she doesn't have her moments of silliness, but Life on the whole has been a problem to her. From childhood, Sylvia's been an omnivorous reader—mention any classic and you're on her home territory. At fourteen, she set out to earn a living. Was crazy about the theatre, but considered herself best adapted to the technical end of it. Got a job with the Theatre Guild dressing and designing sets. After eating paint for two years, she decided to try the acting end of the stage. Went on the road at sixteen and was starred that same year in "Crime"—and from there you know the rest. . . . Herbert Marshall's well known on the London and Broodway stages, where he played for several years with his wife, Edna Best, in a number of successful plays. That quiet, unassuming Marshall manner seems fatal to the ladies. He devoted hours to teaching Miss Sidney the mysteries of billiards while on the set. That view of Manhattan seen from the pent-house terrace, was just a huge cardboard picture! Photographs of buildings were "blown up" many times their original size and fitted together to form the magnificent "view." With lights behind, you'd swear it was gay Gotham at its best. Director Wesley Ruggles has an antipathy against blondes, so instructed Astrid Allwyn to dye her blonde curls a dark brown before reporting for work. . . . Ernest Cossart's a genuine old-time stage hand. After over forty years in the London and American theatre, he was prevailed upon to appear in a movie. It was the Hecht-MacArthur "Scoundrel." Mr. Cossart thinks the movies are swell, now. . . . Philip Reed had a tough proposition. He was playing in the stage version of "Accent on Youth" every evening at the same time he was making this picture. His lines in the picture weren't very different, but just enough to make them exasperatingly difficult to remember. He would surprise the stage cast every now and then with brand new lines.

★★★ The Man on the Flying Trapeze (Paramount)

Here's another Fields picture, which means W. C. is star, director, writer, producer and prop-man. Titles mean nothing, plot means nothing, the cast means nothing when the bulbous-nosed Fields wanders within camera range. So it is with this latest flicker! We can't for the life of us tell who or what we laughed at, but from the beginning to the end, the audience ran the gamut from guffaws to giggles. Mr. Fields is just another hen-pecked husband, at the mercy of not only his wife but her mother and brother. Between the three of them, you can imagine how much chance the poor, bewildered man has to fortify himself with his favorite spirits. He finally has to resort to cleaning his teeth with home-brew in order to taste a drop! The story ambles along at a leisurely rate, with Mr. Fields taking plenty of time, as usual, to speed things up. Mary Brian, pretty as ever, does a nice piece of work as Mr. Fields' daughter, Kathleen Howard is excellent as the shrew whom Mr. Fields really does tame, while Grady Sutton does a good job of making himself detestable as the brother-in-law.

The greatest treat in the world to W. C. Fields is a bed. From the time he was seven 'til he was twenty-seven, W. C. Fields slept in one. Alleys, park benches, barrels and such comfortable accommodations were his lot after knocking his father unconscious at the age of seven and starting out to see the world. Learned his famous juggling act from having to be quick about swiping fruit from vendors for years. Finally got a job on the stage and life became a little less complicated. Now is in the money—and still thinks a bed is the height of luxury. . . . Mary's known as the sweetest girl in Hollywood, and's been the college boys' despair all over the country. Looks like there's something to this "six times a bridesmaid" stuff, for she's gone up the aisle ahead of practically every star in Hollywood. . . . This was the first time Lucien Littlefield has even played himself in pictures for twenty years. At least it's the only time he's appeared without three-inch make-up on his visage, since his specialization has been in the Lon Chaney type of role. . . . Sam Hardy is another old-timer. He's noted to be the best dressed gag-man in Hollywood. Fields claims Sam's plaid pants, green caps and lurid ties are the cause of his astigmatism. . . . Kathleen Howard is the only woman in Hollywood that Mr. Fields will consider for his reel wife. He just flatly refuses to have any other woman scream at him. Miss Howard was formerly a Metropolitan Opera singer. After twelve years of warbling, she turned to fashion writing and became editor of a woman's magazine. When "Death Takes a Holiday" was filmed, Miss Howard was offered a part and's been on the screen ever since.

★★★ Anna Karenina (M-G-M)

If you were a fan ten years ago, you will recall that Garbo played in the silent version of this Tolstoy classic, too. Oddly enough, this story of a woman who sacrifices everything—husband, child, friends and finally her life—for love, stands up well even in this day when tolerance of indiscretion seems to be the vogue. Clarence Brown has done rather an enthralling job of directing and Miss Garbo, given an opportunity to run the gamut of emotions, makes the most of every moment. While Fredric March is not too convincing in his impassioned scenes, he gives a nice account of himself at other times. Little Freddie Bartholomew is pretty fine and Reginald Owen and Basil Rathbone rate their share of honors. The picture itself is one of the most elaborately mounted we have ever seen, and everyone, from the scenic designer to the gentleman who supplied the beautiful musical score, is entitled to a bow.

Garbo hopped a boat for Sweden the minute this picture was completed. But Greta tank she'll come back again, having signed up with M-G-M for another term at a sum that would give you the staggers. . . . May Robson, grand old great grandmother and great lady of the screen, claims that Greta is just a shy, sweet girl, who's glamorous languor comes from not consuming enough liver and vitamin E. . . . Freddie Bartholomew took the American public by storm after that performance in "Copperfield." It's a fact, though, that the child is even more amazing in real life. He has charm and brains enough to put many a noted actor in the shade. A tutor is always at Freddie's elbow on the set, to give him a little larnin' between actin'. He and Greta, though, managed to sneak away almost every day for a game of croquet together. Freddie generally beat, since his drolleries would get the Swedish siren so convulsed with giggles that she couldn't hit the balls straight.

"NATURALLY I LIKE CAMELS BEST...."

MISS BEATRICE BARCLAY ELPHINSTONE

"They're so much milder and have so much more flavor to them," says this charming representative of New York's discriminating younger set. "They are tremendously popular with us all because they never make your nerves jumpy or upset. And smoking a Camel really does something for you if you're tired—you smoke a Camel and you feel like new—it gives you just enough 'lift.'"

That is because smoking a Camel releases your own latent energy in a safe way—fatigue vanishes. And you can enjoy a Camel just as often as you wish, because Camels never upset the nerves. Smoke a mild, fragrant Camel the next time you are tired, and see what a difference it makes.

"OUTRAGEOUS!" Says MODERN SOCIETY

"SPLENDID!" Says THE MODERN DENTIST

IT ISN'T BEING DONE, BUT IT'S One Way TO PREVENT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH"

CAN'T you just hear the shocked whispers flash around a dinner table at her conduct? . . . "How terrible" . . . "How perfectly awful" . . . And they'd be right — from a social angle.

But your dentist would come to her defense — promptly and emphatically.

"That's an immensely valuable lesson in the proper care of the teeth and gums," would be his reaction . . . "Vigorous chewing, rougher foods, and more primitive eating generally, would stop a host of complaints about gum disorders — and about 'pink tooth brush.'"

For all dentists know that soft, modern foods deprive teeth and gums of what they most need — plenty of exercise. And of course, "pink tooth brush" is just a way your gums have of asking for your help, and for better care.

DON'T NEGLECT "PINK TOOTH BRUSH!" Keep your teeth white — not dingy. Keep your gums firm and hard — not sensitive and tender. Keep that tinge of "pink" off your tooth brush. And keep gum disorders — gingivitis, pyorrhea and Vincent's disease far in the background.

Use Ipana and massage regularly. Every time you brush your teeth, rub a little extra Ipana into your gums. You can feel — almost from the first — a change toward new healthy firmness, as Ipana wakens the lazy gum tissues, and as new circulation courses through them.

Try Ipana on your teeth and gums for a month. The improvement in both will give you the true explanation of Ipana's 15-year success in promoting complete oral health.

"ALL THAT I KNOW...I KNOW BY LOVE ALONE"

The heart of a man called to the heart of a woman. "We love", it said, "and love is all." Heart answered heart. With eyes open to what she was leaving forever behind her, she went where love called...to dark despair or unimaginable bliss. It is a drama of deep, human emotions, of man and woman gripped by circumstance, moved by forces bigger than they—a great drama, portrayed by players of genius and produced with the fidelity, insight and skill which made "David Copperfield" an unforgettable experience.

"BILIOUSNESS AND HEADACHES MADE MY LIFE MISERABLE"

"Then I traded 3 minutes for Relief"

I experimented with all kinds of laxatives. Then I discovered FEEN-A-MINT. I traded three minutes for relief. Whenever I feel constipated, I chew delicious FEEN-A-MINT for three minutes.* Next day I feel like a different person. Of course if you aren't willing to spend three minutes—jarring "all-at-once" cathartics will have to do. But what a difference FEEN-A-MINT makes—no cramps, nothing to cause a habit. Try the three-minute way yourself . . . 15c and 25c a box.

ATTENTION, MOTHERS—FEEN-A-MINT is ideal for everybody, and how children love it!

All of you people requesting information about Nelson Eddy—but who can blame you? Anyway, because Mr. Eddy is so extremely popular (he's broken all Information Desk records) and because there has been so little written about him, we felt you were entitled to more than just a short biography of him. Result: A two installment life story starting in this issue on page 28, will give all the information you could possibly desire to know about this young man's life, past and present. So go to it, and read your fill. P.S. He's 6 feet tall, weighs 173 pounds and was born in 1901. You can write Mr. Eddy at the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal., and if you want his photo just send 25c to him along with your request. "Rose Marie" will be his next picture.

MARY O'BRIEN, Upper Darby, Pa.—No, June Knight has not retired. You will see her soon in "Broadway Melody of 1936"—and believe me, she and Robert Taylor certainly make an attractive couple in this opus. As for Max Baer's "Kids on the Cuffs"—that just got lost in the shuffle. He may appear in "The Vanished Steamer" later on, however.

None other than John Wayne. John was born in Winterset, Iowa, on May 26, 1907, the son of Clyde Leonard Morrisey and Mary Brown. His real name is Marion Michael Morrisey. He was educated at the George Washington Grammar School of Keokuk, Iowa, and later at the Lancaster Grammar School in Lancaster, Calif. Following his graduation from the latter, John entered Glendale High School and from there entered the University of Southern California, where he played on the football team. In his junior year he decided to leave college to get into the motion picture business. His first job was prop boy and it was through this that he obtained his first crack at acting. Wayne has one brother, Robert Emmet, and is married to Josephine Saenz. They have one child. John is 6 feet 2 inches tall, weighs 198 pounds, has dark brown hair and grey eyes. His latest picture is "Paradise Canyon" with Marion Burns, and his next will be "Westward, Ho" with Sheila Mannors. He'll sing a ditty in this one. Write him at Republic Productions, Inc., 9336 W. Washington Blvd., Culver City, Cal. NOTE: Next month the Desk will run a biography of Bob Steele, so think up your questions in a hurry.

JEANNE H., Washington, Ind.—Gail Patrick took the part of Florence McCrickett and Frances Grant that of Peggy Burns in "Doubting Thomas." Frank Albertson was in love first with Gail, then Frances, in this picture. Does that help any?

Lafayette, Ind.; ELEANOR ELDREDGE, Chatham, Mass.; MARY VARNER, Omaha, Neb.; HELENA STASH; MARY SMITH—Lots has been written about Joan Crawford, nee Lucille LeSueur Cassin, but one rarely finds a resumée of her life. So here goes. Born in San Antonio, Tex., on March 23, 1908, Joan's family moved to Kansas City when she was quite young, and resided there for 16 years. She received her education at a private school in that city. Billie Cassin, as she was then called, was brought up in the wings of a theatre, as it were, since her father was a theatre owner. She was determined to go on the stage, against her family's wishes, and left home to make her debut in a Chicago revue. Upon the completion of a successful engagement in the Midwest, Joan came to New York where she appeared in several plays. She was seen by Harry Rapf, and brought to Hollywood under contract. Her first picture was in 1925 as an extra in "Pretty Ladies." She was still Lucille LeSueur then, but because her name was so difficult to pronounce her fans gave her the name of Joan Crawford in a magazine contest. From that time on her rise was steady and she is now one of the top ranking stars of Hollywood. Joan is 5 feet 4 inches tall, weighs 115 pounds, has reddish-brown hair, and brilliant blue eyes. Her favorite color combination is blue and white, she adores sport clothes and loves to wear lounging pajamas. She is a marvelous dancer and has a lovely soprano voice. Joan is divorced from Douglas Fairbanks, Jr., and is rumored married, or at any rate engaged, to Franchot Tone. Her favorite sports are tennis, swimming and riding. Joan's next picture will be "Glitter" (tentative title) with Brian Aherne, followed by "Elegance" with Clifton Webb. Both of them should be up to the usual Crawford standard. Write her at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.

HAZEL WOOD, Newport News, Va.—Yes, Gene Raymond really did his own singing in "Sadie McKee" and "Hooray for Love." His next picture will probably be "Believe It, Beloved." Florence Eldridge, Fredric March's wife, took the part of Fantine, mother of Little Cosette, in "Les Miserables."

A biography of Bing Crosby is not complete without that of his better half attached to it. So first we'll have Bing and then Dixie Lee. Harry Lillis Crosby (that's really Bing) was born in Tacoma, Wash., May 2, 1904, but at a very early age his family moved to Spokane where he received his early schooling. Bing has two sisters and four brothers. The nickname, Bing, was obtained on account of he could shout a rapid string of them louder than any kid in the city when he was playing "cowboys and Indians." He dabbled in grease paint during his high school years and even played "Julius Caesar" in a school production. His family, however, wanted him to

...and you'll find magical Marion Davies in her first picture for Warner Bros. —her finest for anybody!

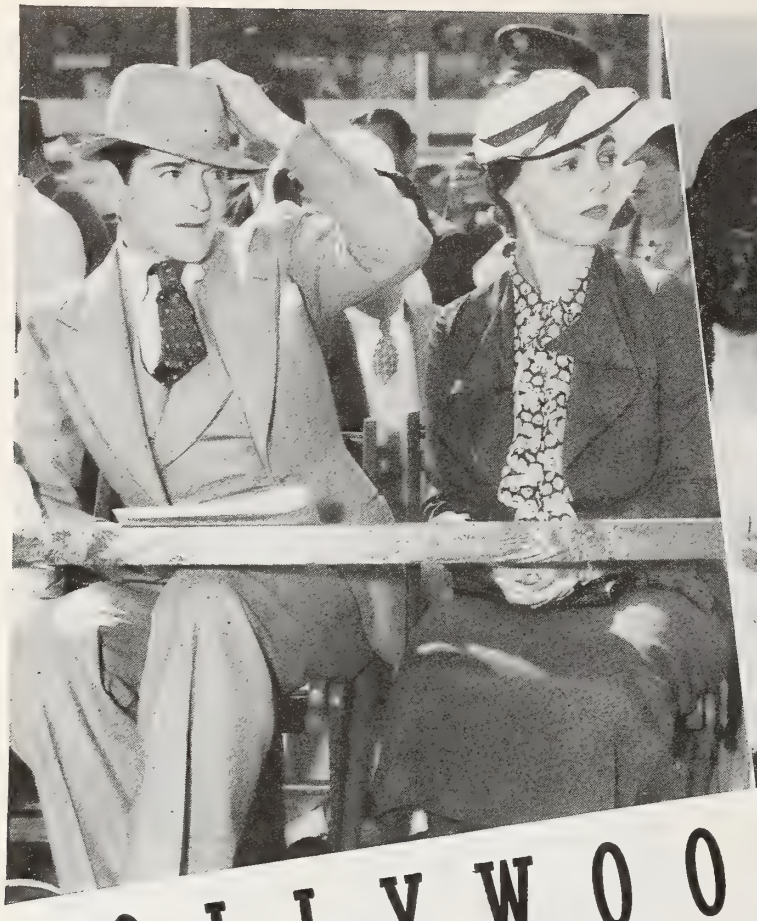
Look who's Marion's new screen sweetheart... Yessir, it's Dick Powell! And when he sings to Marion he does things to her—and you!

SHE'S back, boys and girls! Back with that glamorous gleam in her eye... that laughing lilt in her voice... that merry, magical something that makes her the favorite of millions.

Of course you read the headlines a few months ago about Marion Davies' new producing alliance with Warner Bros., famous makers of "G-Men,' and other great hits. Well, 'Page Miss Glory' is the first result of that union—and it's everything you'd expect from such a thrilling combination of screen talent!

It's from the stage hit that made Broadway's White Way gay—a delirious story of Hollywood's 'Composite Beauty' who rose from a chambermaid to a national institution overnight...

It has a 12-star cast that makes you chuckle with anticipation just to read the names...



It has hit-maker Mervyn LeRoy's direction, and Warren & Dubin's famous song, 'Page Miss Glory'...

It has 'Picture-of-the-Month' written all over it!

Don't think you're dreaming! All these celebrated stars really are in the cast of Marion's first Cosmopolitan production for Warners:—Pat O'Brien, Dick Powell, Frank McHugh, Mary Astor, Allen Jenkins, Lyle Talbot, Patsy Kelly, and a dozen others.

HOLLYWOOD SHOTS

Merle Oberon and David Nevins share a joke at United Artists' Banquet. Merle's in England now.

Francis Lederer haggardly holds his hat while Mary Loos looks calmly at a polo match.

Bellamy peeks over Fay Wray's and Del Rio's shoulders, Virginia Bruce grins—at polo matches.

A new idol gets into the autograph swing! Nelson Eddy at "Anna Karenina."

Sweeping on to new fame together, three distinguished players join hands with a distinguished producer to start the new season with a production of unparalleled dramatic force.
The tenderly beautiful story of two who loved a woman . . . beyond the hope of ever loving another! To one, she was a dream he could never realize - - to the other, a memory he could never forget!

become a lawyer so they shipped him off to Gonzaga College. He played a little football, but was principally interested in the glee club, in which he was quite successful. He and Al Rinker, another student, organized a seven-piece orchestra which became very popular—so much so in fact, that they decided to give up law and enter the entertainment field. Rinker's sister, a radio singer, got them an engagement in Los Angeles, after which they toured the Pacific coast until Paul Whiteman adopted them and with Harry Barris formed that group known as the Rhythm Boys. They toured with Whiteman until 1930, when they were in California making the picture "The King of Jazz." They were engaged to sing at the Cocoanut Grove; Bing made records which became best sellers; then signed a radio contract—and after all that, signed a screen contract. Bing is 5 feet 9 inches tall, weighs 170 pounds and has light blue eyes and light brown hair. His next picture will be "Two for Tonight" with Joan Bennett. Write him at Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood.

Now we come to Dixie Lee (her real name is Wilma Wyatt), who became Mrs. Bing Crosby in 1930. Born in Harriman, Tenn., twenty-three years ago (November 4, 1911), she was educated in New Orleans and Chicago. It was in Chicago that Dixie first decided on a theatrical career. After winning a singing contest at the Hotel Sherman there in 1928, she accepted an engagement to sing at the Lincoln Tavern, and in October of the same year was sent to Pittsburgh to join the road company of "Good News," in which she made a distinct hit. She was then summoned to New York to play a featured role in the New York production of the same show, and was considered the best "Southern Blues" singer on the stage. She was selected from 50 applicants for a role in "Fox Movietone Follies of 1929" and was signed to a three-year contract. She is 5 feet 3 inches tall, weighs 110 pounds, has blonde hair and sparkling brown eyes. She is modest and retiring, almost shy, loves pretty clothes and enjoys swimming, horseback riding and dancing. Her favorite colors are blue and orchid. After her marriage to friend Crosby, she gave up her screen career, and later presented Gary Evan Crosby to her husband on June 27, 1933, and the twins, Phillip Lang and Dennis Michael on July 13, 1934. Her first picture after the birth of the twins was "Love in Bloom" followed by "Redheads on Parade" which you will see shortly. She is under contract to 20th Century-Fox Studios, 1401 N. Western Ave., Hollywood, Cal.

HELEN LOUISE BROWN, Woodland, N. C.—Robert Taylor will be Irene Dunne's leading man in "Magnificent Obsession." Robert Allen is 29, is not married, has been in Hollywood about a year and will be in "Bodyguard" with Florence Rice, next. Jean Harlow's first picture, "Moran of the Marines" was released in 1928. Yes, Ginger Rogers' first picture was "Young Man of Manhattan" released in 1930. I don't believe she ever played in westerns. For the most part, the stars are as good looking off the screen as they are on. Of course, their features are the same but the hair is apt to be different and freckles have a way of changing their appearance.

JANE CARROLL, Hartford, Conn.; MARY PLASKY, STANLEY BOGDAN, Camden, N. J.; NORMA FEINTHAL, MARGARET MULROONEY, Y. LEVINE, G.D., New York, N. Y.; EDITH VERDE, Amsterdam, N. Y.; BARBARA SHANNON, Norwood, Mass.; JEAN CALLEWAERT, Detroit, Mich.; ALICE WALSH, Long Beach, Cal.; NAOMI DISMUKES, Dallas, Texas—She was born Gretchen Young in Salt Lake City, Utah, on January 6, 1913, but became Loretta Young when she embarked upon a motion picture career. She has two sisters also in the movies, Polly Ann Young and Sally Blane, a brother, Jack, who is now an attorney, but was the first of the family to enter the cinema business, and a younger sister, Georgiana. Loretta is descended from American-English-French parents and was educated at Romona Convent in Los Angeles. Her screen career started when she was a tot of four. A baby was needed for Fanny Ward's picture and Loretta was chosen. Her real chance came later, though, when a director called the home and asked for Polly Ann, who was away at the time. Brother Jack suggested that Loretta might do, as she looked so much like her sister. She made such a good impression that she was immediately awarded a role in Colleen Moore's "Naughty But Nice," and has been in the movies ever since. Outside of dramatic work she is most interested in dancing and art. She plays the piano well and loves good music of all sorts. Blue and white are her favorite colors, and salads and desserts her favorite foods. She likes lilies of the valley and gardenia perfume. Swimming, horse back riding, bicycling and ping pong are her favorite sports, and she likes to watch football games, horse races or polo matches. Loretta's hobby is shopping for pretty clothes, and she likes popular novels, attends the movies frequently and has a pet canary. In 1929 she married Grant Withers, but divorced him a year later. Has not married since. Loretta is 5 feet 3 inches tall, weighs 107 pounds and has light brown hair set off by huge grey-blue eyes. Write her at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal. Don't fail to see her in "The Crusades." She is simply ravishing as Berengaria in this opus.

"Where have you been all my life?"

{Intimate conversation of a lady with herself}

"I'VE been doing nasty things to my palate with bitter concoctions. I've been abusing my poor, patient system with harsh, violent purges. The whole idea of taking a laxative became a nightmare. Why didn't I discover you before . . . friend Ex-Lax. You taste like my favorite chocolate candy. You're mild and you're gentle . . . you treat me right. REGINA CANNON KEEPS YOU INFORMED ON THE STARS' ACTIVITIES—SOCIAL AND CINEMATIC

Luise Rainer seems to be the current Hollywood heroine. So great a personal hit did she make at the preview of "Escapade," her first picture, that a member of the departing audience whispered to her friend that Luise was so splendid an actress that she hoped she would not become spoiled. As if in answer to this remark, the crowd separated to permit a fleeing Miss R. to bound up a flight of steps in the theatre's lobby with a cameraman leaping after her. "I will not be photographed," she cried. "I will not be intruded upon this way!" Too bad, too bad!

It was Myrna Loy's walking out on "Escapade" that gave Luise Rainer her big opportunity. Of course, the little German gal had to make good or the chance would have gone for naught. Now, at this writing, everyone is speculating as to Miss Loy's fate. Some say that she is definitely leaving Metro and will move her make-up box to Paramount. Others claim Rosalind Russell will be groomed for Myrna's roles. Our guess is that Miss R. is too distinct a personality to fill anybody's shoes.

When Marlene Dietrich moved into Countess di Frasso's Beverly Hills home, her daughter, Maria, fell heir to an Afghan hound that Gary Cooper once presented to the Countess. The dog looks a little threadbare, patches of its hair having departed, but perhaps that is just another reason why Maria loves him. Incidentally, la Dietrich is going places with Rouben Mamoulian again. He, if you remember, is the director whose parents are Speaking of hounds, Gloria Stuart is in despair over one. It seems Gloria was the proud possessor of a little Scottie and a big airdale. The Scottie had been jealous of the other dog for months and had just gotten to tolerate him when the Sheekman's brand new baby arrived. It was all evidently too much for the pup to cope with. He took one look at his new, unexpected rival and departed for places unknown. Ads in the classified columns have not helped Gloria locate him. You see, too much was—too much!

And now the lovely Phyllis Brooks is set with RKO and she is that pleased—and rightly so! Phyllis came to town as Phyllis Seiler and the Powers That Be at Universal where, it seems, they like to change people's names, declared she should be Mary Brooks. The gal said she'd stand for the Brooks part of the bargain, but she'd like to retain her own first name. "Y'see," she explained vaguely, "I have a rich, old aunt named Phyllis and some day——" Well, the name-changer, who could be made to listen to reason if it clinked in coin, said, "All right, all right!" And now all Miss B. has to do is find a rich, old aunt!

Looks like Lee Tracy and Estelle Taylor really mean business—of the big, matrimonial variety. Estelle came to Hollywood merely to look over her property. She met Mr. T., they became that way, and now 'tis said the minister is being paged. This will be Lee's first matrimonial venture. Meanwhile his "ex" girl friend, the petite Isabel Jewell, is whiling away the shining hours with Nelson Eddy, who is so-o-o devoted. And so, everybody's happy!

Alice Brady, she of the great charm and talent, threw a very elegant cocktail party recently. The affair was full of hors d'oeuvres, playwrights, fine wine and actors—not, of course, named in order of their importance. Anita Louise appeared sans Tom Brown who, they say, is still pining for his blonde. In fact, each day he sends a beautiful gardenia to the object of his affections, but so far the gesture hasn't melted her hard, little heart. But to get back to Mrs. Brady's soirée, we spotted Louise Henry, reported engaged to Conrad Nagel, Virginia Bruce, John Colton, Alan Crosland, Bert Lytell and scores of other famous. Yes, an enjoyable time was had by all; in fact, we believe even the hostess liked it!

Of course, George Raft meant to be generous, but, fun's fun and there's a limit to everything. One recent evening George, on leaving the Trocadero where he had dined and danced with Virginia Pine, slipped the pretty hat-check girl as he thought a one spot. On second glance, it proved to be a twenty and both Mr. R. and the lucky lady nearly fainted at seeing it. Well, maybe that will square matters for the handsome blonde male star who has never tipped the young woman a dime in all the months he's patronized the famous café.

Lady Luck seems to hover around Claudette Colbert, if we can believe the photo-snappers of your favorite players. For months the boys have tried to "snap" Claudette with her constant escort, Dr. Joel Pressman, and have had no luck. Then, at Joan Bennett's farewell party for hubby, Gene Markey, who it developed wasn't going anywhere, the cameramen thought they had Miss C. and Dr. P. on the spot. As they emerged from the dance floor, cameras were whipped into action when one excited operator tripped and fell, temporarily disabling two others. One man was left, but lo when he snapped, nothing (Continued on page 56)

BEAUTY ADVICE

Marion Davies as the drab little chambermaid in "Page Miss Glory." Not very glamorous . . . but wait.

BE EXCITING! BE DIFFERENT! BE INTRIGUING! HERE'S THE SECRET

BY MARY BIDDLE

ALL THE world loves a lover . . . and all the world loves a Cinderella story. The modernized story of the little Cinderella who becomes the Princess is the theme of many a Hollywood scenario where the working girl who might be one of us becomes the glamorous lady we've dreamed of being. "Page Miss Glory" turns another page in the same book of Cinderella stories and Marion Davies portrays the drab little chambermaid who is transformed into the radiant "Miss Glory."

Such stories are not "just fiction." They have happened, and can happen in real life. But how do you suddenly go about acquiring charm . . . glamor . . . a new personality? Well, make-up, a new coiffure, clothes . . . these things can accomplish marvels in the way of transformation. But it's a feeling of confidence, a sense of power within oneself, which in the final analysis achieves the transformation.

Take Hollywood, for instance. Year after year new girls come to Hollywood, anxious to "break into the movies." Unsophisticated, most of them, gawky, untried, and sometimes none too pretty. A year or so later they amaze us by blossoming into exciting, glamorous women. MODERN SCREEN has run stories from time to time showing pictures of the stars "before and after," the way they looked when they first came to Hollywood, and the way they look now. It always gives me a thrill to see the glamorous transformations that have been achieved.

The magical thing that most of those raw Hollywood recruits get is confidence. A director sees the vital spark of . . . shall we call it glamor? . . . in a new girl, an extra girl in the crowd, for example, and as he grooms her for a role he gives her confidence by telling her that she has glamor, by believing in her. When she begins to realize that he believes in her she feels her power. She is no longer timid and afraid, and the spark of glamor becomes a flame which lights up her personality from within.

The fly-away coiffure which Perc Westmore is giving Marion transforms her.

YOU DON'T have to be beautiful to have glamor and to be a personality. Nor do you have to be young. But one thing is certain . . . you have to have confidence in yourself. Glamor goes when confidence goes.

All right now, in order to have confidence, you have to have something to be confident about. You don't have any Hollywood director to instill in you a feeling of confidence; you have only yourself to depend on. I know what you're up against. Your letters are really what led me to write this kind of an article. Selecting comments at random from your letters I run across things like this: "I'm hopeless, I guess I've just got an incurable inferiority complex," "People say I'm pretty but it doesn't seem to get me anywhere;" "I'm so tired of being the same old me, I want to be different;" "Maybe you think it's silly for me to want to be attractive." Of course it isn't silly for any girl to want to be attractive. It's one of the few really normal impulses we have left in this rather crazy world of ours. Of course you want to be different. Even screen stars get tired of "being typed" and playing the same role all the time. And as for an inferiority complex, it can be an incentive as much as a handicap.

Two famous actresses, Joan Crawford and Katherine Cornell, both considered themselves "ugly ducklings" when they started out. Why, Joan Crawford almost ran away from one of her big chances because she thought there were so many girls prettier than she at the casting office that she wouldn't have a chance. Joan has fought against an inferiority complex most of her life and now she's at the "top" simply because she made that complex drive her on rather than drag her down. She licked it by proving herself to herself. Now, the trouble with most of you is that you don't have enough confidence in your own ability to do things. And that's what you must acquire.

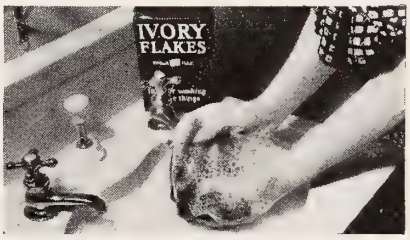
A very famous Hollywood director gave me this advice once. The best way to gain confidence and poise, according to his sincere belief, is to learn to do some one thing exceptionally well. Learn to dance, learn to swim, learn to play tennis, learn to do anything well, and you'll profit by it in the poise you gain. You'll have better command over yourself. Lots of you are self-conscious about your hands and feet. You don't quite know how to handle them gracefully.

If you learn to dance or excel in some sport to the extent that you become physically sure of handling yourself, then you won't be self-conscious when you're with other people, or when you enter or leave a room. You won't be hampered by a lack of confidence in your ability to meet a social situation gracefully.

JUST as you may have aptitudes for certain sports, you may have aptitudes for certain types of clothes, or a certain type of coiffure. Above all, then, be individual. Why has Gloria Swanson's name always been a synonym in Hollywood for "glamor?" Because she has always been so supremely individual, so entirely herself. She wears exotic clothes that would make Janet Gaynor or Jean Parker look ridiculous. But then she would look just as out of harmony with herself if she affected the demure type dress of Janet Gaynor. If you would have glamor, don't be imitative. Don't try to be a second Garbo or Crawford, or Colbert, or a second anybody. There was a time when every other girl and her sister affected a shoulder-length bob in order to "look like Garbo." Most of them looked like freaks. Regular features are essential if the shoulder-length bob is to prove successful, and generally the arrangement needs a few curls clustering at the nape of the neck in order to insure some softening influence.



Be individual. If your hair is thick and lovely, don't have it cut and thinned and plastered down in a flat silhouette. Let its color and texture and abundance mean something in your life. The charming thing about Marion Davies' hair is that it always looks just a wee bit fly-away, as though it were so gloriously alive it just couldn't be bound down with fixed waves and hairpins. "Wash hand-knits with IVORY FLAKES,"

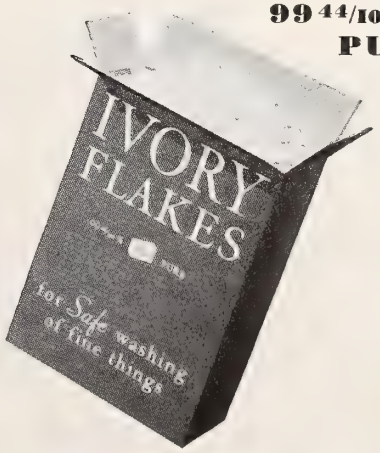
URGE THE MAKERS OF MINERVA YARNS

1. TAKE MEASUREMENTS or trace outline of sweater on heavy paper.

2. SQUEEZE LUKEWARM SUDS of pure Ivory Flakes through garment. Do not rub, twist or let stretch.

3. RINSE 3 TIMES in lukewarm water of same temperature. Knead out excess moisture in bath towel.

4. DRY FLAT, easing back (or stretching) to original outline.



WHEN DRY, appearance is improved by light pressing under damp cloth.

Knit one, purl one—when you put a lot of time into knitting a sweater you don't want it to become little-sister's-size after its first washing! Wool is sensitive—it shrinks at the mere mention of rubbing, hot water or an impure soap!

So wash your woolens with respectful care. And be especially sure to use cool suds of Ivory Flakes. Why Ivory Flakes? Well, listen to what the makers of Minerva yarns say: "We feel that Ivory Flakes are safest for fine woolens because Ivory is really pure—protects the natural oils that keep wool soft and springy."

Read the washing directions on this page, follow them carefully—and your hand-knits will always stay lovely as new!

A TOUR OF TODAY'S TALKIES

BY REGINA CANNON

★★★ Front Page Woman (Warners)

Well, it may be all in the spirit of good, clean fun and, then again, you may be meant to take it big, but anyway you look at it, this is good entertainment. As its title indicates, it's about the ever-colorful activities of the newspaper tribe and how they pay each other off by grabbing news beats—known in the profession as scoops—from each other. Bette Davis and George Brent are on rival sheets. Of course they're in love and, since all's fair in IT and war, they go to it on a big murder yarn. The fact is that their goings-on will give you a laugh and the people in City Rooms throughout the country a big shriek for, believe it or not, these two young people are the only ones on their respective sheets covering the big tale. Of course, it could only happen in reel life, what with every cub on a staff collecting "info" on a real daily. However, this little (?) deviation from truth was doubtless injected for plot purposes. The dialogue is snappy and Miss Davis pretty fine. Mr. B. is slightly more convincing than usual and Roscoe Karns rates high.

Preview Postscripts

No wonder George Brent proves so devastating to some of our best leading ladies, for he has both Irish Blarney and a romantic past. A deadly combination. He was born on the Emerald Isle and was educated there—at least he went to school when there weren't any revolutions to distract him. But in spite of his meager schooling George developed into a bright young man, so bright, in fact, that he was asked to leave his homeland after leading one uprising too successfully. He went back, though, and joined forces with the Irish Players in Dublin. From there he came to America and Hollywood. Miss Ruth Chatterton is his "ex" and her former husband, Ralph Forbes, is his best friend. Miss Garbo and Mr. Brent were great pals before Greta sailed for home. While she's on her vacation, George may be found in dim corners of restaurants or behind grand pianos with Miss Katherine De Mille . . . Bette Davis hails from the East where she had some stage training. Hollywood regarded her as just another attractive, entertaining gal 'til she created the biggest furore yet seen or heard during the recent Academy Awards. The country rose in arms when Bette was not mentioned as a possibility for the prize due to her splendid work in "Of Human Bondage." She attained far more publicity because she wasn't mentioned than if she'd won the grand sweepstakes. Married to Harmon Nelson, a childhood sweetheart and orchestra leader, she claims their marriage is a success solely because neither of them meddle with the other's business. When Harmon plays in San Francisco or other cities close by, Bette lives with him in an auto camp and cooks and scrubs like any hausfrau. She keeps a watchful eye on his diet at all times but never his business. That's Harmon's idea, too, so maybe the fact that the little woman earns thousands of times more than friend husband won't send this marriage on the Hollywood rocks, after all . . . Roscoe Karns has the fastest talking apparatus and the deepest dimples of any actor in the studios. Things are ever lively on a set where Roscoe hangs out—and he's on plenty of them because when a scene falls flat the director howls, "Get Karns." He made his Los Angeles debut on the stage in "Front Page" and was the only one in the house not breathless. Has had a penchant for newspaper tales ever since and was in his glory on this set. This set, though, would put any editor in his glory. It was more complete and perfect in every detail than any newspaper office that ever existed. Teletypes, air-cooling systems—every modern improvement down to extra large spittoons made this a Newspaperman's Paradise. There was plenty of excitement on other sets, too, what with burning down a huge apartment house for one scene and having a fancy electrocution in another.

★★★ Orchids to You (Fox)

A flossy, frivolous number about life as it parades through a swanky New York flower shop, this is guaranteed not to tax your mental capacity, although it may prove a strain on your credulity. Even though it is handsomely cast and produced—they use twelve truckloads of flowers and have the (Continued on page 91)

A STARTLING DRAMA OF TODAY . . . AND FOREVER! TIMELY AS TODAY'S NEWS . . . ETERNAL WITH ITS CHALLENGING TRUTHS!

ALICE FAYE

Looking too, too beautiful, Alice Faye of the torchy, scorchy voice and the lovely slim legs, relaxes after a day's work in "Ball of Fire." In this Fox picture, she will appear with the engaging Jack Haley, the comical Messrs. Mitchell and Durant and your old friend, Bebe Daniels. Alice has been a Hollywoodite for almost two years now and has never once let the town get her. Not even when said town has her rumored engaged to or in love with this, that and the other man. Incidentally, we feel that we owe Alice an apology. We said something recently about a "publicity romance" having been cooked up between the fair Alice and the stalwart Nelson Eddy. 'Twas an idle rumor, reader, and would you mind paying no attention? Alice works hard, lives quietly, looks after her family and saves her spare cash for a rainy day. In other words, no splurging on costly luxuries for Alice.

GRETA GARBO

"Anna Karenina" returns —and Greta Garbo speaks the lines of Tolstoi's tragic love story which she played silently a number of years ago. Those who have been on the set during its production and those who have seen a preview of the picture, say that you will find Garbo imbued with all the old fire and glamorous excitement that she seemed to have lost in recent roles. Fredric March plays her romantic lead and Garbo seems happier and more beautiful than ever before. And isn't she a painting in this ball gown from the picture?

JULIE HAYDON

Here's a girl who had to live down her resemblance to a great star! Julie Haydon resembled Ann Harding so much that it looked for awhile as if she would never have a chance to be a personality on her own. However, along came the Messrs. Hecht and MacArthur with "The Scoundrel" up their sleeves and lo, Julie became a definite and exciting person over night! Paramount has Julie signed to a long contract —but she's hoping they won't type her to dramatic roles exclusively. She would like to play high comedy.

THE BIG Broadcast OF 1936

YOU can listen in on most of the big stars of this great picture, but it's somep'n when you can listen and look, too! All your best radio and screen bets are lined up to give "The Big Broadcast" and it's a treat you won't be missing. Bing Crosby crooning "I Wished On The Moon." Ethel Merman torching "It's The Animal In Me." Jessica Dragonette singing that old favorite "Alice Blue Gown"—not to mention Oakie, Roberti, Amos n' Andy, Burns and Allen, Ruggles and Boland, Wendy Barrie, Henry Wadsworth, Sir Guy Standing, Bill Robinson, Ray Noble and his Orchestra and the Nicholas Brothers.

PREVIEW OF A PARAMOUNT PICTURE— MORE STARS THAN THERE ARE IN HEAVEN

Adv't.

RANDOLPH SCOTT

It took several good rousing "hoss operas" to bring Randy Scott any attention from Hollywood producers. But when they did notice the tall good-looking Virginia engineer, he started to get the breaks. To date his best piece of luck is landing the role of Duncan Bedford in "So Red the Rose" with Margaret Sullavan as the spirited cousin, Valette Bedford. Of course, you saw him in "She" with Helen Gahagan.

WEBB • JEAN ARTHUR

Two of Broadway's pets are Clifton Webb and Jean Arthur. When Jean's earlier cinema career took a dull turn, she hopped right back to the stage. Then, once again, she burst upon the screen in a sparkling new guise, that of the wise-cracking, cynical gal of "The Whole Town's Talking." "Lady Beware" is her next. Cliff's suave, sophisticated dancing and sly comedy will make new excitement in screen fare when he appears in the tentatively titled "Elegance" with Joan Crawford, which she will do after "Glitter."

Nelson first discovered that he had a voice when he used to follow operatic records on the phonograph at home.

(Below) Sudden acclaim hasn't turned his head. He likes the screen but his first and real love is concert work.

(Above) Nelson with his youthful mother, also a singer. She has been his teacher, guide and great inspiration.

NELSON EDDY'S TRUE LIFE Story

HE'S A NEW SCREEN IDOL AND HERE'S YOUR CHANCE TO READ HOW HE GOT THAT WAY!

DRUMS—drums—church solos—Gilbert and Sullivan operettas—drums . . .

The singing Nelson Eddy was born on a July 29th, in Providence, Rhode Island, the only child of Isabel Kendrick and William D. Eddy, with the beating of drums, the anthems of choral singing a part of his heritage.

It may sound as though the small Nelson had been born either to the Comanche Indians or into a professional world of entertainers. Nothing could be farther from the truth. As a matter of fact, so alien was any idea of theatrical life in any of its aspects to any one of the Eddys that Nelson has been poor man, rich man, newspaper man, advertising man, iron worker—all but beggarman and thief—before his golden baritone came into its rich and rightful own.

BY GLADYS HALL

For Nelson is of Puritan strain, of old New England heritage on his father's side, of Dutch descent on his mother's. The Methodist Church, the Ten Commandments, long Sundays of the Old Testament—the iron virtues of those stiff-spined forebears of his, forged and welded the strong unmeltable metal of his character which has brought Nelson Eddy to the high place he occupies today.

It is necessary to one's understanding of a man to discover who or what has been the dominant force in his life, the ruling influence. In the life of Nelson Eddy his mother has been, and still is, that force. A mother-complex, the Freudians would say. Well, why not? For Nelson's mother has been more than a mother in the biological and affectionate sense of the word. She has been a fellow-worker, an ardent sympathizer, a faithful believer and a staunch companion along every path he has trod. She has shared his dreams, partaken of his deeds. And when, at tea the other day in his spacious and beautiful Beverly Hills home, he went to the foot of the stairs and called, "Mom! Ma-ma!" and a young, animated woman came running down to pour the tea, you felt that the little boy was calling, with a man's voice, the one who had made success possible for him in the past and sweet to him in the present.

NELSON EDDY said, meeting his mother's eyes which are like his own forget-me-not blue ones, "I probably am the happiest man in the world. If I had it all to do over again I would do just what I have done. I have no regrets. I have no nostalgia for 'the things that might have been.' The world is, to me, a workshop and a playroom with toys, tools and things which are simply inexhaustible. And the only 'secret' to it all is to keep in tune with the elemental force—call it God or what you will—to realize that it is better to be good than to be bad."

Nelson's heritage on his father's side is sturdy New England stock. He said, "My ancestors did not come over on the Mayflower, however. They missed it by ten years. Result, I have no grandfather's clock! The original Eddy, so far as I can trace, was christened John Eddye. He came over from England and settled in Massachusetts. A bit later, when Governor Winthrop paid the colony a tour of inspection with the object of listing the various trades and vocations of the colonists, he found bakers, chandlers, farmers and fishermen, mechanics, dentists. But when he came to John Eddye, he was stumped. For John Eddye had no job. He wrote him down, finally, as 'John Eddye, gentleman!'

"My mother's mother was of Dutch descent. Mother was born in Atlanta, Georgia—and she was a well-known oratorio singer of her day."

I'VE SAID that the small Nelson was born to the tap of drums, the beat of rhythm, the wings of song. He was. Both his mother and his father were musical. His father was, at one time, drum major in the Second Regiment Band of the Rhode Island National Guard. His grandfather played the drum and previously had drummed for fifty-five years in another famous American band. As a small boy Nelson acted as mascot for the outfit. He also played the drum in a school orchestra which consisted of drum and piano—when they could get a pianist! And he used to rat-a-tat-tat for his small schoolmates as they entered and departed from school. He said to me, "Drums have always played more or less of a part in my subconscious." (Remember how he sang the stirring "Tramp! Tramp! Tramp!" in "Naughty Marietta"?)

His childhood was threaded with the notes and octaves of music. His mother was, at one time, soprano soloist in a church in Providence and he, until his voice broke, was boy soprano soloist at Grace Church in the same city. All during his little-boy years his (Continued on page 83)

NO GREATER THAN

BY RUTH BIERY

ONE OF Hollywood's most famous stars was about to begin a new picture, a production already ballyhooed as one of the greatest of coming attractions. One of Hollywood's best-known directors had been assigned. On the day before they were to start shooting, several years ago, the star telephoned the director and asked if he would go to a certain beauty parlor where she was being made-up. He had known her since their first days in Hollywood and he went at once.

"I just wanted to remind you that when we knew each other, I was a different person than I am today. Now, I am a star. When we get on the set, please do not call me by my first name. I wish to be addressed as Miss Blank."

The director rose and bowed from the waist. "That is perfectly agreeable to me. But please remember, that I, too, am no longer the person you used to know.

STARS CAN FALL IF THE MAN BEHIND THE

Below, Grace Moore had had only tepid response in two former pictures but Victor Schertzinger directed "One Night of Love" and made both Grace and Tullio Carminati famous.

Most directors stand in awe of Kate Hepburn's reputed temperament. But not George Cukor. After "Little Women" Kate called him "great" and wanted him to direct her always.

THEIR DIRECTORS

I am now a great director and I wish to be called Mr. Blank!"

Those who heard the conversation, floating from the booth of a beauty salon, exchanged wise smiles which said, "What a flop that picture will be, starting out that way. He can't make a great picture from such a beginning."

WHEN THE production was one-third finished, the director appeared upon the set one morning with a stranger whom he presented to the star. "I have hired this man to do nothing but say, 'Yes, Miss Blank!' We want you to be absolutely happy while working with us."

Those working on the set looked wisely at one another. They knew this production would never make motion picture history! They knew he was a great director and she was a great actress but they understood no director could be great under those circumstances and that no star is ever greater than the man who directs her.

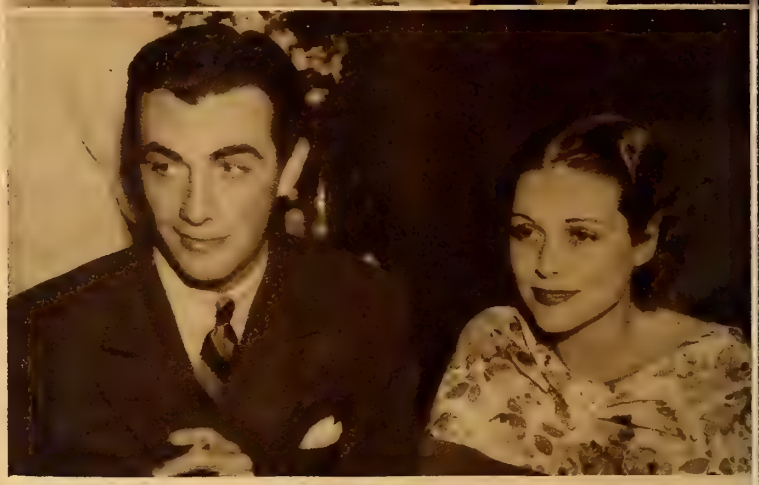
HOT ITALIAN RHYTHM TO THE SNAPPIEST DANCE THIS FAMOUS TEAM HAS EVER DONE

WANT to startle your home town with the biggest dance sensation in seasons? If you do, you have a chance with this preview of Ginger Rogers' and Fred Astaire's most exciting dance from "Top Hat"—they specially posed their "Piccolino" steps for you in a modified ballroom version that is easy to learn but exciting to dance. Here goes!

(1) The beginning. On the vamp of the music the partners do individual turns to right swinging into ballroom position.

(2) The Piccolino Step. This is the key step of the dance and the essence of this ballroom version. Step with the right foot to the right and then back to the original position, to the count of one-two. Then to a one-two-three count, take three steps to the right, finishing with both feet together. Repeat exactly the same combination of steps to the left, leading with the left foot. Repeat the whole four times, alternating the right and left combinations.



(3) The dip kick. Partners separate to a vamp in the music, step with the left foot, dip and lightly kick the floor with the right foot in the rear. Then step with the right foot, dip and kick the floor with the left foot. Repeat the combination twice and step back to ballroom position.

(4) The Piccolino Box—repeat the Piccolino Step, (Continued on page 81)

BOB TAYLOR'S STILL A SMALL-TOWN BOY

At left, Robert Taylor in person—one of the swellest fledgling stars in all Hollywood. Right above, with June Knight in a scene from "Broadway Melody of 1936." And below, dining out with Irene Hervey who is his best girl and his greatest inspiration to succeed. They go steadily together but to quiet, simple places like any small-town couple, he says.

BY FAITH SERVICE

TAKE A young man off'n a college campus, spin the wheel of chance and place him in a studio, his feet on the Milky Way to stardom—and you have a human equation worth studying.

This happened to Robert Taylor, née Brough. He was born in Filley, Nebraska, "raised" in Beatrice, the only son of the late good Doctor Brough and his wife. Conservative, small-town people, the Broughs, unworldly and of simple tastes. People who still thought that theatre folks belonged in some sort of zoo, along with the circus animals and spangled performers. If you had told the late Dr. Brough that his only son would live to become a "moom-pitcher" actor you would have found yourself laughed right out of his surgery.

YOUNG ROBERT had a careful, a religious upbringing. Sunday School and church every week, grace at table, prayers at night. He was raised to believe that drink is a curse indeed and that the demon nicotine is not for godly young men. He was taught that good is good and bad is bad and that there is no blurring the line between. He has not failed that teaching. Even now he does not smoke nor take a drink—certainly not in the presence of his mother, if at all.

And so Robert, the only child, had a happy, comfortable and normal childhood. All of the necessities, few of the luxuries. People in Beatrice did not, for the most part, hold with the flesh-pots. Such things as de luxe parties, opulent cars and romances to (Continued on page 64)

STAR WORRIER

BY FRANC DILLON

She'll deny vehemently that she makes the rest of her cast step to keep up with her dramatic pace, but her leading men will tell you that Bette Davis is a worry! At right you see Bette and George Brent listening intently to Director Keighley on the "Special Agent" set.

"IT'S HORRIBLE to be a star," said Bette Davis.

She said it with a finality that brooked no argument.

One couldn't doubt her sincerity, although she presented anything but the picture of a disgruntled actress, as she waited in her studio dressing room to be called to the set. Wearing a smart satin pajama suit, she looked exactly what she is—a successful and contented young woman who has made up her mind exactly where she is going, and most people think she's there already.

In fact, if Bette were one to rest on her laurels, she could relax, secure in the knowledge that she has just about reached the top in acting art. It is well known around the studios that when Bette is in a picture, it is up to the rest of the cast to keep their minds on their work or she'll walk right away with the honors.

James Cagney, Leslie Howard, Paul Muni, John Eldredge, George Brent—all of her leading men—have only the most enthusiastic praise for her work even though there must have been times when they worried a little and wondered how they were (Continued on page 86)

BETTE SETS AN ACTING "HIGH" HARD TO FOLLOW!

SOME WITTY SLANTS ON JOLLY OLD ENGLAND

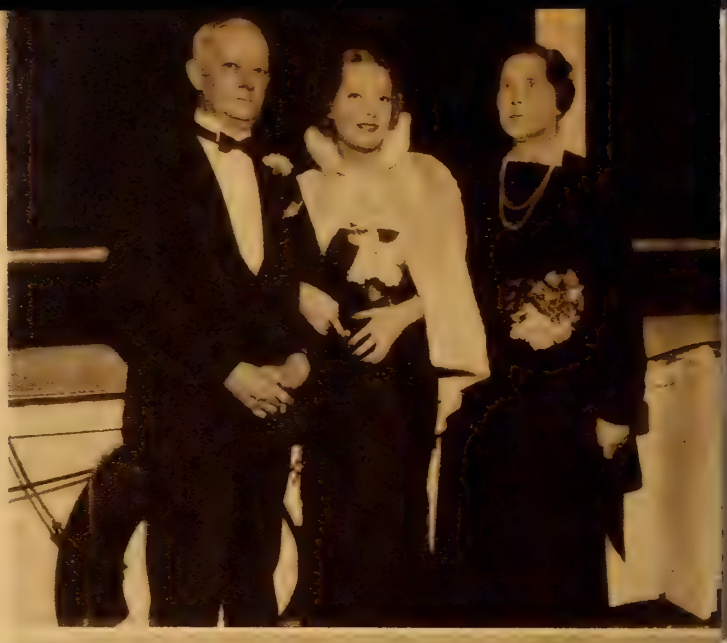
BY ROWENA CURTIS

DEAREST ANNE,

I'm wearing sack cloth and ashes! Not that it's fashionable in London. But I'm wearing it anyhow. For you. On account of, I'm so sorry for not having written you sooner.

But what a whirl I've been in since landing in England. I'm dizzier than usual. But I'll try to stop going around in circles, and start at the beginning, my little one. For I know you want a full confession.

London is a divine place, and I've completely fallen in love with England. (Don't repeat that aloud in Hollywood—it might start rumors of a romance.)



AS YOU may remember, I arrived just at the start of the King's Silver Jubilee. And don't you ever, ever believe the English are staid and unemotional. For two solid weeks the town went mad—people filling the streets night and day, singing and cheering.

I saw the procession, and confess that I hurrah-ed as loudly as any Cockney present. But it was thrilling—brilliant with color; gorgeously uniformed troops of Hussars, Bengal Lancers, Horse Guards and Dragoons; Rajahs in cloth of gold, wearing diamonds as large as turkey eggs; cathedral bells ringing, and millions of voices raised in rejoicing.

However, life isn't all cathedral chimes and national anthems! I've had troubles, too. It's the language. You'd better study English before you come over. I wish I had. You avoid lots of trouble by knowing the language.

Boner Number One I pulled at the Savoy the evening I arrived, at a reception Gaumont-British gave in my honor. I asked for a napkin. In England, napkin means diaper. Serviette is the word, of course, Darling. Yes, I blushed.

Further confusion was caused by the fact that in Merrie Olde England "ladies room" (Continued on page 68)

Likeable Gene, who makes feminine hearts flutter, puzzles over his romantic future. Above, with Ann Sothern, reputedly his current heart throb, in "Hooray for Love." They will be teamed again in "Believe It Beloved."

GENE RAYMOND TELLS WHY HE HASN'T ONE

BY MARTHA KERR

GENE TOLD me I couldn't tell this story. So I'm going to tell you the missing romance chapter in his life. Gene said, "I've never been in love because no girl has ever given me a chance to be."

And as utterly unbelievable as that may sound to you, it's the stomp down truth!

If you've been wondering why (or how) Gene Raymond—twenty-seven, handsome, successful—is still single, here's the answer. And not only is it one of the most amazing stories I ever ran into, but it's a look-in on fame such as I never got before.

IF YOU'VE been wondering why Gene Raymond is still single you haven't been by yourself, either. Over the boudoir ashtrays and strictly hen tea tables of Hollywood's younger femmes his blessed bachelordom has undergone many a conversational dissection. I've been in on some of them. But nobody ever seemed to find the reason.

It's too hard to believe a fellow like Gene couldn't woo and walk off with almost any fair lady who caught his fancy. He's certainly handsome enough. He has shoulders like the Lincoln Memorial, blue eyes with a swift gay grin in them, and a physique that's young and hard from consistent exercise. His hair is by no means the platinum product the camera gives it credit for being—it's plain, bona-fide blonde. A blonde that's entirely loyal to the Guion family tree—for Gene's real name, you know, is Raymond Guion.

He's certainly popular enough to rate all kinds of chances at love, for Gene evermore does the masculine equivalent of "getting around plenty." A beau-by-beau description (Continued on page 76)

IT TOOK CHARLIE FIVE YEARS TO RECOGNIZE AND LOVE HIS SONS

PAPA

THERE comes now from Hollywood a story stranger than the majority of odd tales which originate in that odd city of oddities. And it concerns a man who is concededly one of its strangest and most unconventional inhabitants. It's a story of Charlie Chaplin. A story of the metamorphosis of Charlie Chaplin from a man who, for years, unnaturally ignored—aye, apparently even resented—his two sons, into probably the fondest, kindest, most doting father Hollywood has ever known. So strange is this transmutation of the man Chaplin that even Hollywood, usually blasé beyond belief, stands amazed!

There is today nothing too good for Charlie's two little sons—Sidney Earle, now nine, named after Charlie's beloved brother, and Charles Spencer Chaplin, Junior, ten. There is no kindness too great for Charlie to shower on them. There is no limit to the pride Charlie displays in them—and yet . . .

AND YET, up to less than three years ago, Charlie had refused to see them. After his divorce from Lita Grey, their mother, he ignored them—save for the gesture, at court order, of setting aside a trust fund for them which would forever insure them against want. But of fatherly devotion, of that natural yearning of a father to see his own flesh and blood, of these things there was evident in Chaplin not one iota. And today he's utterly mad about them. Let me tell you about it—from the beginning to today; from the birth of the youngsters to the things Charlie does now to demonstrate his pride in them.

Or maybe it'd be better to begin with "The Little Mouse."

YOU SEE, many years ago Chaplin confessed to a friend that it was his ambition to make his life an unsurpassedly vivid one. And one of the facets of his philosophy was to try to experience, during his lifetime, all of the thrills that fall to the lot of a human. In colloquial words—"try everything once!" That's never been told before—but one of the experiences he wanted was to be a father—to have the sensation that from his own flesh should come and survive a living entity.

When he was married to Mildred Harris he fulfilled that desire. But there was a tragic ending. The story of "The Little Mouse" is an old one—you probably know it. Shortly after Charlie Chaplin's baby was born to the lovely Mildred, it died. It did not even, yet, have a name; the gravestone calls it "The Little Mouse." Charlie was saddened for a mighty long time; he used to sit at the graveside and mourn, mourn, mourn.

And so, when in the middle of 1925, a son was born to Charlie and Lita Grey, who had by now succeeded Mildred Harris as Mrs. Chaplin, naturally all Hollywood thought Charlie would lavish the same mad affection on this newcomer as on that first lost child. Maybe he did. Charlie and Lita were happy then. They were happy, too, when the second youngster came, less than a year later—another boy.

But then came troubles. That's another old story. Everyone who knows anything at all about Hollywood knows that in 1927, after a super-sensational complaint, Lita divorced Charlie, got around $650,000 for having been his wife for a while, got the custody of the two children—each less than two years old at that time.

From that moment, Charlie's love for his two boys seemed to vanish. Maybe it didn't. Maybe in justice one must say that his love for Lita, blackened into something bitter by the things that had been said against him in the divorce case, was so utterly outraged that some of the resentment turned, too, against her children—even though they were his own.

Below, Sidney Earle Chaplin, age 9, and Charles Spencer Chaplin, Jr., 10.

CHAPLIN

BY HARRY LANG

AS THEIR father, naturally, the courts of California held him to accounting for the children's welfare. Because he was rich, it was a handsome accounting. Into the bank went a trust fund of some half million dollars! It guaranteed to each of the youngsters an annual income of $6,000. But beyond that, Charlie did not go—then.

For five years, Charlie did not see his sons. For much of that time they were abroad, being educated in foreign schools. Lita thought that was the thing to do. Too, they had governesses and chauffeurs and a hundred and one things that belong to little boys whom more rugged, self-reliant little boys call "sissies". Wasn't it strange that, a few years later, Charlie should have exploded with that same word?—that he was sick and tired of Lita bringing his sons up as sissies.

Well, at the end of that five years, there happened something that aroused at last, to a fighting pitch, the father-love that had been lying dormant in this Chaplin who didn't even bother to see his sons; to do anything personal for them; to visit them or have them visit him. That thing was the sudden move of Lita Grey to put the two boys in the movies.

For them, as their guardian, she signed a three-year contract with the Fox studio, calling for them to appear in a series of pictures. Of course, it was in the papers, with a grand ballyhoo of press-agentry. And, of course, Charlie saw it.

IT WAS then that there occurred in the heart and the mind and the soul of this father the metamorphosis that has made Hollywood history. Like a tiger, he leaped into the arena—the courts. With almost as much bitterness as Lita had hurled at him in their divorce, he fought her move to put the boys into pictures.

"I want them to grow up to be normal children, without any undue attention and publicity. I want them to enjoy their youth; to romp and play like other children," he told the world. "It is their future happiness I have in mind. I, myself, had to go to work when I was five years old, but—" (and he called the court's attention to that half-million-dollar trust fund he had established for them) "they do not have to!"

There were big lawyers in the case. Charlie's wealth was thrown into the fight. Suddenly, everything he had was none too good for the youngsters whom, for five years, he had seemed to spurn. He suddenly seemed to realize they were his own as much as they were Lita's, and out of that realization perhaps came a flaming parental love, much stronger for having been, for so many years, crushed down, denied, choked.

Well, Charlie won the fight. The court ruled that the written consent of both parents was necessary before the children might be put to work—and the judge in no uncertain terms chastised Lita Grey for having made the effort. And, of course, Chaplin never would and never will sign any authorization for those youngsters to be employed in a movie studio or elsewhere.

And now came another phase of this awakened father-consciousness. Charlie, who for five years hadn't gone about seeing his children, suddenly wanted to see them. He demanded that he be (Continued on page 72)

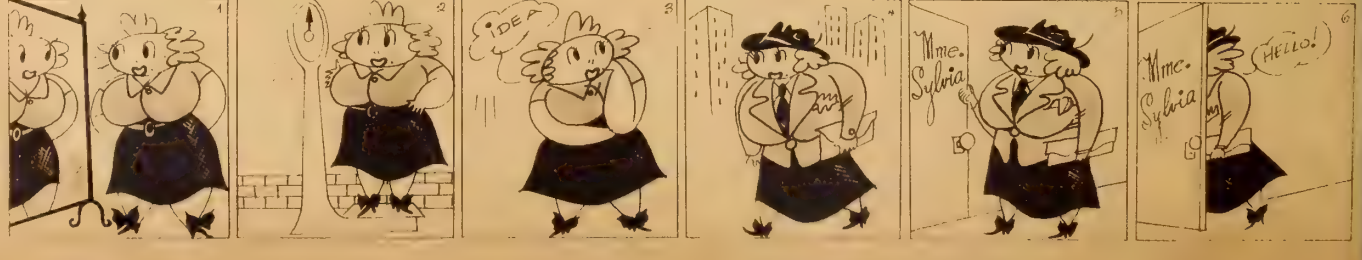
THE WEATHER man says it's Indian summer, but for me, it's winter. I'm snowed in. And just trying to dig my way out from under. I need a shovel to help me through all the letters and photographs that have been dumped in my lap.

But listen, babies, I love it. The only kind of heaviness I don't complain about is the heavy morning mail. The more problems you present to me the better I like it. My mission in life is to help everyone of you to overcome your face and figure faults. And that's from the heart, because I know that every fault can be turned into an attraction. The only thing that can't be corrected is wrong bone structure. But just a minute! I can teach you how to hide it. How's that for you?



It's swell to know that I can help you thousands and thousands of girls to happiness. You can't be completely happy when you're dissatisfied with your looks. And I'm here to tell you how wonderful you can look if you'll do what Sylvia tells you.

LAST MONTH I asked all the gals who look like Jean Harlow to send me their pictures. Well, I don't believe in steam baths but I feel as if I'm in one when I go over these pictures. I never realized there was so many girls who could double for the platinum kid. And believe me little Jeanie had better watch her step. She'd better be a good girl and not cause her studio any trouble or I'll tip her bosses off that the world is full of Harlows in the making.

In next month's article you'll find my selection of the girl who looks most like Harlow. I'll tell her how she can overcome her defects and I'll publish her picture in MODERN SCREEN.

The month after that I will decide on the girls who look like Joan Crawford. There's still time for you Crawford doubles to get your photographs in.

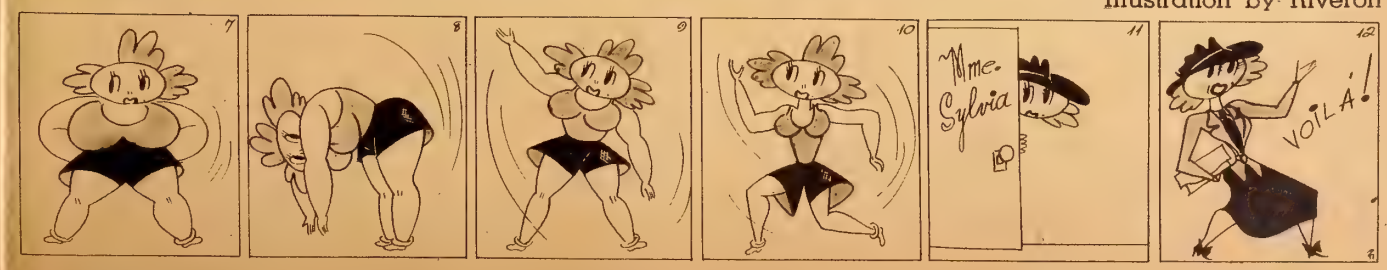
And now for Constance Bennett. Come on you willowy blondes. Remember you don't have to look exactly like her. Connie didn't always look as she does now. Believe me, I know. I gave Connie a course of treatments she shouldn't forget—although sometimes when I see her on the screen I think she has forgotten.

IF YOU bear the faintest resemblance to Dick Bennett's girl send me your photograph. The best one will be published in this magazine and I will send the winner a complete personal course of instructions, telling her exactly how she can remodel herself.



Maybe all this sounds as if I've been too busy answering your letters and looking at your photographs to do anything else. But that's not so. I had to get a few laughs for myself, so I've been reading the newspapers. I've been reading what some of the so-called beauty experts have to say about the "feminine figure divine." And of all the bunk! Some of them tell you to do everything but hang by your teeth from the chandelier if you want beautiful toe nails. And I wouldn't be surprised some morning to read about that.

The little item that got me down was the one about Rosa Ponselle and her bicycle. Rosa is quoted as saying, "If I can work off some poundage and my tests are satisfactory I'm going to make pictures." So what does she do? She rides a bicycle!

I'll admit that bicycle riding, swimming and all such violent exercise may make you weigh less. But I just wonder if La Ponselle ever heard about muscles. When you exercise the wrong way muscles become as over-developed as some movie (Continued on page 88)

LET'S GET GRACE MOORE'S "TEMPERAMENT" STRAIGHT

SHE DOESN'T DENY SHE'S "HARD TO HANDLE" BECAUSE SHE'S MADE A SUCCESS OUT OF IT!

MANY STARS have said, "I am not going to let Hollywood spoil me! I am going to remain myself, no matter what happens."

Hepburn has said it—Claudette Colbert, Garbo, Dietrich, Kay Francis. So far as I know, Grace Moore has never given such an interview; has never said it. Yet Grace is one woman who has refused definitely to let Hollywood make any change in her. She left Hollywood, after her first two pictures partly because she wouldn't sacrifice the temperament which makes her a great singer and a fascinating woman.

When a producer told her, during the making of these original productions, "You're acting like a prima donna," she answered, "But I am a prima donna."

She emphatically refused to become more or less than what she was. She spurned the opportunity to pattern herself to what was then the model for a motion picture actress. As a result, she is not just one more picture star, today. She is a prima donna starring in motion pictures and as such, she is making big money for the box-office.

It is because Grace Moore refused to lose the temperament of a prima donna for the sake of becoming a motion picture actress that we have "One Night of Love" and "Love Me Forever."

For it is true that, if temperament is leashed, you can still act well in the eyes of a clever camera. But you cannot sing well, anywhere, when the fire, the passion, the temper has been processed from you by caution.

Grace Moore has never denied she was "hard to handle" when she made those first two pictures, "A Lady's Morals" and "New Moon." She does not argue about being "difficult" today. Why deny the truth?

How well I remember the stormy impetuosities of that fiery-eyed newcomer. I dropped onto the set of "New Moon" to chat with her. Her eyes were twin balls of a very blue flame. Her lips trembled, her hands clasped and unclasped, indicating nerves pitched to the screeching point. Her words tumbled like water, gushing from an overflowing fountain.

They knew nothing about singing! They knew nothing of song! A woman could not sing a scene she could not feel! She might act it but not sing it! A woman could not sing with the well-oiled mechanism of an automobile engine running in high gear. These pictures! They were not for artists. They were for technicians. They were not for one who understood what would please or not please, in song. What did Hollywood know of pleasing with song? What did Hollywood know of Grace Moore? The picture would be bad. She would be bad. Should pictures ruin Grace Moore, the opera singer, who had appeared before crowned heads in Europe?

She walked from the set. Not once but again and again. She cried. She lost her temper. But the picture went on—with the usual motion picture formula; a formula proven successful for actresses but not for prima donnas!

TAKE THE huge press party thrown in her honor. It was in the imposing and regal home, perched on a high knoll, looking down upon the studio where she was working. This was the only possible house worthy of a prima donna to be found in Culver City. She had a chateau on the Riviera; she had lived in Mary Garden's be-satinned villa, even while she was studying.

They told us Grace Moore appeared at this party she was supposed to be giving. If she did, many of us did not see her. We swam, we listened to orchestra music, we ate of heavy foods and drank of delicate liquids. Rumors flew among us as swiftly and stingingly as mosquitoes. Some said Miss Moore refused to play hostess to a group whom she had not invited personally but had been bid through a publicity department; others said she was tired, too tired to be merry among strangers. Again, we heard this was her day for remaining in bed, drinking milk—a ritual not to be disturbed for any reason. True or not true, we left in various moods but with one concerted idea: it wouldn't take Hollywood long to extract the temperament from this hoighty-toighty lady from New York and Europe.

And that was our mistake. We didn't know then that we were expecting Grace Moore to lose for Hollywood everything she had learned for the sake of her singing.

It was not easy for Grace (Continued on page 70)

BY RUTH BIERY

Grace Moore was told that she would never really sing until she acquired fire to her personality and had run the gamut of emotions. So, she tried the temperamental diva role and found it amazingly successful! Now a star, she's a famous spitfire, too, and she won't change back to the docile little singer from Jellico, Tennessee. Right, a scene from "Love Me Forever" with Leo Carrillo—her second big screen success.

IT ISN'T IN THE

WHAT ISN'T? THE NAME FOR THE NEW GLAMOR.

I HATE to make it tough on all you gals who have just mastered the gentle art of draping yourselves languorously on a divan and looking up through fluttering eyelashes with smoldering eyes—but all that is out! Yes, my dears, there is a new school, a new cult, a new creed in Hollywood. They haven't a word for it yet but the lexicographers, scientists, technicians and Greeks are working on it right this minute. We'll stop the presses, hold the wires and call out the police cars when the word is coined.

In the meantime all I can do is to tell you the story, describe the new sex appeal and tip you off on how to go about getting it.

As a matter of fact, Myrna Loy is responsible. No, no, Genevieve, I don't mean the Myrna Loy who mowed men down and left 'em writhing with one exotic death ray from her slanted eyes.

I'm talking about the new Myrna Loy—that spritely gal of "The Thin Man" and other films, who could take sex or leave it alone (even with a hangover), who was a real pal, could match wisecrack for wisecrack with any male, could look cute with an ice bag on her head and didn't need a single revealing negligée to trap a man.

THAT'S THE new girl. That's the 1935 version of allure, appeal, charm, "it," vamp, flapper, glamor. And if you're going to be popular, if you're going to have all the men ca-razy for you, you've got to master the new technique. If you do, you'll be dancing away with the captain of the football team while the glamor girls are sitting there untangling their eyelashes.

Hollywood sets the fashion not only in clothes and kitchens, figures and bathrooms, but in sex appeal as well. And if you'll listen carefully to my story, you can be your own barometer and one jump ahead of the other girls in your set.

Just glance down the pages of the history of sex appeal—and the gals with that quality knew how to make history—and you'll see that the world's behavior has been dictated by the grease paint folk.

There was Theda Bara. Remember her? Well, your mother does. In fact, probably your mother wound

DICTIONARY. . .

YOU SUGGEST ONE—WE HAVE GIVEN UP her hair around her neck, put on a long, slinky black satin dress and lured your father that way.

Anyhow they called Theda a vamp. And what she did was known as vamping. And it must have been pretty gosh-awful if you ask me. For the very sight of Theda and her ilk coming onto the scene was enough to tip off the innocent gent that trouble was about to brew.

THE WAY to vamp was to slither (and how is your slithering today?) into a room, run your two hands down the side of your body until they reached the hips and then stand there and heave your chest up and down for a count of thirty. After this you dilated your nostrils for twenty counts and then your victim would either fall into your arms or run screaming from the room.

Then the movie mood changed. And before you could say "Bela Lugosi" there was a brand new type of sex appeal as exemplified by Lillian Gish. All the girls exchanged their black satin dresses (those that hadn't been torn to shreds) for dimity. (Who knows what dimity is?) And instead of slithering about they fluttered.

What Lillian Gish had wasn't even known as sex appeal then. It was only after it was discovered that the helpless Lillian could get anything she wanted from men—from new drapes for her dressing room (from the prop boy) to million dollar contracts (from the executives)—that we tumbled. You see, coming so close on the diamond heels of Theda Bara everyone was taken unawares by Lillian and thought she was just appealing to the spiritual in man's nature.

And that, girls, is the secret of being one jump ahead and the reason it's such a good idea. The minute a man catches on that a certain type is out to lure him, it's time to change the type. It throws him off guard and off balance—this change. And he doesn't know the new mode is really the same old sex appeal until he's walking down the church aisle and reluctantly murmuring "I do."

NO, GISH had 'em all confused. She jumped up on one little step and jumped (Continued on page 82)

Vamps, "it" girls and glamor girls are passé . . . there's a new type of sex appeal on the market. You've got to be smart, sophisticated, and chic . . . in the Myrna Loy manner.

Confessions OF AN EXTRA GIRL

A GREAT STAR PROMISES TO HELP HER

Part 3

NOW WE enter the third installment of this exciting true story of a young girl who went to Hollywood for fame but found many obstacles in her way. Her anonymity must be kept because she still is working in pictures.

Discouraged, at first, by scheming and unscrupulous men in cheap "quickie" picture companies, she meets an artist on a bus who asks her to come to his studio to pose for a stocking ad. Fearing further insults, she decides not to go but a lack of funds drives her to it. To decide an argument between the artist and his uncle, who is a famous and eccentric director, she is given the long hoped for screen "test"—only to find it is all just one of the eccentric director's whims and doesn't bring her even a job. However, the artist, realizing that he has done her an injustice, secures a job for her on the Garbo picture, "Romance." Pick up the story here—

AND NOW I actually was at work, whisked from the wardrobe department, to the make-up rooms, to the set. It was all so exciting, so glamorous and I was so eager to make good that I didn't hear what was being said around me. I didn't pay much attention to the other extra girls. And that, I learned to my sorrow, was a mistake.

I was all eyes, awaiting the arrival of Garbo. I had seen her once, you remember, as she whizzed by me going into the studio. Then I had been on the outside looking in. And now I was working, actually on a set.

Clarence Brown was the director. His assistant told us where we were to stand when the scene was filmed. And then we were allowed to sit on benches, waiting.

One of the extra girls—whom I shall call Peg—said to me in a loud voice, "You're new, aren't you?"

I DIDN'T want anyone to know I was new because I was afraid they would think I wasn't capable. So I whispered, "Yes," and turned away so she would not pursue the subject.

That was mistake number two. It seemed as if I always were making mistakes in Hollywood. I didn't have time to realize it was a false move for at that moment Garbo arrived. (Continued on page 73)

CAROLE LOMBARD GIVES YOU HER BEAUTY ROUTINE

BY MARY WATKINS REEVES

I CAUGHT Carole with her hair down the other day! I caught her right in the act of doing what she does to stay glamorous! And, when you witness La Lombard in an episode like that—well, it's just too swell to keep. You have to go around telling people all about it.

These girls—like Carole, I mean—who always look so flawlessly well-groomed. These perfect girls who always manage to carry around such impeccable waves, manicures and make-ups that no matter where they go, or when, they invariably look like Exhibit A. You've seen them—they just never have a suspicion of shiny nose, a hair out of place, a grin out of gear or a wayward eyebrow, even. Well, I don't know what they do to you, but they practically turn me green.

Now, of course, any gal can look glamorous once in a while. If something big is doing at the Club on Saturday night, and you don't mind hibernating in a beauty parlor all afternoon, you usually can rig yourself up to look heavenly for an evening, anyway. But when it comes to staying that way 168 hours a week, no matter how busy you are, that's different. Most girls can't do it. And the blessed few who can, I decided, were hoarding a secret they'd hoarded long enough.

SO I went and picked on Carole, who happens to be the smoothest star I know. And I caught her with her hair down, both figuratively and literally.

"C'mon up," she called, leaning a mop of wet sunny curls over her upstairs banister. "Sorry, I couldn't finish this before you got here, but today's the day for my shampoo and I had to 'tend to it."

She gave her hair a few more vigorous rubs, slipped into a pair of gay crimson pajamas and fluffed her crowning glory over the back of a chaise longue. "Now shoot—what's up?"

"Carole," I said, "for heaven's sake how do you do it? I mean how do you manage to look so darn well-groomed all the time? I never can find a single run-down item about you to harp on—not even one iota of cracked fingernail polish!"

She laughed the Lombard laugh, and wiggled her toes into oyster piqué mules. "Simple, old booby," she answered. "Instead of doing everything to myself on Saturday, for (Continued on page 67)

LOOK FOR SOFT DRAPERY, RICH FABRICS, DEEP

ALL YOU have to do is to write about fashions to have everyone plaguing you about what's going to be smart weeks before a season is well on its way. Since everyone has been asking me the question which I am using for the title of this month's story, I decided to turn the tables on all of you and ask the same question!

If you don't know what you want to buy, or what style trend you can safely start out upon in these early months of fall, let's study what the leading designers in Hollywood, New York and Paris have to say. They have to be fashion seers, looking farther ahead than we even can buy, so with a few of their good hints, we can do our shopping with a pretty practical yet smart chart to go by.

Probably you have heard about the Italian Renaissance trend. Have you? All the designers and stylists are excited about it. Used with discretion it can be charming as well as fun, overdone, it can be as sad a flop as the Empress Eugenie excitement of a few years past. The introduction of style influences derived from the Italian Renaissance, gives you a very elegant sweep to your hats as well as to your costumes.

As you remember, this was the period in Italian history when all art flourished and when painters bedecked their subjects in the richest fabrics, the most elaborate ornamentations and rare jewels. It was a time when rich color was spread across all the canvases. And this is the essence of the Italian Renaissance trend in fashion which both Paris and Hollywood designers are intrigued with at the moment.

In Hollywood, most of the leading designers are showing increasing drapery in their more formal daytime and evening skirts and bodices. They are using jeweled girdles and buckles, rich fabrics and embroidery. Often the fabrics have jeweled, metallic or embroidered motifs for surface elaboration.

IN PARIS, the following details are characteristic of the Renaissance influence — open necklines, either square, yoked or off-the-shoulder. Wide, jeweled girdles, large berets, draped and befeathered hats. Lots of velvet in dresses and wraps. Evening capes that are full and long, swinging from the shoulders and dropping in sweeping circles to the floor. And then there are the Italian Renaissance colors which designers have dubbed by the names of artists and famous Italian families of that period. There's Titian red, Medici purple, Botticelli blue, Cellini green and a wine red named for the famous wine poisoners, the Borgias! Rust and coppery tones, many deep purplish colors and much gold in trimming are all typical of this fashion movement.

Don't be led astray by too much elaboration, however. The basic feeling of the whole fall picture is one of simplicity in line with details making the added gaiety and colorfulness.

You can wear your daytime skirts shorter and fuller, if you wish. For evening you will still cling to the longer line. You can have skirt and bodice drapery, if it becomes you. And, on the other hand, you can turn right around and feel perfectly comfortable in a jersey shirtwaist dress or a trim woolen coat frock. You can stick a feather in your hat, or you can wear the plainest of berets with a sharp jut forward and more fullness to give it a fall flair.

One thing I think you are going to cheer, because I know I do, and that is the return of wrappy lines in coats. Somehow, I never feel quite so snug as I do when I have my winter coat wrapped around me with a warm lap-over, just for that purpose.

Olivia, again, in a trim box jacket suit and brown felt hat with interesting brim line.

YOU'LL LIKE the fuller skirts for daytime. Some have the fullness concentrated at front, this is achieved either with pleats or a godet ripple effect below the belt lines of the skirt. Not only dresses but coats are showing this treatment. There is back fullness, too, particularly stressed in short jackets with flaring backs.

Did you like tunics last fall? Well, they are in again and in many smart guises. The tunic length jacket on fall suits is one of the newest examples of it.

Rather than go on listing fall details and trends which are hard to remember unless you see actual garments illustrating the ideas, I have selected a number of Hollywood costumes which illustrate many of these new points. On pages 48 and 49, you will see some scenes taken from new pictures, each one showing some interesting fashion idea from that particular picture. At the top of these pages are some more fashions that are representative of the clothes the smartest stars are now buying for their fall wardrobes.

"Smart Girl" is the pat title of Gail Patrick's next picture for she wears some stunning clothes designed for her by Travis Banton. One of these costumes is illustrated, the other two worn by Gail being from her personal wardrobe. The gown worn in the picture is an excellent example of the Renaissance trend. It is black dull velvet with a deep square neckline and short pointed train. The entire front is beautifully embroidered in gold thread and the long sleeves also are embroidered. Over this goes a hip-length jacket of gold lamé, reminiscent in design of a page boy's blouse. It is a costume that is simple in line but perfectly balanced by its charming detailing.

For a first fall afternoon and daytime dress, Gail wears black crepe. The bodice shows the new soft fullness that gives a drape feeling to the gown, the softly folded (Continued on page 64)

A striding step on Olivia to let you see the new width and shortness of her fall dress.

MRS. BROOKFIELD VAN RENSSELAER

"For Flavor and Mildness I've never found a cigarette that compares with Camel"

Mrs. Van Rensselaer finds America gayer and more stimulating than Europe. "If I'm tired from the exhilarating American pace," she says, "smoking a Camel gives me a 'lift'—a feeling of renewed energy, and I'm all ready to go on to the next thing." Camels release your latent energy in a safe way.

At home or abroad, Mrs. Brookfield Van Rensselaer smokes Camels. "Once you've enjoyed Camel's full, mild flavor, it is terribly hard to smoke any other cigarette," she says. "I can't bear a strong cigarette—that is why I smoke Camels." Camel spends millions more every year for finer, more expensive tobaccos than you get in any other popular brand. Camels are milder!

AMONG THE MANY DISTINGUISHED WOMEN WHO PREFER CAMEL'S COSTLIER TOBACCOS:

MRS. NICHOLAS BIDDLE, Philadelphia
MISS MARY BYRD, Richmond
MRS. POWELL CABOT, Boston
MRS. THOMAS M. CARNEGIE, JR., New York
MRS. J. GARDNER COOLIDGE, II, Boston
MRS. ERNEST DU PONT, JR., Wilmington
MRS. HENRY FIELD, Chicago
MRS. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL, New York
MRS. POTTER D'ORSAY PALMER, Chicago

Mrs. Van Rensselaer at Palma de Mallorca. She says: "Americans abroad are tremendously loyal to Camels. They never affect my nerves. I can smoke as many Camels as I want and never be nervous or jumpy." Camel's costlier tobaccos do make a difference!

Margaret Sullavan as Valette Bedford in Paramount's "So Red the Rose," based on Stark Young's saga of the South. No wonder gentlemen were chivalrous when ladies looked like this. There were rumors recently about a split between Margaret and her husband, Director William Wyler. But apparently they were very idle rumors indeed, for Margaret and Willie seem completely devoted.

Every Wrinkle you See... STARTED UNDER YOUR SKIN

Miss Ann Keeble, New York: "Pond's not only cleans—It keeps away lines, blackheads."

BUT "DEEP-SKIN" CREAM reaches down— keeps common Skin Faults away

Mrs. Douglas Robinson

grandniece of the late THEODORE ROOSEVELT, and granddaughter of his famous sister, the late MRS. CORINNE ROOSEVELT ROBINSON, says: "Pond's Cold Cream makes my skin look clearer—tired lines disappear."

1 LINES FADE when wasting under tissues are stimulated.

2 BLACKHEADS GO when clogging secretions are removed, and underskin stimulation prevents clogging.

3 BLEMISHES STOP coming when blackheads that cause them are prevented.

4 PORES REDUCE when kept free from pore-enlarging secretions from within the skin.

5 DRY SKIN SOFTENS when penetrating oils sink in, failing oil glands grow active.

6 TISSUES WON'T SAG when underskin fibres are toned up and stimulated.

UGLY LITTLE LINES... dreaded wrinkles ... don't "just happen" overnight! Every wrinkle, every line that streaks your face had its start under your skin. Tiny fibres hidden out of sight, lost their snap—Tissues you can't see went thin and sagging. Then, one day the skin you do see fell into little creases.

The same way with practically all common skin faults. Blemishes, blackheads, sagging tissues—all start deep in your underskin, when tiny glands and blood vessels, nerves and fibres begin to fail.

Skin faults go—new ones can't start

What your skin needs is a cream that does more than cleanse—a "deep-skin" cream that goes right down and fights those lines and blemishes where they start.

This is exactly what Pond's Cold Cream does. Its specially processed oils sink deep into the pores. There, patted briskly, Pond's rouses the underskin. Circulation quickens. Lazy glands get busy. Fibres regain their snap. At the same time, long-lodged dirt and make-up flush out of your pores. Loosened by this deep-reaching cream!

Where Skin Faults begin: Below the dark layer is the underskin where tiny glands, blood vessels nourish your outer skin—if you keep them active!

One creaming shows how Pond's Cold Cream cleans and stimulates. Right after it's wiped off, your skin blooms fresher, livelier—clean—clear to its depths.

As you keep on using it, lines soften—blackheads and blemishes stop coming. Even very dry skin softens into supple texture. Your face takes on a new firmness—a radiant fresh-air look!

Every night, give your skin this double-benefit treatment. Pat Pond's Cold Cream in vigorously. See the deep-lodged dirt come completely out. Feel your skin refreshed, invigorated to its depths.

Every morning... reawaken your skin with Pond's Cold Cream. It leaves your skin so soft and fine that powder goes on with a smooth, allover evenness. Pond's Cold Cream is absolutely pure. Germs cannot live in it.

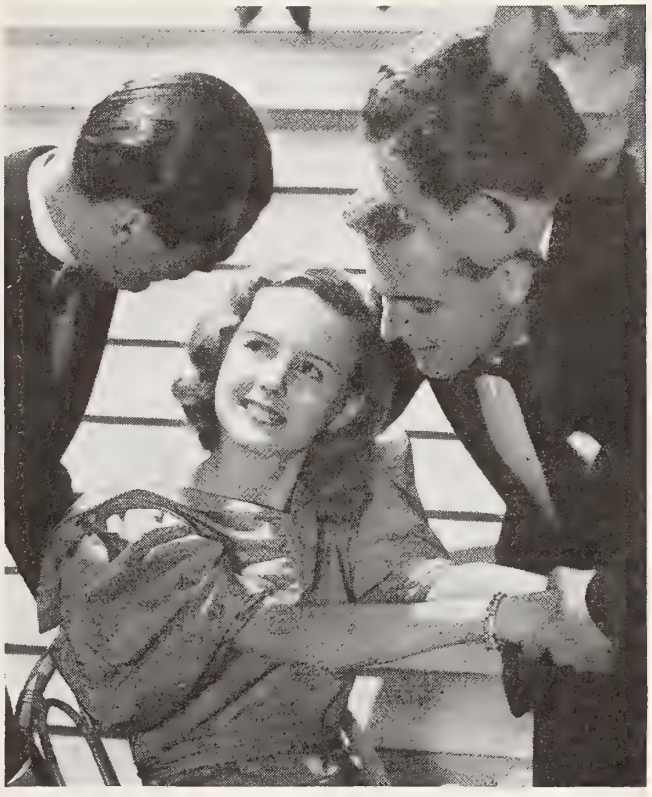
"I'D SOONER DIE THAN GO TO ANOTHER PARTY"



Pimples were "ruining her life"

1 "I had counted so much on my first high school 'prom'! Then my face broke out again. I could have died. My whole evening was a flop. I came home and cried myself to sleep.

2 "Those pimples stayed. Even grew worse. Then, I heard about Fleischmann's Yeast. I began to eat it. Imagine my joy when my pimples began to disappear!

3 "Now my skin is clear and smooth as a baby's. I'm being rushed by all the boys. Mother says I don't get any time to sleep!"

Don't let adolescent pimples spoil YOUR fun——

DON'T let a pimply skin spoil your good times—make you feel unpopular and ashamed. Even bad cases of pimples can be corrected.

Pimples come at adolescence because the important glands developing at this time cause disturbances throughout the body. Many irritating substances get into the blood stream. They irritate the skin, especially wherever there are many oil glands—on the face, on the chest and across the shoulders.

Fleischmann's Yeast clears the skin irritants out of the blood. With the cause removed, the pimples disappear.

Eat Fleischmann's Yeast 3 times a day, before meals, until your skin has become entirely clear.

Many cases of pimples clear up within a week or two. Bad cases sometimes take a month or more. Start now to eat 3 cakes of Fleischmann's Yeast daily!

Eat Fleischmann's Yeast as long as you have any tendency to pimples, for it is only by keeping your blood clear of skin irritants that you can keep pimples away.

And Cary Grant was so amused, he never even set the lad right! It seems that Cary was lunching at the Brown Derby with Marion Marsh when a young man, with a bunch of female tourists in tow, rushed up to his table. "These girls," he announced, "are mad about you! They've come all the way from the middle west to see you. Ladies," he continued enthusiastically, "permit me to introduce you to—George Brent." And Mr. Grant grinned and answered, "Pleased to meetcha."

This is about the tops in strange requests for autographs. When the Comedians vs. Leading Men Charity Baseball Game occurred at Wrigley Field recently, Minna Gombell was besieged for autographs. Minna had just bought a hot dog when one excited woman rushed at her. "If you'll write your name in ink on the hot dog and your husband signs the other half, I'll have my husband split it and frame both halves. He does artistic framing awfully well!" Truly it happened and trulier still, Miss Gombell obliged.

It wouldn't be a movie column if Mae West weren't represented and here's the best we could grab on her for the month. Mae was leaving the District Attorneys' Convention Banquet where she had conferred a Captaincy's honor to one of the bodyguards assigned to her after gangster threats. A spokesman for Miss W. had just announced that unaccustomed as Mae was to night life, she would appreciate being excused to go home to her little bed, etc. And so the Diamond Queen departed in a round of applause. But on the way out she happened to glance in the cocktail lounge where sat twenty handsome attorneys doing a little imbibing. "Well," sez Mae, "this looks interesting!" And b'gosh, it was. In fact, so interesting that the young woman left several hours later; that is, left for the Trocadero where she and her pals had some more fun.

Well, Margaret Sullavan and her director husband, William Wyler, are serene once more. That little tiff has blown over and so again they appear together at previews, benefits, etc. While the separation was on, however, Margaret continued to go places with the occasional escort of Miriam Hopkins and Katharine Hepburn. She didn't refuse to be photographed with him, either. In fact, 'twould seem Miss S. is never averse to a little comment about herself, going on the theory, no doubt, of it doesn't matter what they say as long as they keep talking.

A new angle on "what to do about affairs of the heart" was introduced last month by Lyle Talbot and his girl friend, Peggy Walters. In honor of the anniversary of their first date, Lyle invited a few friends in for cocktails, and the muchly off-again, on-again romance was glowingly toasted. Favors were, appropriately, Cupids mending their broken arrows, and Lyle and Peggy swore on a stack of French rolls to have no further tiffs.

Romance comes to the girl who guards against COSMETIC SKIN

SOFT, smooth skin wins romance —tender moments no woman ever forgets! So what a shame it is when good looks are spoiled by unattractive Cosmetic Skin.

It's so unnecessary for any woman to risk this modern complexion trouble—with its enlarged pores, tiny blemishes, blackheads, perhaps.

Cosmetics Harmless if removed this way

Lux Toilet Soap is made to remove cosmetics thoroughly. Its ACTIVE lather guards against dangerous pore clogging because it cleans so deeply — gently carries away every vestige of hidden dust, dirt, stale cosmetics.

You can use cosmetics all you wish if you remove them this safe, gentle way. Before you put on fresh make-up during the day—ALWAYS before you go to bed at night—use Lux Toilet Soap.

Remember, this is the fine, white soap 9 out of 10 screen stars have used for years. It will protect your skin—give it that smooth, cared-for look that's so appealing.

Use Cosmetics? Yes, indeed! But I always use Lux Toilet Soap to guard against Cosmetic Skin

When is a vacation not a vacation? When Glenda Farrell gets it! Seems Glenda was told by the studio that she could have a couple of weeks at Lake Tahoe. She had no more than unpacked when a wire from Warners requested her immediate return. Miss F. coasted down the mountain into San Francisco, hopped a plane and was back in nothing flat. When she arrived the studio decided to postpone her picture. Last reports from the Farrell abode were that while the roof is still intact, it is still quaking from Irish combustion.

Well, the story goes that when Columbia sent for pretty Joan Bennett recently, it was to talk over a forthcoming role for the actress. "You're not going to play a sweet, little Miss in this one," explained the scenarist. "You're to play a girl, say, sorta like your sister, Constance, is off-screen." Joan took it big and laughed like the dickens! Maybe she knew what the man was driving at!

That personal appearances are a pretty good idea seems to be proved by Gene Raymond's recent experience of face-to-facing it with an audience. Since Gene's return to Hollywood, his fan mail has leaped so that it's hoisted him right into a long term contract with RKO. Pretty tasty—eh, wot? We think so—and well deserved, too.

Having taken out her citizenship papers in our fair countree, Fay Wray departed for London to make a coupla movies over there. The deal suited her right well, too, for hubby, John Monk Saunders, is doing some scripts for a British company. However, their wedding anniversary occurred while he was there and she was here, and Johnny wired a house full of white flowers way across the Atlantic to his utterly charming "little woman."

There doesn't seem to be much justice in the world no matter from what angle you view it, so Alice Brady shouldn't be discouraged! Miss Brady is working on "Metropolitan" with Lawrence Tibbett. She plays an opera singer and t'other day, the Powers That Be offered to get her a double to warble the Gypsy Song from "Carmen." Alice, who has a beautiful voice, decided to try it herself, and so successful was the "play back," that the producers were enthralled and are keeping it in the picture. "Now," laments Alice, "probably nobody'll ever believe I did it!"

Clark Gable's stepson is now old enough to take the high school girls to dances. So, not so long ago, he asked Clark for the use of the family car for the evening. To which Gable assented cheerfully and said, "What's more, I'll drive you and the little lady to the Cocoanut Grove myself." When the pair arrived at the girl's house, she appeared at the curb, took one look at the car and announced to her youthful and perplexed escort, "If you don't mind, I think I'll sit with the chauffeur!"

Poor Jimmy Cagney! He has such big troubles. While he was away on a recent trip, Mrs. Cagney, planning to surprise him, had the entire interior of their house done over in white. Even to the little room at the end of the hall which Jim likes to call his very own. When he returned, he glanced over the whole set-up and moaned, "Oh, gosh, you've even painted that little cubbyhole where I like to sit and mope!"

By the way, 'tis said that Cagney is up for the title role in "Robinhood." That gent, you remember, was an arch crook and it looks as if the Warners are just used to casting Jim in crook pictures!

Speaking of casting—just about every virile-looking gent in Hollywood was Let my death be a warning to all other CORNS, young or old!

"Every corn that ever stabbed a human toe should beware of that arch enemy, Blue-Jay!"— wails this old patriarch, in death-bed testimony

(1) "For 23 years I was the power behind the throne in the Briggs family. Mrs. Briggs had tried in many ways to get rid of me—even tried to murder me with a razor—but this old corn always won out.

(2) Time after time I almost wrecked that family! I made life so miserable for poor Mrs. Briggs that she became cranky and cross—and Mr. Briggs would get mad and leave the house in a huff.

(3) A kindly neighbor woman, Mrs. Allen, was the start of my undoing. One day when she found Mrs. Briggs crying, she whispered to her, "My dear, why don't you get rid of that corn with this Blue-Jay?"

(4) Blue-Jay struck me like lightning! In just a moment I was smothered in soft, felt prison walls. My cries were unheard and my stabbing went unnoticed. My 23 year racket was over, I was a doomed corn.

(5) When Mr. Briggs came home that night, he found a happy wife. They went out and danced just to celebrate! And I was forgotten. Now, 3 days later, my lifeless form will soon be lifted out. My dying words are—Corns, beware of Blue-Jay!"

Corn suffering ended safely and easily with this scientific method

● Only a corn sufferer knows how painful a corn can really be. Yet this suffering is absolutely unnecessary. A visit to any druggist—and the purchase of Blue-Jay (the scientific corn remover) for 25c—will bring blessed and lasting relief.

Blue-Jay stops the pain instantly. The soft, snug fitting pad cushions the corn against painful shoe pressure. The pad is held securely in place by the special Wet-Pruf adhesive strip (waterproof—soft, kid-like finish—does not cling to stocking). In the meantime, without your knowing or feeling it, the safe Blue-Jay medication is gently undermining the corn. After 3 days, you take off the pad and the corn lifts out completely.

If you have a corn—even a tiny one—remove it right away with Blue-Jay. Don't be satisfied with temporary relief. Insist on Blue-Jay.

Much more is expected from women today

These days are good to women. They have independence unheard of a generation ago. And with this new status every woman is expected to have a frank, wholesome outlook, particularly in those matters which affect her intimate feminine life.

Take the question of feminine hygiene. The modern woman has found out that Zonite is the ideal combination of strength and safety needed for this purpose. The day is gone when caustic and poisonous compounds actually were the only antiseptics strong enough. In the past, you could not criticize women for using them. But today every excuse for them is gone.

Zonite is not poisonous, not caustic. Zonite will never harm any woman, never cause damage to sensitive membranes, never leave an area of scar-tissue. This remarkable antiseptic-germicide is as gentle as pure water upon the human tissues. Yet it is far more powerful than any dilution of carbolic acid that may be allowed on the human body.

Zonite originated during the World War. Today it is sold in every town or city in America, even in the smallest villages. Women claim that Zonite is the greatest discovery of modern times. Comes in bottles—at 30c, 60c and $1.00.

Suppositories, too—sealed in glass

There is also a semi-solid form—Zonite Suppositories. These are white and cone-like. Some women prefer them to the liquid while others use both. Box holding a dozen, individually sealed in glass, $1.00. Ask for both Zonite Suppositories and liquid Zonite by name at drug or department stores. There is no substitute.

tested for the role of "Captain Blood." George Brent thought he had it until he read in the paper that Errol Flynn, Lili Damita's brand new husband, was the lucky lad. Poor Jean Muir, who made twelve tests with twelve different men naturally believed hers was to be the leading feminine role, when she scanned the news columns only to learn that Olivia de Haviland would play opposite Flynn. We give up, too. However, there must be an answer!

Not to give anybody a short answer, but, when Freddie Bartholomew was informed recently that he is now a star, the youngster replied, "What's the difference?" Freddie evidently realized that top billing won't get him out of going to school nor rate him an extra frosted chocolate (which he adores) after lunch.

Incidentally, a street lamp interfered with the English boy's view of the Fourth of July fireworks. "Someone please put it out," he requested. "Someone" explained that it belonged to the city and nothing could be done about it. Whereupon, young Mr. B., who had never before seen a Fourth, replied, "Well, I can," and hastily heaved a rock at it. Fred may be a genius, you see, but he's a regular fellow, too—and often a baddie.

Try this on your friends. You may learn sumpin'. David Nivens has. Just say, "Did you make up?" David asked Sally Blane, who grew quite red and replied, "Yes, Loretta's (Young) all right again." He then queried Merle Oberon, who unpremeditatively answered, "No, when I'm through I mean I'm through!" We asked David what was behind it all. To which he blithely answered, "Not a darn thing. It's just a gag, but they all fall for it. They think you know something you don't, and so they tell you something they hadn't orter." Some fun—eh, kid?

Well, that recent Hollywood earthquake literally shook Roger Pryor out of his house. Roger's been dreaming of owning a little chateau ever since he came to town and only two weeks before the Big Shiver, he had bought and moved into a Beverly Hills home way up thar on a hilltop. At considerable risk to life and limb, Mr. P. performed a miraculous paint job on the outside of the building. Well, came the Quake, came down the plaster, came up the roadside mud to bespatter the white paint! Oh, dear, oh, dear. Roger may now be reached at a hotel.

The gossip columns had it all mixed up, much to the chagrin of the three young people—Paula Stone, Gertrude Durkin and Jimmy Ellison. Just because Paula and Jimmy are playing opposite each other, the newshounds have them engaged. Gertrude couldn't understand. Paula, you see, is her friend. Surely Jimmy hadn't changed—after all those things he'd said. Well, they talked it over, only to discover that it's still Gertrude and Jimmy—off the screen.

Kitty Carlisle recently proved that she could "take it"—and also, dole it out. Seems that those mad Marx Brothers love to kid and razz everyone on the set. Nope, there isn't a member of the cast, a prop boy nor an electrician safe from their practical joking. During the making of "A Night at the Opera," they started on Kitty. They played one too many on her and so she decided to retaliate. Miss C. actually hoaxed the three Marxes into hiding all day from a process server who never existed. Since then the brethren have been almost chastened! We said almost.

What, no Romeo? With all the handsome, love-making gents in Hollywood, Irving Thalberg cannot find a Romeo to play opposite Norma Shearer in "Romeo and Juliet." Laugh as you may, everyone with a profile, that is, every male, has been given a test and so far Juliet and the balcony have it their own way. One man's too tall, another's too old, another's too short, and so it goes! What M-G-M is probably looking for is a composite picture of Tom Brown's youth, Johnny Weissmuller's physique, Herbert Marshall's voice and Ronald Colman's face!

Janet Gaynor, star of the Fox lot for ten years, relinquished Dressing Room No. 1 when she departed for Honolulu recently. If you remember, she had previously withdrawn from the cast of "Way Down East" because of illness. There are a lot of speculating meanies around who said that in reality she didn't even have a teentsie-weentsie headache. Anyway, when queried about removing all articles from her d. r., the Gaynor explained that she expected to be gone so long that it didn't seem fair to retain the bungalow. However, Shirley Temple didn't give up her room when she went to Honolulu. Fox officials explain, if you're interested, that Janet Gaynor still has three pictures to make for them.

The little girl actresses are having their day in pictures since the advent and great success of Shirley Temple. Recently, at the preview of "The Little Big Shot," in which she appears, Sybil Jason, aged eight, sat behind us. She was laughing and having a gay, old time viewing herself on the screen. Later she autographed albums just like a Fay Wray or grown-up star.

The next day we spied Jane Withers on the Fox lot. She insisted that we see her new dressing room. It contains a little desk, a small low lounge and all the juvenile comforts. We inquired as to her favorite actor and Jane promptly replied, "Jackie Searle—oh, that Jackie Searle!"

"Yes, we have some bananas; ripe ones, big ones and plenty of them," sings Jean Hersholt. And if you're a pal—and even if you're not—Jean will ask you over to his garden, right plank in the middle of Beverly Hills—highly civilized territory in these parts—and pick you a banana from a huge tree literally loaded down with luscious fruit. The South American touch—eh, wot?

Above, Pat and Eloise O'Brien about to partake of jelly cake and tea. Note pleased expression on our hero. Left, jelly meringue tarts with cocoanut filling—enough to make you grin with joy, too.

BY MARJORIE DEEN

THE MODERN HOSTESS

ARE YOU one of those fortunate mortals who can include among your childhood memories the pleasing picture of your grandmother's jam cupboard and remember the delectable flavor of her jellies—spread thickly on chunks of bread? Have you carried over from your youthful days those same jam-loving characteristics? Well, Pat O'Brien has, and Eloise O'Brien, his very attractive and efficient wife, caters to this particular liking of his in a most original fashion. For, besides seeing that marmalade is served with the breakfast muffins, wild strawberry jam with the Cottage Cheese Salad at luncheon and mint jelly with the roast lamb at dinner, Mrs. O'Brien has devised countless other ways to include jams and jellies in the daily menu. Her jam cupboard would have made grandma jealous, I'm sure, while her ideas for using its sweet contents include several suggestions that grandma never even thought of trying. Nor have you, I'll wager—so I'm going to tell you about them in detail further on.

I had no idea that I would learn about so many delicious dishes when I accepted an invitation to have tea with Eloise. I had just been looking at some new clothes in the little dress shop that Mrs. O'Brien owns and has such fun supervising. Consequently, at that particular moment, clothes, not foods, were uppermost in my thoughts. (You know how it is when you have your heart set on finding a new evening gown in your favorite color—all else is forgotten!)

But when Eloise suggested that I forget frocks for the time being and go along with her, the prospect of tea served beside the O'Brien pool with Eloise herself "pouring" and the added promise that Pat would be home from the studio in time to join us, combined in presenting a most pleasant prospect. In just no time flat I had decided that clothes could wait but tea wouldn't and accepted with alacrity. I'm certainly glad I did, too, for everything conspired to make it a most delightful afternoon and one that was full of helpful suggestions and information for an ever-curious and eager food editor.

The first intimation I had of Pat's liking for jams was when three varieties were served with the small hot tea biscuits, to be followed by a home made jelly roll cut in most generous slices.

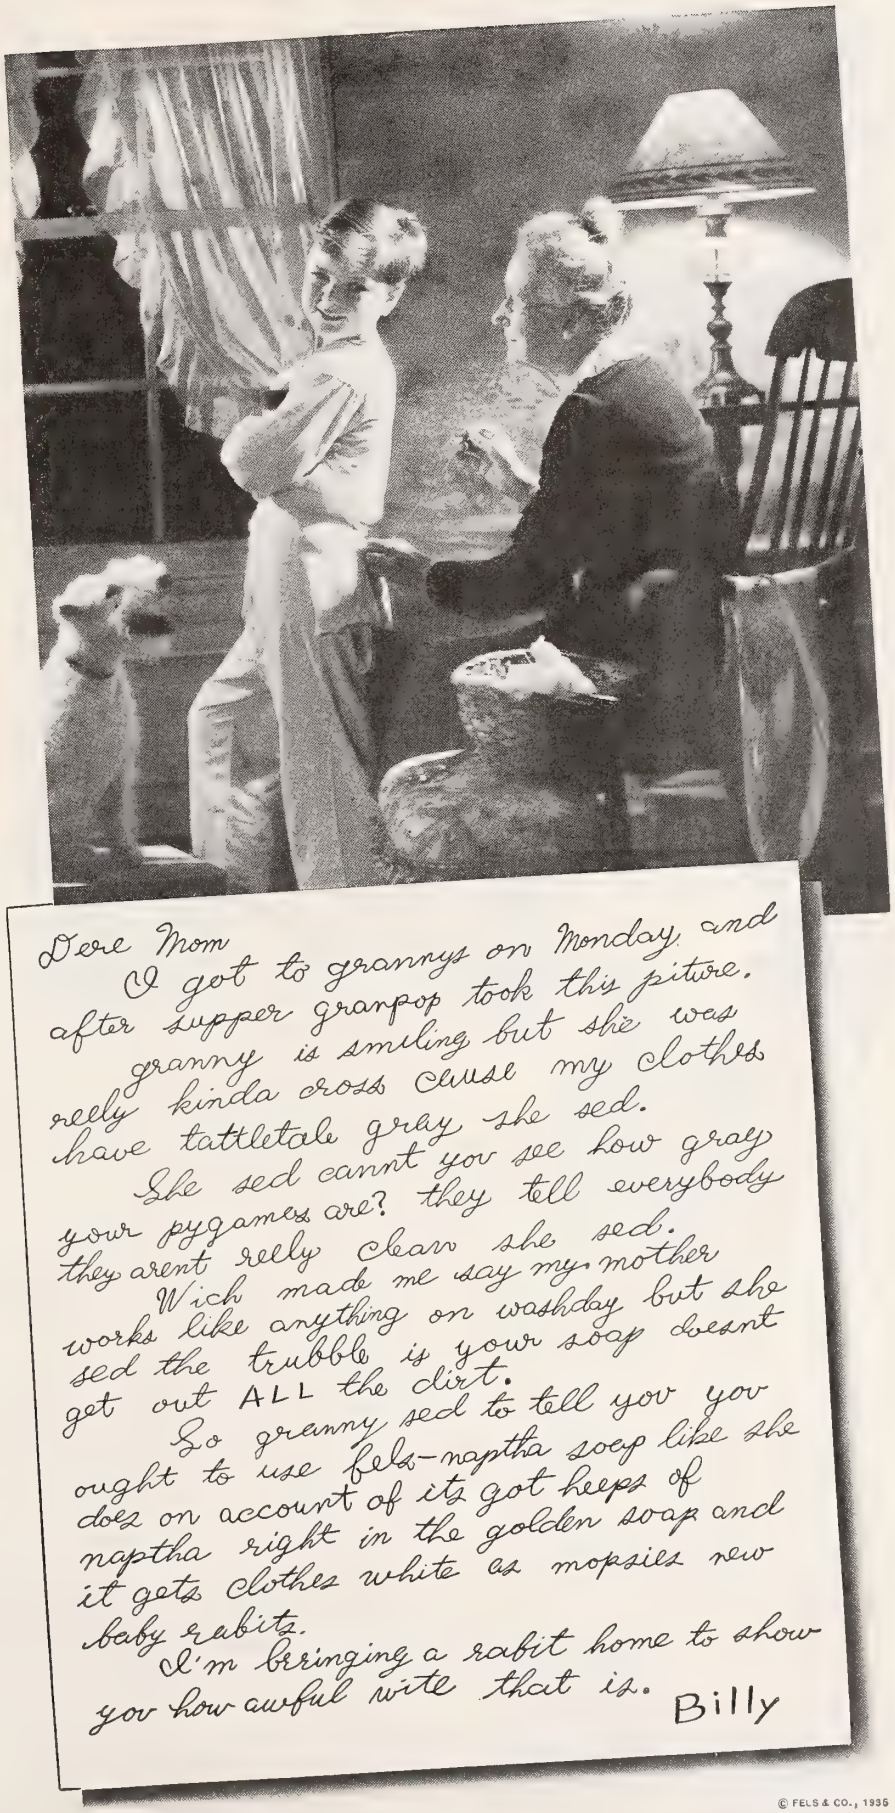
"Do have a second piece of cake," Eloise urged us as she saw with what speed we had disposed of the large servings despite the huge inroads we already had made on the biscuits and jam.

"SINCE Pat goes for jellies and jams in any form," she continued, "this is the one kind of cake he really likes, so I've told our colored cook to have it often. Then I also suggested to her that we ought to work out some other recipes that call for jelly—partly because of Pat's fondness for it and partly because, in an ambitious moment, I had bought enough fruit at a wayside stand to supply preserves for an institution. One look at my cupboard shelves and I realized we were overstocked. Then too, with the grape season coming on, I knew more jars would be added since I'm as fond of grape jelly as Pat is.

"'At every meal,' was my ultimatum to the cook, 'let there be jam!' And there was jam! It masqueraded in pies, it came in sauces, it hid in tarts, it was served with meats. And do you think anyone objected?" she asked, with a gay flourish of the cake knife in our general direction.

"No! no! a thousand times no!" replied Pat enthusiastically.



"You!" Eloise grinned at her famous husband, "you'd never object. But, when the guests added their praise to the family's, the kitchen department became positively inspired. The result was that our supposedly overgenerous supply has diminished to the vanishing point and we're just waiting for the Concord grapes to come in to replenish our depleted stock. You see we want to be able to have several of the dishes we discovered, again and again."

AND so will you when I tell you more about them. But first I want to give you the recipe that the O'Brien cook plans to use in making her grape jelly. This recipe does not stop at giving you only jelly-making directions, either, but also tells you how to make Grape Butter out of the pulp. That's a nice economical idea, isn't it? Well, here's the recipe:

CONCORD GRAPE JELLY AND GRAPE BUTTER

Wash and stem about 5 pounds of fully ripe grapes. Crush grapes thoroughly (a potato masher will do a good job.) Add ½ cup water to crushed grapes, bring to a boil, cover and simmer 5 minutes. Separate juice from pulp by placing hot fruit

HOW ABOUT YOUR FALL CLOTHES?

high neckline is effectively outlined in a double strand of pearls. Notice the wide armhole and cuff bell to the sleeve.

TRAVIS BANTON became so enthusiastic about the costumes which he designed for "The Crusades" that he made a "Crusades" evening gown for Gail's personal use. Inspired by the chain mail costumes of the 12th century, he used a metallic mesh, similar to chain mail, for the blouse top and a narrow, decorative panel down the front of the full black satin skirt. A girdle of the satin is the only other detail in this simple gown.

Orry-Kelly, over at Warners, likes to use metallic cloth in his fall creations. The tunic theme is used to excellent advantage in the dinner costume which he made for Claire Dodd. The tunic, made like a long jacket, is pointed at the front and opens wide down the front to show the chiffon gown beneath. Interesting contrast is effected by the dull gold metal of the tunic, the bright gold kid of the belt, and the soft dullness of the chiffon.

Another Orry-Kelly idea stresses the metal cloth and the tunic theme again in a more formal and elaborate evening ensemble for Claire. A tunic-length coat made with a yoke collared in silver fox and a deep hem border of more fox, tops a simple, beautifully cut gown. The border to the coat's hem dips sharply down to a point at the back. A small collar and a tie belt finish the coat.

Black corded woolen and white corded velvet make the other costume worn by Claire Dodd. The jacket was made collarless so that Claire could wear her own furs with it. The velvet of the blouse also makes turn-back cuffs on the jacket.

Now, down to the bottom of pages 48-49 for some ideas to be gleaned from pictures. From left to right, Joan Bennett and Thelma Todd in "Two for Tonight." Joan wears a simple shirtwaist dress with full sleeves gathered into a tight cuff and a small turnover collar. Thelma's luxurious suit has the smart fur bordering of silver fox which forms a continuous swirl from the collar, down the front and across the fully flared back. The sleeves have the new elbow fullness that is seen in many fall suits, coats and dresses.

Next, Mary Ellis wears a white ermine wrap in "Paris In Spring" which has interesting sleeve detail and a cape collar bordered in silver fox. She also wears a boudoir robe that I thought would intrigue you. It is made of a hairy-like silk that looks not unlike fur. And a huge monogram is appliqued almost in the armhole of the kimono sleeves.

Elissa Landi wears a stunning evening ensemble in "Without Regret." It, too, is lavishly trimmed with the inevitable silver fox. Her gown is topped by a full, hip-length cape that has a great flaring collar and complete border of the fur, much like the flared jacket of Thelma Todd's suit.

They have been busy taking the exotic out of Merle Oberon with the result that you will see her looking very schoolgirl in many of her scenes from "The Dark Angel." A heavy checked tweed suit with jacket, buttoning all the way down the front is very charming. The jacket has a turn-over collar of the tweed but Merle also wears her blouse collar over that. Note the trick bound pockets and the smart way the skirt is flared. And to the right of it is another tweed suit she wears in the same picture. This has a very short jacket and is buttonless, held together by a wide, hand-sewn leather belt.

In the exciting Gaumont-British picture "39 Steps" Madeleine Carroll wears a very attractive ensemble. The three-quarter length jacket is brown caracul with a deep shoulder yoke of the brown woolen of her dress beneath. The coat is made in the youthful, swagger style that is typical of many of the younger fur fashions this season. It has a deep, turn-over collar.

Very Italian Renaissance is the felt cuff brim beret which Jane Baxter wears in "The Clairvoyant." The cuff brim is so adroitly tucked that it flares out as it reaches the crown, jutting into interesting and becoming points.

Look at page 50 for some smart action shots of Olivia De Haviland in her first fall clothes. These were snapped in Hollywood as Olivia burst forth in all her glory on the first cold day.

The new full and shorter skirt is well shown by the fast stride Olivia makes along the street in her beige jersey dress. Isn't it refreshingly young looking? The stripes on her skirt and sleeves are gay Roman colors. The pompon on her small pill-box hat is wool to match the neck drawstring and girdle of her dress.

Down the stairs, Olivia comes in a beige woolen suit with flaring box jacket. A brown sweater beneath and her new felt hat and accessories in brown, too. Note the forward tilt to her brim; there's a jut to practically all the best brims this fall.

And for a good, useful yet smart fur coat, nothing could be as perfect as her gray kidskin.

Any questions you may have about fall trends, colors, accessories or new ideas that I haven't covered, write and tell me all about it and I shall be more than happy to help you out. Just send a stamped, self-addressed envelope to Adelia Bird, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, N. Y. C.

A YOUNG MAN ON HIS WAY

which young Robert is now heir, were phases of life read about in garish Sunday supplements, but only half believed.

High school over Robert came West to Pomona College with the idea of transferring to Yale after his senior year. Later at Yale to take up the study of physchiatry. He thought, then, to hang up his shingle in New York and to devote his life to unravelling the tangled skeins of the lives of men and women who had gone awry.

But, in the mid-term of his senior year at Pomona, came Destiny. In the person of genial casting director Ben Piazza, then with M-G-M, now with Paramount. Ben was there to watch the college play "Journey's End" in which Robert played the part of "Captain Stanhope." Ben cast his trained eye on young Robert, and saw a star-in-the-making. He summoned the startled young man to the studio, gave him an audition and a test, both bad, and sent him back to college.

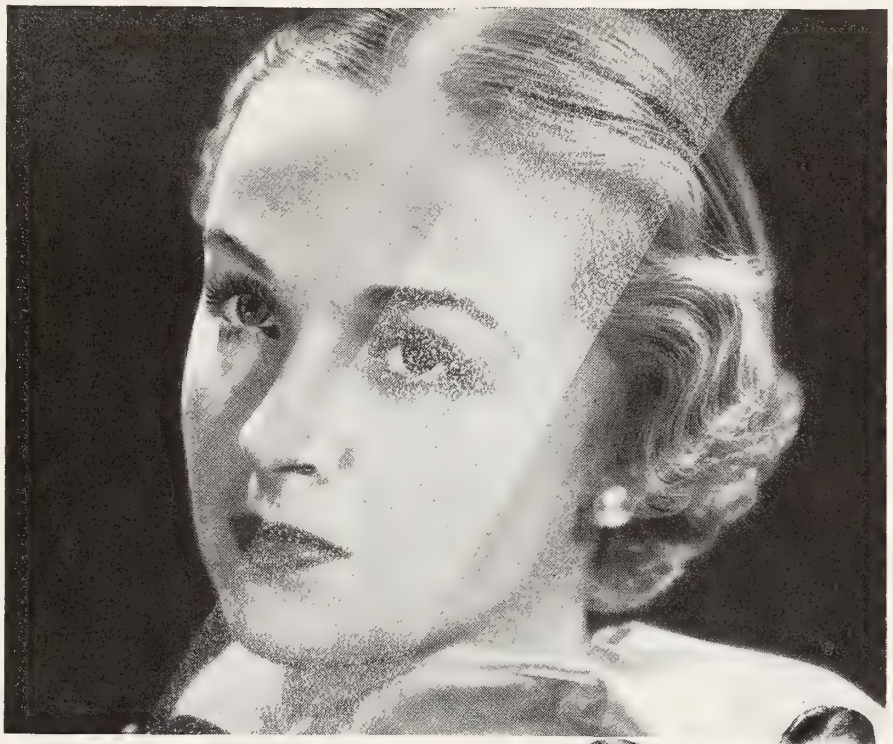
But Ben was not convinced by that audition. Later, he called for Robert again, there was another audition, another test and—Robert was signed to a long-term M-G-M contract forthwith. He returned to Pomona to get his diploma, then packed his bags and returned to Hollywood and to the studio where he joined the M-G-M school under the direction of Oliver Hinsdale. He played a couple of bit parts in big productions, played leading parts in a couple of Mr. Hinsdale's little theatre plays and then "Society Doctor" with result that the studio, the fans, the critics, all said, "a star in the making!" M-G-M believed in him. They consider him their brightest bet, their biggest find since Clark Gable, just as in the feminine ranks, they consider Rosalind Russell their biggest find since Myrna Loy.



Studio and fans appear to be in perfect accord on the starry subject of Robert. For in no time at all he had to engage a secretary to take care of the fan mail that came pouring in, hundreds of letters from hundreds of girls—all wanting to know where he had been all their lives, what he was like, who was his ideal type of girl, whether he is in love, what kind of toothpaste he uses, and why . . .

I SAID to Robert—girls, he has dark brown hair with red lights in it and eyes of a brilliant sapphire blue, black lashes and a golden sun-tan and he is younger looking than he appears to be on the screen— "Tell me about your first year, in detail. What has it done to you, or for you? Has it changed you and if so, how?"

"Yes, it has changed me," Robert said, in his grave and considering way, "for the better, I hope. I am older than I was, more than a year older. It has stabilized me. I am a great deal more serious than I was. I am considerably more practical. I feel a far greater sense of responsibility toward myself and toward life than I ever did before.

"I am in love and have been for some

Miss Maralyn Tankersley's fair skin is enlivened by Pond's Rose Cream. (below) Mrs. M. Bon de Sousa, creamy blonde, uses Brunette.

Science finds true cause of many "dead-looking" complexions

Over 200 girls' skin color-analyzed to find the hidden tints in lovely skin now blended invisibly in Pond's new Face Powder.

LOOK at this girl. Decidedly blonde, with glorious fair skin—Yet her skin seemed "dead-looking"—like the chalk-marked streak above. Her powder had taken the liveliness out of her skin!

The Color Analyst wiped it off—"Here's the color for you," he said, and applied Pond's Rose Cream. Amazing, the change! Pond's hidden color notes brightened her whole face. Brought out her true blondeness. Gone—that dull, pasty look!

BLONDE OR BRUNETTE, Pond's Face Powder can work the same color miracle in your skin.

With an optical machine, Pond's analyzed the skin of over 200 girls. They discovered the hidden tints that give different skins their beauty. In blondes, a hint of bright blue gives that transparent look. In brunettes, a touch of green brings out that creamy enchantment.

Now, Pond's has blended these tints into entirely new shades—invisibly. Yet you see the difference at once! These shades add beauty's own color notes to your skin. They tone up pallid skin—tone down ruddiness—give each skin what it lacks.

Don't stick to old-style deadening shades. Try these new Pond's shades. Find the one which will bring out your unusualness!

Rose Cream—gives a blonde radiance
Natural—lighter, a delicate flesh tint
Brunette—gives clear, velvety tone
Rose Brunette—warms pale, faded skins time, with one girl. Whereas, before I entered the studio, I was in love constantly, or rather *in*constantly, with first one girl and then another.

"I'll take the external things first. The things which may not matter. I've taken an apartment for my mother and myself. Dad died just before I signed my contract. For so tragic an event it had its fortunate aspect—the contract. I needed it, then. There was enough left from the estate to take care of mother, but there would not have been enough for me. I would have had to forego studying at Yale, for a time anyhow. I would have had to earn my own living somehow and I know that I could never have made the money I am making now in any other line of work that might have been open to me. Not that I'm in the 'big money,' heaven knows—but it's bigger than it would have been for me anywhere else for many years.

And so, I have more money than I've ever had before. It might be supposed that this would give me a lavish, spendthrift feeling, coming as quickly and as easily as it did. On the contrary, I am more careful, more conservative with money than I ever was when Dad was sending me an allowance. I'm beginning to build for a future. I'm learning the value of money.

The apartment I've taken for mother and me is more luxurious than I could ever have hoped for, during many hard-working years. I have servants, a luxury which never even entered my calculations when, in college, I used to envision my immediate future. I have more clothes than I have ever owned at any one time before. I have a yen for sweaters and have collected about fifty of them. I drive a better car than I've ever driven.

I'VE been asked whether Hollywood has made me conceited—whether the publicity, the recognition in public, have given me the well-known swelled head. I can honestly say NO. For the first few weeks I must admit, I did think more of myself, of the way I looked, than I ever had before. Certainly, young men in college do not go about considering the angle of their profiles, the set of their heads, which way they appear to the best advantage. If they do, they keep quiet about it, or else—! But I, when I started to work, was camera-conscious. I've got over that now. I've forgotten the camera. I think no more of my looks now than I did before I ever saw a studio. If I think more of myself it is not, honestly, from motives of personal vanity. It is much the way I would feel about a machine which must have good care in order to function properly and so fulfill its purpose.

"Yes, I can really say truthfully that this first year has tended to make me more serious, more conservative, if possible, than I was before I came to Hollywood. Just because so many gay and glittering ways are now open to me, I don't want to take them. I never go to parties. I seldom, if ever, go to night clubs, to the Grove, to any of the places where the cinema clan foregather.

"I've never saved any money before. I'd never thought about saving. Now I do. I've started a couple of annuities. I ponder investments. I read financial sheets. I spend far less than I could spend because I realize how unstable this place and this life and this career can be.

"Because I know how haywire young beginners can go; and have gone, I do none of the things that might lead to—well, haywiring!

"I am in love . . ." Robert hesitated a moment, his brilliant blue eyes soft . . . "with Irene Hervey," he said. "Even in love I'm more stable than I ever was before. I've seen enough of emotional instability to frighten me and make me appreciate being with one girl, going everywhere, sharing everything—my plans and hopes and dreams—with her. Both of us behave a good deal more like a small-town girl and boy than like members of the movie colony with all of the available excitements. Every night, after work, we have dinner together. Sometimes with mother at our apartment, sometimes in some quiet restaurant off the beaten track. If we are at my place, we listen to the radio after dinner, or take a walk, read aloud or play cards or something like that. If we have dined out, we almost always go to a movie. Both of us are rabid fans, neither of us can quite believe that we are inside a studio ourselves. I've often been asked what star, or stars, I would like to be like later on. I don't want, of course, to copy anyone. But I should say that the work of Bob Montgomery and Fredric March, respectively, is the type of thing I'd like to do.

I NEVER thought of marriage until I came to Hollywood. That is, I never thought about it save as some very remote possibility. Now I think of it far more deeply and immediately. I don't mean by this that I intend to marry now. I think it would be sensible not to marry for five years. But I do think seriously of marriage, of home, of raising a family.

"My tastes haven't changed—hardly at all. I still play the piano. I still continue with my study of psychology. I collected a large library of scientific books, on the subject while I was still in college and I read them more assiduously than ever. With two objectives—if I should go out of pictures like the well-known light I can still take my diploma under my arm, go to Yale and pursue the study I intended to pursue. If I succeed in pictures, as I hope I shall, I'll need psychology to interpret the parts I am to play.

"I go to the theater once or twice every week. And someday I'd like to join a stock company on the road and play Captain Stanhope in 'Journey's End.'"

I SAID, "Before I came over here to talk with you, two young and admiring girls asked me to ask you to describe your 'ideal girl.' . . ."

Robert looked thoughtful. He said, "I'll have to take a character on the screen, so that the 'ideal' will have been seen by them. I know—'Hester'—the part Josephine Hutchinson played in 'Oil For The Lamps of China'—she's my ideal girl. I like a quiet girl, a domestic girl, a companionable girl. I do not like the grand kind of, look-down-your-nose type of girl. I like a feminine girl. A gentle, conservative girl."

Robert laughed, very handsome in his striped sweater and white flannels and beach tan. He said, "I'm afraid I'm not very exciting copy. Better material to write about if I'd gone awfully Hollywood, chased about a lot, hit the bright-light trail. Instead, my first year has made a mature man of me. I stay at home. I go steadily with one girl. I save my money. I get more sleep and exercise than I ever did in my life before. An actor, I'm more of a business man than I would have been in a bank. I suppose it's because I know what competition I'm up against. It's also because I figure myself as a one-man corporation, I know that I sink or swim alone.

"And so—instead of gaiety, girls and glitter, my first year has given me a savings bank complex, a real yearning for marriage and stability and the things I grew up to revere when I was a boy.

SHE KEEPS BEAUTIFUL BY SCHEDULE

instance, and then looking good and awful by Tuesday, I stagger the stuff. I have a special day for attending to each item of my appearance, a sort of weekly grooming schedule I made up. And as long as I stay on schedule I can't look run-down anywhere."

So that was it! So Carole's glamor isn't all God-given gilt hair and wide blue eyes—it's partly sensible system! I let her go on.

"'Course the schedule idea sounds simple; learning to keep myself on it was the hard thing. But it's the only way I've ever found of maintaining, as you were nice enough to say, a really flawless appearance. Each day's routine takes a few minutes. If I'm too rushed to spare those minutes, and sticking to schedule anyway must mean coming home a jerk sooner at night now and then, or occasionally getting up a little earlier than usual, it's still more than worth it to me.

"Want me to tell you what I do?"

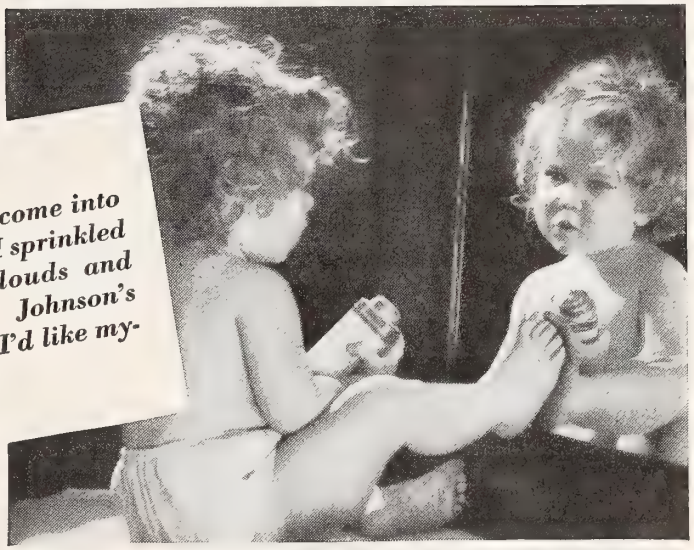
WANT me to tell you? It's the swellest idea for keeping meticulously lovely, despite a hectic existence, I ever heard of—this weekly beauty schedule of Carole's. She began her account of it with Friday because, she says, week-ends are usually the times she wants to look best of all.

FRIDAY. Manicure and pedicure. (Approximate time: 30 minutes)

"I do my pedicure first so that when I apply polish remover to my toes it can't bungle what's been done to my fingers. After I finish both, I rub softening cream or lotion on my hands and feet and allow it to remain overnight. My pedicure will last a week, my manicure till Tuesday."

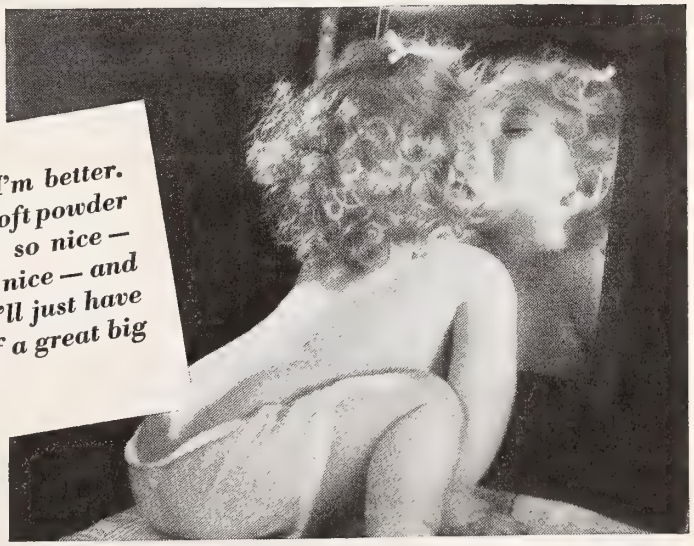
SATURDAY. Eyes. (Approximate time: 15 to 30 minutes)

"I think every girl ought to spend a few minutes one day a week giving her eyes a merciless scrutiny. I do. If I see circles I determine to catch up on my sleep. If the skin around my eyes looks less cushiony than it should I give myself an extra-luxurious eyebath, apply tissue cream over the surrounding area—well above my brows and down over my cheek bones—and make noble resolutions against careless wind and sunburn. I set aside this time to try out new mascaras, and different eye make-ups. It's also the day for my weekly eyebrow arch."



SUNDAY. Skin. (Approximate time: 1 hour)

"On Sundays my schedule really gets attention. First of all, I stay on a fruit juice diet all day; I've found it a grand pick-me-up and cleanser for my skin and body as well. Next I give myself a good old home-made facial—plain oatmeal paste if my complexion needs smoothing, or an egg-white mask if I need a very mild bleach. ('Course you know I do these things for myself; I don't have a personal maid except the one I keep at the studio when I'm working.)



"Then comes my weekly rest-bath. Then my bath's not a shower but a long luscious session of soaking. I love it and look forward to it like a kid. If I feel that I

"Poor me, I do feel sorry for myself this morning. What a night, what a night! But how can a girl get her beauty sleep when her skin's all over prickles and chafes?"

"Lookit what's come into our life! Bet if I sprinkled myself with clouds and clouds of this Johnson's Baby Powder I'd like myself again."

"Mmm — now I'm better. That smoothy-soft powder makes me feel so nice — and smell so nice — and look so nice. I'll just have to give myself a great big kiss. There!"

"I'm Johnson's Baby Powder... count on me to keep babies fine and fit! Just feel my satiny-smoothness between your thumb and finger... I'm made of finest Italian talc. No gritty particles in me... and no orris root, either. Try me—and don't forget my partners, Johnson's Baby Soap and Johnson's Baby Cream."

Science finds DRY yeast far more abundant source of tonic element that stimulates intestinal action—and it's easier to eat

FOR YEARS doctors have recommended yeast for combating constipation without harsh drugs.

Now science finds that this tonic food is far richer in Vitamin B content if eaten dry!

Tests by impartial scientists reveal that from dry yeast the body receives almost twice as much of the precious element that tones and strengthens the intestinal tract!

Experiments indicate that the digestive juices can more easily break down dry yeast cells and extract their rich stores of vitamin B.

No wonder thousands have found Yeast Foam Tablets so helpful in correcting constipation. These tablets bring you the kind of yeast science has found richest as a source of Vitamin B.

At a leading clinic, 83½ of the patients with constipation, who were given Yeast Foam Tablets, reported improvement within two weeks! Before starting to eat this dry yeast, some of the patients had used laxatives almost continuously!

Let Yeast Foam Tablets restore your eliminative system to healthy function. Then you will no longer need to take harsh laxatives. You will have more energy. Headaches should no longer trouble you. Your skin will be clearer and fresher.

need to relax, I use hot water with soda in it. If I want my bath to pep me I run a lukewarm tub and dissolve a whole box of table salt in it. And then I just lie there and dream (while my facial's drying at the same time) for an hour or more. I dream about what I'm going to wear during the coming week. I plan parties and new coiffures—I even mentally design dresses for myself and change the living-room furniture around while I'm soaking! I couldn't do without my rest-bath. Frequently it's the one occasion during the whole week when I really have time to think beauty. And thinking beauty does things for me."

MONDAY. Odds 'n' Ends Day. (Approximate time: any minutes Carole can spare.)

"Monday's the day I take time out to attend to the little things about my appearance that I'm apt to overlook when I'm rushed—whether my elbows or heels have gotten slightly scrubby from exercise, whether my eyebrows need a bit of cleaning up, whether my ardent sun-tanning has freckled the tips of my shoulders, and so on. If I spend a few minutes looking for tiny flaws I can find them and fix them. The little things are important enough, in my estimation, to deserve a day's schedule of their own."

TUESDAY. Wardrobe. (Approximate time: 30 minutes.)

"First of all, it's time now for a new manicure. But in addition, every Tuesday, I quickly go through my entire wardrobe and see that everything that needs 'fixing' gets it. I sort my shoes for running-down heels, I send my soiled dresses to the cleaner (they'll be back in time for week-end wear), I brush my furs and put out the clothes and lingerie that need minor repairs—all those things. I can do it in a jiffy, and it keeps everything I own ready to put on at any time."

WEDNESDAY. Day Off.

THURSDAY. Hair.

"I always shampoo my hair myself," Carole told me, "because I like to give it a good stiff massage and a thorough sunning. Then I have it set by a hairdresser. I picked Thursday because I think hair looks its best two or three days after it's been done. It doesn't fly all over the place then and the wave's have time to shake out enough to look casual and not 'just-waved.' That makes my coiffure right for the week-end.

"Today, you see," she pulled the hood of her pajamas over her damp dandelion-colored curls, "is my regular shampoo day. And I couldn't even let an interview interfere with it because I'm going to Santa Anita Saturday!"

Sitting there looking at her, after that exposé of her pet beauty secret, I knew Carole would go to Santa Anita looking like the well-groomed, glamorous star she always is.

And I knew, too, that no girl with a scrap of will-power need ever display Scottie-pup eyebrows, a droopy dress hem or tweed checks. If her coiffure looks for all the world like a wilted skunk-cabbage it's probably because she spent yesterday afternoon seeing Clark Gable's latest, instead of her hairdresser. If her vanity lands right in the soup when he notices a cracked manicure holding her spoon, she hasn't got a legitimate kick coming.

For every girl can be as bafflingly sleek as Carole. We talked about it and she made some grand suggestions.

You see, you don't have to use Carole's actual routine—just use her idea and custom-build your own schedule to suit your particular needs. Make it as brief or lengthy a routine as you want to. Throw in an extra manicure if your nail polish gets hard wear. Omit the facial if your skin's already the bona-fide peaches-and-cream product. Include your daily reducing exercises if you have any. Plan your swimming dates for the last day before your fresh fingerwave. Take your "day off" whenever you like. But, whatever you plan, you've got to stick to it to get glamorous results.

"That," said Carole, "is the hitch!"

If it's a question of glamor, though, it's worth it. And if it's a question of glamor, Carole should know!

A LETTER FROM HELEN VINSON

is a room for writing, or a waiting room. You ask the way to the cloak room, over here. I learned, too, never to speak of a clothes closet. There ain't no such thing. Closet means lavatory in English. You hang your duds in a wardrobe, Pal.

I got all befuddled shopping for shoes the other day, too. First I wanted a pair of oxfords. Oxford is an institution of higher learning, to an Englishman. The word has nothing to do with footwear. You ask for "lace shoes." Also, only the men wear pumps. The female pump is known as a "court shoe." You can imagine the polite snicker when your little friend asked for a pair of oxfords and something in a snakeskin pump.

The only other time I got laughed-outloud at was when I requested cheese and crackers. At this time of year a "cracker" means a fire cracker. At Christmas time it can mean a kind of bonbon. When you want something to munch with your English cheddar ask for a biscuit.

Well, so much for your English lesson. Whoaaaaa—wait a minute. If you meet that fellow that told me Italian lessons would rid me of my Southern accent, tell him I said, "Philberts!" Remember how I sat up nights over that Italian handbook? And it didn't help a bit. The people over here think I speak "funny American." Then I have to explain all about how I come from Texas. My theme song is "Pahdon my South'n Accent"—even if it is old. The theme song, I mean.

Now I'll give you the low-down on the dizzy social whirl.

I HAD four days off from picture making last week, and went down to the Duke of Sutherland's country estate, "Sutton Place," near Guildford, Surrey.

Annie, if ever a place filled me with envy and longing, Sutton Place did! It stands in about two thousand acres of beautiful country, with picture book gardens, greenhouses, a pheasantry, and all the trimmings. The house was built in 1525 by Sir Thomas Weston, cousin—or something—of Anne Boleyn's. Henry the Eighth visited there often. (Not Charles Laughton, my sweet Dope, but the Old Boy himself.) In fact, there's a picture of Henry, painted by Holbein. And the most gorgeous paintings by Romney, Lawrence, Titian, and dozens of others you don't expect to see outside of museums.

But no, I didn't spend my four days among the art treasures. Not this trip! For the estate has marvelous tennis courts, squash courts, speed boats to race on the River Wey, a swimming pool, and a beautiful golf course. Lady, I was glad I specialized in athletics, and not dramatics, at the University. Throwing your voice would get you nowhere at the Duke of Sutherland's. But knowing how to swing a tennis racquet was a help.

I forgot to tell you that on the King's Birthday I saw the Trooping of the Colours. I was given two tickets for the special enclosure with the understanding that I was to be escorted by a man in correct morning formals—top hat, morning coat. I wished to go with one of my fellow countrymen, being as patriotic as I am charitable. So, it became a race among my American friends, as to which one could beg or borrow the proper attire.

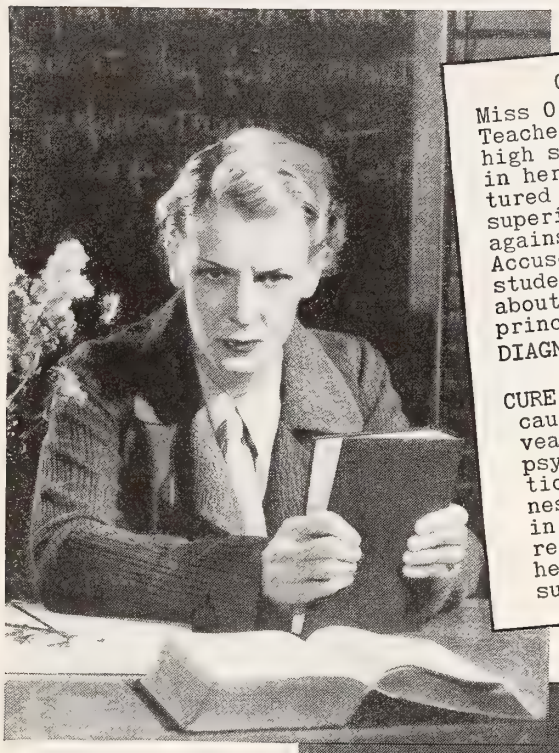
Austin Parker, the clever one, was winner. He rented an outfit. Arrived in all his glory, and hysterics. With my two tickets clutched in hand, and Austin, looking terribly funny, by my side, we started out. Our laughter was suddenly chilled by the somber thought that Austin, provincial American that he is, had forgotten to carry an umbrella. Positively indecent! We finally managed to borrow one from a waiter at the Claridge. That, we agreed, was the crowning touch.

Big thrill of the month, however, was flying to Brussels to see the tennis matches. Fred Perry played a beautiful game. And, of course, his winning made it a perfect trip.

So far this letter must convince you that life in London is all play and no work. But you're wrong. True, they don't work as hard or as frantically fast here as they do in Hollywood. But "King of the Damned" went right along, on schedule. It was fun, being the only woman in the cast, even if the males were mostly convicts dripping with grease (movie sweat). And Conrad Veidt is marvelous to work with.

Of course you know how I've felt about being typed in Hollywood, always playing the selfish wife or the snippy society girl. I've never blamed Hollywood. It was my own fault when I insisted back in '32, on being cast as the spoilt heiress in Connie Bennett's "Two Against the World." Just as the lead in "Death Takes a Holiday," more or less established me as a dramatic ingenue on the stage, so the snippy part in the Bennett film typed me in pictures. But anyhow, it's nice to play a role again and know that the audience will want you to get your man.

We're working hard now on the second film, "Transatlantic Tunnel." Madge Evans and Richard Dix came over to play in it, you know, and they are a pair of darlings to work with. The three of us manage to sandwich a lot of fun in between the work on the set. Let me add too, that Gaumont-British has been marvelous to us Yankees.



All in all, it's very exciting. I get a little homesick now and then. Felt it coming on the other night, so I phoned New York to have a chat with Dad. He said the Scottie was yipping around the place, and I insisted on saying "hello" to Jock. The line was so clear, Jock actually recognized my voice. The precious pup went practically insane with joy. I'll bet there haven't been that many barks wafted over the Atlantic since phones were invented! I can just hear you make some crack about the line going to the bow-wows. Don't do it. Puns are so vulgar.

It's time for me to get to the studios. So, Cheerio, my dear, for this time. Be a good girl, and I'll bring you a crumpet.

Love,
Helen.

Case No. 296
Miss O.H.F. Age 29. Teacher of English in high school. Successful in her work — but tortured by belief that her superiors discriminated against her maliciously. Accused her favorite student of telling lies about her to the school principal.
DIAGNOSIS: Paranoid suspicions.
CURE: Complete — when cause of fear was revealed in the course of psychiatric consultations. Her mental illness had its beginning in childhood, when quarrelling parents made her feel insecure, unsure of affection.

Case No. 432
Mrs. T.O.V. Age 31. Frequently embarrassed husband by telephoning guests and withdrawing invitations. Offended her husband's employer by her inattention and preoccupation with secret worries during a dinner given in her honor.
DIAGNOSIS: "Accident panic" — the fear that the sanitary napkin she wore did not afford complete safety and protection.
CURE: Complete — when the cause of her fear was discovered and the fear ended by introducing to her a sanitary napkin ("Certain-Safe" Modess) that was designed in a way to make "accidents" impossible.

N-O-V-O...the new douche powder. Cleansing—deodorizing . . . for the fastidious woman.

Even if "accident panic" has never haunted you . . . protect yourself against the possibility of an accident ever happening. Get a box of the new Modess today. Its name—"Certain-Safe"—tells the story . . . and you can look at the napkin and see why it's accident-proof:

1. Extra-long tabs provide firmer pinning bases . . . Modess can't pull loose from the pins.
2. Specially-treated material covers back and sides of pad . . . Modess can't strike through.

The day you buy Modess is the day you end "accident panic" forever!

LET'S GET GRACE MOORE'S TEMPERAMENT STRAIGHT

to leave Hollywood when she had completed two pretty bad pictures. When a world-renowned artist is hailed as a failure in motion pictures, it means public humiliation in capital letters. Every corner of the world knows about it. Remember the dozens upon dozens of stories you read about the failure of Grace Moore in pictures?

Grace did not need to leave. She had a contract. She could make more pictures; undoubtedly some good ones. Musical comedies—light singing affairs which would make of her an above-average, singing motion-picture actress. She could stop being a prima donna.

SHE stormed off to Europe! She made her choice in a high-headed manner. She chose not to lose what she had fought to learn—not even for thousands of dollars weekly and fame, unlimited.

She had struggled to get temperament, as she would never have to struggle to lose it! Until a woman can love madly, suffer tragically, lose her temper, run the gamut of emotions—she is a singer but not a great singer. Ask Mary Garden, Mary Lewis or any other prima donna!

As a rule, America does not build temperament, it kills it. A little girl from Tennessee (Jellicoe was Grace's hometown) is trained from the cradle to control herself. She must not speak unless her elders have spoken first, she must turn her other cheek when anger would beget anger, she must not fall in love unless she is certain she is loved first. Such a young woman is raised to live as American tradition has dictated for a "lady."

Grace Moore had a marvellous voice. It was well-trained. She sang for the Metropolitan Opera Company judges. They turned her down. She went to Europe to learn why.

Did I hear someone say, "But that was the plot of 'One Night of Love'?" Of course it was! That plot was based largely on Grace's life story. "Love Me Forever" is based on another part of it. Real stories about a real opera singer!

In Europe, the little American girl went to a maestro who promptly fell in love with her. Madly, insanely in love with her! She was frightened, baffled, amused—but mostly frightened. We are always afraid of what we cannot comprehend. She ran away. She hid in the palatial home of Mary Garden and commenced to train with an older and, she thought, wiser teacher.

SIX months later, this maestro laid the curious truth before her. Her voice was lovely. Her figure was perfect. Her beauty was captivating. But she had no temperament, no fire. She mentally was too well-trained to become a prima donna. She must fall in love. She must learn to live. She must go temperamental. He knew she had fire because he knew all women have it until it is processed from them. She must find that fire and let it burn. Then she would sing, not like a trained parrot, but as a woman capable of enjoying even sorrow and understanding it.

Temperament didn't come easily. Falling in love was not something she could pitch to a proper key, at once, like her voice. A fire that has been well drenched does not find a spark to flare again, on the minute. She was a bit bewildered. And just as she was beginning to flare a little, inspired by an Italian prince who had been thrown dramatically before her door in an accident, Otto Kahn arrived in Europe and she sang for him. He had her sing again for a Metropolitan conductor, who was also in Europe.

The conductor did not want to sign her. He felt something was still missing. She talked him into it! The very success of her salesmanship seemed to spring that lock which had been imprisoning her. That very night, she threw a celebration party. An impetuous, riotous, absolutely mad party. She led her guests in wild dashes through the narrow winding streets of an ancient European city. She rang door bells. She stopped to sing before one house and then another. She dropped into cafes, beer gardens, shops which were closed but opened before these mad Americanos. Grace Moore was actually living!

From that mad night on, Grace Moore was a prima donna. When the time came for her debut in New York, she let all the wildness of her emotions surge like a hurricane through her. A special train of celebrities came from her home town in Tennessee to be at her first opera performance. The Governor, U. S. Senator Lawrence Tyson, U. S. Representatives Francis Garrett and Cordell Hull and other neighbors of her childhood.

They held a reception in her honor on the day before her performance. But Grace Moore was too excited, too uncontrollably excited to talk politely or quietly to neighbors. She sent a note:

"It is with deep regret that I cannot be present today to greet personally each one of my faithful friends from Tennessee. I am conserving all of my energies to give you my best tomorrow and I hope that as you all gather at the Metropolitan you will receive the most sincere message I can give you—in song."

TEMPERAMENT—the ability to act differently from others—always causes excitement. There were those from her home town, who could not understand how a little girl, raised among them, would refuse to attend a tea given in her honor. The Metropolitan issued a denial that it had prevented Grace from attending. It did not interfere with the personal lives of its artists!

Still, Grace Moore did not go! What American convention demanded was comparatively unimportant. She stayed in her rooms and nursed the throbs of excitement, fear and ambition which were coursing through her tingling body. She remained true to being a temperamental prima donna!

And she's still remaining true! Perhaps you have read stories of how she's lost that temperament, had to lose it to win eventual success in Hollywood. I can assure you they are not true. I can prove this, and anyone who worked on the set of "Love Me Forever" could prove it, too —each with a different story!

I went down to see her off when she sailed on the Ile de France this last time to sing a command performance before the King and Queen of England. The night before, she had appeared before the Society of Arts and Sciences in New York, to receive a gold medal for "raising the standards of motion pictures"— the first woman to be so honored; the first motion picture representative. She had promised to sing at the banquet. The song had been advertised for broadcasting. She did not sing. Her voice was ragged from the strain of working on her last picture. Her nerves were frayed. It was hot. A motion picture actress would have sung because the song had been advertised. A prima donna didn't.

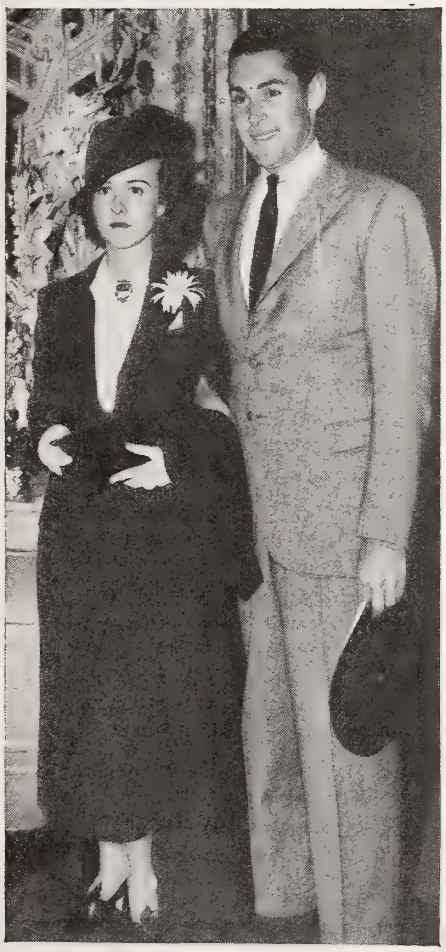
As she hurried down the ladder from the top deck of the ship to meet the newspaper photographers, she looked tired. She was tired. She was nervous. But she smiled and joked and waved her hand and posed this way and that. After half a dozen shots, she held out her hand to Valentin Parera, her husband, and drew him before the camera.



A photographer pushed forward, "I want you, alone, Miss Moore." Grace already was posed with the handsome Spaniard, she smiled but shook her head in a decided refusal. The photographer persisted. His gruff voice became dictatorial.

The smile on Grace's face vanished swiftly, "But you have plenty of me!"

"I haven't!"

There were a few more snap remarks. Now, a motion picture actress would have smiled sweetly at her husband and whispered something about, "You understand, darling." A prima donna didn't. She whirled and walked away. Tears came to her lashes.

DOZENS of autograph seekers held in check, before, by the photographers, swirled around her. "Sign here, Miss Moore."—"I've come all the way from

Why Gamble WITH DANGEROUS METHODS OF Marriage Hygiene

Free Sample

Demonstrates Amazing Doubly Effective Method!

MUST every woman live constantly in fear of suffering? "Not at all!" say many thousands who have found new happiness and confidence by using Boro-Pheno-Form in marriage hygiene. Originated by a well-known physician for his own practice, its remarkable effectiveness alone soon won coast to coast popularity. Hundreds have written of continued satisfaction 5 to 20 years or more! That record should banish doubt and fear from any mind!

So why imperil health with harsh drugs, some of which are actually poisonous? Their effect at best is perilously brief. Boro-Pheno-Form Suppositories give DOUBLE effectiveness—IMMEDIATE effectiveness on application and CONTINUED effectiveness afterward. Amazingly powerful, yet gently soothing, even beneficial, to inflamed or irritated tissues.

So convenient too! Ready to use, no clumsy apparatus—no mixing—no danger of overdose or burns, and no telltale antiseptic odor. Instead, they are actually deodorizing and are used by many fastidious women for that purpose alone. Brooklyn, Miss Moore."—"Here's a pencil, Miss Moore."—

The cameramen joined the crowd. "Just stand on those steps, Miss Moore, with your husband."—"Without your husband, Miss Moore!" The cameramen and autograph seekers were outyelling each other.

She looked around a little wildly. The tears spilled from her lashes. Then she turned and ran toward her stateroom and seclusion. She was halfway there when I caught up. She grabbed my hands in her two little ones and they twitched nervously.

"I, what could I do? I want to please them. But I'm so tired. I worked so hard on the picture. That banquet last night. If I don't get some sleep, I'll crack! This is awful, I wouldn't think of hurting anybody. They just don't understand. I don't understand. Don't let them think I didn't want to sign—"

She was almost hysterical. She had acted as she felt. She was being herself and that self is seasoned with pepper and ginger, cinnamon and sugar. She was angry about the photographer; ready to cry about the autograph seekers and a little frightened of the reporters. She was one big jumble of natural, effervescing emotions.

Now, any Hollywood actress would have learned with her first picture not to let photographers or reporters or autograph-seekers see her emoting. Katharine Hepburn once kicked and screamed and plumped herself on the nearest curbstone, when she felt like it. No more. Marlene Dietrich used to wear pants to formal openings when the mood seized her. Not today. Garbo did try a run-away jaunt to the Grand Canyon but she'll probably not try another.

Temperament is not in style in Hollywood any more. But Grace Moore is not a Hollywood actress. She is a prima donna. She ran away from Hollywood so she can remain what she is. Thank goodness!

PAPA CHAPLIN

permitted to see them. It was on the twenty-second day of August, in 1932, that for the first time, he appeared publicly with them.

HE had called Lita and secured permission to see them. At two o'clock, in an automobile, he rode proudly through the streets of Hollywood with the two youngsters beside him. He went first to the United Artists Studio. Meanwhile there was wind that "Charlie was up to something again." That happens often at the studio of this strange fellow; they never know what queer stunt Charlie's going to embark on next. His employees tiptoed around, wondered what was coming.

And then Charlie arrived with the boys. Remember, they were only six and seven, then. Well, never have Chaplin's employees been so astounded—and they've had the darndest things happen there!—as when he loudly and imperiously demanded that everybody in the studio come and see his sons. Why, the mother of Gracchi, in mythology, when she said, so that it has rung down through the centuries, "These are my jewels!"—couldn't have been one half as proud as Charlie when he told his studio staff: "These are my kids!"

"Look at them! Aren't they swell?" he demanded.

Back into the great open blue Rolls-Royce roadster they went again, after the studio had sufficiently oh-ed and ah-ed and sighed over them, and out to his Beverly Hills house. That was the beginning.

Today, they are virtually steady weekend residents there. The rest of the time, they go to a Hollywood military school—the finest, of course. That was Charlie's idea. Blisteringly denouncing what he called bringing them up as sissies, he insisted that they be reared as American kids. He demanded that they learn democratic ideals, the kind that's hammered into a guy at a military school, you know. And he insisted (this is funny!) that they learn obedience.

Well, as a matter of fact, they may be well disciplined at school but they walk over Charlie with the utmost impunity. Get them up to that Beverly Hills castle of Chaplin's, and neither Chaplin, nor Paulette Goddard, nor the servants have any more control over them than a Hottentot might have over an airplane. It's only natural, perhaps. You see, Charlie, being one of the world's most confirmed theorists, has a theory about bringing up his youngsters.

"Don't," he says, "punish them when they do something wrong. Or when they lie. It's natural in kids; it's like the animal instinct of self-preservation. You have to explain to them first what they've done was wrong, and why. Then they won't do it again. Of course, if they do, then it'd be all right to punish them."

But he never seems to get around to the punishment. Why, let me tell you some of the stunts they've pulled on papa!

ONE day, loud and urgent cries came from the Chaplin swimming pool. Coat tails flying, Papa Charlie raced to the edge, and there had to fish out his sons. Investigation showed that they had discovered papa's exercise wheel. You know—those big things you get in and turn around, and it rolls along while you go spinning upside-down-and-back. Well, they'd merely spun right into the pool.

Charlie gave them a talking to. But, "you mustn't punish them," you know, so all he did was talk.

And so came another uproar from the front of the house. There Papa Charlie beheld his youngest hanging precariously from the high limb of a tree. They got him down, somehow, and found a flock of bruises, scratches and things like that. Then papa asked how he got there.

Well, it was another of Charlie's playthings that the youngsters had adapted to their own uses. Charlie had a sort of over-grown roller-coaster, equipped with a sail—something like a land sail boat. But the boys got tired of anything as simple as that, and took off the sails to make wings with. Sydney was the first to try to fly off the roof with it.

Again Charlie talked to his sons. "You should only," he pointed out to them, "use things for what they were intended."

So he took them to a sporting goods store soon after that. It cost him $50, afterwards, to pay for the damage when they used a football for what it was intended. One of them kicked it in a little punt; the other ran it back. The showcase lost the game.

Even papa's play is mercilessly ruined by the two young Chaplins. Fishing off his yacht one day, he got a bite. That is, he thought it was a bite. He pulled in furiously. "This," he told all on board, "is a big one." It was—it was one of his own big prop shoes. The kids had tied it on his line from underneath.

CHAPLIN loves tennis. He's such an enthusiast that it drives him into spasms if he's disturbed in a game. It's more than a game with him, it's a serious occupation. And so Sydney and Charlie, Junior, take their bows and arrows, and usually at the tensest moment of the game—whizz!—there comes an arrow into the middle of the proceedings. They've lost more games for papa, that way, than you could count. Charlie talks to them about it. He tells them they shouldn't do it. "You children," he says, with that frigidly polite air grown-ups put on for recalcitrant youngsters, "must not play here. Take your bows and go up on the lawn." They do—but it's a fifty-fifty bet that something they do on the lawn will wreck papa's game just as effectively as a bow and arrow.

When they're at the Chaplin house, of course, they haven't their mother. Anyway, as this is written, Lita is East. But there's Paulette. The children adore her. They don't call her "mama," not yet anyway, but they call her, simply and charmingly, "Paulette." She has more control over them than anyone there, even including Papa Charlie himself. I'll bet anything that neither of the two kids would ever be anything but delighted if they learned, for sure, that Papa and Paulette were Mr. and Mrs. Chaplin.

But with all this, it must be honestly said concerning Charlie that he's making a go of bringing up his children. For what he neglected them before, he's more than making up. And of love, he doesn't seem to have enough for them. I've seen him in cafés, for instance, both alone and with the youngsters. Alone, he's a silent, hermit-like crab of a fellow. When the youngsters are along, he bubbles with a glee that's heart-warming, he wants everybody to come and see his youngsters, he can't find enough goodies on the menu for them. He's a different man.

The one thing Papa Charlie will not permit them is any ostentation—and consciousness that they're different from other kids. Richer, that is, or important because their dad is famous. In that, he has succeeded remarkably. So remarkably that they don't even seem to realize that Papa really is famous.

"Why," he explained once, "they love Mickey Mouse—but they don't even think I'm funny."

It was a bit wistful, though . . .

CONFESSIONS OF AN EXTRA GIRL

I've never seen anything so lovely as she was in the costume of "Romance." She took your breath away as, followed by her maid, she swept across the stage and sat down.

As she made this gesture I looked across the set and saw a handsome man in make-up and costume. Garbo's arrival seemed to electrify him. He looked at HERE's one little medicine-hater who is going to bed happy. She's just had her first taste of Fletcher's Castoria—and she loved it! Now mother is back in favor once more.

Do you know that even the taste of Fletcher's Castoria is made especially for children?

It's one laxative they take willingly. And it's very important that a child should take a laxative without a struggle. For the fear and resentment a child feels when forced to take a bad-tasting laxative often seriously upsets her nerves and her digestion.

But there's more to the laxative question than taste. Children's systems are sensitive, delicate. So Fletcher's Castoria is made just for children, of ingredients that are safe and suitable for a child.

It contains no narcotics. No harsh, purging drugs such as some "grown-up" laxatives contain . . . It will never, never cause griping pain. It will not form a habit. It is gentle, yet thorough.

Buy a bottle today. Depend on it always until your youngest child is 11 years old. Be thrifty—buy the family-size bottle. And look for the signature Chas. H. Fletcher.

her with his heart in his eyes as if he loved her more than any man had ever loved any woman. You felt as if you shouldn't be looking at him, as if you were peeping through a keyhole.

Garbo, too, seemed to feel that gaze. She looked up, smiled, and said, "Good morning," in that deep, throaty voice of hers. And as she looked at him, his face lit with a smile so glorious and wonderful that it made a lump rise in my throat.

I NOW turned to Peg and said, "Who is that man?"

She actually sniffed. "Well, Miss Ritz," she said. "You're not so smart as you thought you were." She nudged the girl next to her, "That's John Gilbert."

I looked at the man again. Why, it couldn't be Gilbert. I'd seen him many times on the screen and no make-up could so change a face. I looked back at Peg and the other girl. They were laughing at me. And I realized that war had been declared.

Peg spoke in a loud tone to her companion, "Why doesn't Miss Ritz talk to her pal, Garbo?" She turned back to me. "You and Garbo are chums, aren't you, dear? Or maybe someone in the front office got you on this set. I can't think of any other way you'd be here except by pull."

I could feel myself blushing under the make-up. "I'm here," I said as calmly as I could, "because I had a test made and it was good."

"Oh, she's had a test made. Well, isn't that just too, too divine. And tell us, angel, how you got the test?"

"I . . ." in my excitement the word had been spoken in a very loud tone and I saw the assistant director turn in our direction. "Come, come, girls, a little less noise," he called. I blushed again.

With elaborate condescension the girl next to Peg whispered, "You're supposed to be quiet on a movie set. Oh—sorry, how stupid of me to think you didn't know. The next great star, the friend of the executives must surely know that!"

I could feel tears coming into my eyes. But those girls must not see them. I looked back at Garbo and somehow from that lovely calm face I received comfort. I can't explain it but she had a quality that made me feel peaceful and secure. It was as if she were telling me not to mind, to have courage.

FROM looking at Garbo my eyes turned to the face of the man with his heart in his eyes—the man they had told me was John Gilbert, but wasn't. He seemed so lonely. And I was so terribly lonely. Something impelled me to walk over to him. He looked at me and smiled.

"You're new, aren't you?" he asked.

Great heavens! Was my newness sticking out all over me?

"Yes," I said.

"So am I," he said. "Terribly new. I don't know what I'd do if everyone weren't so kind."

"They've not been kind to me," I said. "I think those girls hate me. They've kidded me terribly. They told me, for instance, that you were John Gilbert."

He smiled. "I'm Gavin Gordon. Can you imagine my getting a break like this—leading man in a Garbo picture! The chance to work on the set with Miss Garbo. She's the most wonderful, the finest . . ." he was looking at her again, with those blazing, intense eyes. He didn't even notice that I had gone, that the assistant called me on the set.

The "cats" next to me were at it again. "Well, Miss Ritz, you must talk to the featured players. Us common extras aren't good enough for you, eh?"

And now the tears were really in my eyes and it was just at that moment that Mr. Brown snapped into action and a scene was in progress. Garbo was called on the set, which was supposed to be a stage entrance she was leaving. In a low tone Brown discussed the scene, the assistant standing nearby. Suddenly both Brown and the assistant looked in our direction. The assistant motioned to me—I thought. I started forward.

Peg hissed in my ear. "No, you fool, he wants me." She took a few steps.

The assistant shook his head, "No, not you," he said, "that girl in green."

I could hardly believe my ears. I was wearing a green dress!

MR. BROWN explained the action. As Miss Garbo came out of the stage entrance I was to step up to her and hand her a little bouquet of flowers. My God! I was actually doing a "bit." My first day on a set. It was all too wonderful.

The prop boy gave me the bouquet. The other girls were called over. We rehearsed the scene with me—with me—stepping out from the rest and handing her the bouquet. As I did so I looked up and smiled at her adoringly thinking that's what the character would do. Brown nodded his approval of the action. And Garbo, the great Garbo, smiled down at me when it was over and said, "That was fine, dear."

In a glow of pride and elation I walked back to the others and I'm sure I could not help giving Peg and her friend a glance of triumph. Would I have been human had I refrained? Peg tossed her head.

"We'll take it now," Brown said.

The cameras purred. The sound men said all was okay. The lights flashed on. And I was doing a bit.

But just as my turn came and I was about to step forward Peg whispered, "The front of your dress is open."

Instinctively my hand flew to my bosom. I hesitated and looked down at my dress. The bodice was not open. I took another step.

"Cut!" Brown called. And the assistant said, "What's the matter with you?"

And then, in a sudden rush of anguish, I realized that Peg had said that not in kindness but to break me up. Such a remark, I later learned, was an old and despicable trick.

I was so chagrined I could not speak. And then I heard my tormentor saying, "I can do the scene, Mr. Brown."

"All right, let's get going," the assistant said. And I had to stand there with the others and watch Peg do the little bit which had meant so much to me and out of which I had been cheated.

AH, what little dramas go on while the great dramas are being filmed! The men making the picture did not know my heart was breaking. They had their problems. They were in a hurry to do the scene and one girl was the same as another.

The scene was over. "Okay?" Brown asked.

"Okay," said the assistant, "except that girl in green wasn't smiling."

Smiling! How could I smile when my heart was a lump of lead in my chest! God! What a business.

The rest of the day is a nightmare to me. I did find, when I got the courage to talk to some of the others, that Peg and her friend were noted for their petty meannesses and that nobody liked them. They certainly were not typical extra girls and it was just my bad luck being placed next to them. But—and I'll tell about this later—I did have a chance to even scores with Peg, during the coming months. And, here's some irony, when I saw the picture the "bit" had been cut out!

Drama! There was Gavin Gordon on that set hopelessly in love with Garbo—or at least his eyes told me so. (And where is Gavin Gordon now?) And there was I my hopes of stardom shattered once more. (And where am I now?) Hopeless Hollywood. Poor, hopeless Hollywood!

WHEN the day finally ended, I turned my costume back to the wardrobe department and wearily climbed the stairs to the extras' room to take off my make-up.

I sat alone in one corner of the room, listening to the girls talking. Some of them had been called back for the next day. I had not been called. I would never be called again. I could not do the most simple "bit."

I walked out on the little balcony and looked across the green lawn. I had failed, miserably and completely. I didn't care now. No one could heckle me, no one could see. So I let the tears run down my cheeks.

And suddenly I heard a voice. "What's the matter, dear?" the voice asked. I turned wearily and there standing beside me was Joan Crawford.

Something about her made me know that I could talk to her.

And it all came out in a rush. I told her everything that had happened—why I had failed and how I felt.

She took my hand in hers. "Look at me," she said. With the back of her other hand she gave me a little slap under the chin. "Keep that chin up," she said. "Smile!"

I obeyed her command. I felt better already. "Now listen," she went on. "At ten o'clock tomorrow morning you meet me at the gate. We're going to show those girls. I'm going to get you a job—yes, a job in pictures. Why, that's a real smile. Now go home and forget today. Tomorrow is coming."

Yes, tomorrow was coming and with it an amazing experience for me. I knew it. I felt it. Next month I'll tell you all about it.

HE'S LOOKING FOR A SWEETHEART

of the life of practically any of Hollywood's unattached actresses inevitably includes a Raymond episode. He scores top-high with his fans, too. On a recent personal appearance trip, feminine furors in nine major cities brought out the police to handle crowds around his hotel and theatre. And in New York, where he spends most of his off-screen interludes, he's undeniably the debs' delight. Blue Book mamas practically turn Emily Postian handsprings for the honor of young Mr. Raymond's presence at a coming-out party or a weekend at Newport.

In addition to his popularity and handsomeness, he has all the other items that are apt to make the ladies go after his sentimental scalp—fame and a fortune and one of the brightest futures in the film colony.

AND yet Gene Raymond told me, "I've never been in love because no girl has ever given me a chance to be"—and told me the truth. But if it takes as much truth to convince you as I made him relate to convince me, then you're an old skeptic too. So maybe we'd better go back to the beginning, to the very beginning of Gene Raymond.

It's the darndest thing, his being in pictures anyway. It's story-book, almost, for a mother to say, "My first-born shall be an actor," and have it really happen. But Mrs. Guion, a native of Alsace, is one of the most remarkable women I have ever met. From her, her son inherited much of his determination and quiet poise and characteristically French joie-de-vivre. With those three qualities and his mother's ambitions as well as his own, it isn't so story-book after all, that he's Hollywood's Prince Charming today.

I knew what she meant when she told me Gene was a 'pretty little fellow' as a child. Not that he couldn't skin a fence or a cat as professionally as any other Long Island kid, but there was a certain soft fairness about his skin and features that's unusual in boys. You notice it now, first thing, off-screen—a sort of scrubbed-clean-behind-the-ears look, a firm, fresh blondness that strikes you as being more wholesome, really, than handsome. You'd take him for a Dartmouth senior or a young Wall Streeter before you'd ever suspect him of being an actor. He's much too down-to-earth to even look or behave like a celebrity, and you like him for it.

I don't think Gene is a 'born actor' anyway. He's a very skilled craftsman who has learned his tools and his workmanship, who makes a pure business of his art. There's none of the divine urge or temperament bunk about him, and you like him for that, too.

At an early age he was placed in the Professional Children's School in New York. He studied to become an actor as other boys study to be architects or engineers. Classes meant elocution, gestures, voice modulation, fencing, horsemanship, gym—anything and everything that would assist him in the theatre. So outstanding was his progress that at the age of fifteen, wearing his first long pants (white duck, $2.95 a pair, with a crease still warm from the family iron) he made his stage debut in "The Potters" and quickly became one of Broadway's leading juveniles.

A FEW more seasons on the boards, a smash hit in the leading role of "Young Sinners" which ran for two years, and it was inevitable that Hollywood, bearing fat contracts, should knock long and loudly on his dressing-room door. Gene, twenty-one and fond of the footlights, wasn't so keen about putting his John Henry on a dotted line that could tie him down to talkies only. He finally came West under what was and has remained the only gentleman's agreement in the film colony—Mr. Jesse Lasky was to have first call on his services. Under that arrangement Gene enjoyed until recently a sort of glorified free-lance career, playing the roles he wanted, not the ones that might be dished out to him were he under contract. A month or so ago, however, RKO persuaded him to sign a long term contract, and have big things planned for him.

It's amusing to hear him tell about his first year in pictures. He was scared to death he wouldn't ditto his stage success before the camera. So he rented a seventeen-room house, wrote home for mother, and promptly interned himself in his seventeen rooms like a bearded old hermit. He spent his evenings studying German grammar instead of girls, reciting lines instead of sweet nothings. Frankly, he'd never done a great deal of dating anyway. Getting ahead in the theatre had consumed his time and interest before, then along came a tough new job in pictures that didn't leave him much time to consider the belles of California and how they blossom.

I think the romance angle of Gene's life might have been much different if he had gone about socially that first year. To the girls he courted he would have been just Gene Raymond, a nice young man. But by the time he had leisure for dinners and dances and evenings à deux he was Gene Raymond, idol. Young actor with a couple of hit pictures behind him and all the glamor that goes with screen success. A celebrity whom women insisted upon treating as such—and that's just the reason one celebrity's still single.

GENE RAYMOND doesn't go for high-powered, open adoration no matter whose brand it is—star, fan or society girl!

It takes a stuffed shirt to really believe applause, to really believe he's a national object of romantic interest, something extra special in the way of a young man. And Gene's no stuffed shirt. Contrary to many lime-lighted males he has no theatrical sense of himself. Instead, he's sane and sensible and down-to-earth enough to want and to demand to be treated like a plain, nice young man—not a hero.

I've watched Gene in lots of flattering situations. I've seen him surrounded by women at more than one cocktail party, I've heard six feminine "hellos" on his telephone inside of thirty minutes. I've even seen him stop traffic at Broadway and 50th Street. Outside his hotel in Chicago not long ago, more than a thousand women waited an entire morning to see him come out; at his theatre another vast crowd stood under his dressing-room window in the rain, shouting to him to throw his cigarette butts to them. Adoration like that, I thought, wouldn't exactly do to a young man what water does to a duck's back. I asked Gene to tell me the honest-to-goodness truth.

"How," I asked him one afternoon when we munched pretzels and downed punch at a sidewalk café, "how does it make you feel to be treated like a tin god? To have practically every girl you meet instantly sizzle with sentimental hope, cash your slightest congenial compliment at ten times its face value and promptly fall on your neck with words—if not arms?"

Gene shrugged his somewhat massive shoulders, lighted a cigarette and spoke very seriously. "Honestly—please don't misunderstand this—but I hate it. I hate it. It's forced me to cultivate a characteristic I loathe in myself—it's made me wary of women.

"Listen, I know I'm not anything wonderful. I know it isn't really I that they admire, it's the men I portray on the screen. It's the lines I say and the make-up and lighting and background and all the other artificialities. I could be the same person and drive a truck for a living and I'd go about unnoticed.

"So when women, as you say, 'make a fuss' over me I feel exactly as though I'm being lied to. I wonder what I have that they want—certainly not myself. I distrust them and I'm embarrassed and I want to get away as soon as I can.

IT does another thing to me, too. If a woman meets me and doesn't 'make a fuss' over me I'm forced to think she's being cagey, using reverse strategy. It's a natural reaction. I don't want to think those things, but if you had this to go through, you would, too.

"And that's why I mean it when I say no girl has ever given me a chance to fall in love. I'm just like any other fellow. I want to do my own pursuing. I want to go about under normal social circumstances and be able to tell when a girl likes me for myself and nothing else.

"That would be necessary and right, before I could fall in love."

You wouldn't like Gene if he really took all the flattery he gets to heart, if he accepted being fussed over as though he were divinely entitled to it. He's simply a young business man with no more glorified an opinion of himself than the boy next door or the date you had last night.

AND when Gene marries what will he want—beside a girl who will treat him like a regular human being? I asked him that too.

"Of course I want to marry. I want to love and be loved as every man wants those things. As for my ideal girl—well, I do have ideals and preferences. I could say I like independent girls, girls who have known what it is to make their way in the world and really meet life like a trouper. I could say I'm partial to brown eyes and good athletes and southern accents. I could build an ideal. . . ."

Gene lit another cigarette and grinned. "But you know—you know as well as I do that when I fall I'll just fall. And whether she incorporates all my ideals or not, won't matter."

So there you are with the exposé of Gene's bachelordom in a nutshell. It's an interesting piece of psychology to remember, too, if you're ever after the sentimental scalp of a widely popular young man—the campus hero or the best-looking lifeguard at the beach. Treat him exactly like any other not-so-hot male and he'll like you for it.

Gene told me I couldn't tell this.

He said, "The missing romance chapter in my life? Say listen, it's really missing. You can't tell that story—it isn't!"

Well, I don't know. I think it is, don't you?

She Cheats

(but the person she cheats is herself)

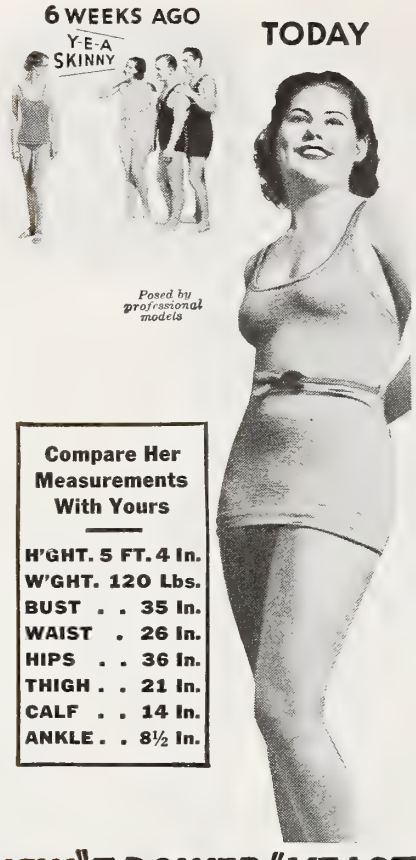
SHE cheats herself out of good times, good friends, good jobs—perhaps even out of a good marriage.

And all because she is careless! Or, unbelievable as it is, because she has never discovered this fact:

That socially refined people never welcome a girl who offends with the unpleasant odor of underarm perspiration on her person and clothing.

There's little excuse for it these days. For there's a quick, easy way to keep your underarms fresh, free from odor all day long. Mum!

It takes just half a minute to use Mum. And you can use it any time — even after you're dressed. It's harmless to clothing.



You can shave your underarms and use Mum at once. It's so soothing and cooling to the skin!

Always count on Mum to prevent the odor of underarm perspiration, without affecting perspiration itself. Don't cheat yourself! Get the daily Mum habit. Bristol-Myers, Inc., 75 West St., New York.

NEW "7-POWER" YEAST ADDS 5 TO 15 LBS. QUICK

Richest imported ale yeast now concentrated 7 times with three special kinds of iron in pleasant tablets

AN AMAZING new "7-power" yeast discovery is putting pounds of solid, normally attractive flesh on thousands of "skinny," run-down people who never could gain an ounce before.

Doctors now know that the real reason why great numbers of people find it hard to gain weight is that they don't get enough Vitamin B and iron in their daily food. Now scientists have discovered that the richest known source of health-building Vitamin B is cultured ale yeast. By a new process the finest imported cultured ale yeast is now concentrated 7 times, making it 7 times more powerful. Then it is combined with 3 kinds of iron in pleasant little tablets called Ironized Yeast tablets.

If you, too, are one of the many who need these vital health-building elements, get these new "7-power" Ironized Yeast tablets from your druggist at once. Day after day, as you take them, watch flat chest develop and skinny limbs round out to normal attractiveness. Indigestion and constipation from the same source quickly vanish, skin clears to normal beauty—you're an entirely new person.

Results guaranteed

No matter how skinny and run-down you may be, try this wonderful new "7-power" Ironized Yeast for just a few short weeks. If you're not delighted with the results of the very first package, your money will be instantly refunded.

Only don't be deceived by the many cheaply prepared "Yeast and Iron" tablets sold in imitation of Ironized Yeast. These cheap counterfeits usually contain only the lowest grade of ordinary yeast and iron, and cannot possibly give the same results as the scientific Ironized Yeast formula. Be sure you get the genuine. Look for "IY" stamped on each tablet.

Special FREE offer!

To start you building up your health right away, we make this absolutely FREE offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out the seal on the box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results guaranteed with the very first package—or money refunded. At all druggists. Ironized Yeast Co., Inc., Dept. 310, Atlanta, Ga.

THE MODERN HOSTESS

in a 2 quart sieve, over a deep bowl. Place a double layer of cheese cloth in a smaller sieve. Run enough juice through this to make 4 cups of strained juice. Make this juice into jelly as follows:

GRAPE JELLY

4 cups juice
7½ cups sugar (3¼ pounds)
½ bottle fruit pectin

Measure sugar and juice into large saucepan. Stir until sugar has melted. Bring to a boil over hottest fire and add bottled fruit pectin at once, stirring constantly. Bring to a full rolling boil, then boil ½ minute. Remove from heat, skim and pour quickly into hot sterilized glasses. Makes about 11 (6 ounce) glasses.

GRAPE BUTTER

Rub grapes, from which juice has drained through sieve. There should be 4½ cups of pulp. (If there is not quite enough, use any excess grape juice or add water to fill up the last ½ cup.) To grape pulp add sugar and fruit pectin in the following proportions:

4½ cups pulp
7 cups (3 pounds) sugar
½ bottle fruit pectin

Measure grape pulp and sugar into large saucepan or preserving kettle. Mix well, bring to a full rolling boil over hottest fire, stirring constantly, both before mixture reaches a boil and while boiling. Boil hard 1 minute. Remove from heat and stir in bottled fruit pectin. Pour quickly into hot sterilized jelly glasses. Makes approximately 11 (6 ounce) glasses.

(Follow recipes exactly. Don't guess about measurements. Time the boiling by the clock. A "full rolling boil" is one you cannot stir out. It is absolutely essential to the success of these recipes.)

IF you follow these rules and measurements you'll discover that the above recipes are about as easy and "fool proof" as anything you've ever tried. The addition of bottled fruit pectin cuts down both the chances of failure and the time of boiling. Pectin, you know, is what makes fruit jell. In this refined, concentrated form it contains definite jelly-making strength for specified quantities. Where the most experienced jelly makers in the old days sometimes had failure, nowadays, by using this bottled produce the veriest amateur can be assured in advance of success.

And now let me describe briefly the jelly-and-jam-dishes made according to the O'Brien recipes. I don't want to go into a detailed description here because I'll be only too delighted to send you the recipes themselves. All I want to do at this time is give you some idea of the delicious treats you will learn how to make just by sending for Mrs. O'Brien's recipes. Pat thinks they're great—and so will you!

As usual I've had these four recipes made up into leaflet form—four unusual recipes this month! Yet they call for only the simplest ingredients—the kind that may be found on the shelves of your kitchen closet or any grocery store. Oh yes! That reminds me. Even if you don't want to attempt to make your own jams and jellies, you still will want to have these recipes, for your grocer carries many first rate jams and jellies, too, which you can use most economically in making up these dishes. But be sure you buy a brand that you know by name and reputation so that you will be sure of uniformly good results when making Pat O'Brien's favorite dishes.

First in importance of these sweets is the Jelly Roll that I was privileged to sample. To Mrs. O'Brien's proportions I have added my own description of the easiest way I have discovered to roll a Jelly Roll. I'm sure you'll be as glad to learn this simple little "trick" as you will be to learn the correct proportions for making a light textured cake.

The second of the recipe cards will describe to you how to make a Jam Pie. If you're looking for a new pie filling, here's your golden opportunity!

The third recipe card brings you directions for making the little Jelly Meringue Tarts so temptingly pictured at the beginning of this article. Under their meringue and cocoanut topping there is a cocoanut custard filling that is just about the simplest thing I've ever made. Under the custard there is jam (of course there would be, since it's a Pat O'Brien favorite!). Incidentally, this same recipe can be used to make a novel filling for a cocoanut custard pie—one with an O'Brien touch!

On the fourth card I'm giving you a recipe for Spiced Grape Relish. You'll be surprised to discover what a festive touch such a relish supplies when served with an otherwise prosaic roast.

The coupon will bring all these recipes to you at no cost and with practically no effort. If you have a sweet tooth you'll love them all. And if you have a man in your family he'll love you for cooking for him the same dishes that Eloise serves to her typical he-man husband, Pat O'Brien.

You'll recall that it's often said that "men are just grown-up boys." Well there's certainly one thing they never outgrow and that's their liking for jellies and jams. This month's recipe leaflet will teach you so many practical and novel ways to cater to this liking that you should really send for your free set of these recipe cards NOW.

NO GREATER THAN THEIR DIRECTORS

Although this is an unusual case—if it were not, we would have few good pictures—it is used here because it so strikingly illustrates one of the simplest truths about making pictures. No matter how capable the actor or actress, no matter how clever the story (and this was one of the best), no matter how well-adapted the script, how excellent the photography, the musical score, etc., in the end no picture is greater than the man who directs it.

The great directors of Hollywood are its unsung heroes; the poor ones its unpunished civilians.

Although we give the glory to the actor, if we are honest in our research, we discover those actors and actresses whom we love most dearly and admire most intelligently are the ones who have been fortunate enough to fall into the hands of a great director for at least one name-making picture.

Today, when you say Myrna Loy or William Powell, what picture do you think of at the same instant?—"Thin Man," of course!

Both Myrna Loy and William Powell were fine actors before W. S. Van Dyke handled them in this record-breaking production. They had been in Hollywood many years. But had their names become household words as had Clara Bow's, Greta Garbo's, Lon Chaney's, Jean Harlow's, etc.? Myrna had had modest fame, won from playing exotic roles, largely Oriental. Bill had been sure-fire for consistent laughs. And then someone handed W. S. Van Dyke the script for "Thin Man" with the names of Myrna Loy and William Powell pencilled on it. "Van," as Hollywood calls this two-fisted, hard-crusted man, knew that one director after another had refused to do that story. But he was used to being sent to the South Seas ("White Shadows"); to Africa ("Trader Horn") or the Arctic Ocean ("Eskimo") without uttering a grumble even though he detests travel and "location" pictures. He is one director who has never said "no" to a picture.

The fact that Van never says "no" was the luckiest thing that ever happened to Myrna Loy or William Powell. Myrna became a star—Bill a great star. The world sang their praises. Justly so. They proved themselves capable of living up to the genius of the man who directed them. His praises went unsung because it is the custom to sing only to the spectacular. Since the director never appears on the screen he is never spectacular.

CLAUDETTE COLBERT and Clark Gable. How quickly the words "It Happened One Night" follow the mental flash of their names. Again, both were well-known. However, it had been a long time since Clark Gable had had a truly great picture. The very fact he was loaned to Columbia for this production showed Clark's prestige was not at the top. Studios seldom loan top-notchers. He told me, "I was slipping. I knew I was slipping. To tell the truth, I didn't want to make that picture. I didn't like the idea of being loaned. I told Frank Capra so. I had to apologize afterwards. I couldn't and wouldn't have done anything else. I know what Frank did for

Tells Her Own Story About Color Harmony Make-Up

"MAX FACTOR'S POWDER brought out unexpected beauty in my face through the magic of its color harmony shades. I find it clings for hours, and makes my skin appear satin-smooth even in a close-up.

"MAX FACTOR'S ROUGE is creamy-smooth, and blends so perfectly that the lovely tones appear to be my own coloring. It keeps its true color in any light because the color harmony shades are light-tested.

"MAX FACTOR'S SUPER-INDELIBLE LIPSTICK is moisture-proof, so I apply it to the inner as well as the outer surface of the lips giving them an even, harmonized color that is really lasting."

MIRIAM HOPKINS and Janet Ross met in Hollywood for the first time since their school days together. Miriam Hopkins was lovelier than ever, poised, charming. Janet was dull-looking, self-conscious, awkward.

"Please tell me," asked Janet, "is there anything an average girl like me can do to be more attractive?"

Of course there was! The first step to beauty was to obtain expert advice, so Miriam Hopkins took Janet to Max Factor...Hollywood genius of make-up.

"Color harmony make-up will reveal the beauty in your face just as it does with screen stars," Max Factor told Janet. "You shall see what powder, rouge and lipstick in your color harmony shade will do."

With the instinct of a true artist, Max Factor applied the colors that would bring out, in the dull little face before him, the priceless thing called beauty. Rachelle powder to enliven the skin and give it satin-smoothness, Blondeen rouge to give alluring lifelike color to the cheeks, Vermilion lipstick to accent the youthful tone of the lips... the living portrait was finished... and another woman experienced the joy of seeing for the first time, beauty in her own face!

Would you like to see what an amazing change color harmony make-up will bring about in your face? If you are a blonde, brunette, brownette or redhead, there is a color harmony make-up that will make you beautiful... me in that picture. I'll never forget."

Claudette Colbert told me, with her traditional, frank manner, "An actress must have a great picture to become known as a great actress. I had 'Cleopatra' and 'It Happened One Night' in the same year. That was more luck than in all the rest of the years added together."

Two people who realize what they owe to the quiet-mannered, unassuming little Italian who once worked in the technical department at Columbia. Frank Capra's one rule for a picture is—make it simple.

Capra wanted Clark Gable for "Broadway Bill" and Clark wanted to play it so badly he offered to do it for nothing. "It would be worth it to be with Capra again," he said. And I think the only time Clark Gable has been jealous in his life was when Warner Baxter played the role.

Victor Schertzinger knows music. Very few men or women in Hollywood have the musical training or knowledge of this director. He studied in Brussels, was a concert violinist with Sembrich, Sousa, Prior, Calve and appeared by himself for several years upon the musical stages of Europe. He was the first man to write a musical score for a motion picture—"Civilization."

When producer Harry Cohn had the shrewd foresight to place him behind the microphone on "One Night of Love," he made himself several million dollars, and turned Grace Moore from a woman, who had had no success in two pictures, to one of picturedom's greatest sensations. We can't avoid facts! Grace had made two other musical pictures and the world wasn't rushing to name perfumes, soaps, breads, etc., for her. But then a musical genius, who also knew pictures took her in hand, even to writing the script!

"Little Women," "Bill of Divorcement" and Katharine Hepburn! When you think of them you should think first of the name —George Cukor. Supposing Hepburn had first fallen into the hands of a director who did not understand her red-pencil type. (I always think of a red pencil when thinking of Katy because nothing stands out more than a red pencil on white paper.) Cukor not only knows how to direct but he knows how to handle a red-pencil. He told me of a scene which he calls typical.

THE day when she was to carry Jean Parker down the stairs in "Little Women," she had not been too well. Her father, a physician to whom she had just paid a visit in the East, had instructed her not to carry anything heavy. When director Cukor told her to carry Jean Parker, she answered, "My daddy told me not to carry anything heavy!"

"Then don't do it!" Cukor snapped.

"Let me try!" Hepburn retorted.

Cukor restrained his smile. He had what he wanted. By telling Hepburn to do as she pleased, she had done as he wanted.

And the day after this picture was finished, Katy told me, "'Little Women' is a great picture because George Cukor is great. I want him to direct my other pictures. I do not want anyone else to direct me. A picture is no greater than its director!"

Katharine Hepburn knew the truth. She appreciated what Cukor had done for her.

This situation between these two brings out another striking proof of the necessity of a director understanding and valuing correctly his star. Hepburn is greater when Cukor directs her because he has the knack of inspiring her to do her best dramatic work.

I will tell you a secret. Many directors are afraid of her. But Cukor is not afraid. The set on which they work is always barred even to within-the-studio-visitors. Cukor says, "That is because even studio people might misunderstand." Misunderstand the battles. Katy yelling and using explosive but illustrative language. Cukor telling her to, "keep still and do as you please." Here is a man who understands the woman who gives her best when she is exploding. Few men understand explosive women. A man who does not should never direct Katharine Hepburn, Constance Bennett, Jean Arthur, Nancy Carroll or Lupe Velez. The world miscalls these folk "temperamental." George Cukor denies this. "They are as God made them and will do their best work only as He intended."

HAVE you seen Freddie March equal his performance in "Les Miserables?" He has given us some splendid performances before but I think we are safe in saying this is his first "inspired" one. He was playing in competition with one of the greatest of actors, Charles Laughton. Fredric March had to be inspired. And what inspiration is better than competition? Director Richard Boleslawski is one of the shrewdest readers of character in Hollywood. Just how much he did to make these two great actors realize the greatness of each other is not written on any studio records!

Janet Gaynor, Charlie Farrell and director Frank Borzage! Here is another secret I believe to be untold. Frank Borzage believes romance filters through a screen and out into the bosoms of an audience more poignantly when his leading man and leading lady feel real emotion for one another. Only those who worked with Janet and Charlie Farrell know the intense encouragement Director Frank gave to these newcomers in "Seventh Heaven" when they began to look romantically at one another. He would invite the two of them to dine with him to "talk over the picture!" Incidentally, when he directed Loretta Young and Spencer Tracy in the picture in which they met (and I wish the world would remember what Hollywood knows but seldom says—Spencer Tracy and his wife had separated before Loretta and Spencer met) you would see Director Frank and his two stars dining frequently together to "talk over the story."

Of course, this story would not be complete without a mention of Marlene Dietrich and Josef Von Sternberg. And this is the final proof. Marlene Dietrich is more beautiful, more charming, more alluring today than when she arrived in this country—a bashful, chubby, mystified German Frau. Her legs are more beautiful now than when they were first publicized. She refused to be directed by anyone else because she felt Von Sternberg to be the greatest director in pictures. Her loyalty was a great and deserved compliment.

I caught Von Sternberg in an off-stage moment when they had completed a production which the critics had not considered as great as some former ones made by these two. It happens that Von Sternberg has always proved his greatness by his honesty. There is no "humbug" about him. He is both a great director and a great man. He said, "There are just so many great stories in any one man. They come or they don't come. I need a vacation."

I suppose there are always exceptions—yet when we delve deeply enough we usually discover exceptions do prove the rule. I was chatting with Edward Arnold during a lull in the making of "Diamond Jim." He said, "George Arliss is a great director." Remember they worked together in "Cardinal Richlieu." Someone who had worked with Mae West might have said the same of her. These two are the powers behind their own thrones. . . . They do as much of the directing as the director. So even the exception proves—no star is greater than the man or woman who directs him!

as described above, four times only this time doing a complete box.

(5-6) The Piccolino Whirl—repeat the step, dip, kick combination, described above, twice. The girl then stands still while the man takes three steps around her, starting with his right foot. The man then stands still, as the girl steps around him. Repeat three times, alternating man and girl. On the man's last turn he catches the girl in ballroom position and they both do a complete turn.

(7) Man takes girl's right hand in his. Partners do small steps, starting with the right foot, to counts of one-two, one-two-three.

(8-9-10) The Piccolino Spin—Partners come together in ballroom position, stepping with left foot and kicking high in back with right. Do this four times moving in small circle and putting plenty of zip into it. Partners stop facing each other for one count.

(11-12) The finale—do the Piccolino Step and finish with the Piccolino Whirl in which man and girl alternately step around each other and end, then do turn.

"THE AVERAGE CHILD NEEDS ONE QUART OF MILK PER DAY for normal growth and development"

H. C. SHERMAN, Ph. D., Sc. D.
"CHEMISTRY OF FOOD AND NUTRITION" courtesy of MacMillan Company

THIS DELICIOUS FOOD-DRINK PROVIDES almost twice THE FOOD-ENERGY OF MILK ALONE

DOCTORS, dieticians, pediatricians agree that growing children need a quart of milk a day. For milk gives the most valuable nourishment for strong bones, sound teeth, straight legs and active muscles.

Unfortunately, many children do not receive sufficient milk as part of their daily diet—either because they dislike milk—or because a quart a day, every day, soon becomes monotonous.

Doubly valuable, therefore, to growing children is Cocomalt. For not only does Cocomalt make milk delicious, but made as directed, it almost DOUBLES the food-energy value of every glass or cup of milk.

Add 5 vital food essentials

Cocomalt is rich in five important food essentials. It supplies extra carbohydrates which provide food-energy needed for pep and endurance. It supplies extra specially valuable proteins that help replace used or wasted muscle tissue—for building solid flesh and muscle. It supplies extra food-calcium, food-phosphorus and Sunshine Vitamin D for the formation of strong bones, sound teeth.

Doctors advise busy adults and convalescents to drink Cocomalt in milk every day because it is easily digested, quickly assimilated and because of its high nutritional value. A hot, non-stimulating drink, helps to induce restful sleep. Cocomalt taken hot at bedtime helps you to sleep soundly.

Cocomalt is sold at grocery, drug and department stores in ½-lb. and 1-lb. air-tight cans. Also in the economical 5-lb. hospital size. In powder form only, easy to mix with milk—delicious HOT or COLD.

Special Trial Offer: For a trial-size can of Cocomalt, send name and address (with 10c to cover cost of packing and mailing) to R. B. Davis Co., Dept. MA10, Hoboken, N. J.

Cocomalt
Prepared as directed, adds 70% more food-energy to milk

Cocomalt is accepted by the Committee on Foods of the American Medical Association. Prepared by an exclusive process under scientific control, Cocomalt is composed of sucrose, skim milk, selected cocoa, barley malt extract, flavoring and added Sunshine Vitamin D. (Irradiated ergosterol.)

It Isn't in the Dictionary

down off it again. She let Jack Gilbert chase her through a forest—that was in "La Boheme"—but she never let him catch her. That was the secret. The men never caught the spiritual type. That's why the next type—Clara Bow, the flapper, the "it" girl, was such a welcome relief.

SUDDENLY, when men were all exhausted and panting from chasing the hundreds of Lillian Gishes they couldn't catch (and what's the use of catching a girl who appeals to your Better Nature anyhow?), Elinor Glyn appeared. She coined a new word. The word was "it"—and did she start something!

Clara Bow—and all her thousands of imitators—had "it." Great big scissors were brought out and the fluttering, ankle-length dimities were chopped off at the knees. Little bobbing curls were whacked off with the same scissors and you had a wind-blown bob. The reformers "tchted" "tchted" "tchted" at the flappers and "it" girls (there had been not a single "tcht" for Gish) but the men loved 'em. (The reformers loved 'em, too, if the truth were known, but were in the habit of "tchting.")

It was easy to be an "it" girl. You just ran wild all over the place, were just a little madcap, free as the wind.

You had to have a lot of pep and vigor to be an "it" girl. It was just go, go, go from morning until night. Anything for a laugh—jump in the pool with your clothes on, ride a bucking bronco bareback, stand on your head if you felt like it. I suppose it was sheer exhaustion that made us turn to glamor.

We all turned to glamor when the Chief dumped Garbo at the Santa Fe station in Los Angeles. Nobody knew we would—least of all the Swedish girl who was dumped.

GARBO was tired. The California climate didn't agree with her. She didn't slither. She didn't flutter. She didn't bounce. She just sat with her eyes half shut because the sun hurt her eyes. And that, gentle reader, was how glamor was born.

Imitating Clara Bow had worn us all out. Gosh, but it was nice to sit or recline and exude glamor. In the dictionary, incidentally, the word is defined like this, "Glamor—magic or enchantment; magic influence; spell; witchery; hence, alluring and often illusory charm."

Now you never saw a very busy or active witch, did you? The mystic ones who deal in spells invariably just sit and stir a pot. So the glamor girls just sat. They didn't talk much—that might break the spell (and sometimes did)—they didn't do much. They just looked pale and pretty and the men were entranced because they, too, were tired chasing the "it" girls. And for awhile they didn't catch on that this new behavior on the part of their women folk was glamor. They thought, "Now there's a nice dumb girl who won't give me any trouble."

It was when the attitude got tagged with a word that the men caught on. And that's why the style has now changed. They're on to our tricks, sisters. They've tumbled that it's just good old sex appeal after all.

And then along came Myrna Loy.

Of course, Mae West had arrived and done her bit in a good cause. But she didn't fool anybody. You knew right away that Mae had sex appeal. And if the younger boys didn't believe it—they just asked Dad. And he knew. Mae didn't create a vogue. Mae didn't induce women to go in for hips and tiny waists. The girls looked at her and said "How quaint" and went on being glamorous.

But little Myrna has a new slant. You can't classify her—and that's why she's so deadly. She certainly doesn't vamp anybody. Dear me no! Not by the farthest stretch of the imagination is she a Gish. And certainly you wouldn't call her anything so old-fashioned as an "it" girl. Glamor? No, no, she's much too down to earth for that.

Watch her screen technique. She's a good pal, quick on the uptake, cute (but never coy), attractive, regular.

AND if you get in on that style while it is still young, before men catch on that it's just another link in the sex appeal chain—baby, you'll go far.

Myrna and her technique—they're both as modern as Vitamin E. Smart, sophisticated, chic and palsy-walsy. Watch her, copy her before someone comes along with something else and you're too late.

And maybe it's better that we haven't a word for Myrna's type yet. Words spoil the illusion. And words (and this is important, girl friends) tip men off that it's an act—the same old act that wowed Adam in the Garden of Eden. Because no matter how you say it it's the same old thing—just dressed up in a smart frock. "It" or glamor, allure or charm. Put 'em all together and they spell sex.

Oh, by the way, Myrna Loy isn't the only cinema gal with the new technique. No, siree, there's someone right on her own Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer lot who has the now formula down pat. And that girl is none other than charming Rosalind Russell.

Everyone is going for her in a big way because she belongs to this new school of smartness. She's snappy, alert, quick on the trigger and a real pal to the boy friend. Very much like Myrna—in fact there's a facial resemblance between these two that is positively astounding. You've noticed it, no doubt.

Men are falling hard for this 1935 version companion-sweetheart. So get busy and see if you can't acquire this new "it." These two cinema charmers are grand patterns to follow. It mightn't be a bad idea to take a few tips from them.

Maybe we should call what Myrna does—Loytering. Oh well, let it go. I can't be shot for trying!

NELSON EDDY'S TRUE LIFE STORY

mother taught him the fundamentals of music. She read scores with him. And often, when she was practising a solo for her church, the little golden-haired boy would like it and beg her to teach it to him. She would and so, on a given hour of a Sunday morning, the mother and son would be singing the same solo, both golden-haired, both young.

BUT at no time did the boy dream or plan to become a professional singer. Nor did his mother, music-conscious as she was, seem to be aware that her son's slender throat lodged a miracle of sound.

He wanted, as a matter of fact, to become a civil engineer. "I didn't," he told me, "know what in blazes a civil engineer was but it sounded good. Sort of elegant and important. It's just as well for me that I never got around to it because I can't add six and four and make them come out ten, not without a struggle."

But small Nelson's boyhood was not all dedicated to music. He had a typical, wholesome devout New England childhood. His paternal great-grandmother owned a farm at Acushet, Massachusetts, and Nelson spent many an enchanted summer there.

God-fearing people, his father's people, and they saw to it that he revered the stern, uncompromising God of his father. Methodist by family inheritance, young Nelson, in the course of his travels from one New England town to another, attended the Baptist, Congregational, Universalist, Episcopal and Presbyterian Churches. Thus he learned early that sect is not important but that worship is.

There never was any one established home in Nelson's boyhood. His father, a machinist and an inventor of farm tools and naval devices, moved about from city to city, almost from season to season. So that the boy attended the Dartmouth Street Primary School in New Bedford, Mass., the Rhode Island Normal School in Providence, the Edgewood Grammar School in the same city and the Grove Street Grammar School in Pawtucket, R. I., from which he graduated.

A traveling salesman kind of life—but in every town his parents took a house, never an apartment nor a hotel suite. And his mother, the genius of home-making in her heart, made of each transient abode, a real home.

NELSON said to me, "I couldn't give a life story without talking about my grandparents, my father's mother and father. For they are more important in my life than I am! Mr. and Mrs. Isaac M. Eddy, their neighbors call them. But they were and they are, Gramma and Grampa to me. Their home in Pawtucket was my real home. I spent most of my week-ends there and it was there, with them, that I learned most of the lessons that have stood me in good stead all of my life. I learned the value of gentleness and kindliness—the beauty of simple living. The robust virtues of character and heart. My grandfather it was who taught me to play the drum and the fife. My grandmother taught me a reverence Behind a screen of matter-of-fact efficiency, Julia Scott tried to conceal her love for the man who was her boss. But that didn't work. She had to leave. When she told him, he made her a proposal—a proposal which was very different from one that was due a beautiful girl.

What was the outcome of this strange bargain? You will be surprised to learn what happened to Julia in "She Married Her Boss," the story based on the Columbia Picture starring Claudette Colbert.

for old things hallowed by long love and service.

"I spent dreamy hours among the old knick-knacks and daguerreotypes of that sweet-smelling, sweet-living house. I played with the toys my grandfather had played with. I ate the cookies my grandmother made for me and no food in all the world, neither on the Continent nor here, has ever tasted so good. Their sweetness and kindliness toward me was one of the joys of my childhood and their life-long loyalty and devotion to me is one of the prides of my manhood. They hang onto the radio every time I sing. They play, over and over again, every record I have ever made. And, whenever I record, I make records off the air and send them to them. Their favorites of my songs are the 'Evening Star' from Tannhauser and 'Going Home.' I think they will be 'going home' very soon now—but they cannot make a home in heaven that will be any more heaven than the home they made for a little boy and a grown man, here on earth."

Grammar school was the end of Nelson's formal education. There was to be no high school, no college for him. At the age of fourteen he left the classroom forever and began, then, the self-education which—but of that more later on.

"I was," the golden baritone told me, "a very dull child. I was good. I was obedient. I was a bit timid—I didn't run with gangs. If a big fellow wanted to take a poke at me, I'd let him take it rather than start a fight. My deportment in school was always and consistently 'D'—not because I was personally mischievous but because I always was minding other fellows' business, poking my nose in where it didn't belong. Meddling.

"I liked little girls. More especially little girls with curls. And I manifested my liking by pulling their curls, teasing them, sneering loudly, 'Aw, an old girl!'"

He first fell in love when he was seven and in the third grade. He said, reminiscently, "That was my first love affair. Doubtless the recipient of my rather murderous attentions didn't know then and doesn't realize to this day—if she remembers me at all—that it was love that was animating me. How should she? But it really was. I was seven, the young lady must have been all of six. Her name was Doris—you see, I do remember—and she had very pullable, golden curls, and sweet blue eyes. I teased her daily, hourly, all of the time. I threw spitballs at her. I dipped her curls in inkwells. I climaxed my attentions one day by chasing her home from school, throwing stones at her as she ran. Weird and wonderful are the ways of small boys, for all the time I was thinking how pretty she was, how much I loved her. At last, one particularly well-aimed stone cut her across the eye, a really bad gash. I followed her into her house and, above the din of her justifiable wails, unctuously asked her mother if I might be allowed to put butter on the bruise. My mother, I said angelically, had always told me that butter was very good. And her mother, touched by so much manly solicitude on my part, allowed me to minister to the hurt I had inflicted. She never knew, until later, that I was the culprit, the desperado of love. That must have been a shock to her illusions!

CURIOUS. Perhaps in some obscure way I fancied myself as Dan Cupid pursuing the victim of my affection with bow and arrow. I don't know, I only know that it was love I felt. Love was in my mind. I was moony regularly about her. When I graduated from school, some years later, she was in the auditorium. I saw her there and planned to speak to her after the commencement exercises. But when I went to look for her she had gone and I've never seen her again. Doris—where, I wonder, is she?

"At the age of thirteen I had my next emotional disturbance. I was spending part of that summer at Sakonnet Point, R. I. There was a little casino there where the summer folk danced two or three times a week. I got the job of ticket collector and had permission to dance when duty permitted. I always gravitated immediately to the acknowledged belle of the place, the daughter of the local constable. I had overcome considerably my third-grade shyness or I could never have asked her to dance with me, since I couldn't dance!

"She was very kind and patient with me, teaching me how to place my feet and go one-two, one-two so that I could, at least, circle ineptly about the ball-room. And the circle, that ancient and traditional mystic sign, caught us in the ring of love.

"We did all of the 'teenish things. We carved our initials on the trunks of trees, heart-enclosed. We rode bicycles together. We took long walks, saying nothing and feeling all of the inexplicable keen agony of love at thirteen. Love which has no tongue, no voice, only a heart!

"It all came to what seemed to me a tragic and frustrated end when, seated cozily behind a rock one day—getting up courage to kiss her cool cheek—her father, the constable, loomed up behind us and in the best movie-constable blood-and-thunder voice bade me begone and his young daughter to run home to Maw and he'd tend to her later!

"And so, we didn't kiss. We never kissed at all, my sweetheart of thirteen summers, and I.

"Later, much later, came a love which dyed my life with all the colors of the spectrum, from sombre purple which is for pain to the reds and ambers of joy. But that is another, a much later part of my story."

WE must diverge now to the day of young Nelson's graduation from grammar school—his last day in any classroom.

For at this time of his life his mother and father decided to divorce and Nelson, instinctively and naturally, went with his mother. He was fourteen when his parents dissolved their marriage. He says of them now. "Two perfectly swell people who just couldn't get along, temperamentally."

Two wise people, too, who believed that a child should not be torn between two parents. A mother whose great love claimed her son. A father who acknowledged that love and gave it way.

And a little fourteen-year-old lad who had, now, to make his own way in the world.

Mother and son departed from Philadelphia and the Mott Iron Works owned by Nelson's maternal uncle. There was the promise of a job as telephone operator for the boy. The promise was kept. Nelson plugged the switchboard and, a little later, was made shipping clerk which, he said, meant "underdog." "I was pretty young," said Nelson, "and I hadn't the ghost of an idea as yet what my role in life was to be. But one thing I did know—that it was not to be that of underdog."

And so, it is this same quality which, today, makes him take his scripts home, read the scene into the virgin record of a phonograph, then "act" with the records, thus learning his lines and perfecting all of the nuances at incredible speed—this same quality stood him in good stead at the iron works. For he made it his business to know the name, the history, the utilitarian value of every bolt and screw, every gadget and device manufactured in his uncle's plant. He says, "I'm always interested in anything I'm doing—I have a consuming desire to know all there is to know about it."

He realized, too, that he'd had an incomplete education and that he would, from this time forth, have to be his own teacher, pupil and examiner.

He said, "I started to study then and I've been studying ever since. Only when you begin to dig for yourself do you realize how limitless is knowledge and how small a chance you have of scraping so much as the surface."

He took all kinds of courses, this industrious youngster. He began with the Alexander Hamilton Business Course, by correspondence. Too poor to buy the text-books offered by the course he dug up a second-hand book store that carried them and bought them there. He also, at that time or a little later, bought "The Wealth of Nations," a famous set of books on economics by Adam Smith.

He read omniverously. He read as he walked to and from business. He read, a book propped up in front of him, during his lunch hour. He read at home, in the apartment he and his mother shared, half the nights through. He read books that would give him a background, familiarize him with the world he lived in, in all of its aspects. H. G. Wells' "Outline of History," Plutarch for ancient history, compendiums of science, art, biology, geology, psychology—sets of books that would, he said, "give me the whole picture."

AND strangely and inexplicably, even then he did not know of the golden voice he possessed.

At the Mott Iron Works he was promoted from shipping clerk to follow-up clerk, a clerical job. He was earning twelve dollars a week and knew that that wage was probably tops for him, at his age. His mother was working, too, at the University of Pennsylvania. They were just barely making ends meet but they played it as a game, joyously, hand in hand.

"And then," said Nelson, "one sweet day I suddenly decided that I hated it—all of it. And I up and said, 'I'm quitting!' I knew that I was taking a desperate step. But I knew, too, that mother would say 'All right, son, it's for you to decide.' And she did. She always did. Which is why I am here today.

"But that day showed no glimmer of the future. I just knew that I had jolly well got to get another job and that without delay. And so, a rather shabby lad of some fifteen summers, I began the trek down the whole length of Chestnut Street. I went into every shop, cellar, loft, store and building from 16th Street to 7th. I didn't miss one. And finally landed at the corner of 7th and Chestnut. It was the office of that famous daily, the Philadelphia Press. I got a job as night clerk, night cashier, night ad taker. I worked from five P.M. to midnight and eight dollars a week was my remuneration. And that four dollars deficit between the eight and the twelve irked my soul as nothing else has ever done. I've never been able to endure the feeling of going back, of losing ground. There were some advantages, of course, in that I had more time for reading and also I was taking, at the time, a correspondence course in art. I'll wager that I've been the greatest correspondence-school-taker in the country! And in my spare time (spare time!) I tried my hand at writing obits at half-space rates.

ONLY A PENETRATING FACE CREAM WILL REACH THAT UNDER-SURFACE DIRT!

By Lady Esther

Those pesky Blackheads and Whiteheads that keep popping out in your skin—they have their roots in a bed of under-surface dirt.

That underneath dirt is also the cause of other heart-breaking blemishes, such as: Enlarged Pores, Dry and Scaly Skin, Muddy and Sallow Skin. There is only one way to get rid of these skin troubles and that is to cleanse your skin.

A Face Cream that Penetrates

It takes a penetrating face cream to reach that hidden "second layer" of dirt; a face cream that gets right down into the pores and cleans them out.

Lady Esther Face Cream is definitely a penetrating face cream. It is a reaching and searching face cream. It does not just lie on the surface. It works its way into the pores immediately. It penetrates the pores, loosens and breaks up the waxy dirt and makes it easily removable.

Make This Test

Pass your fingers over your whole face. Do you feel little bumps in your skin? Do you feel dry patches here and there? Little bumps or dry or scaly patches in your skin are a sure sign of "sub soil" or under-surface dirt.

It Does 4 Things for the Benefit of Your Skin

First, it cleanses the pores.

Second, it lubricates the skin. Resupplies it with a fine oil that overcomes dryness and keeps the skin soft and flexible.

Third, because it cleanses the pores thoroughly, the pores open and close naturally and become normal in size, invisibly small.

Fourth, it provides a smooth, non-sticky base for face powder.

I want you to see for yourself what Lady Esther Four-Purpose Face Cream will do for your skin. So I offer you a 7-day supply free of charge.

Write today for this 7-day supply and put it to the test on your skin.

See for Yourself!

Note the dirt that this cream gets out of your skin the very first cleansing. Mark how your skin seems to get lighter in color as you continue to use the cream. Note how clear and radiant your skin becomes and how soft and smooth.

Even in three days' time you will see such a difference in your skin as to amaze you.

At My Expense!

With the free tube of cream I'll also send you all five shades of Lady Esther Face Powder. Thus, you can see which is your most flattering shade and also how well the cream and powder go together to give you a lovely complexion.

(You can paste this on a penny postcard.) (17) FREE

Lady Esther, 2010 Ridge Ave., Evanston, Ill.

COLORLESS

"It was after a few such intensive months," said Nelson, "that I conceived the idea of becoming a reporter. My obits read pretty slick, I thought. And I'd picked up a lot of reportorial knowledge by keeping my eyes and ears open and my mouth shut. And so, one bright courageous morning I advanced upon the City Editor and reminded him that he had once said to me, in an affable mood, 'I'll make a reporter out of you one of these days, young feller.'

"But alas for my Puritan upbringing which had stressed truth-telling though the stake be the reward! When the C.E. asked me my age I said 'Sixteen, Sir.' And the answer was, 'You have to be eighteen in order to be a reporter.'"

It didn't take Nelson longer than the walking distance to get down to the offices of the Evening Public Ledger and to the desk of that sheet's City Editor. Whereupon the following pithy dialogue took place:

Nelson: "I want to be a reporter."
C.E.: "How old are you?"
Nelson: "Eighteen, sir."
C.E.: "What do you know about reporting?"
Nelson: (lapsing haplessly into truth again) "Not a damn thing, sir!"
C.E.: "You're hired."

AND a full-fledged reporter he became. And then, just as things were going full tilt, came one of the newspaper's periodic shake-ups and young Nelson was shaken off the Ledger and onto the Evening Bulletin where he did every type of reporting from murders, which he sometimes had to see, to major league baseball of which he had never seen a single game.

"There wasn't much of life I didn't get to know first hand," remembers Nelson, "the seamy side and the silken side. And all the while I was studying advertising. When I left the paper I went into advertising agency work. And got to be a pretty expert copy writer and make-up man.

"It was about this time that I began to amuse myself by singing with phonograph records. I'd buy the records, learn the songs and sing 'em. I also bought a guitar and accompanied myself. I learned opera arias by phonograph and always sang them when mother and I had company evenings, using the records for accompaniments and drowning out, I am afraid, the original singers thereon.

"It never dawned upon me, however, with one of those dramatic sudden sunbursts of revelation that I had a 'voice' which I should give to the world. It did occur to me that here, in my singing, in the pleasure I got from it, might be another avenue of work, another 'job.'"

Everyone in Philadelphia, in the whole world of music for that matter, knew of David Bispham, the great American baritone of his time. And it was while he was still copy-writing and making-up that Nelson walked himself into the atelier of David Bispham one fine morning and said, "You teach, sir? Will you teach me?"

David Bispham said, "Sing." And Nelson, very young, totally untrained, stood there and sang an Italian aria memorized from one of his records.

Did the fates stand still and listen? Did the goddess of Music murmur and stir?

The next day a message came for Nelson. It was from David Bispham. It said—

(To be concluded next month)

doing in the picture. On occasion they have admitted as much.

It was during the filming of "Of Human Bondage," that Leslie Howard, at the end of the third day's work on the picture, walked off the set mopping his brow.

"My God!" he exclaimed. "The woman is walking away with the picture! She's tremendous!"

When the picture was finished, critics and audiences agreed with Mr. Howard that if Bette hadn't stolen the picture she had, at least, done all right for herself, and her work in it nearly won her this year's Academy award.

Although she failed to receive this award, Bette was recently honored by the American Institute of Cinematography, which is the organization of motion picture cameramen. Once a year they pay tribute to those in the motion picture business whose work is outstanding enough to warrant it and this year they honored Bette Davis and Helen Hayes. This was a sincere tribute from a non-political group of men whose opinion and knowledge of acting certainly is not to be taken lightly.

Bette appreciates these tributes sincerely. What girl wouldn't? But she refuses to let her head be turned, and goes serenely on her way, doing her best in every picture. And her best is a little too good for the mental comfort of the other people who work in her pictures. She has come to be known as Hollywood's star worrier.

Being aware of all this, it was the more amazing to me to hear her make that startling statement, as she did, not in the heat of argument or thoughtlessly, but calmly, almost disinterestedly. I was curious to know the reason for it.

"In the first place," she said, "I'm not a picture stealer because there is no such thing as stealing a picture. The person who has the part steals a picture. Sometimes a bit will stand out because it is showy and gives the actor an opportunity to do something with it. That is why a person playing a minor role will so often be pointed out as having stolen a picture."

AND then she said she thought being a star was horrible.

"But don't misunderstand me," she added hastily. "I wouldn't want not to be a star. What I mean is that the star is continually on a spot. Everyone is waiting for some other member of the cast to 'steal' the picture from the star. They take a fiendish delight in pointing out some minor player and declaring that he or she has stolen the picture 'right from under the star's nose.'

"The star, who carries the weight of the picture on her shoulders has, naturally, the longest part in it. She cannot hope to have a part that stands out every minute. She is on the screen so much that people get tired of looking at her and say, 'Well, for heaven's sake! Is she going to be on all night?'

"Consequently, when some other actor comes on for a brief flash with one smart line to speak, it is a refreshing diversion in the picture and someone is sure to say he stole the picture.

"A star has to make each picture better than the last one, and that is an impossibility. You can't expect even to make every picture a good one. If you have two pretty good pictures out of three you are doing well. That can't be helped when a star is under contract. The studio has to make a certain number of pictures and Warners isn't a woman's studio. The good pictures made there are all men's pictures. When I get a good part I regard it as a bit of luck."

Good philosophy for a girl Bette's age, isn't it? Bette takes life philosophically, but not too much so. After her success in "Of Human Bondage," a natural hopefulness led her admirers to believe that eventually she would be given other good roles. Bette, however, is not one to sit idly by on the chance that this hope, which she shared, might turn into a movement all by itself. On the contrary, she constantly is on the lookout for stories that would make good picture material for her. She reads books and manuscripts by the dozen in a search for roles she feels she could do well, and when mediocre roles are given her, she makes the best of them. And mediocre roles, in Bette's expert hands, invariably attain a respectability not even hoped for by their brain parents.

Bette refuses to take herself seriously. "How could I?" she laughs, and reminds you of her arrival in Hollywood. The press agent, who met her train, returned to the studio and reported that she had not arrived.

"He said he couldn't find me because I looked so unlike an actress," Bette laughed. "Of course I had no make-up on. In Boston, where I come from, people just don't wear make-up on the street.

"That was one of the first lessons I had to learn in Hollywood—to make people notice me," she continued. "I had one friend at the studio who told me over and over: 'Make them notice you, Bette. Don't be a little brown wren.'"

She had to unlearn everything she had been taught was right in social life. She had to learn to project herself and her personality. She had to appear physically flamboyant in order to make her employers suspect she would have glamor on the screen.

They told her she had pop eyes, that her mouth drooped, that her figure was bad. Obviously she could do nothing about these defects, if she had them and there is some difference of opinion on that point, so she did the next best thing. She learned to rise above them, to make her good points so important that any bad ones passed unnoticed.

BETTE'S first year in Hollywood was a series of disappointments but she held her head high and, possessed of an indomitable will and amazing courage, kept on. No one suspected the depth of her hurt when her own studio failed to notice her and time after time gave roles that would have been suitable for her to other actresses. She was no star worrier in those days. She was a worried starlet.

In those days she had lovely, long, very light hair that was her pride and joy, but she finally yielded to studio pressure and had it bobbed. And then, to quote her, she became "another Hollywood blonde."

Whether it was the bleached hair or the bob that did it will never be known, but something caused her to be noticed about that time. And once given an opportunity, the clear quality of her work won her the recognition she deserved.

"Experts insist that hair this gold color photographs better," she said with a wry face, "but I hate it. It embarrasses me when I go home to visit because in Bos-

The Serene Confidence of the 8th WOMAN

ALWAYS HERSELF

Do you know a woman who is never at a disadvantage, never breaks engagements, never declines dances (unless she wants to!) and whose spirits never seem to droop? She is apt to be that eighth woman who uses Midol.

NATURE being what it is, all women are not born "free and equal." A woman's days are not all alike. There are difficult days when some women suffer too severely to conceal it.

There didn't used to be anything to do about it. It is estimated that eight million had to suffer month after month. Today, a million less. Because that many women have accepted the relief of Midol.

Are you a martyr to regular pain? Must you favor yourself, and save yourself, certain days of every month? Midol might change all this. Might have you riding horseback. And even if it didn't make you completely comfortable you would receive a measure of relief well worth while!

Doesn't the number of women, and the kind of women who have adopted Midol mean a lot? As a rule, it's a knowing woman who has that little aluminum case tucked in her purse. One who knows what to wear, where to go, how to take care of herself, and how to get the most out of life in general.

Of course, a smart woman doesn't try every pill or tablet somebody says is good for periodic pain. But Midol is a special medicine. Recommended by specialists for this particular purpose. And it can form no habit because it is not a narcotic. Taken in time, it often avoids the pain altogether. But Midol is effective even when the pain has caught you unaware and has reached its height. It's effective for hours, so two tablets should see you through your worst day.

You'll find Midol in any drug store — usually right out on the toilet goods counter. Or, a card addressed to Midol, 170 Varick St., New York, will bring a trial box postpaid, plainly wrapped.

"I COULDN'T TAKE A STEP IN PEACE!

Every Move, Every Position, Cost Me Pain"

ANY person with Piles knows what suffering is. Piles cause you physical suffering. They cause you mental distress. They make you look worn and haggard.

Piles can take various forms — internal or external, itching or painful, bleeding or non-bleeding — but whatever form they take, they are a cause of misery and a danger.

A Scientific Formula

Effective treatment today for Piles is to be had in Pazo Ointment. Pazo is a scientific treatment for this trouble of proven efficacy. Pazo gives quick relief. It stops pain and itching. It assures comfort, day and night.

Pazo is reliable because it is threefold in effect. First, it is soothing, which tends to relieve soreness and inflammation. Second, it is lubricating, which tends to soften hard parts and also to make passage easy. Third, it is astringent, which tends to reduce swollen parts and to stop bleeding.

Now In 3 Forms

Pazo Ointment now comes in three forms: (1) in Tubes with Special Pile Pipe for insertion high up in the rectum; (2) in Tins for application in the ordinary way; (3) in Suppository form (new). Those who prefer suppositories will find Pazo the most satisfactory, as they are self-lubricating and otherwise highly efficient.

Try It Free!

All drug stores sell Pazo in the three forms described. But a liberal trial tube is free for the asking. Just put your name and address on a penny postcard or the coupon below and by return mail you'll get the free tube. Write for it today and prove the needlessness of your suffering.

ton—well, nice people don't wear hair this color."

AND she is planning an experiment in the near future, the first time she has a few weeks between pictures. She is going to let her hair grow back to its natural color and see if it can't be photographed effectively.

"That's one advantage of being a star," she laughed. "They light you and do all sorts of things to make you beautiful if you aren't. A star gets all the breaks, really, in money, roles, lighting, everything."

As Bette looks to the future she has no definite plan except that she wants to quit before she gets old.

"I couldn't say that I want to retire in five years or ten because I don't know, but I don't want ever to be old on the screen. I think everyone wants to be remembered as young and vital and for some outstanding performance. I suppose I'll be remembered for my role in 'Of Human Bondage,' which I think stood out because people were so amazed that I had the courage to play the girl as she was, without one redeeming feature. But I couldn't bear to have that remembrance dulled by ever being old on the screen."

So there is Bette Davis as I see her—young, beautiful, a finished artist, happy in her marriage, serious about her work but not taking herself seriously. She refuses the title of star worrier. She says being a star is horrible but admits in the next breath that it's horribly nice. She's a menace to the peace of mind of her rivals and whether she admits it or not, she really is Hollywood's star worrier.

COMMON SENSE + SENSIBLE EXERCISE = REAL BEAUTY

queens' opinions of themselves. And when you put on a lovely soft evening dress you look as if you could double for Carnera. Big muscles are swell in a young prizefighter. But they're hideous in a woman.

Believe me, I know about bicycle riding. I come from a country where bicycles are the thing. In Copenhagen everybody rides. And I've seen people's strained, haggard faces, their big thighs and legs and broad hips bulging all over the place. Swimming and bicycle riding will not reduce you in proportion. No violent sport will give you a perfect feminine body. You've got to relax when you exercise. And you've got to exercise my way.

Honestly, it seems to me that when people recommend things like swimming and bicycle riding and standing on your head all they're trying to do is to confuse you. They keep you in a constant state of bewilderment. The only apparent reason for their doing it is so that you'll keep on reading their stuff. Otherwise why would they give you such wrong dope?

BUT that isn't my way. I've never given anyone a wrong steer yet. I couldn't. I am only interested in having you solve your beauty problems. I want to teach you honestly and sincerely how to be lovely and happy. And I promise I'll never hold out on you.

And now will you promise me—and promise yourself, which is more important—that you won't let me down by falling for this bicycle riding and swimming nonsense, if you want to reduce properly?

But don't weep and wail if you've done these things through ignorance. In Hollywood one of my jobs is to take down over-developed muscles. And you can do for yourself what I do for the stars.

Study my pictures on pages 40 and 41 carefully. In them I show you how you can reduce fat and muscles in the thighs and legs. Put your right hand on a chair back. Take hold of your left ankle with your left hand. Relax. Keep relaxed the whole time you're doing this exercise. Lean forward and as you do so pull your leg up with your hand. Ouch! I thought that would get you. Feel that pull? Feel it in the left thigh and the right calf? Then you're doing the exercise right. Now repeat with the left hand on the chair back and the right hand holding the right ankle. Begin by doing it five times on each side and, day by day, increase to twenty times. You'll feel the muscles flattening out and the flesh melting away. And that's the right way to reduce.

Another thing that handed me a big laugh in the papers recently was the so-called brand new discovery of paraffin baths. Well, it isn't such a new discovery. Your mother used paraffin to seal up her jelly jars. And how would you like to be all sealed up like a jelly jar?

The idea is that the paraffin bath is supposed to open the pores, create circulation and cleanse the skin. What it really does is to make flabby muscles and make your heart pound like a steam pump. Believe me, baby, you don't need paraffin or any other paraphernalia to get circulation. You don't need paraphernalia to reduce. All you need is a lot of common sense and proper exercises and diets.

Reducing isn't easy. Nothing worth while is easy. And flesh doesn't roll away unless you make it roll away. There are no reducing short cuts. You'd think it pretty silly if I told you that the way to clean your house is to sit down and watch the dust roll away.

COME on now, don't be the type to swallow the nonsense some people hand you hook, line and sinker—particularly the sinker. Because if you do you're sunk!

Work for beauty. Follow my routine, because that is scientific and proven. Have youth, beauty and courage by climbing on the band wagon with Sylvia. And remember, I'm ready at all times to answer questions concerning all your problems. If you so desire, your letters will be kept in strictest confidence.

And you girls who look like Joan Crawford and you girls who look like Constance Bennett send in your photographs. Send them to Madame Sylvia, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. And be sure to watch for next month's MODERN SCREEN. I'm showing you the girl who looks most like Jean Harlow and telling that girl—and all you other girls—how she can completely remodel herself, the right way—without an ounce of bunk in the article.

And—look—if you want a personal reply to some personal problem, would it be asking too much of you to enclose a stamped, self-addressed envelope? Please. I'll answer any beauty, weight and general health problem you pop at me but send the stamped envelope.

BEAUTY ADVICE

Now maybe you're the type who has a small, well shaped head that can be as sleek and well cut as a boy's. Or perhaps you would look adorable with your hair built into a nimbus or halo of ringlets. Perhaps you're lucky enough to look well in half a dozen different types of hair-dos. Then you can be a different woman every shampoo.

About this business of types . . . lots of you write me, and maybe you enclose a snapshot of yourself and you say "What type am I?" Well, sometimes it is a little bit difficult to judge. You just can't pigeonhole people off into types nowadays because a woman who has to be efficient enough to hold a job and feminine enough to hold a man can be a dozen different types rolled into one. Look at Myrna Loy. If she hadn't been typed for so many years as the girl they called in whenever they wanted someone to play the part of a Chinese, East Indian, or half caste exotic, we would have had our own wholesome, grand, American Myrna delighting us with her modern roles a long time ago. They typed Claudette Colbert as a sweet, demure, goody-goody girl. And what did she turn out to be? The siren Cleopatra, the seductive Poppae, and "It Happened One Night" that she turned out to be a sparkling comedienne as well. What have you been typing yourself as? A drab little back number, a self-conscious twittery Jane, a girl with an inferiority complex? Well, then, be somebody different!

I'm in favor of every woman sort of "kicking over the traces" once in a while. If you go back to your old home town after being away for some time, you deserve the treat of dramatizing yourself with gusto. If you have a party frock that's cut a little low, wear it to the Fireman's Ball. If you have some exotic pajamas, give a tea in your mother's parlor for your best girl friends. Wear silver eyeshadow and blue mascara. Do things that make you feel glamorous, that help your confidence along.

YOU don't have to be freakish in your attempts to be individual. Nobody expects you to wear leg o' mutton sleeves when simple plain ones are the order of fashion, or to wear short skirts when long ones have been in since the war. But if everybody from the chambermaid to the Park Avenue debutante is wearing a tailored suit, why don't you choose a sports ensemble with a three-quarter length coat? Try to strike an individual balance between dowdiness and what everybody is wearing.

There's glamor in individuality, and glamor in freedom. Be free. Don't wear clothes that seem to bind you in physically. Joan Crawford, for example, says that she can't bear to wear any dress that is tight around the shoulders and arms, because then she seems to be bound in physically, and mentally. Incidentally, walking is the best corset in the world. If you exercise enough, you won't need tight foundation garments for lumpy hips and abdomen.

Good posture helps to strengthen your personality within yourself. It not only helps you to look well. It helps you to feel well. It will help you carry on the whole business of living more gracefully, and with more vitality and less of that tired, draggy feeling. Put into your subconscious mind the feeling that the body is a lovely thing, not a lump to be slumped into. Don't sit on yourself. That's what most of you do . . . settle down on the hips. Here is an easy way to obtain correct posture. Stand with your head and shoulders and buttocks against the wall, your heels out two or three inches. Now touch the wall with the small of your back. Walk away from the wall, and keep that position. When you pull in the lowest muscles of your buttocks, that makes the buttocks drop, and the abdomen draw back and up. Your chest should be comfortably high, your shoulders straight but loose, and your head back with your chin up. If you have any particular problems of posture . . . if you want exercises for that common failing lordosis (sway-back) . . . drop me a line and let me help you.

GET into the habit of correct facial exercise too. Marion Davies has one of the most lovable personalities because she has a smile for everyone, from the "prop boy" and electrician up to the director. Optimism is catching. I remember Irene Rich once telling me that the best facial she knew of was a smile. Every once in a while just let yourself think a smile, let it creep from the corners of your mouth to your eyes. It will act as a sort of inward and outward facial.

Why don't you start taking stock of your personality right now? You can't change your personality by waving a wand, and saying: "Presto, here's the new me." It isn't done by any overnight trick. Only the discovery of hidden power within oneself will do it. You can discover that power. You can learn to be attractive and to feel attractive. I have set down in a special bulletin for you the things that I feel to be most important (from a beauty editor's viewpoint) in the development of a new personality. Remember this about personality. No one is born without the makings of a charming personality. You can dream it into being, and work it into being. Send in the coupon for "The Secrets of Acquiring a New Personality" today.

endorsement of the National Florists' Association—it is still a pleasantly ingratiating effort gone wrong for lack of plot. Charles Butterworth, slyly humorous, is a rich play boy proposing on the dot of 5:30 P. M. daily to crisp blonde Jean Muir, the fashionable lady florist. John Boles, agreeably handsome, is a rich corporation lawyer whose marital difficulties become entangled in a strange fashion with the florist shop. Other times, he sings for you and right nicely, too. Sidney Toler, Ruthelma Stevens, Harvey Stephens, and Spring Byington are others in the cast which was directed by William Seiter.

Jean Muir moved her make-up box all the way from the Warner lot to Fox to appear in this one. The first time she's ever been loaned, either, and the Powers That Be over in Fox Hills were that pleased with their bargain; in fact, they liked the idea so well, they gave Jean fifteen gowns to wear in the film. The floral background is something to contemplate. Truck loads of fresh blooms appeared at the studio every day and there wasn't a prop boy whose best girl didn't have gardenias every evening. Fact is, everybody seems to have gotten something out of this picture . . . William Seiter, its director, landed a long term contract and Shirley Temple rated the model doll house used . . . John Boles may have missed out on gifts, but he's doing all right anyway. One good job after another for John and, at the moment he's over at Paramount playing opposite the operatic Gladys Swarthout in "Rose of the Rancho." He's living at Malibu these early fall days with the wife and kiddies—the same wife and kiddies he's always had. Nothing, you see, seems to turn Mr. B's profile. Which is cause for congratulations on his good judgment.

★★★★ China Seas (M-G-M)

It's a very red-blooded, he-man fare—this picture! Wally Beery doing his dirtiest and, cinematically speaking, W. B. can be pretty soiled; Jean Harlow, loving well AND wisely, Rosalind Russell, very charming and competent, and Mr. Robert Benchley, known as a wit, acting as a drunkard, and such a convincing one at that, that he should be embarrassed. There's mutiny aboard and cruelty, too, for when Mr. Beery decides that a man shall speak up and tell secrets, he has a way that would convince most of us that speaking up and telling secrets was the thing he wanted to do most. But not Gable! Nope, Gable won't let you down! He's still the hero, torture or no torture, broken foot or no broken foot. The settings are colorful, the fighting scenes handled expertly, the storm sequence thrilling and the various performances nicely done. Miss Harlow gets better in each picture, Miss Russell more restrained and charming, and the boys, Gable and Beery, each deserve a big, gold star for histrionics. We think you're going to like "China Seas," that is if you don't go for sissy movie material.

Clark Gable's real leading woman in this picture wasn't Harlow a-tall, according to Clark's own statement. 'Twas Carol Ann Beery, the six-year-old daughter of Wally. Carol's simply mad about Clark, too, but she confided to her Dad that she really con-

EAGLE BRAND CHOCOLATE FUDGE

2 cups granulated sugar
1 cup water
1⅓ cups (1 can) Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk
3 squares unsweetened chocolate
1 cup nut meats (optional)

Mix sugar and water in large saucepan and bring to boil. Add Eagle Brand Sweetened Condensed Milk and boil over low flame until mixture will form firm ball when tested in cold water (235° F.-240° F.). Stir mixture constantly to prevent burning. Remove from fire, add chocolate cut in small pieces. Chop nut meats and add. Beat until thick and creamy. Pour into buttered pan. When cool, cut in squares.

sidered him far handsomer than Mr. Gable. . . . Rosalind Russell hails from Connecticut and is one of a large family of seven youngsters. Rosalind is the only Russell who turned to the stage, but it looks as if she's made a wise choice . . . Robert Benchley's never been drunk before—in pictures anyway. But he's won the coveted title already of giving the best performance of an inebriated gentleman as yet seen on the screen. Mr. Benchley faithfully amused the cast every afternoon, living up to his reputation in fine style. But in the mornings he was completely useless for work or play. Seems that civilized people, according to Mr. B, never come to life until past noon . . . Tay Garnett, director of the picture, should know about the sea, since he's spent every possible moment in it or on it since he was a kid. He even got Clark so enthused over his yacht that they've enrolled in a navigation course together. One of the most beautiful sets ever built was erected on the Metro lot for the Hong Kong water-front scene. Buildings patterned exactly after those seen around the Chinese water front were put up alongside a huge iron tank of water on a rear set. Real sampans and junk were imported to be used on the water and at least half of Chinatown was brought in for background in the scene. All over the lot signs were posted in Chinese so that the new extras would not get lost, strayed or stolen.

★★★ Welcome Home (Fox)

While this is the somewhat old saw of a group of guys living by their wits and some of the situations are easily anticipated, you're going to have plenty of fun watching the antics of Jimmy Dunn, William Frawley and Raymond Walburn, a few "take" artists who would just as leave sell you what doesn't exist as not. Jimmy rates himself an invitation to the old home town, which is Opportunity spelled with a capital O for Raymond, who is all prepared to do big business of the not too honest variety. A little bond unloading, to be specific. Of course, it's up to Jimmy to eventually get himself and his pals out of trouble, which is no mean task when you witness the nifities that are being pulled right and left. The story is replete with bright dialogue of the strictly slangy variety and the players each make the most of the evenly distributed good roles handed them. Messrs. Frawley and Walburn especially rate praise as does the ever-pert Arline Judge. You will see an old silent day picture friend, Charlie Ray, in this one, too. Charlie does a choice bit of pantomime extremely well.

Preview Postscripts

James Dunn has been one of Hollywood's most eligible bachelors for some years now. But so far no real romance seems to have entered his life except a Grande Passion between him and Miss Shirley Temple. The stalwart Jimmy is simply reduced to pulp in that blonde's hands, while Shirley admitted to reporters that she's really serious this time about Mr. Dunn being her Big Moment, especially since he built her a two-story doll house. This is Jimmy's twenty-third picture, so you can see he's kept pretty busy, what with being a bachelor and an ardent aviator, too. He has his own plane and takes off to parts unknown without a moment's notice... This is Rosina Lawrence's first real chance in pictures, although she was practically brought up on the lot. Her father's a carpenter out there, so Rosina was able to crash the gates at an early age, and being pretty besides, she managed to get some "bit" parts off and on. Finally she landed her first big job. Sally Eilers was playing opposite James Dunn in "Dance Team" and the director decided that Rosina was close enough to Sally's size to become her stand-in. So she sweltered under the kleig lights and stood for hours on one leg and then on the other in order to arrange the best lighting for Miss Eilers. And now Rosina is Mr. Dunn's leading lady with a stand-in of her very own. Such is Hollywood . . . Arline Judge is the pertest, prettiest cutie in Hollywood. She looks like she belongs in the eighth grade, but will have you know that she's the very domesticated wife of director Wesley Ruggles and the very dutiful mother of a two-year-old son. Arline's been in pictures for several years, and each passing year finds her playing more youthful parts . . . Raymond Walburn is more familiar to Broadway play-goers than to movie ticket buyers, but his fan mail is beginning to show that this new audience is not without its appreciation of the finer points in histrionic ability.

★★★ Farmer Takes a Wife (Fox)

When you see this picture, you'll be addressing fan mail to a Broadway stage recruit called Henry Fonda. This young man appeared in the theatrical version of this story, scored heavily there, and so-o-o—Fox are grooming him for stardom. The yarn deals with the struggles of men interested in the Erie Canal and their efforts to combat a prospective railroad. Need we say that it all happened in the nineteenth century? The fighting river boatmen are headed by Charles Bickford, as competent a heavy as ever crossed the screen. It is on his barge that Janet Gaynor works. Of course, for purposes of conflict, Mr. Fonda claims the dear old canal is a thing of the past. That, as you may gather, makes no hit with Mr. B. and Miss G. However, Love eventually makes the latter listen to reason, as does a big, rowdy row make the former. Fox has spared no production expenses and the background and scenes are A-1 insofar as realism is concerned. The various roles are handled expertly, with Slim Summerville, Andy Devine and Roger Imhof coming in for especial honors. Miss Gaynor is adequate and the director and cameraman splendid at their respective tasks.

Preview Postscripts

This was taken from the New York stage hit—but with a difference. When the studios do a play they do it up right or know the reason why. On the stage, f'rinstance, such things as the Erie Canal is left to your imagination, but not at the Fox studios. And wotta price this little project developed into. Engineers, architects, historical authorities and a corps of helpers got their high-priced heads together for several months, resulting in an exact replica of the Erie Canal of 1853. This included the water, bridges, locks, landscape and all the adjacent buildings, even to the old Hennessey Hotel. The set looked more like Rome, Italy, than Rome, New York. Janet Gaynor just loved this part. Sweet, simple roles are right up her alley, though she's redheaded, freckle-faced and with a temperament to match. The big romance of her life was Lydell Peck, San Francisco socialite, whom Janet divorced after a year of holy matrimony. Now she divides her time between a mysterious dentist and Gene Raymond. . . . Henry Fonda used to be fonda Margaret Sullavan, even going so far as to marry her. But she divorced him a few years ago. Originally planning to be a gentleman of the Fourth Estate, Mr. F. studied journalism diligently at the University of Minnesota and worked for a time on an Omaha paper. Covering a story on the Community Playhouse there, he decided acting really looked like more fun and took it up seriously. His first big break was in the stage production of this same play. . . . Slim Summerville's been gangling around the movie lots so many years that most people, including Mr. Summerville, have lost count. He was a natural in the pie-tossing days out at Sennett's with that basket ball reach, but his first real recognition came in "All Quiet on the Western Front." Slim isn't really lazy a-tall, even if his favorite sport is fishing. . . . Andy Devine is probably the most envied man in Hollywood, since his waistline is strictly his own business. While other screen heroes order a lettuce leaf with a dash of lemon for lunch, in fear of studio sleuths, Andy sits down to corned beef and cabbage on the dot of twelve every day. What's more he has the same kind of disposition which fat men are supposed to have and leads a peaceful existence with his wife and small daughter. Andy comes from Arizona and is still surprised at getting a move on himself long enough to reach California. . . . Jane Withers is a bad example for all little girls, for it was her temper tantrums that made her famous. She stole a picture from Shirley Temple by being too disagreeable for words, and is now a Fox Baby Star.

★★ Murder Man (M-G-M)

This is another newspaper yarn, slightly more fantastic than its predecessors. The convincing note is casting Spencer Tracy as the man who gets front-page murder stories ahead of rival sheets. Somehow you believe that Mr. Tracy could do just that. The tale is pretty sordid, unreeling the method one man uses to avenge himself against another, and rather immoral, in that the spectator actually feels nothing but sympathy for the murderer. Tracy's performance is excellent. His quality of naturalness is something to cheer about in these days of overacting. Next, comes Harvey Stephens, who has some splendid dramatic moments as a condemned man who is innocent of the particular crime for which he has been convicted. Mr. Stephens rises to the occasion beautifully. William Collier, Sr., too, comes in for his share of praise for the fine portrayal of a small part. Virginia Bruce is the love interest, and displays very little of interest. Somehow this should have been a thrilling story, but somehow, it misses. And, to see the hero turn out to be a villain is very much off the beaten track and a little hard for the audience to take.

she is the most beautiful girl in America and, in consequence, fast becoming a very rich one. In fact, Marion sort of liked it better when she and Patsy Kelly, a coupla happy chambermaids in a big hotel, had a silent crush on Dick Powell, handsome young aviator. And, if it hadn't been for two fast-talking gents like Pat O'Brien and Frank McHugh, Miss Glory would never have had the permanent and facial that set her on the road to fame. The story, as you perceive, is highly imaginative and therefore, rather unconvincing. It isn't fast-moving enough, but perhaps a generous application of the shears will remedy this defect. Also, the comedy is a bit strained and the whole picture has a definite "trying to please" effect. Perhaps the director was a bit impressed with the magnitude of his assignment. Anyway, Miss Davies is very beautiful and charming and has an ingrating quality seldom seen in celluloid. The production is lavishly mounted and the photography excellent. Oh, yes, let's give a couple of loud, British cheers for Patsy Kelly, who does much with very little.

Working in a Marion Davies picture is some fun for the cast and crew. The gal's disposition is as sunny as her hair and she sees to it that "an enjoyable time is had by all." Coffee and sandwiches every afternoon and, at the end of production, a gift for each who has coöperated to make the whole a success. Naturally everyone does his best. This time the cast presented Marion with a silver plaque autographed by the entire unit. That's a tribute for you! . . . Frank McHugh is a laugh-getter both on and off the screen. He's the lad who keeps the gang in "stitches" even between shots—a practical joker with real wit. . . . Then we have Pat O'Brien who, everyone on Hollywood Boulevard will tell you is a regular guy and Dick Powell, who rated a birthday during production. What a party Marion staged for the event—and what "prazants!!" Dick is sort of lonesome these days, what with Mary Brian making movies in Europe. He's still true to the brunettes, for Olivia de Haviland, pretty and talented newcomer, is his playtime companion. . . . Lyle Talbot always does well with the fair sex, too. Still, with all his partying, Lyle takes time to answer his fan mail personally. . . . Seems as if the champion cigar-smokers of the town were concentrated on this picture. Mervyn Le Roy, its director, puffed 22 stogies a day, Pat often got away with 16, while Frank, the big sissy came in a bad third by inhaling merely ten. O'Brien couldn't take a cigarette though. He was called upon to smoke one during a scene and it made him feel as if he was crossing the water to Catalina on a breezy day. The 200 extras voted that they'd never worked with such a congenial bunch of principals.

★★★ We're in the Money (Warners)

The gold-digging blonde babies, Glenda Farrell and Joan Blondell, are at it again. This time they appear as a couple of process-servers, and do they get their men! In Turkish baths, on night club floors; well, no place is too public nor too private for these crashers. The gals are working for an absented-minded attorney, played by that inimitable comic, Hugh Herbert, and what the yarn loses in plausibility is more than made up for in its laugh-inducing qualities. Glenda and Joan do their usual stuff in quite the usual way, and if you like them—and who doesn't—you're in for a quota of fun. Ross Alexander is good as the masquerading chauffeur and love interest, and Phil Regan makes an ingratiating crooner. Then there is a newcomer, Anita Kerry, who rates a bow and, of course, Mr. Herbert, who sets a mad pace for the picture. The motorboat sequences are calculated to be side-splitting and the manner in which the daffy attorney is finally caught up with by the scheming little lady who is out to get heart balm—anybody's cash will do—is a riotously funny situation. Yes, as light fare, "We're in the Money" will more than suffice.

★★★ Steamboat 'Round the Bend (Fox)

Whether or not you are a Rogers' fan, this new Will, gone dramatic, is going to please you plenty. Stripped of his usual political tirade, Mr. Rogers steps forth as a purveyor of patent medicines—need we say containing 90 percent alcohol—in a simple and interesting story of river folks, saving his money to buy a dilapidated steamboat which he hopes to have his nephew pilot. The boy, John McGuire, in love with a swamp girl, commits a murder in her defense. Against her protests, Will turns him over to the sheriff in a most amusing manner. This bit of fun, however, is topped by a fancy jail wedding given the pair of lovers to the musical strains of "Listen to the Mocking Bird." Mr. Rogers plays Mr. Rogers in his usual charming manner, Francis Ford is simply slick in the role of a converted sinner and Anne Shirley, Eugene Pallette and Berton Churchill all contribute to the general merriment.

There was as much fun on the set as in the picture in this one, for those two well-known wits, Will Rogers and Irvin S. Cobb, got together on some snappy repartee, much to the amusement of the rest of the cast. Evidently, Robert Benchley's successful cinema career was becoming a little too much for Mr. C., for upon seeing his friend's "rushes" on "China Seas," Irving signed himself a contract at Fox. He likes making movies, thank you, and will probably appear in another before returning East for the winter. . . . Mr. Rogers still hits the high places at the box office, for his homely comedy is appreciated by the deah public. Rogers has a sort of unwritten formula for successful pictures—lotsa laughter and go sparingly on the triangle situation. . . . John McGuire and Anne Shirley, taking care of the youthful love interest, aren't "that way" off the screen, despite the rumoring of the rumor hounds. There's an older man in Hollywood who is cuh-razy for pretty Anne but he declares that since he's not a cradle robber, nothing will ever come of it. While Anne doesn't exactly spend "quiet evenings with her books and pictures," she is not the type to be doing the rounds of a night. Nobody is more serious about her career than this little lady. . . . Eugene Pallette and Berton Churchill have forgotten more about acting than most middle-aged thespians will ever know. They enjoy talking things over between scenes and reminiscing about the "good old days" in the theatre.

★★ Dressed to Thrill (Fox)

This just doesn't live up to its title in any department, so not much can be said for it except that it serves to introduce a new face to American moviegoers. What promises to be a sparkling comedy begins to lose its fire early in the telling. However, Tutta Rolf, as the Russian darling of Continental night clubs does what she can to cover story deficiencies by giving a highly interesting characterization. Clive Brook, in a most unsympathetic and dull role, lacks conviction in his romantic efforts with Miss Rolf. You see, he has had the opportunity to fall in love with the lady on two separate occasions, the first of which he let slip by the boards in favor of a beeg bankroll. Robert Barrat comes in for some praise as Clive's war-time buddy and we must give credit to the designer who created Miss Rolf's beautiful wardrobe. Also, a nod to the scenic artist. Somehow, that is all that may be said for "Dressed to Thrill," for if suspense is lacking in a story and you don't much care how it turns out, you find yourself, like the Easy Aces, anxiously anticipating the newsreel.

★★ Shanghai
(Walter Wanger-Paramount)

Check up another hit performance for Charles Boyer. With pretty slim story material, which is most of the time draggy, this picture is well worth seeing because of Mr. Boyer's excellent portrayal of an Eurasian, who is ostracized, because of his being a half caste, by the social whites. It is a necessarily sympathetic role and yet, never does the star become maudlin or sentimental. As its title indicates, the tale is unwound against a Chinese background, with Loretta Young playing an American girl over there on a visit to her wealthy and eccentric aunt (Alison Skipworth). Loretta looks more beautiful than ever and is seen in close-up after close-up, until one finally realizes that there can be too much of anything—even if it's as good as Miss Y.'s features. Warner Oland plays excellently the philosophic friend of the hero's and Libby Taylor, is fine as the faithful colored maid. Fred Keating is badly miscast and, therefore, unconvincing. The art director and cameramen come in for their share of honors, for never have we seen such delightful settings and beautiful photography.

★★★ She (RKO)

"She," based on the curious mystery tale by Rider Haggard, will make the chills run up and down your spine. As a spectacle, it is magnificent, for the sheer magnitude of the background and effects sweep you away from the work-a-day world, even at times tending to make the actors seem unimportant. The plot of course is fantastic and concerns the journey of Randolph Scott and Nigel Bruce to the Kingdom of Kor in search of the eternal flame (youth, to you). No advocate of the cold cream route, "She," played by Helen Gahagan, has retained her beauty for 500 years by entering the flame annually. However, when Randy appears, she decides to concentrate on him and becomes fiercely jealous of Helen Mack. Well, you sort of have the idea: even a queen can't take it. Of course, anything is liable to go haywire once in 500 years, and in the big sequence, it's the dialogue that gets pretty weak. You'll like the spectacle however, and Miss Gahagan and Helen Mack. Oh yes, the gentlemen who make the journey to Kor are all right, too, thank you.

Persistence does have its points, since the movies have finally landed Helen Gahagan after five years of struggle. Miss Gahagan's been too busy with too many things, really, to come to Hollywood, what with acting on the stage, singing in opera, taking care of husband, Melvyn Douglas, and their eighteen-months-old son, to say nothing of several goldfish. Miss Gahagan began this hectic life at Barnard when she co-authored a play with another girl and appeared in it, too. John Cromwell, a Hollywood director now but a New Yorker in those days, spotted her and whisked the seventeen-year-old girl to Broadway. Helen was starred at twenty, played several hits in the Big City, then snapped her fingers at the whole business and set sail for Europe to become what she's always wanted to be—an opera singer. She had a grand time and sang in several famous operas. In Prague, Miss Gahagan got in a rather tight spot. It seems the opera for the evening was to be sung in Czecho-Slovakian and the nearest thing to that language that Helen knew was pig-latin. However, she blithely sang the score in Italian while the other leads and the chorus warbled back at her in their native tongue . . . Randolph Scott is the young man who graduated with such honors from Westerns. He's big, blonde and husky, with jaw and fists like iron and a kind, honest look in both eyes. Naturally, when he drifted into Hollywood he was immediately thrust into tales of the wide open spaces. So he busted bronchos pictorially for three years, until the studio suddenly put him in "Roberta" due to an emergency. Having proved that he can break hearts as well as horses, Randy's been in demand for romantic stories ever since. Randy used to be Georgia Tech's star football man, then he tried out for the team at the University of South Carolina, roamed around Europe a couple of summers and finally drifted to Pasadena where he joined up with the Community Players. One day he took the street car out to a Hollywood studio and he's been there ever since . . . Nigel Bruce is well known on the London and Broadway stages. He can make anything laugh. Friends swear that even dogs have been known to giggle when he looked at them sideways. He was born in California, but feels as English as mutton.

★★★ Escapade (M-G-M)

First and best, this will give American fans an opportunity to meet the much-publicized Luise Rainer, Metro's German importation. To say that Luise rises to every claim the studio put forth for her is but to put it honestly. She has charm and acting ability which serve her in a cast of highly capable American players who know well the Hollywood ropes and who never have to think of their English before reading a line. The Rainer eyes, too, are sumpin'—sumpin' gorgeous. The story deals with a pre-war romance in gay Vienna. A famous artist is the philanderer (William Powell); a dutiful (?) wife, his current temptation, (Virginia Bruce) and a little secretary (Miss R.) the gal in whom he falls deeply in love. The picture abounds in color, dramatic moments, irate husbands and character studies of ladies who love unwisely. The performances are quite perfect, too; well, you'd guess as much when you hear that, added to the above-named fine cast are such sterling players as Reginald Owen, Frank Morgan and Mady Christians. Put this on your movie list.

Preview Postscripts

You'd think Luise Rainer was an old hand at stealing pictures, wouldn'cha? But the truth—and no publicity gag—is that Miss Rainer has never moved in front of a camera before in all her twenty-one years. She thinks the brightest feather in her cap, movie stardom notwithstanding, is that she's a Max Reinhardt protégée. She's been on the Viennese stage for several years. Without music around her, Luise is as comfortable as a fish out of water. Has an immense machine at home that can play thirty operatic records without pausing for breath, and this she turns on before the bath water of a morning . . . Bill Powell proved himself even "gallanter" while playing with Miss Rainer. He spent long hours giving his leading lady the low-down on camera technique and the English slanguage. Bill's one of the busiest men in Hollywood, what with one thing and another. For over a year his biggest worry, next to Jean Harlow, has been the building of a modest twenty-room house in the Hollywood Hills. Said he wanted to see where his money went for a change—but admits he's already seen too much, and with the house but half finished.

★★★ Lady Tubbs (Universal)

This picture is just "too, too deevine!" as Lady Tubbs was so fond of saying about everything from pancakes to palaces. Lady Tubbs is the "Brainless Brady" at her best and is practically the whole picture in spite of the excellent supporting cast which includes Alan Mowbray, Douglas Montgomery, June Clayworth, Hedda Hopper and Anita Louise. In spite of Alice Brady's apparent dumbness in this play, however, she is an extremely smart woman at heart. From a cook in a construction camp to a titled lady who wins the fox hunts at baronial castles, is a jump that requires more assets than a broad "a." Mr. Mowbray is simply elegant as the polished gentleman who teaches her the ropes, and goes through untold tortures when she makes her social debut. He it is, too, who rigs up the horse out of a piano stool, a floor lamp and some leather cushions, on which Miss Brady learns to ride to hounds. Hedda Hopper is in her chronically good role of the social climber and ultra-snob, and Douglass Montgomery is adequate as the son on whom she keeps an eagle eye. Anita Louise plays the sweet young thing who is the object of his affections and June Clayworth, the ruthless young lady who regards Doug as her own property. Miss Clayworth, incidentally, is an actress of decided ability, even if she doesn't show much talent in getting her man. The picture is one you won't want to miss, for it is one good laugh from beginning to end.

In sassiety news style, "a good time was had by all" on this picture, what with a collection of wits like Alan Mowbray, Alice Brady, Hedda Hopper and the others in the cast who aren't exactly stuffy, either. Alan Mowbray's famed in this country and abroad as having the largest fund of top-notch tales ever accumulated by one man. He's an Englishman at that, but far from the stiff-necked, snooty type which too often invades Hollywood . . . Alice Brady's known for years as the lady who's never missed a comeback. Miss Brady is well known on the Broadway stage, too, and in the days of silents pulled down the largest salary of any screen actress —$6000 per week, which was big money in the good old days before state taxation. Claims she doesn't live in a home but a dog-kennel. Every purp is welcomed with open arms by her, whether it be a transient or permanent guest. Any time you see eight greyhounds on a leash coming down Hollywood Blvd., you can be sure Alice Brady will be on the other end. She has an insatiable appetite for detective stories, and every chair, table or corner in her home, not occupied by a dog, is piled with sleuth literature . . . Hedda Hopper is one of the De Wolfe Hopper wives, besides being a Hollywood fashion plate. Hedda starts talking the minute she hops out of bed in the morning and never runs down 'til she's back there again . . . Douglass Montgomery is a shining example of a young man unhampered by his parents' wealth. Brought up in Pasadena with every possibility to run with the "idle rich," Doug studied acting day and night. Though he had chances to become prominent through the Pasadena Community Playhouse, he chose small, insignificant parts in Broadway plays for several years in order to gain experience. Finally achieved his goal, then came home to the Playhouse and from there to Hollywood . . . Anita Louise is another who's worked hard all her young life. Though a leading lady at fourteen, Anita kept on studying languages, music, fencing—in fact, everything that might help her in acting. An accomplished horse-woman, she had no double in the difficult fox-hunt rides in this picture. But in one scene she was thrown by her fiery steed and rescued just in the nick of time by the gallant Mr. Montgomery. Alice Brady had better ideas, though. She rode a dummy horse. But it bucked so badly the first day that a prop man rushed out and bought her a whole armful of cotton batting.

★★★ Diamond Jim (Universal)

Here is a hearty tale of the Gay Nineties with, as its central figure, a famous diamond bedecked character who knew how to throw as mean a champagne supper as ever passed the lips of a chorus girl. You have doubtless heard of the legendary Diamond Jim Brady and here is your opportunity to see him—in the celluloid. Edward Arnold portrays the character role with a deal of realism. He has the opportunity to run the gamut of emotions and comes through like the splendid actor Mr. A. is. Jean Arthur is seen as the little lady Diamond Jim loved and lost. Cesar Romero is the mustachioed meanie who treats her the way women seem to like to be treated—indifferently—and Binnie Barnes plays Lillian Russell, famous American beauty. Eric Blore and George Sidney, comedy characters, come Binnie Barnes works hard at making American movies while her husband carries on his business in England. Theirs is probably the world's champion long distance marriage. Fact is, Binnie's "worser" half plans to drop over to this land of equal rights and unequal fights to see his wife this fall . . . Edward Arnold has been tipping the scales puh-lenty lately and the Powers That Be who hold his contract are beginning to worry, 'tis said. However, Mr. A. is such a swell actor that he may be able to get away with the calories, too . . . We also have the temperamental Jean Arthur present in this opus. She's a clever gal, is Jean, but is known around Hollywood as being one that is hard to handle. A great little scene-stealer, too. The setting for this production set Uncle Carl Laemmle back much munyee; in fact, one set alone cost $103,000. Anything to entertain the public! That is Universal's motto. And goodness knows, they're right! This one abounds in color; in fact, that alone makes it worth the price of admission; that, and of course, the consistently clever cast.

★★★ Old Man Rhythm (RKO)

If you are one of Buddy Rogers' fans you may be disappointed to see so little of your favorite in this picture, which brings him to the screen after an absence of nearly three years, but gives him little opportunity to display his musical talent. The picture is unusual in that there are fat parts for almost everyone but the star.

The plot is laid at Fairview College, with a typical musical comedy background where there is more interest in sex than science. The fun begins when George Barbier, who carries the title role hilariously, enters college to watch over his son, played by Rogers. He becomes the life of the campus and succeeds in breaking up a romance between Rogers and Grace Bradley by pretending he has lost his fortune. Miss Bradley withdraws and all signs point to love in a cottage for Rogers and Barbara Kent.

A picture of scattered entertainment, it gives opportunities to several young newcomers. Joy Hodges, a pretty girl, who was discovered singing at the Cocoanut Grove and Sonny Lamont, a very fat boy who handles himself with dexterity,

Alice Brady and Alan Mowbray in the hilarious "Lady Tubbs."

There's a scene in this picture in which the girls are called upon to serenade the boys. Now, just what the well-dressed girl should wear to serenade her man was a little item that called for much kidding and debate. When you know that the cast consisted of twenty-year-olds (excepting Buddy), you'll realize that the players had their fun and the director his troubles. The story required that much ice cream, candy and cake were to be eaten and did the boys and girls have a gay, old time—for the first few days anyway. Now, however, none of them—except lit-tul 270-pound Sonny Lamont can look a sweet in the face. Despite his "excess", Sonny is some mean hoofer . . . Somewhere along the way, it was discovered that Buddy Rogers could take shorthand, and was he kept busy while the script girl was at lunch! Buddy learned that sometimes it's a bad thing to be too clever and willing . . . Barbara Kent used to be a great favorite with the fans. Then she up and got married and retired. Now she's back again, more petite and pretty than ever. Her marriage, by the way, is one of Hollywood's most successful . . . The pulchritudinous Grace Bradley is stepping right along toward stardom and little Joy Hodges, too, looks as if she's a comer. Yep, this picture serves to exploit a lot of youthful talent you're gonna hear much more about before very long.

★★★ Smart Girl (Paramount)

Bright and amusing and nothing to give you brain fag is this well-dressed comedy of errors. The comedy is carried effectively by Joseph Cawthorn and the errors made by Pinky Tomlin, who proves that he can act as well as write and plug songs, for nary a note does he warble in this one.

Ida Lupino and Gail Patrick are left to shift for themselves when their father, caught in the depression, shoots himself. Gail takes the first offer and marries Kent Taylor, with whom Ida also is in love. Ida discover that her ability as an artist is worth money and gets a job designing for Joseph Cawthorn, hat manufacturer.

When Sidney Blackmer, an unscrupulous oil man, hires Kent to work for him and Ida learns that the company is about to be investigated by the Government, she evolves a plan to save her brother-in-law.

Gail Patrick has just about everything—beauty and brains. Yep, the cast of this picture was surprised to learn that this charming Miss from Alabama has studied law and still is ambitious to become a senator from her home state. That, despite a growing movie career. If Paramount does right by Miss P. they'll discover she'll eventually become a money-maker for 'em . . . Ida Lupino, as you may have guessed, is about as difficult to suppress as a boil. She's everywhere at once, has more energy than a small dynamo and is strong on fast conversation. No, there's never a dull moment when Stanley Lupino's chee-ild is on the scene. Incidentally, she's just signed another contract with Paramount and has a nice role in "Peter Ibbetson" . . . Joe Cawthorn, you may or may not know, was a great stage comedian when your mother was a gal. He graced many a Broadway musical and if there was a laugh to be gleaned from the libretto, Mr. C. would get it . . . Sidney Blackmer, too, hails from the stage where he starred in several light comedies where a profile and physique were perquisite. Now he's gotten older and heavier and consequently finds himself the bad man of the picture piece . . . Pinky Tomlin used to warble at the Cocoanut Grove where the college girls fell, en masse, for his charms. 'Twas then that the studios investigated and now it looks as if Pinky is to become a permanent film fixture.

★★★ Bright Lights (Warners)

The Joe E. Brown fans are gonna have a field day in this one, for they'll see their favorite at his best in a made-to-order story, slim though it be as to plot. Joe plays a tramp comedian who graduates from the sticks to the bright lights of Broadway. Brown's a married man who falls for a capricious society gal (Patricia Ellis) who joins up with the troupe. However, he comes to his senses—or is brought to 'em—and returns to friend wife (Ann Dvorak) in the last reel. Joe proves that he can dance, Pat turns out a mean tune and Miss Dvorak gives a pretty, slick performance in this one. Yes, the entire cast does right by itself, including that old standby Joe Cawthorn, and that new one, William Gargan. The settings are colorful and often amusing and the chorines something to cheer about. Busby Berkeley takes care of the directorial end of the picture and does a most creditable job. Yes, Mr. Brown is fortunate to have landed this opus. It's a well-nigh perfect set-up for his particular talents.

The oldest theatre in Los Angeles, The Grand, at First and Main Streets, is employed as the background for this picture. It is now a Mexican vaudeville house, by the way. As a boy of seventeen, fifty years ago, Joe Cawthorn played there and to this day it hasn't been remodelled. Yep, even the same old gas fixtures flicker away. Some of the scenes were made at the Follies, a burlesque show in these parts, and the entire troupe were used, even to the soubrette who sings a gay, little number entitled "Powder My Back." The Maxellos, German tumblers, were brought here especially for the picture because Joe Brown is cuh-razy for acrobatic acts. He had one swell time. The night the cast worked at the Follies—the public as well as extras were used in the mob scene. Wouldn't you have liked to have been around that night 'cause the Dear Public, too, were paid for the fun they were having? . . . Pat Ellis celebrated her seventeenth birthday during the proceedings and was given a grand party. Pat started her movie career at fourteen and at that time told a great big fib about her age so that she wouldn't have to go to school.

★★★ Jalna (RKO)

You've got to be more interested in character studies than in plot action to enjoy this picture of the doings of a wealthy, clannish Canadian family. But if you like sharply drawn characterizations, you're in for an evening's entertainment, for each in his role deserves a big gold star. The picture itself is rather dull and very talkie, yet Director John Cromwell has made a rambling story as compact as possible. If the picture is in the three-star class, it is strictly because if his expert handling and the deft performances of the well-chosen cast. We are treated to the spectacle of the Whiteoaks at home. Behold a gabby, old grandmother, a weakling poet son, a boy you'd like to strangle, the noble head of the house, a daughter suffering for twenty years from unrequited love. Into this melée comes a girl of uncertain parentage as bride to one son, and a very self-sufficient New York secretary as bride to another. The fact that the brides fall in love with a coupla other guys (sons-of-course) makes for the only real interest in the yarn. Jessie Ralph, Ian Hunter, Kay Johnson, Nigel Bruce, David Manners and Molly Lamont all have almost equally important roles and, as we've said, they're all equally good in them.

One of the most important members of the cast of this little opera is Oscar, the parrot. Oscar was heard as well as seen during the early days of production. In fact, he was so much in evidence, he was soon banished to his boudoir. Seems that in the big dinner table scene, Oscar, who picked up phrases quickly, shouted, "Lock 'em up," which means in studio parlance, "the scene is over; tear down the set." Before anyone could speak walls began to come down on all sides. Well, that was when Oscar was given his walking papers . . . Jessie Ralph, who plays the grandmother has made eight pictures so far, in seven of which she portrayed characters of different nationalities . . . Molly Lamont, the ingenue, is a little English actress RKO imported from South Africa. She was the ping pong champion there and thus far no one in Hollywood has been able to beat her at the game . . . C. Aubrey Smith's cocker spaniel, known as Sinner, applied for a job in the picture and b'gosh, got it. Speaking of dogs, a Great Dane adopted the cast. He would arrive each morning and stay with them all day . . . Kay Johnson, who has perhaps the most important role in the picture, was once again directed by her husband, John Cromwell. However, Mr. C. plays no favorites at the studio . . . David Manners, also in this large cast, is about to receive his citizenship papers, David hails from Nova Scotia.

The "New Must"

● MRS. FRANCIS L. ROBBINS, JR., wearing Cutex Ruby Nail Polish and smart matching Cutex Ruby Lipstick. Mrs. Robbins is a beautiful and popular member of Long Island and New York society.

MATCHING LIPS AND FINGER TIPS

LIPS and finger tips must match—that's the latest rule for make-up! And you had better follow it because you'll look pretty scrambled if you don't.

It sounds like more work, but it isn't. You can be all matched up today without wrinkling a brow or lifting a finger. Because Cutex has brought out a complete range of harmonizing lipsticks and nail polishes.

6 smart harmonizing shades

Just pick the smart shade of Cutex Liquid Polish that will best accent your costume—you can choose from Natural, Rose, Mauve, Coral, Cardinal and Ruby.

Cutex is a polish that flows on evenly, leaving no rim or streaking of color. It won't chip or peel off. Cutex finger tips—and toe tips, too, if you want to be very smart—will stay marvelously smooth and gleaming.

Now, you simply complete the color ensemble with the Cutex Lipstick that matches or tones in with your nail polish. Natural Lipstick goes with Natural, Rose and Mauve Polish. Coral, Cardinal and Ruby Lipsticks match Coral, Cardinal and Ruby Polish.

And remember—the new Cutex Lipstick shares the famous Cutex quality. It's creamy and smooth—never greasy. It goes on with the greatest ease and stays on. And it positively won't dry your pretty lips.

You'll find Cutex Liquid Polish at your favorite store. Crème or Clear, with patented metal-shaft brush that holds the bristles in tightly. Be sure to get the Cutex matching Lipstick, in its smart black enamel case!

a tour of today's talkies

(Left) Mr. DeMille spared neither time nor money to make "The Crusades" the most lavish of his spectacles. Here are Katherine DeMille, Henry Wilcoxon and Loretta Young. ★★★★ The Crusades (Paramount)

The annual DeMille epic is once more with us, and as is usual with the efforts of the great Cecil B., it is loaded with spectacle and grandeur. The sight of what looks like 10,000 Hollywood extras in full armor smacking each other down on the plains of Jerusalem is edifying enough in itself, but Mr. DeM. comes through with several other lavish touches just to remind you that movies can still be made for a million dollars. The story has to do with Richard the Lion-Hearted, who joins the Crusades to escape a marriage to the sister of his cousin Phillip, King of France, and finds himself almost immediately obliged to wed the daughter of the King of Navarre. He's quite pleasantly surprised, however, when she turns out to be Loretta Young. As portrayed by Henry Wilcoxon, Richard is a hale and hearty guy whom you'll like immensely. Loretta Young is as beautiful as ever and the rest of the cast (all 10,000 of 'em) is excellent. If you like your DeMille, here's one of his best.

This is tops for all the DeMille spectacular spectacles. Cecil B. outdid himself on lavishness more from sentiment than extravagance this time. Seems the DeMille ancestors fought the good fight in the Crusades. It's their coat-of-arms used in the picture, too. A dozen authorities did research for over a year before the cameras ground out the first foot of the 300,000 made. Nope, you won't have to watch that many unreeled, since only 10,000 feet were released. Paramount felt decidedly Middle Aged for about six months, what with every available corner on the lot flaunting medieval castles, ramparts, moats, catapults, etc. One set alone took up four acres, and it was a daily occurrence for 1500 people and 800 horses to be working at the same time. Even if you aren't statistical-minded it still took 4800 pounds of nails for "props", 46 tons of lumber and metal for one siege tower, 2500 pounds of crepe hair for mustachios, 18,000 yards of cloth, several thousand wigs, fifty gallons of imitation blood and a few tons of chain mail. Climatically though, the fillum didn't cost a penny, since there's an absolute parallel between the ozone and vegetation in Palestine and California. But it looked for a while like the whole project would flop since not a falcon could be located in this country or England. In desperation, a director turned to the L. A. directory and discovered Orin (Continued on page 8)

Zannon, who not only had a falcon but eight of them. . . . Henry Wilcoxon was the true martyr of the "Crusades." He had to live for four months with the birds and his horse. This meant giving up his pet passion, yachting, since the falcons objected to the water and the crew objected to the horse. Mr. Wilcoxon had to give up hair-cuts for almost a year, too. Just here a year from England, he is amazed at the sacrifices American actors have to make for their Art . . . Katherine DeMille received her role in the picture as a Christmas present from Papa. Determined to make her own way in the movie world, Katherine has turned down good offers for roles because she felt that her father's "drag" was responsible. . . . Loretta Young has been in the flickers for yars and yars—but she started at fourteen. Considered by many as one of the ten prettiest girls in Hollywood, Loretta is kept busy dashing from one studio to another and trying to keep her weight up. Just made her first trip to Europe. Fred Perry is reported to be one of the reasons. . . . If you keep your eyes open, you can spot many an old-timer in this—William Farnum, Clara Kimball Young, Hobart Bosworth, Lillian Rich and Florence Lawrence. . . . There was no dearth of excitement while shooting this, either, since the scenes were generally thick with flying arrows, fire-balls, falling walls and much smoke and fire. Firemen were on duty during all the mob scenes and it was a regular occurrence for several warriors to plunge into the five feet of water in the moat in order to extinguish their flaming costumes. Director DeMille has a patented "mob system." He uses eleven assistant directors on a scene calling for a thousand extras. Each assistant is in charge of a group of one hundred, and this group in turn is broken up into sections of ten with a competent extra in charge. He's used the same warriors in so many pictures, that they've formed a club known as "Cecil's Warriors."

★★★★★ A Midsummer Night's Dream (Warners)

First of all, there is the outstanding pictorial loveliness of this film. When the first forest scenes came upon the screen, this hard-boiled reviewer felt quite breathless and excited for a moment. The accompaniment of the Mendelssohn music added greatly to the effect. Then, we were delighted to find that all the Warner players took their Shakespeare quite calmly. They read the lines as if they were actually conversing and didn't once rave and gesture all over the place. This was particularly commendable in the younger players—Dick Powell, Jean Muir, Ross Alexander and Olivia di Havilland, whom we think you will consider a find. Anita Louise is a lovely Queen Titania. Mickey Rooney had a fine time as Puck and, while there was a trifle too much of him, it is an amazing performance for a young lad.

James Cagney, as Bottom, deserves a paragraph all to himself. Mr. Cagney, mark our words, is a real actor. It's quite a jump from tough-guy roles to classic comedy. To make Shakespearian slapstick as funny as a modern wisecrack isn't easy. He does it. Well, we don't suppose the Cagney fans will allow him to desert his customary roles for doublet and hose but we, personally, consider him versatile enough to be cast in a greater variety of parts than he has had thus far.

We have only one criticism—the film is too long. We would hate to be asked what should be cut, because it's all so well done, but cut it should be. However, even if you do get a little hungry during the run of the picture and even if one foot does go to sleep, see it—every bit of it—because it is a great step forward in modern picture making.

★★★★ Top Hat (RKO)

By this time you've probably learned that when a screen musical involves Fred Astaire and Ginger Rogers it turns out to be the kind of entertainment you're looking for. Well, here's why you'll like "Top Hat":

First, Fred Astaire does more dancing than he's done in any of his previous pictures. Second, they've done Ginger Rogers up in a new hairdress which makes the gal more attractive than ever. Third, Irving Berlin has decorated the whole business with some swell songs, notably "Isn't It a Lovely Day?" and "The Piccolino."

The story will remind you of "The Gay Divorcée," since it's based on the same theme—the one where the gal thinks the guy is someone else again—but it manages to keep out of the way of the comedy and the dancing. Incidentally, there's a supporting cast including Edward Everett Horton, Eric Blore, Erik Rhodes and Helen Broderick, all of whom are top-

Coffee-making is an art—take a tip from Charlie Ruggles

the modern hostess

(Right) Mr. Ruggles isn't out to claim any honors in the culinary field, but he does boast making a good cup of coffee via the drip method. (Below) Doesn't the Dutch Apple Cake that Charlie's cook baked look too tempting? The recipe for this and many more delicious coffee companions are free for the asking.

Courtesy None Such Mince Meat

By Marjorie Deen

IF THERE is anything Charlie Ruggles likes it's coffee and . . . you know the sort of thing I mean . . . coffee and doughnuts, coffee and pie, coffee and cake and of course, coffee and coffee cake.

But of first importance is the coffee itself, which, in Mr. Ruggles' estimation, must be full flavored and crystal clear.

From the early morning "cupacoffee" on through the day with Charlie it's coffee here, coffee there, coffee, coffee everywhere. Coffee for breakfast at his farmhouse in the San Fernando Valley (served in colorful Mexican pottery cups to go with the decorations which are Mexican throughout), coffee at the Brown Derby for lunch, coffee in the studio commissary between scenes, yes, even coffee in the dog shop that is Charlie's pet pastime (no pun intended!).

Charlie raises dogs, you know, in extensive kennels on his farm. The card of the dog store where they are sold reads: "The Terrier Shop. Accessories and Puppies, operated by Charlie Ruggles' See-Are Kennels." And it was in this shop that I finally caught up with the elusive Mr. Ruggles after tracking him for days!

When I arrived I found Charlie brewing for himself, under the interested gaze of a prize cocker spaniel, a generous pot of coffee for mid-afternoon consumption. That's what started the conversation along coffee lines, in the first place, and that's how I discovered that the Ruggles' food favorites are of the type that are at their best as coffee-companions.

WE STARTED OFF by discussing doughnuts as we "dunked" them cheerily and without shame into the delicious coffee Charlie had made. Quite a coffee-maker is Charlie (I understand this is his only culinary accomplishment). He insists that the first requirement for a good cup of coffee is good coffee, ground especially for the type of coffee-making utensil you intend to use. Personally he prefers coffee made by the drip method, with which I am in hearty accord.

For drip coffee as for any other, the coffee must be measured accurately. The amount varies according to personal preferences, of course. Some prefer very strong coffee, others a trifle weaker. But really weak coffee should never be permitted to make an appearance anywhere. After the required amount of (Continued on page 58)

RKO went Venetian with a bang for this one. Three sets were used to construct a canal that would have put the European ditches to shame. A faithful reproduction of the Lido was constructed on another, even to the same pattern in the grilled iron balconies. A half dozen de luxe gondolas were patterned after an imported original, while the half dozen gondoliers were all imported originals. Mr. Fred Astaire tapped up the ladder of success in a comparatively short time, but even the top rung doesn't satisfy him. He's the World's Worst Worrier. Practice has already made him perfect in the opinion of everyone but Mr. A. He's at it from morn 'til night and often then. Fred originates all his own dances and those of his partners, while the chorus work is the idea of Mr. Hermes Pan, RKO's dance director. . . . Mr. Pan has used the same thirty girls and boys for the choruses of the Carioca, Continental and Piccolino. . . . Ginger Rogers' story is what makes gals forsake home for Hollywood. She was born and raised in a little Arkansas town, but neither Ginger nor her mother, Lela Rogers, intended that she'd stay there long. So dancing, speech and singing lessons shared honors with spinach on Ginger's daily diet. From Broadway Lela brought her daughter to Hollywood and is now the proud mama of a star. In what private life Ginger's allowed, she's Mrs. Lew Ayres. . . . The fact that Helen Broderick's just making her film début isn't the fault of RKO. They signed the actress two years ago to a contract. She was to make her first picture on completion of the Broadway run of "As Thousands Cheer." It was complete 74 weeks later. Miss Broderick's been married 25 years to Lester Crawford, with whom she appeared in vaudeville. . . . Eric Blore literally shot to cinematic fame after "The Gay Divorcée." Any set on which he's working has to be closed to visitors since re-shooting scenes mounts up in the money. And every Blore comedy scene brought on so many laughs from the spectators that the studio faced bankruptcy. Even now the crew wrecks an occasional scene with badly suppressed giggles.

How he became the best-dressed baby in town

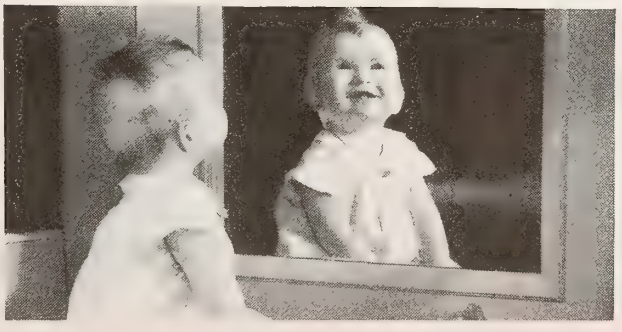
(As told by Danny's Mother)



Little Judy was taking a sun bath with my Danny. That's how this thing started. Judy's diaper was so much whiter than Danny's, it made him look like a poor relation. "How come, Hazel?" I asked Judy's mother. "I work harder than you, but your clothes are whiter."

"Danny, you get Judy out of your hair," Hazel grinned back. "And tell your mother that she works hard enough, but her soap is lazy. It just doesn't wash out ALL the dirt. So her clothes are only half-clean—and that's why they have that tattle-tale gray look."

It sounded pretty sensible to me, so I took Hazel's advice and changed to her soap—Fels-Naptha. Glory, what a difference! That marvelous golden soap is so chuckful of naptha that dirt almost flies out. In no time at all, my clothes were a gorgeous white again.

And now look at Danny—he's the best-dressed baby in town. His clothes, and everything else in my wash, look simply grand. What's more, they're safely clean. Fels-Naptha is so gentle I use it for my very best silk undies. And it's wonderfully easy on my hands, too!

Hollywood front from romances

You may worship the ground your favorite movie stars walk on, but we know a girl who doesn't even have kind words for the air some of them breathe. She's a stewardess on one of the transcontinental planes, and she has decided opinions in re a few of the lovely ladies who fly through the air with the greatest of ease. Up in the clouds where there are no autograph hunters outside of a stray angel or two—8,000 feet above sea level and the Warner Brothers—a star's real character asserts itself. Among the screen sirens this little lady nominates for oblivion are Miriam Hopkins, Katharine Hepburn and Nancy Carroll. On the credit side of her books she lists Jean Harlow and Kay Francis; among the favorite male flying stars are Wally Beery and Dick Barthelmess.

Mary Brian continues to be the unmarriedest gal in these parts, despite the fact that she's been linked with enough prospective bridegrooms to keep the average girl in husbands the rest of her days. Our spies tell us that Dick Powell, when he first arrived in Hollywood, proposed to Mary several times and got the downward thumb on each occasion. Dick and Mary are still pals, but it seems Dick has given up the home-and-kiddies idea, at least for the present, which means he's not confining his crooning to La Brian.

Fame is a fleeting thing, if you can believe Arline Judge. Arline took a peek at the International Exposition at San Diego recently, and while strolling about the grounds, she was approached by a stranger who offered her a job in the nudist show. "It's seventeen bucks a week," the guy told her, "but here's the big inducement. The Hollywood producers are always looking over the show, and a girl as cute as you oughta stand a chance of getting in pictures." "It's a nice offer," replied Arline, "but I'm afraid my husband wouldn't let me. He hates the movies!" And that's the true story of how Arline lost her big chance to become a movie actress.

James Melton, whose radio baritoning has won him a lot of fans, recently arrived in Hollywood to star in the musical, "Stars Over Broadway." Harry Warren and Al Dubin, who have turned out more hit songs than you can choke a crooner with, wrote the ballads for the picture, and they came to a slight impasse with Mr. M. regarding one of them. Jimmy liked the music, but he didn't care for the words. He particularly didn't like the words "scrambled eggs," in the song. He didn't mind scrambled eggs in their place, but he refused to sing about them. As we march to press the battle still rages, with Warren and Dubin standing up for the ancient (though sometimes

The title of this little episode is A Ribber Ribbed or A Blonde's Revenge, and it's the reason why director W. S. Van Dyke is out gunning for a girl named Harlow. Recently Van tossed a formal dinner party for Regina Cannon, and the Harlow name was not on the guest list. Dinner was progressing in a quiet, dignified manner at the Van Dyke menage when a limousine drew up to the front door and in marched Jean and a gal friend, both attired in slacks and blouses and both bearing blankets and a picnic lunch. La Belle Harlow and friend swept into the dining room, eyed the guests, spread their blankets on the rug, opened their lunch boxes and nonchalantly tossed banana peels and egg shells on the floor. From a critical standpoint, it was one of Jean's best performances. Incidentally, it also broke up the dinner party.

Credit Raquel Torres with creating an innovation in Hollywood parties. She and hubby Stephen Ames entertained 200 tourists at their home recently, and while guests cocktailed and roamed about the house and grounds everyone wondered how the hostess would solve the problem of introducing celebrities. The answer came with the arrival of the first star, when a loud-speaking system boomed out: "Ladies and gentlemen, for your approval—Binnie Barnes." And after each announcement the panic was on, what with most of the guests making a dash for autographs.

While we're mentioning the Raquel Torres-Stephen Ames party, it might be well to add that the real fun began when some of the visitors decided their host was Eddie Cantor. While the rush was on poor Stephen was accidentally shoved into the swimming pool, clothes and all. At this crucial point Vince Barnett heroically tossed off his coat and dived in to the rescue, much to the glee of the guests. So now Stephen is wondering whether the thing really was an accident. Maybe Rubinoff was in the crowd.

It's girls like Wendy Barrie who send travel bureau men off to rest cures. Before the completion of "A Feather In Her Hat" she announced to the waiting world that she would pack herself off to London to be maid of honor at her sister's wedding. By the time the picture was completed she had completely forgotten London and announced her destination as Honolulu. Maybe that explains why two days later she packed her belongings and left for Mexico. Anyway, it's nice that she could get away for awhile, don't you think? (Continued on page 54)

The Last Interview

"You don't think I should say that about your favorite humorist. But you haven't even given me a chance to finish." Then Hal Mohr added, "And he's the most generous, the most sincere, the most lovable man it's been my good fortune to meet up with in my many years as a cameraman in this industry."

Hal Mohr settled comfortably back in his chair. The expression on his face was that of a man who is about to talk upon a favorite subject.

"The night before Will starts working on a new picture," Mohr told me, "he sometimes gets around to taking the script home. Just to get the general gist of the story. Next day he arrives at the studio, smiling that wise-sheepish smile of his—totally and blissfully unprepared on his lines. The old-timers have learned to expect this—but the newcomers! Nobody ever tells them that one of the idiosyncracies of America's favorite homespun philosopher is never to learn his lines for a part, as the author intended them to be spoken.

"So imagine the actor who's never played with Will Rogers before! Innocent as a lamb, he arrives on the set, bubbling with gratitude at the opportunity to play in a picture which everyone knows beforehand will be a knock-out box office success because Will Rogers is in it.

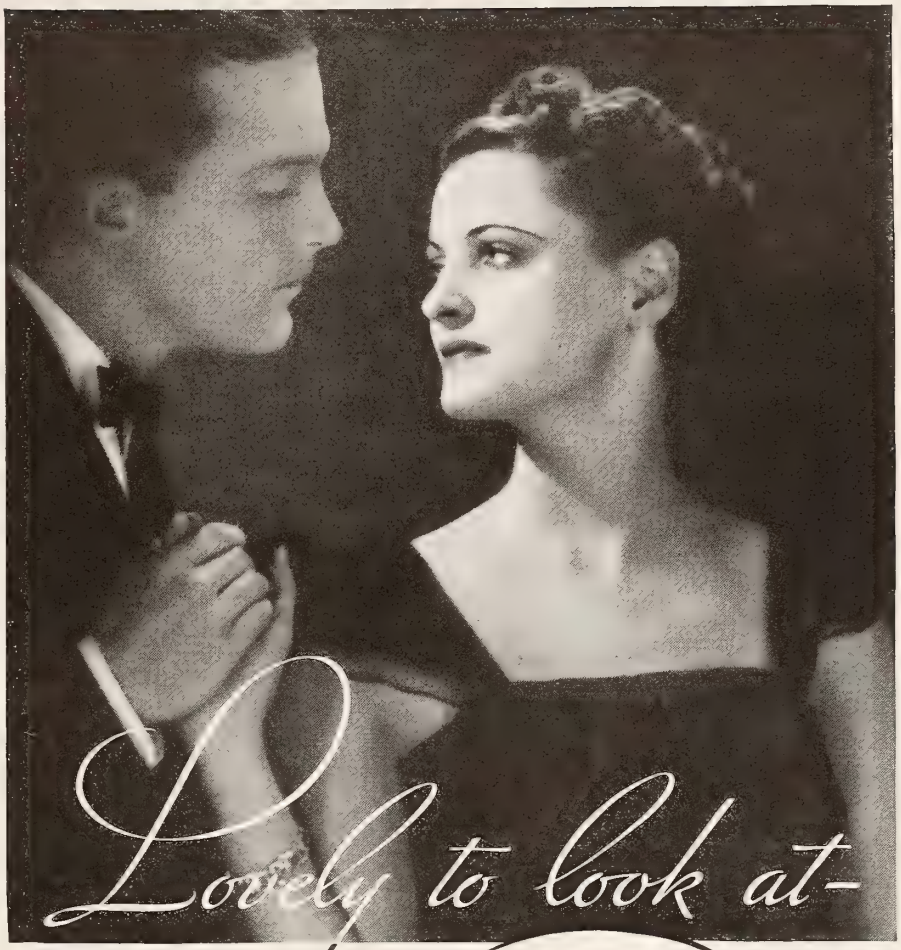
"He waits for a certain cue in a speech. The cue doesn't come. For Will ad libs his lines. Furthermore, he improvises them differently every time he plays the scene. It isn't because he's too lazy to learn them; it's because each time he rehearses a scene he thinks of a better way of delivering a speech. Something spontaneous that fits the situation far better than the lines the author has written. A spicy, humorous touch, like those that give his morning column such punch.

"Valiantly, the script girl—if she's new—corrects him. Then she, too, learns her lesson, accepts these Rogerisms as the rest of us have learned to do, and trusts to Providence. None of which ever feazes Will. He goes right on, improvising better and better lines and wisecracking with the crew who worship him.

"But don't run away with the idea that actors object to working with Will. On the contrary. They love it! Playing with Will Rogers is ready-made Heaven for all aspiring young stars, once they get used to Will's way of doing things.



FOR Will Rogers is probably unique in the industry as the one important star who'd rather face an assemblage of cannibal chiefs than face the camera in a close-up. He'll invent all sorts of machinations to avoid having his full face in front of a lens. He'll go out of his way to push the other actors up to face the camera, while he plays with his back to the lens. You can imagine what a break that is for the young up-and-comers, who have come away from making other pictures with other stars firmly convinced that every screen celebrity is necessarily greedy for close-ups.

"When the picture finally reaches the cutting room, it's a foregone conclusion there aren't going to be any full face close-ups of Mr. Rogers. Which may give you some idea of the man's modesty.

"Modesty—and generosity! His two chief characteristics. You will forgive me if I grow eulogistic. After all, I'm speaking of the man who helped me win Evelyn.

"I'll tell you a little story—a Will Rogers story.

"The company for 'The County Chairman' had gone to the Mojave Desert for location shots. Naturally, when Will Rogers arrives anywhere, he's mobbed by the usual welcome committees, the town band, and the autograph books. Diffident as he is, Will has learned to take this kind of thing in his (Continued on page 95)

beauty advice

Heads, lovely heads, and all offering new faces for each of you! Reading from the top down the right. Dixie Crosby's young-girl arrangement of soft curls and a ribbon. Binnie Barnes in a severe, classic hairdress and below in two soft, feminine arrangements that are equally becoming. And then three stages of Ginger Rogers' haircombs from the early "Change of Heart" days to the present "Top Hat" sophistication and chic.

Tired of looking at the same face? Then change your coiffure as Hollywood does!

By Mary Biddle

WHEN YOU'VE gone shopping for a new hat, haven't you often wanted to buy a new face to go along with it? Of course you have. So have we all. We have peered hopefully into the mirror, trying on this model and that, hoping to find the hat that would "do something" for us, that would bring a new and interesting stranger to the mirror instead of the same old face. We all get tired of our faces, even the glamorous ladies of Hollywood. There's many a girl who would give most anything she possessed if she could look like Norma Shearer, and yet I know for a fact that Norma gets afflicted with the "I want to be different" spasms, even as you and I. What does she do about it? Well, she generally rushes to Antoine's to have an entirely new hair-do to pep her up.

The hairdressing shop is a better bet than the hat shop for finding a new face, even though the hats this year would certainly tempt us to buy a whole assortment of new faces, if we only could. Hats have "gone Hollywood." They're dramatic. They're playing the grand lady. Don't you love them? But let's don't wear the same old faces under them. The best way to find a new "You" in the mirror, and to find a new "You" to arouse interest in someone else's eyes, is to change your coiffure.

EVERY WOMAN dreams of finding the perfect hairdresser, I suppose, who will do her over in the twinkling of the scissors. But good hairdressers are rare, that is, good to the point of being artists able to create the particular type of hairdress that flatters you, and satisfies your urge for being made over. Most hairdressers will ask you, "How do you want your hair cut?" So you, in the final analysis, have to be the guiding genius of your own coiffure destinies.

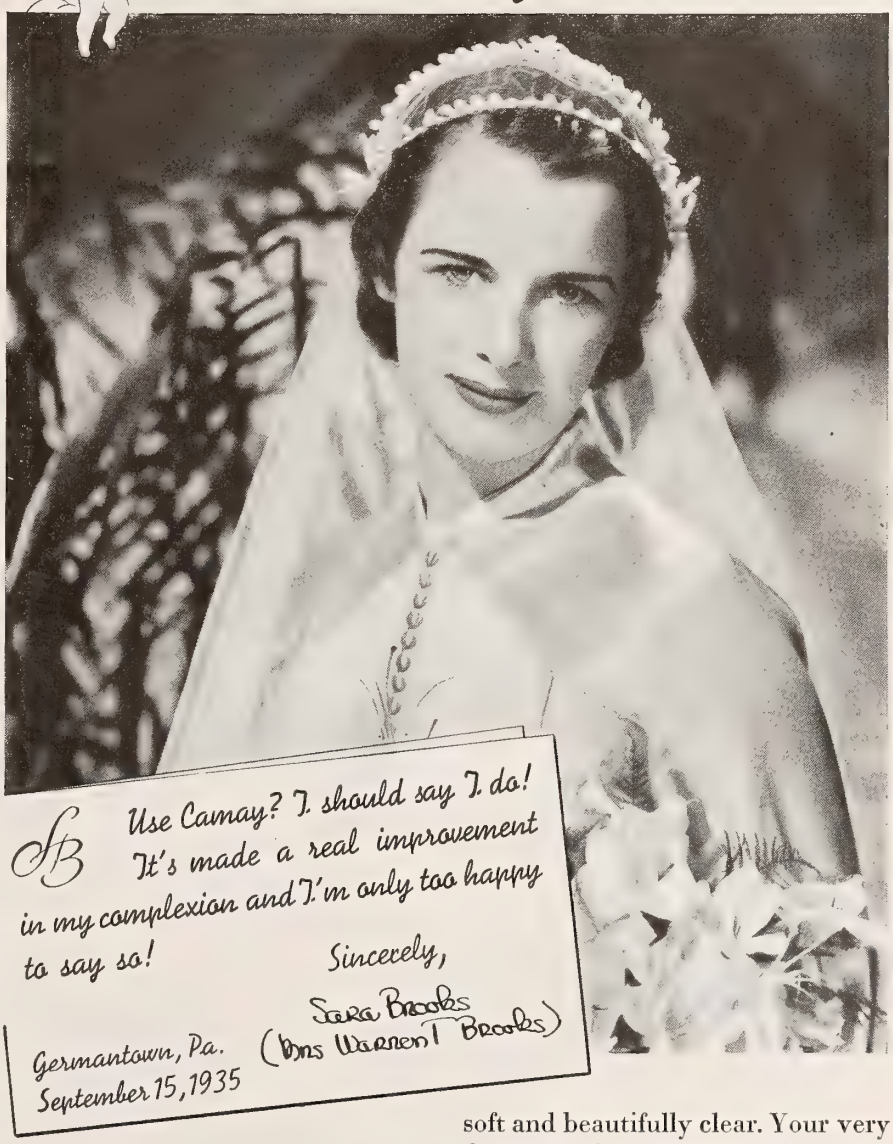
Binnie Barnes was partly my inspiration for writing this article . . . and you were the rest of it. She gave me such a grand story about her own changeable coiffures that I had to give it to you, along with my own amplifications, of course, because your letters indicated that you were fairly shouting for advice on "How shall I do my hair?"



Naturally, it would be impossible for me to prescribe the perfect coiffure for each one of you. But there are certain principles of hair arrangement that Binnie and I can give you, however, that should help you to decide what particular type of coiffure suits you best. First off, remember this very important "Don't." Unless you have the perfectly chiseled features of a Dolores Del Rio, don't go in for extreme hairdresses, or sharply defined outlines of hair. Irregular features, and most of us have them (including the stars), demand a more lenient arrangement of waves and soft outlines.

If your face is long and thin, your hair should be parted on the side, a not-too-high part, and brought down in a swirled wave or soft bang (or bangs) across the forehead. It should have a soft fluffed out effect over the ears in order to give roundness to the outline of the face. Now on the other hand, if your face is round and full, you should have a hairdress with a high side part, an off-the-face effect, and a flat arrangement over the ears.

LARGE loose waves are the vogue nowadays. Small crimpy waves are too unnatural looking, and besides that, they add years to the face instead of subtracting years from it. Let's hear what Binnie has to say about her own illustrated coiffures, as applied to hairdresses in general. Take picture number three, the one with the medium length bob, and the large loose wave. Says Binnie, "I admit there is nothing startlingly new in this hairdress, but when in doubt, there is nothing like it. It is becoming to young and old, fat and thin, and to regular and irregular features. If it were not for the fact that we girls forever are looking for variety, this style would be universally adopted, I'm sure."

Because "we forever are looking for variety," I'm going to interpose a suggestion (Continued on page 94)

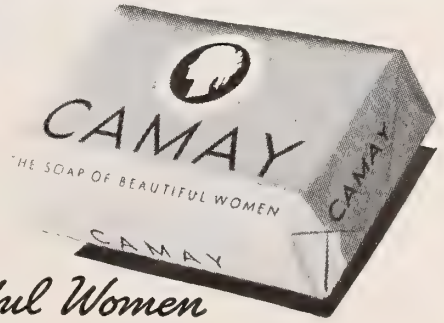
Praises for Camay from a Lovely Bride of Autumn

Use Camay? I should say I do! It's made a real improvement in my complexion and I'm only too happy to say so!



Sincerely,
Sara Brooks
(Mrs Warren I Brooks)

Germantown, Pa.

HERE'S a very pretty person and a lifelong friend of Camay—at least from the age she could tell right from wrong in a beauty soap. Her name was Sara Stratton and she was married just last fall.

Her clear and lovely skin is a real compliment to Camay's gentle character. And another indication that Camay's pure and gentle lather keeps the feminine skin marvelously soft and beautifully clear. Your very first use of Camay will show you how gentle and mild a fine beauty soap can be—how it can help to bring new softness and clarity to your skin. Camay's low price is another pleasant advantage.

Let Camay bring your loveliness to light.

Even though Claudette Colbert rushes busily from Paramount to Columbia making pictures, her doting audiences bemoan the necessary lapses between her screen appearances. She's just that popular. Lately Claudette's make-up kit was parked at Columbia where she was filming "She Married Her Boss." And according to enthusiastic reports, you can prepare now to enjoy it as much as you did "It Happened One Night." Melvyn Douglas and that dashing Mike Bartlett are her romantic partners in this gay opus. Out of role, Claudette still keeps the gossips wondering about her romantic interests in life.

She marries her boss

And Roger Pryor is the lad around Hollywood who can repeat the title below with fervor! He's been Ann Sothern's boy friend for sometime despite the various rumors out of Hollywood that would make you think their mutual heart throbs aren't real. Roger and Ann are teamed for "The Girl Friend" on the screen, too. Ann is the charmer who put North Dakota on the Hollywood map and she has done the old state proud. She's got talent galore and beauty plus—but just look at this stunning portrait for full appreciation of the latter.

What a girl friend!

Just let Hollywood give Mr. Muni a role he can sink his teeth into and you will be assured grand cinema fare in your home town. Paul is the chap who quietly goes about this business of acting and with deftness puts across one fine performance after another. It's no wonder that the Brothers Warner keep him safely under contract year after year. "Dr. Socrates" is the uninformative title of his next picture in which he has Ann Dvorak as his leading woman. Paul isn't disturbed by the rumor hounds because he remains devoted to Bella Muni.

Dickens and Elizabeth Allan seem to strike the fancy of the M-G-M bigwigs as an unbeatable screen team! And certainly, the deceased Mr. Dickens would be the last one to protest such an alliance, for Elizabeth seems to have the happy knack of making his most delightful heroines live again. So great was her acclaim as David Copperfield's mother that Elizabeth is now playing Lucie Manette, the immortal heroine of "A Tale of Two Cities." As for Monsieur Charles Boyer, that gallant Frenchman has become a domestic menace on these shores. There's something about those quiet, suave performances of "Private Worlds" and "Shanghai" that have set the average American wife's heart going pit-a-pat at the mere mention of his name. Right now Charles is making pictures in France and his wife, Pat Paterson, is following suit by appearing as Mme. Boyer in a French picture.

It's gotten so that the John Monk Saunders are about Hollywood's most active commuters. First John dashes over to England to run up a little story for Gaumont-British and then the little wife, Fay Wray, packs her bag and hikes along after him to do a picture for the same busy British film company. It's almost reached a point where the New York ship reporters never know whether they are having a farewell or welcome home interview with Fay. Incidentally she's home for a spell and you'll be seeing her in "Alias Bulldog Drummond," in which Jack Hulbert rescues our lovely heroine from a gang of jewel thieves.

Gaumont-British accent

Michael Bartlett's screen career has been brief to date but more than auspicious in that he has had the luck to play romantic leads with two of Hollywood's biggest box office darlings—Grace Moore in "Love Me Forever" and Claudette Colbert in "She Married Her Boss." Michael, believe it or not, escaped a New England textile career by his music-loving mother upsetting his textile-minded father's after-college plans for him. She had watched his success in Princeton Triangle shows and realized that he had a voice and talent. One break followed another with result that the handsome Bartlett profile is star stuff.

New leading man

her mother's failure brought Harlow fame

By Ruth Biery

THERE ARE really two Jean Harlows—the one you know on the screen and the one you might have known had Fate not intervened. And yet, there is little doubt that this second Jean would not be a star today if the first Jean had not come to Hollywood first.

But to understand about these two women—the mother and the daughter—it is necessary to begin our story back many years, in the heart of the Middle West, Kansas City.

Picture a large and well-furnished suburban home edging a bustling, rapidly growing city. The war was over and Kansas City was settling down to the boom of the mad twenties. An average American family lived in that typical house of the immediate post-war period. Dr. Montclair Carpenter was a dentist with one of the most lucrative practises in the city in that day when people could afford to humor their teeth and pay cash for the humoring. He was one of the backbone-of-the-city type, an elder in the Emmanuel Presbyterian Church, a youthful pillar in business and social circles. His neighbors could not, and cannot, speak too highly of him.

His home differed only in one respect from those of other successful men in the community. His wife was more beautiful, his daughter more adorable than the other wives and daughters. Harlean Carpenter was undoubtedly the most beautiful young matron in Kansas City. And Harlean Carpenter, the second, looked much like her. Although those who knew them well then claim the child did not have the beauty of the mother.

The family seemed happy. The mother each Sunday attended the church where her husband was so prominent. Little Harlean went to Sunday school. There were many merry parties where the wife of the successful young doctor was the envy of the other women. Her beauty was so striking, her naturalness so fascinating.

IT IS NOT fair to guess, ever, at what causes dissension in the "happiest" family. Even though we live next door, we cannot know—really know. Somehow, husbands and wives never tell, even in court, the true aches of heart and of soul.

We can wonder, of course. Part of the fun of living is wondering about our neighbors. We can ask ourselves if the lovely, young Mrs. Carpenter caught that post-war fever of so many women—the desire to accomplish something. Did she catch the feminine disease of ambition which was just then beginning? When we are ambitious, really ambitious, there is nothing we can do but give in.

The outlet for true beauty was then in Hollywood, as it is today. So one morning, Mrs. Carpenter burned the bridges of suburban life in Kansas City behind her, tucked little Harlean Carpenter, the second—then about seven—onto a train and headed westward. She divorced her husband.

We probably shall never know exactly what happened to the two Harleans during their first experience in Hollywood. Hollywood is always a trying place for great beauty coupled with great ambition. This is an old saying, but it's true: You may have talent, ambition and beauty, but you cannot have success without the "lucky break." If Director Von Sternberg had not seen Marlene Dietrich lunching in a restaurant in Germany; if Mauritz Stiller had not refused to step foot on American soil unless a little friend, named Greta Garbo, were not given an acting opportunity!

Somehow, the moment did not come to Mrs. Carpenter. She returned to the home of her father, a town near Kansas City.

Little Harlean was growing up. As she rounded into adolescence, she showed signs of developing the beauty of her mother. The mother began to think more and more of the future of this tiny miniature of herself. What would she be?

How many, many times have we seen this in Hollywood! There is no ambition more subtle and yet all-absorbing than the ambition of a mother transferred, often without the mother's knowledge, from self to child. Ann Dvorak's mother had it. She renounced a brilliant career for marriage. When marriage failed, she became intent upon Ann's career. Ann was to have what her mother had missed! She was to become a great star, she was not to renounce anything for marriage. And it isn't only in Hollywood! How many times have you heard mothers say, "If only I had had a college education! Well, believe me, my daughter is going to have what I missed!"

Mother and daughter drew closer and closer together. They became two lovely, brilliant dashes of femininity traveling life's challenging road as a unit. Hollywood often has wondered about the (Continued on page 64)

Did you know that Jean's mother once sought stardom?

Above, the resemblance of Jean and her mother, Mrs. Bello, is amazing. Long ago in Kansas City friends thought that Jean would never be as lovely as her maw! Here they are in a recent "snap."

Right, Hollywood has wondered about the great bond between Jean and her mother. Jean feels she owes everything to her mother's driving ambition for her. "Riff Raff" is Jean's next picture.

old man cooper advises master freddie

By Faith Service

Caught unawares, these two kids have a real heart-to-heart talk

THE CONVERSATION reported below took place the other day between Freddie Bartholomew and Jackie Cooper as they sat with me in an office on the M-G-M lot. Unknown to the two boys, everything they said was taken down in shorthand just as they said it. Freddie flipped a coin with great dexterity as he talked. A bag of jelly-beans passed back and forth between them. And as they chewed they talked. They were both very serious, very dignified, very mature. And neither of them were conscious of the way in which they were revealing themselves. In this talk you will be able to perceive the rudiments of their young philosophies, the young buds of their skepticism, the innocent birth of their knowledge that Fame is fleeting and easily forgotten.

A striking study in contrasts, these two lads. Sturdy, American, twelve-year-old Jackie with his bright gold hair, his broad, sun-tanned face, the easy assurance of his "tremendous experience" and the more delicate, poetic, nine-year-old English Freddie, with his brown, Byronic curls and lilting English voice. On the surface, two child stars. Under the skin, two little fellers who forgot, now and then, the rigors and responsibilities of stardom and lapsed into boy talk of motor-bikes and pillow fights and aeroplanes and cabbages and kings.

Here is what they said:

Freddie: How did you get started in picture work, Jackie? I don't know that I ever heard, you know.

Jackie: Oh, I've been in pictures about seven or eight years—well, a long time ago I did extra work with Lloyd Hamilton. I think I was about four or five, but I wasn't noticed on the screen at all. But then later, at Fox, Mother was working in the music department there; they were picking out someone to sing a song in the Fox Movietone Follies and my mother thought she might as well take a chance and bring me along. She didn't say, though, that I was her boy. I sang my song and they thought I would be good for Our Gang Comedies and they told Hal Roach about me and he signed me up. I think that's how it was. My mother knows the story backwards. . . .

Freddie: But what was "Our Gang"? I don't know that I ever saw it at home in England.

Jackie: Oh, just shorts! Well, it was fun, though. A lot of kids. There was a colored boy in 'em and a big fat boy, and we used to get into mischief all of the time. That's about all there was to it. You ever do any work over there in England?

Freddie (modestly): Well, just a little. I began when I was about five, too. I was on the stage a little. Just charity work, you know. They don't allow little boys on the real stage in England.

Jackie (knowingly): Oh, sure, I know, benefits and things. Well, how did you get over here, then?

Freddie: Well, I came to New York for my vacation. Cis and I, you know. Cis is my Aunt Milicent Bartholomew. And we heard about "David Copperfield." And I asked Cis to write out to California and say that I wanted to play David. She didn't want to, but I made her write and Mr. Selznick invited us down to his house and I recited Shakespeare and things and I fitted the part and . . .

Jackie (enthusiastically): Swell! I don't think anybody else could have done that part, either. I mean it. You were swell. No other little English boy in the world or any other little boy in the world could have done it. I've read the book and I saw the picture and no one could have done it a-tall. . .

Freddie (flushing with the pleased embarrassment of one artist receiving rare praise from another): When did you read the book?

Jackie (indifferently): Oh, I dunno. Years and years ago.

Freddie: Did you read "Oliver Twist"?

Jackie: No, I didn't.

Freddie: I'm going to play Oliver in the fall, you know. Well, did you read "Pickwick Papers"?

Jackie: Nope, never have.

Freddie: Oh, you should! It's the funniest book I ever read. I read it when I was six. I used to read parts of it out loud to Cis to make her laugh, too. You should get that book.

Jackie: I very seldom read. I think living's more important than reading. More important for your work, you know. More fun, too. I like Dickens, though. Dickens and Mark Twain. But I very seldom read because I can't sit by myself and keep quiet. Not unless I'm told to.

Freddie (flipping a coin): I like to read. I read almost all of the time. I like aeroplanes, too. I had a lot of aeroplane models given (Continued on page 88)

and Helen in "Top Hat."

a tribute to Ginger

From an old-timer who admires the courage of this young 'un

GINGER ROGERS always reminds me of a swan. Have you ever watched a swan glide across the water? Make its progress, reach its goal with beautiful grace? And apparently without effort? And then have you been surprised to notice how hard and consistently that swan has been working beneath the surface all the time in order to produce that seeming ease, that thrilling motion?

So it is with Ginger. Take her, at twenty-four, one of the very greatest of the stars. Rapidly approaching that million dollars earned through her own efforts which she has set for her mark. Beautiful, goodness knows. Well-groomed always. And the one and only dancer Fred Astaire ever has brought himself to compare with his sister, Adele—now Lady Cavendish—with whom he danced his way to fame.

None of these things were dumped into Ginger's lap, believe me. She has come a long way and worked hard to find them. And if you've acquired another impression about her from the bare facts you've read in her biography, let's look behind the scenes of a few outstanding incidents.

Fifteen years ago Ginger Rogers was nothing, had nothing. She was a gangling, freckled nine-year-old. Named Virginia McMath. (It was a small cousin, incidentally, unable to pronounce her first name, who called her Ginger. And she came into the Rogers name when her mother married a second time.) However, even back there, when Ginger lived with her grandmother while her mother went out to earn a living for all of them, Ginger was on her way. For she was teaching herself to be a leader, being a stern taskmaster for herself in all she did. Taking one medal after another at school. In tennis. In swimming. And never for one moment failing to believe in herself or in her future.

EVEN IN those days she showed the discrimination which is so often an anvil on which success may be forged. It was her English teacher, one Ruth Browning, for whom she developed the inevitable school-girl crush. You've heard, perhaps, how, charmed and attracted by this woman's speaking voice and her choice of words, Ginger invited her to come and live with them.

We all have impulses to do things like that occasionally. But we squash them usually. Whereas Ginger always has had enough spirit and courage to put her impulses into action, been eager enough for the experience they would offer not to count the cost too high in the event they didn't always work out right.

"Never," Mrs. Rogers says, "will I forget the day Ginger came home and calmly announced that she had asked Ruth Browning to live with us, to share her room. At first I protested. But then I discovered that Ginger had sold Miss Browning on the idea, too. She never was one to give up easily. And even as a little girl I never knew her to stop at any half-measures when she set out to accomplish a thing."

That relationship with Ruth Browning proved a very happy one. And it wasn't until she married that she left the Rogers home.

"I owe a great deal to my long and close association with Miss Browning," Ginger says. "She taught me many invaluable things. Fairness in dealing with people. To see the other fellow's side as well as my own. And most important of all, probably, to get out and work for the things I wanted. To reach towards them constantly by study and determination. To waste no precious minutes sitting back and dreaming.

"She always pointed out to me that to advance ourselves we must take steps. That not to take steps is to stand still or, worse, to slip backwards."

We were sitting on the set in front of her portable dressing-room. And so often it was the spirit in her voice that made her words seem bright and convincing. Nevertheless, while she talked, young and, for the moment, serious, I couldn't help thinking how useless the same advice and influence would have been if she hadn't been receptive to it, if she had been gaited for indolence and failure.

You've heard, of course, (Continued on page 69)

A hectic two hours with "unapproachable" Laughton

by Katherine "Scoop" Albert

JUST CALL me "Kitty, the girl reporter." Or, if you think that too informal "Scoop" Albert will do.

Toss the false whiskers in the corner. Put the Sherlock Holmes magnifying glass aside. Boys and girls, I got the story. I'm a little weak and shaken. I may never be the same again. But I got the story.

The funny part is that the original assignment seemed so easy and pleasant. "Charles Laughton is arriving in New York Saturday," my boss said. "I'd like you to do an interview with him."

Could anything be more simple? Wait a minute! Wait until I tell you what happened.

Very sweetly I called Mr. L.'s press agent and said I'd like to interview the actor. And from that moment on the calm stream of my life became a rushing torrent.

"Interview Laughton?" the press agent screamed. "My God, Kitty. He arrives in town at nine a. m on the Century. He sails for England on the Ile de France at eleven and during those two hours he has to get his passport, his re-entry papers, and heaven knows what. The boat will probably have to be held for him. Interview Laughton? It simply can't be done. In the first place there isn't time—not a minute's time. And in the second place I have a wire from him saying, 'Positively no interviews.' You can't interview Laughton. It isn't possible."

YOU'D BETTER not say "can't" to an Albert. The 'never-give-up Alberts" they call us. "Do or die" is our motto. Would you like to see the coat of arms?

At nine a. m. that momentous Saturday morning I appeared bright and smiling at Grand Central Station.

The press agent saw me. His looks were so black I thought he was going to a funeral. "You can't stay here," he said to me. "Nobody can interview Laughton. I told you that yesterday. There isn't time. Now be a good girl and go away. Come on, Kitty, Laughton won't have an interview."

"Look," I said, "there comes the Century."

The press agent gave me another dirty look and ran toward the train. I thought, for a minute, he was going to throw himself under the wheels. I ran after him. The train stopped and Laughton—all done up in a big-checked coat, grey trousers and a hat that once had a shape but didn't now—got off.

I'd heard he was morose, melancholy, morbid. Instead his face is like a jolly little boy's face. And his smile is something wonderful.

"I feel fine," he said. "I slept eighteen hours a day on the train. I feel fine, but a bit like a ground squirrel. Do you sleep well on a train?" he asked me.

I'd never seen the man before. The press agent, who was trying to pretend he didn't know me, had not introduced us. But Laughton's question forced him to mumble something about my identity. "And now, good-bye," the press agent said. "We're off to the barge office to get Mr. Laughton's passports and things. Good-bye, Kitty."

"Good-bye," I said, and got in the taxi with them.

Laughton began to worry on (Continued on page 96)

Myrna knows all the answers

by Elizabeth McDonald

"I like people who can laugh at themselves," says Myrna Loy

MYRNA LOY wears life like a ribbon in her hair. A gallant perky ribbon, and as brightly colored as the one a little girl in Montana used to wear years ago.

And because you can't take life seriously when you wear it like that, Myrna Loy goes right along laughing at things other people take pretty desperately, little things like disappointments and responsibility and herself. And even studio difficulties.

"I like people who can laugh at themselves," she said, pouring another cup of coffee and at the same time unwittingly proving herself a member of her own fan club. "The people who don't take themselves seriously."

Rosalind Russell is one of her best friends in spite of the fact that she has been hailed as the second Myrna Loy. Great friendships have crashed on less than that.

"It's unjust to Rosalind," Myrna said when I asked her about this. "Being likened to anyone takes some of your personality away. She is so much of an individual, so much herself that it is unfair to compare her to anyone else. Rosalind is a personality in her own right."

There had been talk of rivalry between Myrna and William Powell, rumors that she is reluctant to co-star with him.

"I liked playing with Bill." The warmth in Myrna's voice scattered those rumors to the four corners of the earth. "He's one of the swellest people I know and a grand actor and he's got an absolutely marvelous sense of humor."

(Below) A scene from "The Dark Angel," Merle's second American-made film, with Janet Beecher, Herbert Marshall and Fredric March. (Right) Merle admits that she's fond of David Niven. But marriage? She's not afraid to talk about her views on that subject either. (Extreme right) A new portrait of her, minus the exotic make-up.

Merle talks frankly about love and the men who have the romances of

by Gladys Hall

"I WAS sixteen," laughed Merle, "when, as the poets say, 'Love first came to me' . . . and it was in India . . . and there may be sweeter things than first romance but never again anything quite the same . . ."

And that started us going. And now you are going to hear about the real romances of Merle Oberon. We'd been laughing together, Merle and I, over the sundry rumored romances and rumored engagements which have adorned her name ever since, as Ann Boleyn in "Henry the Eighth," she first made the screen Oberon-conscious. She's been reported, almost daily, engaged to this one, "interested in" that one . . . and the latest rumor dear to Hollywood cocktail hours, is that, almost any day now, Merle and David Niven, my dears . . .

I said, "It might help to allay these fanciful fictions if you would tell some of your real romances . . ."

Merle said, amused, "Of course. They haven't been terrifically exciting or unusual, though. Just the romances every girl has, I suppose. But such as they are, they're mine and not made up for me by gifted imaginations. I had, of course, a romantic background. Several romantic backgrounds and they made of me, quite naturally, a very romantic person."

And then she told me of the Island of Tasmania where she was born and where her father, an Army officer, died three months before she was born. She told me of India, Bombay and Calcutta and the hill country around Darjeeling where she spent her young girlhood. She attended La Martinière College in Calcutta. Her uncle, also an Army officer, held the strict, Army-officer's point of view as to how a young girl should be raised. The small Merle was kept secluded from the world. She studied Latin and French and Hindustani. She sewed fine seams and learned piano and was drilled in the courtesies of an old civilization.

AND FROM her shadowy distance she looked out on India . . . on child marriages, small, tanned girls bearing babies almost as big as they . . . the gay life of the Army Post . . . beautiful women "out from home" defeating boredom with gay flirtations and romances and dark flowers, carefully suppressed . . . She read Tennyson and the sonnets of Sappho and dreamed as all girls dream. She spent hours alone visualizing herself as the Dark Lady of Somebody's sonnets. She saw herself as a figure of mystery, rather fated, cloistered in a garden where the lotus and the mogra trees exhaled their unearthly fragrance. And she dreamed of a man who would find her there, a man tall and dashing and very handsome, who meant a lot to her

Oberon

(Right) Is it any wonder that men the world over—in India, England, America—have fallen in love with this beautiful girl?

would love her in silence and from afar the long years through, scarce daring to breathe her name.

"My dreams," she said, "were very exotic, which is odd because I am not."

She is, actually, young and sun-tanned and completely unaffected. Her hazel-green eyes have only a suggestion of slant at the outer corners. Her hair is of a bright brownness. She wore lemon-yellow sport pajamas, no jewels. We sat together in her dressing-room on the Goldwyn lot and sipped iced tea. She loves to wear overalls without benefit of laundry and to go deep-sea fishing. She spends most of her spare time in slacks or a bathing suit, swimming and playing hand-ball on the beach. She never wears orchids. She never wears jewels. She loathes hats and hairdressers and dressing up. New York scared her to death. She is still terrified of Hollywood and of all the beautiful, self-assured women here. If anyone praises her acting she is delighted. If anyone tells her she is beautiful she thinks they're kidding her. She loves children and people who clown. And she is amused at her own exotic roles on the screen. She loved her part in "The Dark Angel" and is relieved that Mr. Goldwyn is going to let her be just an English girl, herself.

much ado over astaire

KATHERINE ALBERT and Adele Whitely Fletcher, those two demon Hollywood interviewers, quarreled so over an Astaire interview that we ended the argument and salvaged a life-long friendship by giving the assignment to both of them! The interview, herein related in play form, is what actually took place, scene by scene, and we think you'll enjoy it—we know we did!

Time: Last Spring.

Locale: A tea-room in Rockefeller Center, New York City, filled with the hubbub of the luncheon hour. A good part of said hubbub comes from a round table at which sit Mary Burgum, Adelia Bird, Katherine Albert and Adele Whitely Fletcher. All four have just come from a preview of "Roberta." Judging by the slightly hysterical conversation of K. A. and A. W. F. there was only one person in the production —Fred Astaire.

Katherine Albert (in the plaintive little voice she uses when she is endeavoring to appear a conscientious contributor and generally helpful): But Mary, I think the readers of MODERN SCREEN would love the life story of Fred Astaire. In six parts, say. I really do!

(From Mary Burgum emanates the Great Silence common to editors who aren't rising to bait.)

Adele Whitely Fletcher: Mar-ee, I'll do a Fred Astaire life story in six parts for nothing. For nothing, Mar-ee! For nothing!

Fred's admiration for Ginger Rogers is unbounded. He thinks she's a swell partner. Here they are in "Top Hat."

With Joan Crawford in his first screen appearance, "Dancing Lady," which he swears he enjoyed doing.

A PLAYLET IN THREE ACTS

by Adele Whitely Fletcher and Katherine Albert

K. A.: Listen, Mary, I'll pay you, if you'll let me see Fred Astaire!

Mary (helplessly and hopefully): Well, Astaire just happens to be in California. So I don't see how either of you are going to see him. To get a life story or any other story.

Adelia Bird: I've no doubt the dears would hop a plane tonight. Even pay their own passage. I've heard about such women but I never saw two before—thank goodness!

Mary (subtly changing the subject): I thought Irene Dunne and Ginger Rogers were awfully good in the picture, didn't you?

K. A. (vaguely): Irene Dunne? Was she in it?

A. W. F. (equally vague): Ginger Rogers? Was she in it?

Mary (bustling like a good mother hen): Come, come girls. Eat your salad. Remember what our Sylvia says about vitamins. After all, Fred Astaire is three thousand miles away.

K. A. (sighing hopelessly): Three thousand miles . . .

Mary (continuing as if there had been no interruption): If he were here now I'd let you both see him. Under the circumstances I'm sure it would take both your brains to get one story!

A. W. F. (who, at moments like these, imagines herself a philosopher): Maybe it would be better not to see him, Katie. You know, save your illusions.

K. A.: You save your illusions, Pet!

A. W. F. (taking a chance on her illusions): Mary, is that a promise? May we both see him? When he comes to New York, I mean?

Mary (wearily, paying the check. Demanding certain sums from all. K. A. and A. W. F. hand her theirs dreamily. After all, money means so little to them): That's not what I said, Fletcher. But okay.

they're still gossiping

Joan's new film is aptly titled "I Live My Life."

By Caroline Somers Hoyt

THEY'RE TALKING about Joan Crawford again. And that's one of Hollywood's favorite indoor sports.

What are they saying now?

No, not that she is flitting from man to man, not that she is being wild and gay, not that she is dissipating her talents and energies upon private emotions.

They said all that years ago. They have something new to talk about and find fault with now.

Now they're saying, "Why does Joan shut herself away from the world?"

They're saying, "What's the matter with her—building that big house and furnishing it so beautifully and then never giving any big parties in it?"

They're saying, "Why doesn't she go out more? She must be very unhappy since she stays away from large crowds of people as she does."

Only faint echoes of this gossip come to Joan's ears. But we discussed it one day as we lay sunning ourselves on the edge of her crystal clear swimming pool.

Joan smiled. "Isn't it funny?" she mused. "For so long I worried about what people said. I tried to mould my life as 'they' seemed to want it moulded. And now I've stopped and it's all so simple.

"I live as I want to live. I've not deliberately done anything, not consciously changed my mode of living. I simply discovered the things that gave me the most personal peace and happiness—and then I did these things.

"When I was married to Douglas our house was always filled with people. Douglas liked a lot of people around him. He had many amusing and charming friends. Some of these people who filled my house I liked—others I did not like at all.

"After our divorce I was, I guess, a little neurotic. Or perhaps I was behaving perfectly naturally. At any rate, I wanted to see only my few dearest friends—only those who had remained loyal and steadfast and true throughout all the trying phases of my life. I wanted only those who understood. And in having only them around me I discovered that I had never actually enjoyed the big parties. That is fairly simple, isn't it?

"When I remodeled this house I did it because I loved it, because I wanted a place which reflected my taste and which was comfortable and efficient in every way.

"You see, I didn't do it for show. I didn't do it so that a lot of people who care nothing for me and about whom I care nothing could come and admire or criticize.

"I think my drawing room is beautiful. It is all white and blue and cool and I admire it as I would admire a beautiful painting that I had selected. There are many others who enjoy it with me—but they are close and dear friends, who understand what it is I really want.

"Parties are like eating too much candy. If you have them all the time they lose their charm and zest. One is soon satiated with them. And that is wrong, especially when an occasional party in honor of some event can be such fun.

"Recently I gave a birthday party for Franchot. It was something to look forward to. Something that was great fun to plan. And we had a marvelous time. Some people made a big to-do about it and said I was 'coming out of my shell,' that I was 'throwing my house open again.' What nonsense! Heaven knows when I'll give another big party. That one was grand, but if I had had a party every other night that week it would have been no fun at all. It wouldn't have been anything 'special.' And I wanted that to be something 'special.' good citizen

Fred in "Anna Karenina"—his next is "The Dark Angel."

By Martha Kerr

A STRANGE man, they call Fredric March, in Hollywood. A man who is different, not of the mould to be expected.

Writers do not like assignments on Freddie. They do not enjoy interviewing him. He is kind, he is courteous, he is even delightfully entertaining but he says nothing exciting, nothing to make a sensational story.

I do not pretend to be wise enough to describe accurately this man whom Hollywood calls strange. I do claim to have collected enough incidents about him and to have seen him frequently enough to form a wholly individual opinion. I am giving you my opinion, with the incidents, and I am wondering whether you will agree.

To me, Freddie would not be "strange" in Racine, Wisconsin, where he was born in '98. He would not be different in Madison, where he went to the University of Wisconsin, nor in Poughkeepsie or Minneapolis. In fact, I believe he is, in Hollywood, exactly what he would have been in Racine, had he remained there. And that is what makes him unusual, almost out of place, at times, in Hollywood. Assuredly, the average Hollywood actor would seem unusual in Racine, as a leading citizen.

Take the first time I met Freddie. He had not entered pictures but was playing John Barrymore in "The Royal Family" on the Los Angeles stage. I was invited by a nonprofessional friend to have dinner with Mr. and Mrs. Fredric March. The name of Florence Eldridge (Mrs. March) meant something to me; the name of her husband meant nothing. I had not seen the play. I only knew he was one more stage actor.

I remember how I stared at him. Accustomed as I was to actors, I simply could not believe this man to be one. He was just a nice man. Good looking, in a friendly way, as the president of a small-town bank might be thought good looking. He was quiet, reserved, speaking when spoken to rather than engineering the conversation.

I finally asked him a reporter's oldest question. (Incidentally, he did not know I was a reporter.) "And what is your ambition, Mr. March?"

At first, I thought he gave an answer as old as the question. "I'd—I'd like to stay in Hollywood!" But when he gave his reason, I changed my mind. He said, "I want to settle down to living in one place. Have you ever played stock? We were the first to take the Theatre Guild plays on the road. In one of the southern states, we were to play in a gymnasium. When we arrived, there was a basket ball game in progress. We had to wait until it was over and then set our scenery before our audience. Another time, we played in an auditorium which we later learned was condemned. There was no running water in another theatre and we had to scoot next door to the Chamber of Commerce to wash our faces. The stage offers glamor but Hollywood offers contentment."

I tried not to smile. A man who could see no glamor in Hollywood must be a very bad actor! I decided I didn't even want to see his play.

My next experience with Freddie was after he had signed with Paramount and made several successful pictures — "The Wild Party" with Clara Bow, "Paris Bound" with Ann Harding, "Footlights and Fools," "Jealousy" and "My Sin."

Perhaps you do not remember these early pictures or what was said of him. He was being called the second John Gilbert or John Barrymore, not the first Freddie March. I decided I must have been mistaken about him and went down to have tea with him and Mrs. March. I expected to meet the second John Gilbert or Jack Barrymore, both of whom I knew and privately considered fascinating, "good copy," but "slightly cracked."

My, my, can this gal tap! She comes by it naturally, too, for she's had only a dozen tap lessons in her life and for the past five years has held the tapping title. As a result of her grand work in "Broadway Melody of 1936", Metro has given her a long contract.

Dancing

"AND BELIEVE it or not," Eleanor Powell rushed on breathlessly, "I play a part. I speak lines. In fact, I play two parts; you see, it's dual personality business!"

Miss Powell, in case we've jumped you, is featured in "Broadway Melody of 1936." Miss Powell is the twenty-year-old dancing sensation of New York night clubs and musical comedies. Miss Powell has been adjudged the world's greatest feminine tap dancer by the Dancing Masters of America. And yet, that which principally interests Miss Powell is that she has lines to speak! 'Twas ever thus, we suppose, since the time the clown wanted to play Hamlet and the millionaire's son had designs on driving a taxi.

ELEANOR POWELL was brought to Hollywood to dance in Metro's newest spectacle. She had no thought of speaking her piece. Tapping her way through a couple of hot sequences was what she was engaged to do. And then came the tryout for the, as she puts it, leadin' lady role. She won—as she's had a way of doing since she was eleven years old.

At that time, the very youthful Eleanor was pushed into a Black Bottom contest. Yes, literally pushed into it. The other entrees were professionals, one of whom—the blondest and prettiest, of course—was scheduled to win. It was all sort of, as Bert Lahr would put it, "in da bag." And then this child, who had been discovered turning expert cartwheels on the Atlantic City sands that very morning and engaged by Gus Edwards to fill in a spot on the huge cafe's program, was asked if she'd like to get into the fun. The youngster didn't realize she was expected to decline and she certainly didn't know she was not supposed to win.

AND SO, the prize—two almost priceless tickets for a current prizefight—was hers. Afterwards, a waiter thoughtfully relieved her of them. If Eleanor had brought the bits of pasteboard home, they could have been disposed of for $200, which certainly would have helped the Powell exchecquer at that point.

After such a sensational and unpremeditated debut at the Ritz Grill, the very young lady decided that hers would be a theatrical career. Why, it was so easy. The music played and somehow you just danced. You simply couldn't help it. All the drudgery of the Russian Ballet, bar work and the floor turns suddenly emerged into a beautiful routine. Eleanor, herself, was surprised at what a cinch it was! Surely, this was the thing to do. It was far pleasanter than being a school teacher. Anyone could tell you that!

And so, every summer Eleanor (Continued on page 66)

lips, this month's lucky

Lois' resemblance to Jean is amazing—read what Sylvia has to say to her, and all the Harlow types.

LOOK OUT, Jean Harlow, here comes Lois Phillips! I'll leave it up to you and you and you. Does this gal look like Harlow or does she look like Harlow?

Well, that's what I asked for. I asked the girls throughout the country who bear a resemblance to Jean to send me their photographs. I've also asked for Joan Crawford and Constance Bennett resemblers. (You still have time to get these in.) And now I want pictures of girls who look like Claudette Colbert.

But now let's look at Lois Phillips, a little Oakland, California, girl, who, at a glance, might be Harlow's younger sister. I'm publishing her picture, as I promised I would, and am sending her a long letter containing personal advice—advice which will tell her everything she wants to know about herself.

First of all, I want to give Lois a tip. And it's a tip which every girl in the world can use, including the movie stars.

Lois, don't—just because you look like her—don't imitate Jean Harlow's mannerisms, her walk, her haircomb. Be yourself! You are basically the Harlow type, yes—but, that doesn't mean that you should try to make yourself a carbon copy of her. Carbons are never so clear as the original! And I wish the Hollywood stars would put that in their cigarettes and smoke it. They imitate each other until I'll bet their own mothers are confused.

You see, there are just a certain number of basic types in women. In all literature there are just thirty-six basic plots. Yet millions of stories are written. The brilliant author dresses up an old plot, does some fancy writing and adds an O. Henry twist to the ending. So what? So you think you're reading a brand new story.

If you're a clever woman you'll do the same thing. Use your own basic type, as an author uses a basic plot. Dress up the type. And don't forget the O. Henry twist at the end. How's that for you? That's individuality, girls. That's what yanks you ahead of the crowd and makes you a person and not just an old left-over Garbo, Harlow or Crawford.

I get so sick of women alibi-ing themselves because they look like someone else. You won't believe me, but honestly, I've had women say to me, "I don't have to reduce. You see, I'm the Mae West type and she's fat."

My God! Did you ever hear such a thing! Basically they may be the West type. But those same women could go to town in a big way—they could go North, South, East and West if they

a figure like harlow

If you are a movie type, Sylvia (left) wants your picture. This month she tells you how to be like Harlow.

Sylvia

No, it's Lois Phil- picture contest winner would check the excess baggage they carry around.

So, Lois, be glad you're the Harlow type. It's a darn good type. But be individual. Be Lois Phillips, instead of a Jean Harlow imitation.

As a matter of fact, you're in better general proportion than Jean. You need to take off a little weight all over (and I'm explaining just how that is done in my personal advice to you) and it ought to be easy for you to do what I did for Harlow. (Stick around, you other girls. It won't hurt you to listen in on this. You'll find plenty of things you can apply to yourselves.)

Lois, I want you to watch Harlow carefully. See all her pictures—her latest one is "China Seas"—and discover for yourself what's right and what's wrong with Harlow.

You won't want to imitate her walk, certainly, or her voice. She always plays tough roles on the screen and walks and talks in character. So lay off that. It's all right for the dizzy dames Harlow portrays. But, Lois, you look like a nice, sweet girl. You wouldn't want to be tough.

That walk of Harlow's makes her neck appear shorter because it has developed some shoulder muscles. So I'm going to tell you—and all the rest of my girls—how to have a long, graceful neck. There is nothing so attractive as a beautiful neck.

In my work I have actually been able to lengthen necks—in one case I succeeded in adding a little over one inch (there's one for Ripley). And what I can do, you can do. Here's how.

Clasp the hands together at the back of the head toward the top. Relax the head. Let the chin fall on the chest. With your hands pull down hard as if you were trying to put your forehead on your stomach. (Don't worry, baby, you'll never make it, but go as far as you can.) Now this is important: Keep the head relaxed. Don't resist the

Confessions of an extra girl

Part 4—a chance to repay a debt and to get even with an obnoxious director

ILLUSTRATED BY CARL MUELLER

AFTER COMING to Hollywood and being almost attacked by a "quickie" director (for the dignified, big directors who work for reliable companies do not do such things), I at last got work in a studio, through the help of an artist named Bradley. I was asked to do a bit and, because of the meanness of one of the extra girls, I failed. Joan Crawford found me, crying alone on the dressing-room balcony. She said if I would meet her the next day she would help me. Now go on the with story. . .

Joan Crawford met me at the studio gate the next day, although I had thought she might forget her promise by morning. But I was wrong. I did not know Joan.

I appeared at the gate promptly at ten and one minute after ten she drove up in her car. "Hi, there. Am I late? Well, you look better this morning. Come on."

I tried to thank her for all she was doing for me, but she wouldn't let me. She seemed very embarrassed to have anybody thank her. "I don't understand why you're doing this," I said.

She answered at once, "Because I know how it is to be blue and discouraged."

And now she took me by the hand and led me around the lot introducing me to every assistant director at the studio and saying, "This is a friend of mine. She's cute and pretty and has talent. Any time you can use her for a bit or even for extra work it will be a personal favor to me."

Finally we wound up at the casting office. She told the people there the same thing. This tour had taken up about two hours. Joan said she had an appointment and then she hung her head and blushed, "Gee, I hate to talk about this," she said, "but do you need any money? If you do . . ."

She was so afraid of hurting my feelings, so I stopped her from going on. "Oh, thanks," I said, "but I have enough money. And I hope some day to repay you for what you've done for me this morning."

"You can," Joan answered quickly. "When you're in a position to do so, help another girl."

Before I had time to speak she had jumped into her car and was gone.

That was the beginning of my career as an extra. Calls for work began to come. One (Continued on page 78)

OLD, WRINKLED, water-marked charts . . . dividers . . . rules . . . logarithmic tables . . . the paraphernalia of the sea. Of such things are dreams made, but to Henry Wilcoxon they are glorious playthings, keys to adventure. When Richard, the Lion-Hearted, leaves the studio and heads for home, he leaves only a name behind and Henry, the Lion-Hearted, comes into being with his zestful plans for the exploration of those vast wastes of water in the Pacific that have never borne the keel of a white man's boat.

Some twenty years ago a raging hurricane howled savagely down upon a little group of islands huddled fearfully in the Caribbean. In the uncertain protection of a small cove on the Isle of Dominica a faint wail was heard at the height of the storm. Hurricane-born, a baby-boy's cry challenged the winds. And that innate sense of challenge grew as the boy's body grew—tall, straight and powerful.

WELL, THE first fall flurry of clothes buying is about over and I suppose you are all tricked out in either one of those Mussolini-like military toppers or a dashing Renaissance creation. Summer is definitely on the shelf and cool autumn is in the air . . . even out there in Hollywood where fall comes along more reluctantly than it does in more rugged climates.

be taking stock in the fall but this is a different sort of inventory. This is my own private check-up on what Hollywood has been up to while the rest of us have been up to our ears in fashion ticker tape. And, my pets, much has been happening out there. Not only in the studios but about town where our cinema darlings parade their latest and smartest bibs-and-tuckers.

At the studios the designers are busy with many new pictures which will carry their most inspired new ideas to you via the screen and the stars who sponsor them. Talking with several of them, I have ferreted out some ideas that will turn into real fads for you, unless I am just an old day dreamer!

OVER AT M-G-M and a chat with Adrian. He is busy with sketches and fabrics for Joan Crawford's new picture "I Live My Life." Joan and Adrian have decided that her costumes for this picture must be basically simple.

Above, since fall brides are as popular as June ones, this beautiful bridal veil and coronet worn by Joan Crawford in "I Live My Life" will prove a grand inspiration. Tiny seed pearls in sea shell scallops form the coronet from which the tulle veil falls. At right, Adrian's newest contribution to youthful fashion fads . . . a polo coat for formal evening wear! He designed this for Joan to wear over a matching dinner gown. Every detail is like the original sport coat.

These two get along beautifully calling one another pet names and much gay teasing during conferences . . . there's none of the clash between designer and star in this set up. Joan says, "Nothing extreme in this picture, darling. I play the well-bred girl and I must look it. What do you think about having my hair cut shorter, too?" Adrian agrees, so you will see Joan with her hair in a shorter and, I think, much more becoming length.

Adrian has just called Joan into his studio for a fitting and to approve some more sketches that he has made. Adrian surrounds himself, as well as his stars, with glamor. His studio is cool, white and many-mirrored. There is a small stage one step up from the studio floor . . . it is curtained off and behind this Joan disappears to try on a costume. This is one which she will wear in a ball sequence. When she is ready she calls out to Adrian, he in turn pushes a series of electric light switches, pulls back the curtains and there stands Joan in a flood of lights which brings out every detail of the gown. Joan grins widely as she turns in the costume but Adrian stands with folded arms, taking in every detail and frowning slightly. Finally, he says, hitting upon what evidently has been bothering him, "The waist is too low." That decided, Joan comes down off the small stage and kneels on the floor to inspect some of Adrian's newest sketches spread out for her inspection.

"I'M ALL READY TO GO ON AFTER I'VE SMOKED A CAMEL...IT ALWAYS SEEMS TO RENEW MY ENERGY"

• The Langhorne estate, "Greenfields," is famous for its hospitality. "I notice that Camels disappear amazingly fast," says Mrs. Langhorne. "Every one likes them—they are mild and you never tire of their flavor." Costlier tobaccos do make a difference!

• "I certainly appreciate the fact that Camels never make me either nervous or edgy," Mrs. Langhorne says. "I can smoke all the Camels I want." It is true that Camels never upset the nerves. The millions more Camel spends are justified. Smoke one and see.

MRS. LANGHORNE grew up in New Orleans. Now she lives in Virginia, where she rides to hounds. "One thing I especially like about Camels," she says, "is the fact that they are not strong and yet, if I am tired, smoking one always picks me up. I feel better and more enthusiastic immediately." Camels release your latent energy—give you a "lift." Millions more are spent every year by Camel for finer, more expensive tobaccos.

Little Sister Forges Ahead

So sweet and demure is Joan, the youngest of the Bennetts. She has a role well suited to her in "She Couldn't Take It," a Columbia picture, with Georgie Raft as her leading man.

Skin Faults start Underneath!

In the underskin are the tiny glands, blood vessels, nerves and fibres that make the outer skin lovely. When they begin to fail, skin faults start!

Which is Yours?

LINES FADE when wasting under tissues are stimulated and fill out.

PORES REDUCE when freed of clogging secretions from within skin.

BLACKHEADS GO when clogging secretions are removed, and underskin stimulation prevents clogging.

BLEMISHES STOP coming when blackheads are prevented.

DRY SKIN SOFTENS when penetrating oils restore suppleness and failing oil glands grow active.

TISSUES WON'T SAG when underskin nerves and fibres are kept toned up and stimulated.

Miss Maralyn Tankersley — St. Louis: "Pond's Cold Cream stimulates the very life of my skin. It has kept away many a line and blemish."

Wake up that Sleepy Under Skin with "Deep-Skin" Cream

See outer skin lose Lines, Blackheads, Blemishes

Mrs. Richard C. du Pont

Society aviator who holds many awards for her achievements in the air, says: "After using Pond's Cold Cream, my skin looks as if it never saw a speck of dirt! I never have a sign of a line or wrinkle."

THE FIRST LINE that shows in your face is a danger signal! A sign that right under it skin glands and cells are growing tired—getting sleepy.

Every blackhead you find means that those same little glands are overworked! Getting clogged! And that's true of most common skin faults—nearly all start when your underskin slows up.

How to stir up underskin

But you can waken that sleepy underskin! Start the circulation going briskly again. Stimulate those little glands and cells to full activity!

What your underskin needs is the rousing action of Pond's deep-skin Cream.

Pond's Cold Cream is made of specially processed fine oils which go deep into the pores. The first application flushes them clean of every particle of dirt . . . make-up . . . skin secretions. At once, your skin feels fresher, livelier—looks clearer.

Then you pat fresh Pond's Cold Cream right into your newly cleansed skin. Pat it briskly with your finger tips. Feel the blood coursing through! Every little nerve and gland and fibre is wakened by this treatment. Toned up. Invigorated! Your skin feels alive! . . . wide-awake! Do this day after day—regularly—night and morning.

The very first treatment makes your skin clearer—feel satiny. Soon little threatening lines begin to fade. Blackheads clear away. Blemishes stop coming. Once again your skin is firm—young. Its color blooms again!

Every night, give your skin this double-benefit treatment . . . Pat in Pond's Cold Cream to flush out all dirt, make-up, skin impurities. Wipe off. Then—briskly—pat in more Pond's Cold Cream to invigorate your underskin—wake up tired skin glands, nerves and cells.

Every morning, in the daytime before you make up, refresh and reawaken your skin with Pond's Cold Cream. Your skin will be smooth and satiny, ready for powder.

Try this for just a few days—Send for the special 9-treatment tube offered below. You'll always be glad of the day you started to use Pond's! Pond's Cold Cream is absolutely pure. Germs cannot live in it.

Here's how it happens in Hollywood. A well-known stage actress, out making her first picture, invited a number of the natives to a cocktail party in honor of Bette Davis, who had once played a bit in one of her Broadway shows. The appointed hour arrives, the photographers arrive, and the guests arrive, all in fancy attire. Finally, comes the guest of honor decked out in slacks. "Look," she asks us in what turns out to be perfect grammar, "for whom is the party being given?" When we replied, "For you," you could have knocked her over with a caviar canape. But the ever-present Davis poise comes to the fore and she joins in the fun while the photographers snap their pictures and a good time is enjoyed, as they say in the papers, by all.

Among those glimpsed at the Davis "surprise" party was Paul Cavanagh, who played tall-dark-and-handsome to Mae West in "Goin' To Town." The blonde one, he says, is one of the most charming women he has ever known. The report of a romance between them is just one of those things, for Paul has other plans and so has Mae.

From now on, Gene Raymond will probably have all his birthday parties out in public, and here's why: Jeanette MacDonald and several other film ladies threw a birthday dinner for Gene at the Beverly-Wilshire, and after the cake-cutting ceremony the gals lined up to kiss the guest of honor. Four young ladies at the next table noticed the proceedings, got into the line-up and received one of the Raymond kisses. Gene was so pleasantly surprised he had a piece of the birthday cake sent to their table. Girls who like cake and kisses are making reservations now for next year's party.

Probably the first person to learn that Winfield Sheehan and Madame Maria Jeritza were to be married was Shirley Temple. Shirley and the former Fox producer are pals, and he wanted her approval before he took such an important step. At a dinner party, with the opera singer seated on one side of him and Shirley on the other, Sheehan advised the young lady of his plans. Although Jeritza won the man of her choice, Shirley says it's still 50-50 between them. "Because," she explains, "during the dinner he held hands with both of us." So if a report of a Sheehan-Jeritza break-up comes around, you'll know the siren who caused it.

When it comes to following in the footsteps of Garbo, the unofficial championship should certainly be handed to Marlene Deitrich. We don't mean that the glamor girl is attempting to imitate the silent one on the screen—we mean that Marlene has been taking up with practically all of Greta's former gentleman friends. First there was Fritz Lang, and then came Rouben Mamoulian and Count Carpegna, all three of whom once rang the Garbo doorbell. Just to complete the picture, Marlene is now seen about the night spots with John Gilbert, who was Garbo's biggest heart throb before she decided she wanted to be alone. (Continued on page 99)

MAKE-UP! That's the thing all you folks who follow this department so avidly—all you folks who intend to make theatrical work your life's career or who are simply having the very time of your lives with amateur theatricals—want to hear about.

This month I've captured Jack Dawn, the make-up expert at M-G-M. He has grease-painted everyone on that lot from Garbo to the humblest extra girl. And the boy knows his stuff. I'm sure you'll be thrilled by what he says. But before he starts let me remind you that there is still room for dramatic clubs. And if you want to start one, write to me in care of MODERN SCREEN'S Dramatic School, 149 Madison Avenue, New York, N. Y. I'm also eager to answer any personal dramatic problems. But don't forget to enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope.

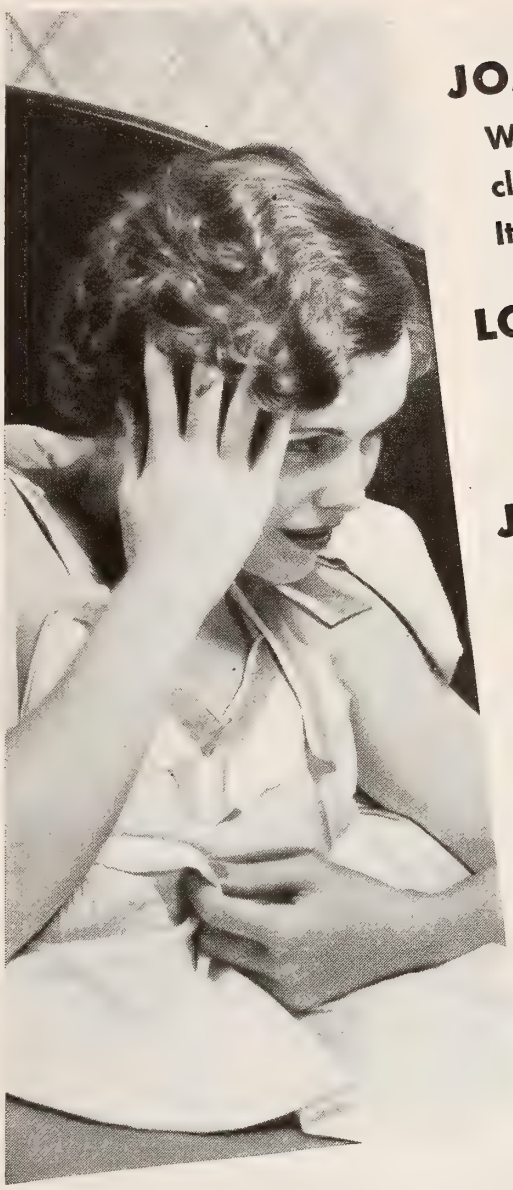
Modern Screen's Dramatic School

And now Jack Dawn, the make-up lad, gives you some advice:

"In making up a character for the stage or screen it is infinitely better to underdo it, and let the acting take care of the rest, than to overdo it. Conspicuous make-up detracts from a performance, since the eyes of an audience will focus upon the unusual.

"The keynote of any make-up is naturalness. That is why I advise anyone who contemplates making-up for a certain character to seek out a similar character in real life and memorize the contour of the face, the highlights and shadows. Make mental notes of the particular facial characteristics you wish to portray, and then go about gaining that effect in a natural manner.

"In my opinion most make-up mistakes are made in the portrayal of old age. But it can be done convincingly if you study the physical changes that occur in a face as it ages.



"First of all, as a person becomes older, the muscles in the face sag, resulting in lines. The eyes sink back in the sockets and the puffiness goes from under the lids, allowing them to droop over the eyes at the outer corners. The lines at the sides of the mouth become straight. Sagging muscles result in hollows under the cheek-bones. Eyebrows turn down at the corners and appear much thinner. The point of the nose appears to drop lower.

"Now the best advice I can give on age make-up is to tell you to study a member of your family or a friend who appears to be the character you wish to create. Compare their lines to your own, then visualize these lines on your own face.

"A grease-paint foundation is the coffee has been placed in the section of the drip pot intended to hold it, boiling water is poured over the grounds—and I mean boiling. It generally takes five minutes for the water to drip through.

Whether you use the drip or percolator method when making coffee, you should try the new liners and filters that can be used in either type of coffee pot. You place the liners in the part of the pot in which the coffee grounds are to go. The gossamer-thin filter paper is then placed inside the liner and all is ready for the coffee to be added. If you want to make sure that your coffee is clear and without a trace of sediment in the bottom of the cup, these new paper gadgets will do the job for you. They have little cross cuts in the centre to fit over the percolating spout which in no way minimizes their efficiency, if you use a drip pot. They do a neat job of emptying out the used coffee grounds in one operation, too.

And now that we've discussed coffee-making a bit, let's get back to the foods that Charlie Ruggles prefers as accompaniments to the perfect cup of coffee.

The doughnuts of which I was speaking a while back were of the new popular whole wheat variety. You can kid all you want about "sinkers" but certainly the doughnuts made by Charlie's colored cook were very delicious. There was a large proportion of whole wheat flour used in their making and not one trace of a greasy taste about them. The recipe? Certainly! I'll tell you later on how to get it.

Of course, in every man's estimation pie is the ideal coffee-companion. Charlie is no exception and admits that Lemon Cream Pie is his favorite. It's a first cousin of the Lemon Meringue Pie—only creamier, as its name suggests. So many lemon pies taste like flavored flan that I was overjoyed to get, from Charlie's cook, a new recipe for a lemon pie that has a smooth, mouth-melting filling. This recipe, too, is yours for the asking.

I was also able to get recipes for two more of Charlie's favorite dishes—one a dessert, the other a breakfast hot bread of the simplest sort. This breakfast bread is called Cinnamon Crumb Cake. It's as spicy as its name suggests but far easier to make than you'd ever think it could be. It can be made up in the morning in a very short time, especially if all the dry ingredients are sifted together the previous evening and left in a covered bowl for early morning use.

When Binnie Barnes gives a typical English "Tea" Party for her British compatriots she also caters to the preference of her American friends by having a generous supply of coffee on hand. A tremendous variety of foods accompanies these beverages—strawberries (in season or out of season) with whipped cream and powdered sugar; jams and marmalade; buttered slices of currant bread, crumpets, muffins and scones; Swiss roll, plum cake, homemade chocolate cake, and iced cup cakes. Binnie, dark haired and British, plays the blonde American Lillian Russell in "Diamond Jim Brady." Una O'Connor and Herbert Mundin are her guests.

The dessert I spoke of is of the Dutch Apple Cake variety. A simple biscuit-like dough is placed in a pan. Into this are pressed thin, wedge-shaped pieces of apple with butter, sugar and spices sprinkled over the top. In the Ruggles version there is still another ingredient—mince meat. Now that there are delicious, inexpensive, ready-prepared mince meats available at your grocers, you'll find this dish easy to make and perfect to eat. It's called New Netherland Cake if you care to know. And you may have the recipe free if you care to have it.

Of course, in speaking of dishes that should accompany coffee we must not entirely overlook coffee used as a flavoring in desserts and sauces. One of the very nicest of the coffee desserts I know of is Coffee Marshmallow Mousse, a very rich tasting, easy-to-make sweet—the kind the luncheon or bridge club will rave about. But save out a generous portion for father's dinner too! He won't turn up his nose at this one, I'll wager. Here's the recipe:

COFFEE MARSHMALLOW MOUSSE

18 marshmallows
½ cup strong coffee
½ pint whipping cream
½ teaspoon powdered sugar

Place coffee and marshmallows in top of double boiler. Cook over boiling water until marshmallows have melted. Remove from heat, turn into a bowl and cool. Place in refrigerator until mixture has set to the consistency of a thick syrup. Add sugar to cream. Whip cream until stiff. Fold cream into marshmallow mixture. Turn mixture into a mold that has been rinsed with cold water. Return to refrigerator until firm, about 4 hours. Serve plain or with slightly sweetened whipped cream.

Cut this recipe out, mount it on a card and save it for future use. But send for the Ruggles recipes too, right away.

Each recipe is printed on an individual card of filing-case size. Filing cases to hold them can be purchased for a few cents in almost any chain store. Though not essential such a case is nice to have if you are starting to make a collection of these Star Recipes. When you realize that there is no cost to you beyond the price of the stamp or postal you use when sending in your coupon, you'll surely want to send for Modern Hostess leaflets regularly. Why not start immediately by sending for the recipe cards which give you directions for making Charlie Ruggles' favorite coffee companions? You'll love the little design on the cover of the leaflet, the name of the star on each card. Not to mention the enthusiasm with which you should greet recipes for Cinnamon Coffee Cake, New Netherland Apple Cake, Whole Wheat Doughnuts and Lemon Cream Pie. Well, here's the coupon, you ambitious cooks! Use it immediately.

"Beats my home-cooked spaghetti a mile—quicker, easier—costs less, too!"

"I DON'T wonder Mary was surprised. I certainly was the first time I tasted Franco-American. Up until then I firmly believed no ready-prepared spaghetti could possibly be as good as home-cooked. But Franco-American is actually better—ever so much better! I use it all the time now and I've told a number of my friends how delicious it is.

"We all agree it has the best sauce we ever tasted. In fact, we never knew how good spaghetti could be till we tried Franco-American!"

Good? No wonder!

Franco-American chefs use eleven different ingredients when they prepare their delectable sauce. Tomato puree, lusciously smooth and rich. Golden Cheddar cheese of just the right sharpness. Selected spices and seasonings, each one adding its tiny bit more of zestful flavor and delicate piquancy.

"Why should I bother with home-cooked spaghetti now?" women are saying. "I never could make as good a sauce as this. And I'm not even going to try." Franco-American is so much easier, too. No cooking or fussing—simply heat and serve.

And here's a pleasant surprise. You pay less for it than if you bought all the different sauce ingredients plus the cost of cooking them. And isn't the time you save worth something, too? Ask your grocer for Franco-American today. A can holding three to four portions is never more than ten cents.

Any Woman can be Up to Date

(in her information)

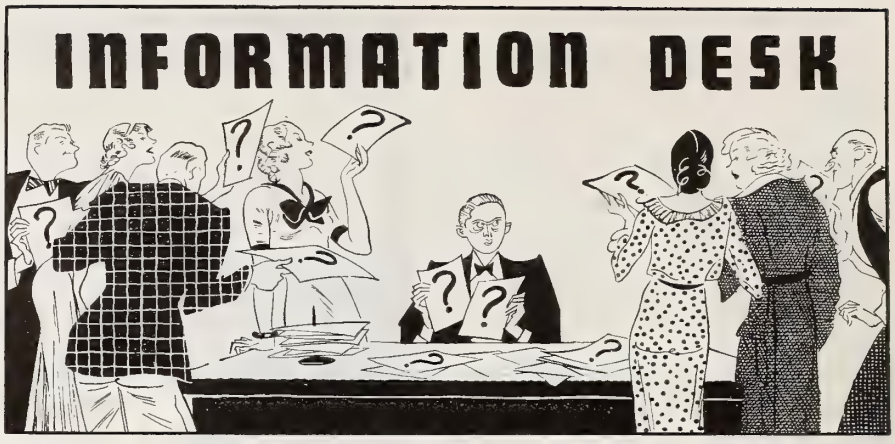
A great deal of the talk among women, on the subject of feminine hygiene, had better be disregarded. Some of it is garbled, incorrect, perhaps even dangerous. And some of it is just plain old-fashioned. Here are the facts, for any woman to read, and bring herself up to date.

With Zonite available in every drug store, it is old-fashioned to think that poisonous antiseptics are needed for feminine hygiene. There was a time in the past, when certain caustic and poisonous compounds actually were the only antiseptics strong enough for the purpose. But that day ended with the World War which brought about the discovery of Zonite.

Zonite is the great modern antiseptic-germicide—far more powerful than any dilution of carbolic acid that can be safely used on human flesh. But Zonite is not caustic, not poisonous. This marvelous Zonite is gentle in use and as harmless as pure water. Zonite never injured any woman. No delicate membranes were ever damaged by Zonite, or areas of scar-tissue formed.

It is hard to believe that such power and such gentleness could ever be combined—as they are in Zonite. But what an ideal combination this is—for the particular requirements of feminine hygiene.

Also Zonite Suppositories (semi-solid)



Zonite comes in liquid form—30c, 60c and $1.00 bottles. The semi-solid Suppository form sells at $1.00 a dozen, each pure white Suppository sealed separately in glass vial. Many women use both. Ask for both Zonite Suppositories and Liquid Zonite by name, at drug or department stores. There is no substitute.

Send for the booklet "Facts for Women." This is a frank and wholesome booklet—scientific and impersonal. It has been prepared for the special purpose of bringing women up to date. Don't miss reading it. Just mail the coupon.

She has one brother, Charles. Subjected to a rigorous French upbringing, she was a very quiet, well-behaved youngster. The Colbert family came to New York when Claudette was six, and she attended the Washington Irving High School. As a graduation present she and her mother took a trip to Paris after which Claudette enrolled in the Art Student's League in New York. Came the day when, at a tea, she accepted a bet that she could get a part in a Broadway production. A friend of hers managed to arrange a maid's part in "The Wild Westcotts" and she won her bet. But, to her surprise, Claudette discovered that she really wanted to become an actress. To this end she called upon Brock Pemberton and finally persuaded him to give her the leading role in "The Marionette Man." From then on life was a series of stellar roles until 1929 when she left the stage to concentrate upon being a screen actress. Her first picture was a silent, made during the time of her stage appearances and was entitled "For the Love of Mike." It was so bad that she did not return to the screen again until 1929 when she made "The Lady Lies" in the East. Claudette has brownish hair and large brown eyes. She lives a simple life, is still interested in art, likes to read, play tennis, swim and travel. Her best friend is Daisy Lukas, wife of Paul Lukas. She is 5 feet 3 inches tall and weighs 107 pounds. She married Norman Foster during her stage days, but their divorce is only a question of time. "She Married Her Boss" is Colbert's most recent picture and her next will probably be "A Bride Comes Home" with Fred MacMurray. She is under long term contract to Paramount Studios, 5451 Marathon St., Hollywood, Cal.

ALICE MASON, Granite City, Ill.—Jack LaRue has been terribly fussy these days—a fact that will greatly tickle his many fans. Having recently completed "The Little Big Shot" and "Special Agent" for Warner Brothers, and "Wild Night" for Universal, he is currently working on "The Spanish Cape Mystery" for Republic. Write him for a photograph at Republic Studios, 9336 W. Washington Blvd., Culver City, Cal. William Powell's next opus will be "The Black Chamber" with Rosalind Rusell and Binnie Barnes. "The Great Ziegfeld" in which Powell plays the title role, will probably be finished eventually.

MILLS, Winnipeg, Canada; CLARA CRIBLIER, Waterbury, Conn.—John Boles, born in Greenville, Texas, on October 27, 1900, of an old Southern family, was the son of a banker and cotton broker. And take it, or leave it, Love is John's middle name. Greenville schools and the University of Texas gave him the preparatory courses necessary to entering John Hopkins, where he intended to start his study of medicine. The War interrupted his plans, and he enlisted in the army in the intelligence division. While in France his voice made him a great favorite of the A. E. F. entertainments, during one of which he was heard by a noted British musician who advised him to train his voice for the stage. When John returned to America he decided to follow this course, first working in a local bank to save money, then going to New York to teach French in a girls' academy and at the same time to take voice lessons. He later went to France to study and returned to New York in two years, determined to get a leading role or nothing. Nothing it was, for a long time, but finally "Little Jesse James" was the answer to his prayer. He was an instant success and after this appeared in several Broadway productions until Gloria Swanson offered him the leading role in her picture, "The Loves of Sonya." He accepted and appeared in several other silents until he made his first big hit in the sound picture, "The Desert Song." From then on you know the story. John is 6 feet 1 inch tall, weights 185 pounds, has dark brown hair and gray-blue eyes. He seldom smokes, nursing his voice, and spends much time out of doors, exercising to keep his weight down. He likes all outdoor sports, especially hiking and tennis. Mrs. Boles is the former Marcellite Dobbs and they have two daughters. After "Redheads On Parade" you will see him in a very special picture, "Rose of the Rancho" with Gladys Swarthout. Write him at the 20th Century-Fox Studios, 1401 N. Western Ave., Hollywood, Cal.

CHARLOTTE PATIKY, Huntington, N. Y.—You guessed right. Robert Light is the young man you thought he was. He did appear in "Reckless," "Gentlemen Are Born," "Murder in the Clouds" and "Mary Jane's Pa." He is 24 and still single. His next picture will be "Shipmates Forever" and you may reach him at Warner Brothers Studios, Burbank, Cal.

Her sister, Athole, married Howard Hawks, film director, and her brother, Douglas Shearer, is Chief Recording Engineer for M-G-M. Educated in Montreal public schools, and Westmount High School, Norma started playing in school plays at 14. In 1920 she and her mother and sister came to New York to try to break into the movies. After nearly starving for six months without getting a break, Norma landed a three-day job in a college picture. Then came a lead in a western which was good for one week. After another semi-starvation period, little Norma began to get feminine leads in such pictures as "The Stealers" and "Channing of the Northwest." These brought a contract from Louis B. Mayer and the chance to head for Hollywood. There she met Irving Thalberg on the M-G-M lot and shortly after she had become a star, married him on September 29, 1927. Their first son, Irving Jr., was born before Norma made "Strangers May Kiss," and now, before she started "Romeo and Juliet," she became the mother of a little girl, Katherine. Norma's first talking picture was "The Trial of Mary Dugan." Besides being an excellent actress, Miss Shearer is a brilliant conversationalist, one of the best hostesses in Hollywood and has long been considered one of the best-dressed women of the screen. In the realm of sports, Norma enjoys horseback riding, swimming and tennis. She plays the piano and is an omnivorous reader. She is 5 feet 1 inch tall, weighs 115 pounds, has wavy brown hair, semi-bobbed, and blue eyes. Write her at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studios, Culver City, Cal.

JEANNETTE SIKES, Dublin, Ga.—Rumor has it that Clara Bow is grooming herself (reducing) for a screen comeback. So maybe you'll be seeing her again soon. Clark Gable's and Franchot Tone's next pictures are one and the same. "Mutiny on the Bounty" with Charles Laughton.

Md.; BLANCHE McCLINTOCK, Lynn, Mass.; BETTE PENINGTON, Renton, Wash.; ELFRIEDE TONNE, Islip, N. Y.—Imagine earning $200 per week at the age of eight! Well, that's just what Fred Astaire and his sister, Adele, were netting at that tender age. Born in Omaha, Neb., on November 26, 1900, he and Adele (their name was Austerlitz then) wasted little time before they took to the stage. Their fame as dancers grew rapidly and they were Broadway stars while still very young. Three of their musical productions took the Astaires to London where they became the rage both in the theatre and in society. In 1931 Adele retired from the stage to marry Lord Cavendish of London. Fred, forced to continue alone, made a tremendous success in "The Gay Divorce," on the New York and London Stage. It was at this time that Phyllis Livingstone Potter, society girl, became his wife. Our dancing hero made his screen debut in "Flying Down to Rio" in a minute part. Next came Crawford's "Dancing Lady"—also a small part. Then RKO signed Fred for "The Gay Divorcée," and as a result of this, to a seven year contract. Off the screen Fred has dark brown eyes and hair, likes tennis, golf and prize fights. He dotes on corned beef and cabbage, likes to read anything written in English. He is 5 feet 9 inches tall and is very slender. His next picture after "Top Hat" will probably be "Follow the Fleet" again with that high steppin' gal, Ginger Rogers. Write Fred at the RKO-Radio Studios, 780 N. Gower St., Hollywood, Cal.

MARY POWERS—In case you haven't heard, Franchot Tone is Joan Crawford's man. Maybe they'll be married by the time you read this, or maybe they are already. Joe Morrison, born on November 19, 1908, will be 27 his next birthday. He has dark brown hair and twinkling blue eyes, is 5 feet 10 inches tall and weighs 150 pounds. He's not married.

Of course, she really isn't old—she was only 23 her last birthday, February 21st. Born in Bridgeport, Conn., in 1912 Arline was educated at St. Agnes' Seminary, Brooklyn; Urceline Academy, New York City and New Rochelle College, New Rochelle, N. Y. Her nimble feet led her to the dancing school run by the late Jack Donahue, who gave her her first job—entertaining with a chair-dance tap routine at a shoe and leather fair in Boston. Returning to New York, Miss Judge went into a ten weeks vaudeville engagement, followed by parts in stock and Ruth Selwyn's "9:15 Revue." In the second "Little Show" she sang the song hit, "Sing Something Simple," and while appearing in George White's "Scandals," was tested for the screen. She went to Hollywood and sat around for three months, then was suddenly chosen for the lead in "Are These Our Children?" directed by Wesley Ruggles. Three years ago she married the man, and their young son is named Charles Wesley Ruggles. Arline is 5 feet ½ inch tall, weighs 99 pounds, has chestnut hair and tanned skin. She likes many sports, particularly tennis, and horseback riding as well as swimming. After "Welcome Home" she started work in "Fly By Night" in which she appears with Robert Young. Her address is 20th Century-Fox Studios, 1401 N. Formosa Ave., Hollywood, Calif., where you can write her for a photograph if you send 25c.

Young. Educated at Marengo Heights School, Seattle, Wash., and Lincoln High School, Los Angeles, Bob always wanted to act and gave vent to his urge by going in for amateur dramatics at high school. On graduation, he became interested in the Pasadena Community Play House and did forty productions for that group. Furthermore, he took a dig at the following businesses: drug clerk, reporter, building and loan association salesman, bank clerk, etc. Besides that, friend Robert toured the coast with the Moroni Olsen Players. (By the way, this same Moroni Olsen is playing the part of Porthos in "The Three Musketeers.") And having been seen by a scout in one of these productions, he was invited to have a test made. It was a success and M-G-M signed him to a contract, but loaned him to Fox for his first picture, "The Black Camel." Then came "The Sin of Madelon Claudet" and Bob had made his name. This lad is 6 feet tall, weighs 170 pounds and has brown eyes and hair. His favorite sport is golf, he reads biographies and is simply nuts about his wife, Betty Henderson—she was his sweetheart in high school and he married her about four years ago—and his two-year-old daughter, Carol Ann. Bob's next picture is "Red Salute" in which he plays opposite Barbara Stanwyck. Write him at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer Studio, Culver City, Cal.

They swapped powders!

☆ The Blonde's skin brightened—

★ The Brunette's was shades clearer

Over 200 girls' skin color-analyzed to find the hidden tints in lovely skin now blended invisibly in Pond's new Face Powder.

BLONDE: "Look! Your Brunette powder makes my skin glorious!"

BRUNETTE: "No more Brunette for me! Your Rose Cream makes my skin clearer."

The two girls had happened on something that many a woman can benefit by.

Creamy-skinned, Miss Hope Gatins (left) had deadened her skin with too light a powder. Miss Marjorie Striker, dark-haired, had dimmed her fair skin with too dark a powder!

Then, how can I find my shade, you ask. Study your skin—not your hair, nor your eyes! Is it sallow? Your powder can brighten it! Dull? The right powder will make it clear!

But old-style, deadening shades can't do this!

With an optical machine, Pond's tested over 200 girls' skins. They brought to light the hidden tints that make skin beautiful. In blondes, a suggestion of bright blue intensifies that delicate transparency. In brunettes, a hint of brilliant green brings sparkling clarity!

Now these magic tints are blended invisibly into Pond's new shades. Try them—see the difference! Each does something special for a different type of skin.

Rose Cream—gives radiance to fair skin
Natural—lighter—a delicate flesh tint
Brunette—clears creamy skins
Rose Brunette—warms dull skins—tones down ruddy ones
Light Cream—a light ivory tone

See how delicately Pond's clings. Won't clog or cake. As natural as skin itself!

First Fan Letter

I have always been a movie fan but for the first time in my life I feel moved to write a fan letter. After seeing the artistic perfection of Nelson Eddy's performance in "Naughty Marietta," I knew that my reactions would have to find expression. He embodies the most unusual combination of charming personality, fine acting ability and superb voice it has ever been my good fortune to encounter. To see the audience in a large city theatre listen with breathless attention to Mr. Eddy's glorious voice and to hear that crowd break into thunderous applause to an empty stage and to see the people leave the theatre with dreams in their eyes, was to me a unique experience. Mr. Eddy is no doubt accustomed to ovations but I'm sure he has never had one more sincere.

I love good music and consequently have avoided musical pictures because I did not care to have my ideals shattered. I attended the showing of "Naughty Marietta" against my better judgment but found myself enthralled after the first few minutes. Thank you, Mr. Eddy, for your excellent rendition of the numbers and please be good enough to let a disillusioned public soon again have a glimpse of that rare thing—a man who has music in his soul. —Marilyn Parkes, Llanerch, Pa.

Loyal to Buddy

All the world admires a person who refuses to give up and hasn't Buddy Rogers proved that "you can't keep a good guy down"?

We loyal fans who have backed Buddy Rogers right from the very beginning of his career ask that he be given another chance. Buddy proved in his early pictures that he could act and when he was refused the good stories he wanted, he didn't leave Hollywood to forget, as so many other stars have done. He started out to show the big shots of the film capital what he really could do.

He was a Broadway hit in Ziegfeld's "Hot-Cha" and later had his orchestra featured on two large radio networks. Recently he proved himself a success on the London screen with his portrayal of a real youth full of the joy of living in "Dance Band." Besides, in the last three years that he has traveled with his orchestra he has packed the theatres and night clubs wherever he has appeared.

Doesn't all this prove that he hasn't been licked? And he's even returned to Hollywood, where he has been working in "Old Man Rhythm," to show them he isn't afraid of what its kleig lights and glamor do to a career.—Marilyn Bonnell, Milwaukee, Wis.

New Talent

Hurrah for "Escapade"—bound to make you forget the humidity in the air. Bill Powell proves to be a star with a heart in affording lovely Luise Rainer (pictured) to give full scope to her varied assortment of excellent talent. In short, he just fades into the background as the feminine contingencies in this picture disport themselves in the front line. What a grand bunch of femininity it is, too—Mady Christians and Virginia Bruce with Laura Hope Crews thrown in for good measure. I just ate it up and found it one of the best features of the summer output.—J. Edward Mulcahy, Waterbury, Conn.

Hisses and Applause

About this wonderful star of "One Night of Love" and "Love Me Forever"—I wish to say I'm sick and tired of her posing and high-hat airs. Who? Grace Moore, of course. She's the most unnatural thing that there is in Hollywood. Did you ever notice any picture of her? She's sure to have everything "perfect" about her. No one ever seems to catch her unaware, or without that sugary smile on her face. That's what makes her so unnatural.

We fans get sick and tired of all that posing. I, for one, like Elisabeth Bergner (pictured). You certainly wouldn't call her beautiful, not even pretty—still she attracts attention by her very naturalness. Give us more of her!—M. G., Geneva, Ohio.

Beautiful Horror

After I read your reviewer's opinion of "The Bride of Frankenstein," I just had to speak up in defense of what was to me a beautiful and infinitely touching picture. I have never seen a finer or more moving performance than that of Mr. Karloff as that pitiful, grotesque monster, reaching out in vain, for human companionship.

I realize that there are some people who do not like horror pictures, but I do not see how even these could fail to appreciate Mr. Karloff's magnificent work, to say nothing of the beauty of the entire production. I intend to see this picture again at the earliest opportunity and the fact that it drew capacity crowds during its showing here proves that the majority of fans do appreciate this type of entertainment.

Maybe you had better keep the Movie Scoreboard it seems a bit more accurate

BORN IN A HURRICANE

and vital—something with "guts."

Not long ago, in the devious manner in which such things happen, a man came to Wilcoxon with a strange tale. Somewhere between 120 and 150 degrees west of Greenwich and within thirty degrees north latitude lay five lost islands. Beautiful things they are, too, according to the fragmentary reports and seamen's tales that have sifted down through the century—lush and green, abounding in game and fresh water, surrounded by sea and sky, bathed in sun and the soft trade winds. Inhabited? No one knows. Treasure? Rich in natural wealth—or just an island strangely immune from the foot of man? Again, no one knows.

I GAVE up all ideas of following the sea for adventure," Henry told me, "long ago. It seemed there was no real romance left—nothing to do, no honestly hard jobs to go out and lick. When speed swept wood and sail from the trade lanes, speed and hurry swept the battle of a man and his ingenuity against the elements from the sea. Steam? Bah! It's as safe as a baby's crib! Gyroscopic compasses, radio, gadgets galore, tremendous hulks of steel driven at set speeds through any seas! They sail themselves. Thrilling situations at sea nowadays occur either through carelessness, bad seamanship or are one of those thousand-to-one shots that always happen to the other fellow—like winning the Irish Sweepstakes.

"And then this came along. I hardly believed it at first. New land, unexplored and, in reality, hardly discovered. In 1840 a sailing vessel making its way back to the States passed them miles off. The Captain made an entry in his log and paid no real attention to it. He wasn't interested. Maps, especially of Oceania, were rather vague and incomplete. True, they didn't show on his chart, but that didn't mean the islands hadn't been discovered and claimed years before.

"That was our first clue. We had his port of clearance and his destination. We had his number of days out of port and a fair guess at his approximate speed, but, as any sailor can tell you, that is far from sufficient knowledge to go cruising along thousands of square miles of sea with any hope of success. Next we heard of an old chart, rough and inaccurate, made by a venerable Captain of the old school who sailed quite close to the islands in 1860, twenty years later. By crossing their courses and, even allowing for glaring mistakes in their rule of thumb figures, working out their speed and dates, we've been able to narrow down the search considerably.

"Where are they, or, where do we think they are? Don't be silly! I'll tell you all that when I'm safely at sea and beyond all chance of being beaten to the Lost Islands. For years I've dreamt of this sort of adventure—just the three of us in a forty-foot schooner headed for parts unknown, to discover and explore. That's life!"

No one could call Henry Wilcoxon a frustrated man, despite the fact that he minimizes all the things that have happened to him in search of action. He has had plenty and he admits there is really no very good reason why he is alive today—except that the roaring inferno in which he was born seems to have implanted in him a strange, almost mystical, quality of they're good for Baby!

Your baby's proper nourishment comes first, of course. So the big point to remember is that these foods are specially good for your baby.

We strain vegetables many times finer than you can. We cook them with air shut out, to guard against loss of vitamin C. We save water-soluble vitamins and minerals that you often pour off with the cooking water.

And Now—Shaker-Cooking

Best of all, there's a new, exclusive Gerber process—Shaker-Cooking. It "stirs" the contents of the can, allows the heat to penetrate more quickly and uniformly, shortens the cooking time and makes Gerber Strained Vegetables fresher looking and fresher tasting than ever before. That's saying a lot—for we grow our own, and pick them fresh, in our own Michigan gardens! For baby's sake—and yours—use Gerber's.

Hundreds of thousands of babies have been fed the modern Gerber way on recommendation of physicians. Every Gerber product has been accepted by the American Medical Association's Committee on Foods. Ask your doctor. . . . Remember that these products are unseasoned—salt or sugar may be added to meet your baby's individual taste or requirements.

scenting danger when logical thought gives not the slightest intimation of anything being amiss. A primitive strain in this barrel-chested man warns him of trouble—the back of his neck and spine tingle like an electric shock. It's just an intuitive warning, stronger in some than in others.

"Time and again that signal has saved my life," he says. "I can remember the first time it happened as vividly as if it were yesterday. I was scared stiff, if you want to know the truth. Just about as much scared by the funny feeling as by what happened. It was down in the Barbados; a bunch of us were playing cow-boy and Indians; I was the Indian and running like the devil to save my precious neck; we were galloping along over the top of a ruined Spanish fortress wall; just ahead was a stone arch, part of the wall, over which we'd run hundreds of times. But this time I stopped dead. No reason. I grabbed the others though they were yelling and fighting to get away. And just then that arch that had stood for centuries over a hundred-foot gully crashed with a roar that shook the island.

"It happened again when my brother and I were flying over the Alps. We were supposed to come down for the night on a small mountain lake. We got there just at dusk. Everything was serene, the sun painting the peaks in every color of the spectrum, and just below us the great, flat white expanse of the frozen lake. We started to circle down to an easy landing when that awful prickling started on my spine again. And again, for no apparent reason. I pulled up and gave her the gun. I know my brother thought I'd suddenly lost my reason, but I headed for the shore, steep and drifted with snow—not a dangerous landing place, but certainly less inviting than the lake.

"I put her down with some difficulty and clambered out trying to explain why I'd done it—when I really didn't know! We made our way into the nearby village for the night—and then we found out. For months the villagers had been pumping water out of the lake from beneath the ice for their own use. Between the bottom of the ice and the surface of the water beneath was several feet of nothing. If we'd landed on the lake there is no question but that the strain would have been too great on the ice and we'd have gone through."

And yet this same man will sit down and tell you quite seriously that he considers acting to be the most romantic and adventurous calling today. In fact, he's "terribly keen" about it. The very uncertainty of an acting career appeals to him, the ups and downs that tag one from this picture to that all have an element of gambling in them that lifts them from the mundane. So, to Henry Wilcoxon, the land-lubber, it has the same powerful appeal that going down to the sea in sails has for Henry, the Lion-Hearted.

"Been awfully nice to see you," he cut my reverie off, "but I must be getting along. Stopping by the harbor to look over the new Marconi sail and make arrangements for auxiliary water tanks. We're really making quite a thing of this trip, you know. May be frightfully important if we do raise some new land, but, in any event—it's action!"

HER MOTHER'S FAILURE BROUGHT HARLOW FAME

intimacy of this mother and daughter. Only this untold story of the first "Jean Harlow," who did not become a star, and of the second, who did, can explain it.

I DOUBT if this mother has had any of the fears, common to many mothers, of any man supplanting, completely, the depth of the bond between her and her daughter. Jean's early runaway marriage may have been a shock, but the mother, undoubtedly, understood that very young girls in fashionable boarding schools are apt to find romantic outlets when life becomes a routine of guarded classrooms. And that such attachments are not deep and seldom permanent.

Today, the mother must be grateful, for it was this marriage of Jean's which Fate used to give her life a twist it had not handed to her mother when she sought screen fame. The wealthy young husband took his adolescent bride to Hollywood for a honeymoon and this was her first lucky break!

Jean Harlow today credits her entrance into pictures to a bet. It is true, she took her first job to win a wager from one of her young social acquaintances. She was a young girl, living in Beverly Hills, and dashing hither and thither with young socialites, who thought she had no ambition to go into pictures. But we are not always aware of our true ambitions! Jean had not forgotten her girlhood thrill of watching Pola Negri enter a motion picture theatre. "I just wanted to touch her, then," she has told me. And that early impression must have left its haunting spell upon her.

Jean won the bet and entered pictures. She signed with Hal Roach.

Many have wondered why Jean's grandfather imperiously ordered his only granddaughter back to Kansas City the moment she had won screen recognition, this first time. Perhaps we can understand now. His beautiful daughter had felt the lure of Hollywood, only to return to Kansas City. And now his granddaughter was feeling it. He would not have her disappointed. His word to "come home" was not a request, but a command. He commanded she break her contract with Hal Roach. So Jean Harlow, like her mother, returned from Hollywood to Kansas City.

But now there was the ambition of two women. The younger had won her opportunity. It should not be taken from her. I presume the combined arguments of these two beautiful women were too much for the determination of one man. Anyway, Jean Harlow divorced her young husband and the two "Jean Harlows" returned to Hollywood together.

You remember Jean began the second time in Al Christie comedies. And again, the elusive lucky break came to her at just the right moment. She was acting in a Christie short when Ben Lyon and Jimmy Hall "just happened" to drop onto the set. They saw her and cried, "There's our leading lady for 'Hell's Angels,'" and took her immediately to Howard Hughes for a test. Jean says, "Howard Hughes was completely exhausted when he saw my test. He had looked at 700 girls when I flashed before him on the screen and he said, almost without thinking, 'I'll take that one.'" Another lucky break for the second Harlow or Jean as she became in Hollywood. She replaced Greta Nissen.

It is weird—the way the lucky moments that had passed the "first Jean Harlow" dropped so neatly into the lap of the second! It is touching the way the one Jean Harlow was to fulfill the ambition of two women.

AND perhaps the luckiest break of all for Jean was the fact that she had, at her constant command, the experience and wisdom of two women. She was not one alone, battling Hollywood, she was two.

What might have happened if Jean Harlow had been forced to pass through her Hollywood experiences alone, as Barbara La Marr did! Her fame was so instantaneous and nothing can be as deadly a menace as quick fame. Then marriage, suicide, quick marriage and quick divorce. Ah, here were experiences which might have wrecked one Jean Harlow, standing alone. But with two of them, holding hands, combining experience and knowledge!

I talked with Jean Harlow not so long ago about her philosophy of living. She told me she and her mother had worked it out together. She said: "I am very lucky. The majority of girls my age do not have an understanding about life. They are mostly seeking not to be bored. They are hunting for a reason for living. While I have learned that life is a very glorious adventure. I am grateful—at twenty-two. I know how wonderful it is to be alive. There is neither a past nor a future. I have learned that. Do not misunderstand me. I am not a drifter, I am a fighter. But I have learned about the 'plans of mice and men.' I fight only for today. Once, I thought I knew what life would turn out to be. So did my mother. Now, I know there is no use in planning for something which may never come to pass. Why should one take away from the joy of living each day for something which may never happen, for something which has happened but over which you have no control. My mother has not had an easy life. Neither have I. We have worked out this idea of living, together."

One Jean Harlow, alone? A girl who is still so young? Could she have worked this out alone? Could she have bounded to success, alone? Could she have faced what she has faced and won singlehandedly? I doubt it.

Each time I see the Jean, our Jean, on the screen, in performances which are assuredly growing better and better, I think of this hitherto untold story. I remember I am not seeing just one Jean Harlow—but two.

THEY'RE STILL GOSSIPING

But it certainly was not significant of some tremendous change in my mode of living.

"Why must one be poured into a mould, anyhow? Why can't one be spontaneous and simple and do what one wants to do?

"I've heard that one of the reasons people say I'm 'ingrown' is because I choose to see movies here at my house rather than go to the theatres. And that seems to me so simple.

"When I remodeled this place I added a fine play-room, a sort of little theatre that I knew would bring pleasure to my friends and to me, including a projection room.

"I adore movies, partly for themselves and partly because they are in my work

THIS little medicine-fighter has one of childhood's greatest worries licked. He has just been introduced to a laxative that's a treat—Fletcher's Castoria!

Even the taste of Fletcher's Castoria is made especially for children. A youngster takes it willingly . . . and it's important that he should. For the revulsion a child feels when forced to take a laxative he hates upsets his nerves and digestion.

And—Fletcher's Castoria was made especially for a child's needs—no harsh, purging drugs in Fletcher's Castoria such as some "grown-up" laxatives contain.

Like the carefully chosen food you give your child, Fletcher's Castoria is ideally suited for a child's growing body.

It will never cause griping pain. It does not form a habit. It is gentle, safe and thorough.

and, therefore, a vital part of my life. And isn't it much nicer to have films sent over from the studios and see them comfortably in one's own home than to go out to a stuffy theatre? I think I'm terribly lucky to have the opportunity and I can see nothing odd about it.

"But certainly when I can't have entertainment brought to me I go to it. Concerts, stage plays, opera—I wouldn't miss them. I always go.

I BELIEVE that perhaps the answer is that I am one of the few people who actually love my home. It represents something to me—the beauty and security that was lacking in my early life. It also seems the reward for the hard work I've done. There is not a vase or a piece of linen in the place that I've not selected lovingly. It took months to complete. And what, then, would be the good of it if I were not to be in it?

"I won't follow the accepted pattern unless I like the pattern.

"On 'cook's night out' everyone in Hollywood dines out. But I have lots more fun. I cook the dinner myself.

"No, I'm not going to tell you that I'd adore cooking three meals a day, every day. I wouldn't. That would be dull and monotonous and I hate monotony. But I do like to cook. I think it's a real artistic adventure. And I'm a good cook, too.

"I manage my own house, partly because I like it and partly because I can save money doing it. Once I had a secretary who took care of things and then I decided that it would be better if I kept the accounts. I was amazed at how much I was able to save on both small and large ordering.

"Actually, I'm a frugal person. I learned that when I was on—well, you couldn't even call it a budget. You've got to have some money to budget and I didn't have any. But you'd be amazed at how little it takes to run this house, if you're careful about details. And I am.

"But I like to live nicely. I dress for dinner every evening (and I've heard that criticized) and it isn't to put on swank. If it were, I'd certainly say so, because if I felt like putting on swank I would. I dress for dinner simply because it makes me feel good. After working all day under those glaring hot lights, with make-up on, it is the most marvelous sensation in the world to take off that make-up and put on a pretty dinner dress—a simple, cool dinner dress—and have a nice, quiet meal. Anyhow, I love pretty clothes. I wouldn't be a woman if I didn't. I really look forward to the dress I'm going to wear on the evening after a hard day's work.

YES, I live in my home, live in it in every sense of the word. Now wouldn't I be a fool to trot off to a beach when I have this pool here and this marvelous and private place for sun bathing?

"I can't see that I'm so odd or strange, can you? My life seems very sane and logical to me. But if it weren't, I wouldn't care. I've stopped that. I have never hurt anyone knowingly or willfully, in my life, but I live as I want to live. I do, insofar as I can, as I please. And I'm happy. I am as happy, I imagine, as any woman in the world!"

The sun bath was finished. She stretched her beautiful, long, lean legs. "And now I have to go to the studio for a wardrobe fitting," she said.

Suddenly I saw the maddening bustle of the studio, heard the incessant din of the lots. Even the thought jarred upon the peace of Joan's garden.

She must have read my thoughts. "Knowing how hard we picture people work, do you wonder that I love this peace?" she asked. "Realizing how much we play act, should anyone be surprised that I like to stop play acting when I come home?"

No, I don't. And one shouldn't. Joan is but reaping the reward of success—success that came from work, work, work. Certainly, she should be at liberty to take that reward as she likes.

Well—she is!

and her mother returned to Atlantic City, where there was always a good job waiting for a good dancer, which meant that Eleanor had a good job. In the winter she returned to her native Springfield, Mass., where she helped teach dancing school and attended high school. Then came the summer when Eleanor was sixteen and at this eventful date, it was decided that she try her luck in New York. Now, you know, no one has much luck in New York at first, and neither did this better-than-promising ballerina. The town is full of postponements and promises and people's relatives who have an "in," and managers who want tap dancers when you can only do ballet!

"It seemed," said Eleanor, "that the only way out of a ballet bad situation was to learn tap dancing. And so, I took ten lessons from Jack Donahue—and that was all the tap training I've ever had."

Imagine! And this gal is the title-holder for taps. She's won the very stiff contest for five years in succession, a contest in which the judges sit under the stage and where perfect taps, shading and rhythm count. The contestants are never seen while in action, so beauty, personality and smart clothes are of no avail. You've gotta tap, sister, or you don't win. Hard lines for relatives! (Incidentally, Bill Robinson has held the men's tap dancing award for years.)

"And so," continued Miss Powell, "with a few soft shoe routines to the good, I landed in 'Follow Thru,' a show that ran two years and gave me a chance to save up. Then came some other hits, and now the movies! I can't believe it. Wait 'til my grandmother sees the picture. She's just living for it!"

ELEANOR POWELL must be one of the minor mysteries to Hollywood. She is simple and unaffected and unspoiled. Nothing is too much trouble in order to perfect her work. Endless rehearsals, striving for new effects, bouncing out of bed at 2 a. m. to try a new step that has suddenly, out of nowhere, occurred to her.

"I'm always afraid I'll forget how," she confesses frightenedly. Suppose sometime, I just can't get going. I'm like someone who plays the piano by ear. He's always afraid that the last thing he's played is going to be—the last thing he's played. Oh, gosh, don't even let us talk about it!"

Eleanor talks as fast and as entertainingly as one does who loves to recount experiences. If she makes a misstatement, her mother corrects her. She said she danced twenty weeks at the Casino de Paree on Broadway. Her mother reminded her it was seventeen. "Oh, yes," she answered hurriedly, "you're right, it was seventeen." She never attempts to take credit for what she hasn't accomplished. She'd rather be well liked than rich or famous. She did several years of vaudeville. Most troupers refer to it as "did"—like "doing" time, or something just as tedious. Eleanor made friends of everyone on the bill. Every stage doorman is remembered by her. She produced a little book which says: John Elmore, st. doorman Seattle—swell. Bill Everett, st. doorman Dubuque—swell. Jim Jason, Columbus, a little grouchy first half of week, but swell by Friday!

Yes, when people see Miss Powell, so tall and so expert in her profession, they forget she's only a kid. Then they meet her. After that, you somehow feel like getting out the roller skates and going after hot dogs. Not silly; just young.

It isn't easy to write the success story of a twenty-year-old who's been one—a success, of course—for so long.

AND when I started, all I wanted was a job," she'll tell you. "My mother had done so much for me. She was a widow when I was only two and ever since then her ambition was to try to give me the things my father could have, had he lived. Well, I've always wanted to do my bit and, just lately, I think I have."

Reports at Metro on Eleanor's performance in "Broadway Melody of 1936," are extravagant. Her dancing, of course, is the last word. Her acting, too, is said to be sincere and convincing. It would have to be that. Anything the Powell attempted would have to be that. She is under a long-term contract to the studio and will return to Hollywood after she appears in a Shubert musical show on Broadway.

"I like Hollywood," reiterates Eleanor. "Of course, I'd like to meet people who weren't so wealthy, too. You know, middle class, like I am. You know, without swimming pools. I get mixed up when I tell it, but—you know!"

And as she told all about it, Miss Powell packed to go to New York. Forty pairs of shoes—ballet and tap—all well worn, had to be crammed into a special trunk. Trick soles to make the taps come out clearer, and the pair that Jack Donahue fixed before he passed away several years ago—great-hearted Jack who helped the kids who wanted to dance and forgot to watch the clock to see when the lesson was up, Jack who starred in musical comedy, but never failed to notice the merit of someone in the chorus line. The pair that Mr. Donahue fixed for Eleanor has never been worn since he left the stage forever. To him, Eleanor gives credit for much of her success.

Now place your right hand on the left side of your head just behind the left ear, with the finger tips pointing downwards. Turn your head to the right. Relax. Put your chin just a little in front of your shoulder. Pull hard enough with your hand to feel a good stiff stretch down your left shoulder and into your back. Repeat on the other side. Don't Fool Around with a COLD!

Every Four Minutes Some One Dies from Pneumonia, Traceable to the "Common Cold!"

DON'T "kid" yourself about a cold. It's nothing to be taken lightly or treated trivially. A cold is an internal infection and unless treated promptly and seriously, it may turn into something worse.

According to published reports there is a death every four minutes from pneumonia traceable to the so-called "common cold."

Definite Treatment

A reliable treatment for colds is afforded in Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine. It is no mere palliative or surface treatment. It gets at a cold in the right way, from the inside!

Working internally, Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine does four things of vital importance in overcoming a cold: First, it opens the bowels. Second, it combats the infection in the system. Third, it relieves the headache and fever. Fourth, it tones the system and helps fortify against further attack.

Be Sure — Be Safe!

All drug stores sell Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine in two sizes—35c and 50c. Get a package at the first sign of a cold and be secure in the knowledge that you have taken a dependable treatment.

Grove's Laxative Bromo Quinine is the largest selling cold tablet in the world, a fact that attests to its efficacy as well as harmlessness. Let no one tell you he "has something better."

GROVE'S LAXATIVE BROMO QUININE

have a lovely, long, graceful neck.

(Aside to Mabel Slater, Newark, N. J. Your picture was swell, too. You're a close runner-up for the Harlow resemblance. You must watch your little tummy and hip line, but you certainly have a million dollar smile. Use a little salt to season, when people tell you that you're perfect as you are. You can be gorgeous if you'll get just a little thinner.)

AND now back to Lois. Since you're living in Oakland, California, where it is cold and foggy a great deal of the time, you need plenty of heat producing foods. And this goes for everyone living in a chilly climate.

Starches are heat producing but since you need to lose weight take your starches occasionally in the form of a baked potato. Be sure to eat skin and all since next to the skin are minerals that the body needs. Eat rye wafers or whole wheat bread. Never eat bread unless it is two or three days old, or toasted.

Meat is another heat producer. Have meat at least once a day, but only broiled or roasted. And when you require sweets take only natural honey and fruit sugars, especially good are the sugars found in a very ripe banana.

(Aside to Beryl Lands, New Orleans, La. From the ankle to the knee you have a perfect Harlow leg. Looking at your picture, I can understand why they call you the Jean Harlow of New Orleans. But if you'd take off just a little weight from the knee to the hip you'd have a good chance of being Miss New Orleans or, maybe, Miss America. I was in New Orleans last year and I'll never forget the grits and gravy and all the rest of the swell southern cooking. It's wonderful, but, oh baby is it fattening! So be careful. You have a great deal of personal charm and a lovely looking face but listen, honey, don't slump. Stand straight and walk straight and dance for fifteen minutes a day with your shoulders thrown well back.)

So many of the girls who sent me their pictures this month are too fat in the hips. Well, that was Jean Harlow's trouble when she first breezed into my studio in Hollywood. Her body was beautiful but the hips needed shaving down. And Sylvia is the gal who did it. Here's the hip exercise I gave Jean. You girls need your mother or a girl friend to help you out.

Lie on a bed with your arms above your head and relax. Then have your helper put one hand under your right arm and one hand on your right thigh and stretch the trunk as much as possible without moving the position of the hands. In other words, tell your friend to imagine she is trying to pull you in two. Do the same thing on the other side of the body. Darling, that breaks down the fatty tissue and keeps it that way!

And now, Lois, here's the last word. You're blonde, but I can't tell by your picture just how platinum your hair is. But here's a tip for you. Platinum is one of the most expensive things in the world—and that goes for the hair, too, especially when you lose it. Platinum hair becomes brittle and breaks so easily. So be careful. A woman's hair is her crowning glory—but a bald head isn't a pretty crown. And a wig slips sometimes. So keep your scalp loose with massage and always use plenty of oil on your hair before you shampoo it. And there you are—all the rest will be in my personal letter to you.

OH yes, speaking of letters I want to say this. I personally read and answer every letter I receive. Write me care of MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York City, and enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope. I have so many people to help. I do not neglect anyone but I can answer you much more quickly if you will ask me just one question at the time. The other day I had a sixteen-page letter, with a question in every line. Now use your common sense a moment and you'll realize that that letter has to be put aside until I can take care of the more considerate girls who just ask one question.

And now, Lois, I hope you've had a thrill out of seeing your picture in this magazine. I'm sure it will help you. Let me know if you're being a good girl and doing the things I've told you to do. More power to you darling. Sylvia's for you every day in the week including Sunday and believe me I'm for all my other babies too, but I must demand that you make yourselves as attractive as possible.

And now, come on, you Crawford and Constance Bennett doubles. And you girls who look like Claudette Colbert. I want to help you, too. Remember you don't need to look exactly like the movie stars. In fact, you shouldn't. The basic type is what counts.

I want to see more of you! But when I get through with you there will be less of you to see!

Family reunion over, Jimmy Cagney threw a farewell party for the whole clan. They are l. to r., Mr. and Mrs. O'Connor (cousins), Jimmy's wife, Mr. and Mrs. Bill Cagney, Jim and sister Jeanne. Mrs. C. is seated.

A TRIBUTE TO GINGER

how during the Charleston craze Ginger won a state championship, whereupon she was booked in vaudeville for four weeks at one hundred dollars a week. Virtually launched upon her theatrical career, in other words. And perhaps hearing this you've thought how lucky she has been.

ON the set that day Ginger told me more about that contest. Her mother objected to her entering it. Perhaps she felt Ginger had no chance. For she never had had a lesson in her life and skilled dancers were among the entrants.

"But," Ginger told me, "I didn't give up. I argued and pleaded. I made mother's life miserable, I'm afraid. Then finally, the night before the contest, I wore her down. And she went out and bought white Romaine crepe and brilliant trimming. And we worked all night. And in the morning the dress for me to dance in was finished."

For years I've watched the Hollywood girls, at close range, thanks to my work in the studios and the film colony friendships I hold so dear. And as I so often point out in my radio talks I find it exciting and inspiring to watch them build beauty and charm and fame for themselves. As deliberately and practically as you would build a house with either bricks or timbers.

In fact I'm pretty well convinced that the only difference between those who arrive and those who don't—in Hollywood or anywhere else—is that the first put their shoulders and their brains behind their ambitious dreams. And the others, except for an occasional spurt of effort, just sit and dream.

Ginger and Lela Rogers' troubles weren't over when that Charleston contest precipitated Ginger into the theatrical world, let me tell you. Quite the contrary.

"The worst time mother and I ever had," Ginger told me, "came soon after that. I had a vaudeville act I called 'Ginger Rogers and Her Redheads'. Another act came along and offered my redheads more money. They left me flat. Mother and I didn't have enough to pay our hotel bill, much less return home to Fort Worth."

It was in Chicago that this happened. So Ginger and Lela went to live in a theatrical boarding-house, in one of those rooms which people of the theatre who have been down on their luck never forget. A room with a torn and gritty carpet, half burned-out electric light bulbs, dirty lace curtains. A room which they loathed even while they wondered how they were to pay for the sordid, shabby shelter it offered.

So what happened? Did Ginger quit? Wire some old friend or a relative to send her money? She did not! She'd gotten into this jam and she'd get out of it. What if it did mean taking a job in a cheap cabaret. Dancing and singing torch songs. It meant enough money to pay their room rent and get them to Fort Worth via tourist tickets, even if it didn't leave very much for food.

And when Ginger reached home again was she discouraged by that experience? She was not! While her mother earned enough to keep them working on a local paper Ginger whipped another act into shape. A single. Something she could carry herself without any help from any other redheads.

SEARCH YOUR SKIN

FEEL FOR LITTLE BUMPS!

They Indicate Clogged Pores, the Beginning of Enlarged Pores, Blackheads and Other Blemishes!

By Lady Esther

Don't trust to your eyes alone! Most skin blemishes, like evil weeds, get well started underground before they make their appearance above surface.

Make this telling finger-tip test. It may save you a lot of heartaches. Just rub your fingertips across your face, pressing firmly. Give particular attention to the skin around your mouth, your chin, your nose and your forehead.

Now—does your skin feel absolutely smooth to your touch or do you notice anything like little bumps or rough patches? If you do feel anything like tiny bumps or rough spots, it's a sign usually that your pores are clogged and may be ready to blossom out into enlarged pores, blackheads, whiteheads, "dirty-gray" skin and other blemishes.

A Penetrating Cream, the Need!

What you need is not just ordinary cleansing methods, but a penetrating face cream—such a face cream as I have perfected.

Lady Esther Face Cream penetrates the pores quickly. It does not just lie on the surface and fool you. Gently and soothingly, it works its way into the little openings. There it "goes to work" on the accumulated waxy dirt—loosens it—breaks it up—and makes it easily removable.

When you have cleansed your skin with Lady Esther Face Cream, you get more dirt out than you ever suspected was there. It will probably shock you to see what your cloth shows. But you don't have to have your cloth to tell you that your skin is really clean. Your skin shows it in the way it looks and feels.

As Lady Esther Face Cream cleanses the skin, it also lubricates it. It resupplies the skin with a fine oil that overcomes dryness and keeps the skin soft, smooth and flexible. Thousands of women have overcome dry, scaly skin, as well as enlarged pores and coarse-textured skin, with the use of Lady Esther Face Cream.

The Proof Is Free!

But don't take my word for the cleansing and lubricating powers of this cream. Prove it to yourself at my expense. Upon receipt of your name and address, I'll send you a 7-day tube of Lady Esther Face Cream postpaid and free. Let the cream itself show you how efficient it is.

With the free tube of Lady Esther Face Cream, I'll send you all five shades of my Lady Esther Face Powder, so you can see for yourself how the two go together to make a beautiful and lovely complexion. Write me today for the free cream and face powder.

(You can paste this on a penny postcard) (18) FREE

Whenever one of these kids signs up for a picture, a party is in order. So when Toby Wing departed to make a film in Canada, she gave the gals a spaghetti treat. Semi-circling the spaghetti pot are Grace Durkin, Marsha Hunt, Paula Stone, Toby and Pat Wing, Barbara Fritchie, Anne Shirley and Sue Carol.

Her first engagement was in Memphis, Tennessee. There's no need to go into the pinch-penny methods the Rogers had to use to get there.

"Memphis, Tennessee!" said Ginger. "Will I ever forget it? Or the practically empty theatre to which I played my first show. I was so nervous I had all I could do to get my feet off the floor and my songs out of my throat. The manager wasn't exactly impressed. In fact while I was doing my number he ordered his assistant to 'can' me. To get another act. And Mother heard him."

SHE laughed. But you knew darn well it hadn't been a laughing matter when it happened. For they'd spent their last cent to get to Memphis and they were strangers there.

"Immediately Mother told me what she'd heard," Ginger went on, "I grabbed her by the arm and we rushed out of that theatre to walk through the Memphis streets until it was time for me to go on again. Playing two shows, you see, I was entitled to my pay."

So Ginger played her second show. The theatre at the second show was crowded. That helped somehow. Ginger took it as a challenge and stepping out on the stage prepared to show them. When she danced, something hopeful and exciting and young stirred in the hearts of those who watched out there in the dark. And when she sang they dreamed and believed again.

"How easily she dances!" they whispered to one another. And "How naturally the warm, full notes flow from her throat!"

Not once did they suspect how desperately hard she was trying to please them—how consistently, step after step, note after note, she was giving all she had. For if they had suspected any of this she wouldn't have been such a hit.

Then there was the unhappy marriage Ginger had to overcome not long after this. Youthful marriages which crash usually aren't any great help to progress. But it was inevitable, I think, knowing Ginger and her impetuosity, that she must come to just such a marriage as she did when she was seventeen and she and Jack Culpepper, a good-looking vaudevillian, played the same circuit. Before their marriage which took place on the stage one night after the final curtain—in quite the romantic manner you'd expect of Ginger—Lela Rogers had plenty to say about this union. All of it unfavorable. But immediately that marriage ceremony was performed she stopped talking and began to hope for the best. However, a year later when Jack and Ginger were separated because their bookings now took them on different circuits, they wrote to each other admitting it all had been quite a mistake.

Whereupon Ginger didn't, as Eighteen so easily might have, sit down and dwell upon her disillusionment. Instead she worked harder than ever to shape a new, full life for herself. To continue with her self-improvement and become interested in so many things that the loss of no one thing ever could leave her bankrupt. To analyze exactly what had happened to her marriage so honestly and with such frankness that she grew neither cynical nor bitter. And so she came along through the years to her recent marriage with Lew Ayres with all the hope and belief of one who never has failed in this respect.

AND what of Ginger right now? Well, in the studios they'll tell you no one works harder than she does. It isn't, you see, simply her inborn sense of rhythm that sends her skimming over the dance floor in intricate, beautiful motion, that brings her such high praise from Fred Astaire. It's the weeks she puts in working on her routines before a picture goes into production. And Ginger is also mindful of personal progress. In the Rogers-Ayres house you find dictionaries everywhere. Since Ginger is ambitious to increase her vocabulary and become an easy, fluent talker she will admit no new word into her speech until she has become thoroughly familiar with it, with both its pronunciation and its meaning.

For little things like this I give Ginger as great credit as I give her for coming the long, hard way she has travelled to find her present success. It's so easy for us to develop blind spots about ourselves, never to see ourselves with a perspective.

And so I say Ginger reminds me of a swan. Because when she swims across the dance floor with beautiful grace it's due to the weeks and weeks during which she rehearses her routines. And because, if her biography indicates that she's come to her beauty, her fame, her wealth, and her stardom by a straight, easy road this is because she has let nothing down her. Because, like a swan, she's working hard and consistently always. Even if it isn't evident on the surface of things.

HOLLYWOOD FADS IN THE MAKING

costumes from this picture. It was too early to get a complete layout of fashions for you but it does show you what Adrian is aiming at. And too, here are some of the things he thinks about these designs.

The most amazing and probably the one costume that will have the most fashion significance is the polo coat used for formal evening wear. This is exactly like your good old camel's hair model but is fashioned of a rich metal cloth and is worn over an evening gown of matching fabric. The lapels are exaggerated but the raglan sleeves, the stitched seaming and the sash belt of the original sports coat have been faithfully copied by Adrian in this luxurious fabric. Adrian feels this will appeal especially to young people who like comfort as well as novelty in their evening wraps. It is modern and gay, quite in tune with youthful spirits.

The formal gown which Joan was trying on this particular day has been dubbed "The Bounty" by Adrian. The name is particularly inspired because Adrian thinks that "it looks like a gallant ship in full sail." Much like those ships used in "Mutiny on the Bounty" which was being filmed at the same time. The shoulders of this gown are wide and very square. Looping up over the shoulders, like wide suspenders, the white metallic cloth forms a square neckline in both front and back. The belt is wide and the gown is floor length with a slight train. Joan wears no jewelry with this except a single wide jeweled bracelet.

The wedding headdress you can see on page 50 is made of seed pearls in a scalloped coronet effect. Very charming for fall and winter bridals.

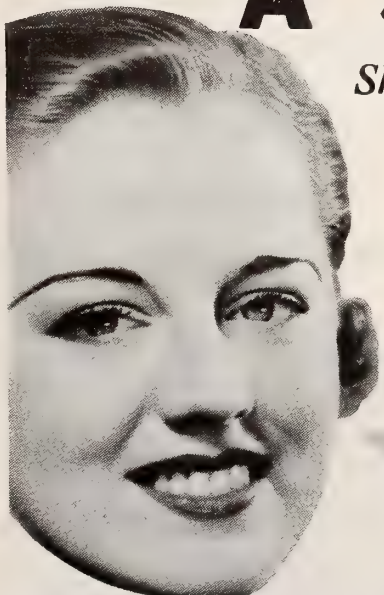
Of new fashion trends, Adrian says, "Generally speaking, women's clothes will be more elaborate than in some years. There will be an abundance of furs and embroideries. Tweeds will be more popular than ever, too."

Off-screen and about town, Joan has found a new spot in which to place her beloved fresh gardenias. She pins a small bunch of them to the brim of her new fall sailor of black satin. Of course, being fresh, they have to be changed every time Joan steps out but it's a swell idea, if rather impractical for the likes of us!

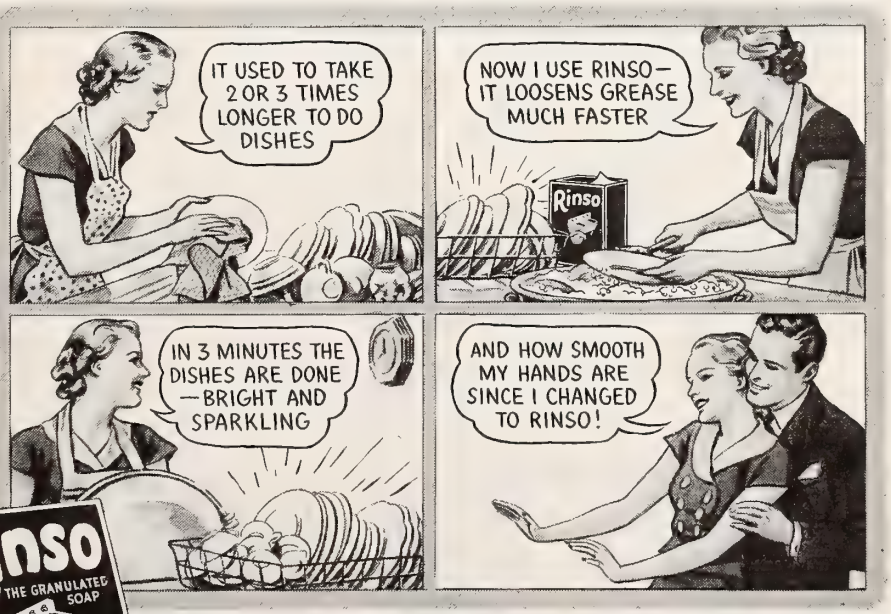
Incidentally, while on the subject of fresh flowers, I have to tell you that Marlene Dietrich wears real rosebuds for earrings. Try to trump that as an idea!

A trot over to Warners yields the stunning pictures of Dolores Del Rio which can be glimpsed on pages 48 and 49. This is the wardrobe that she wears in "I Live For Love." All the producers seem to have their stars living for something this month, what with Joan living her life and Dolores existing for love.

Orry-Kelly has done himself proud on this group of costumes. They are beautifully designed and are full of sparkling fashion details. As you can see, Orry-Kelly is much influenced by the Grecian trend of formal fashions. His evening gowns all have the drapery and the flowing lines that are characteristic of this fashion phase. You may be slightly confused over so many different influences being apparent in fashions this season but that is what makes buying new clothes such an exciting pastime. To jump from military daytime clothes to Grecian robes by night and then off on another tangent into the period of the Italian Renaissance allows no chance for monotony in your dressing.



THERE is more than a bit of Renaissance in the dramatic black velvet gown and cape. The wide, starched white lace collar used so ingeniously for the entire decorative motif of the costume is typically Renaissance in character. The most amusing thing about the cape is the fact that it looks like a separate wrap but actually it is merely the great train of the dress brought up and thrown casually about the shoulders to form the cape.



Orry-Kelly says of Dolores, "White is Dolores Del Rio's best color. At least ninety percent of her wardrobe is in white and instead of making her look larger, as white is prone to do upon the screen, it makes her look slimmer and smaller. Next to white I like black for her, black velvet especially is becoming either with or without the relief of white. She looks well in the rich, deep shades of the Renaissance, too . . . the warm, glowing reds and wines, the regal purples, the golden yellows and antique greens."

Pointing to the lovely white chiffon gown of Grecian inspiration, he says, "The Grecian mode is especially grand for Dolores, giving her an old-world grace combined with ultra-modern smartness. She looks best in these gowns that have soft fullness and drapery above the waist and long sweeping or draped lines beneath.

And showing me the white fox trimmed wrap that tops this charming Grecian dress, he said, "Dolores is one of the few women who can wear white fox without looking cheap in it." That is why he used it so lavishly for the top of this coat . . . double bands of the fur from the sleeves and the collar.

Although she rarely ever wears any hair ornamentation, with this costume, Dolores used gardenias at the sides of her dark hair. Again Orry-Kelly made a comment, "Though she usually wears her hair parted in the middle and swept back from her brow, she is successful when she varies it by parting it to one side."

Another white gown has less drapery but still follows the Grecian silhouette. It is soft dull velvet with the draped and bloused bodice cut to form a halter at the neckline which is ornamented by two clips. The skirt is folded across the front in a soft, straight drapery.

I simply couldn't resist showing you the bridal veil arrangement which Dolores wears with a regal satin wedding gown in a scene from her picture. A crushed fold of tulle is drawn nun-like under the chin and meets the veil just above and behind the ears where it is held by two miniature magnolias. The top of the head is left bare as the main part of the veil flares out from the back. A single large white magnolia is held in the hands. A perfectly charming idea and one which you fall and winter brides should copy.

Everywhere about Hollywood you notice that the stars are wearing flowers and more flowers, artificial or real. Besides Joan's gardenias and Marlene's rosebuds, there's Claudette Colbert's new black crepe afternoon dress topped by a waistlength cape of white velvet violets. Imagine such swank! And besides the cape, Claudette also has a tiny turban of the violets and a gauntlet edging of them on her black gloves.

Kitty Carlisle likes pansies and since the season is over for fresh ones, she wears a clump of velvet ones on her new purply-blue felt hat and a small bunch to match tucked into her belt. What's more Kitty can switch these pretties to other costumes when the spirit moves. These are all fads, my pets, and good ones to adapt to your own uses.

ANN SOTHERN is sporting a purple evening wrap to premieres that offers a startling yet right practical idea. The sleeves and gloves are all one . . . a cozy idea for chill winter nights, what?

You can have your heels or leave them off according to Hollywood. Many of the smartest gals adore the heelless evening sandals. Dolores Del Rio and Joan Bennett being two of these. Joan bought a dozen or more pairs recently and Dolores wears Grecian heelless ones for evening. Low heels are generally favored by a majorty of the stars.

And how would you like to be all done up in suede? Dolores has an entire suit of chamois colored suede. Sally Eilers has an amusing peasant dress in Venetian blue suede with its short full skirt finished off with strips of blue, green, red and yellow leather. And just the other night, Frances Dee caused a small riot locally by appearing in a white suede evening gown, cut very severely, its only trimming a bunch of scarlet suede poppies. You can't say the cinema-ites are afraid to wear something new and daring.

The peasant type dress, by the way, is a great pet about town at the moment. Its tightly fitted basque bodice and short full skirt have a youthful zest that appeals to these youth-loving stars. Marion Davies was showing me one of her favorite variations of the style. Hers is a navy blue skirt, very full, worn over a bright red taffeta petticoat and topped by a basque blouse in boldly printed taffeta. Huge sleeves are shirred into the armholes and caught into tight narrow cuffs at the wrists.

Over at RKO Bernard Newman is up to his ears in sketches and costumes for two new pictures . . . one is a group of costumes to be worn by Ginger Rogers in "In Person" and the other is the exciting job of doing costumes for Lily Pons debut in "Love Song." Since Mr. Newman had not yet completed all these costumes, I was unable to get pictures of them until later but a brief description of one or two will give you an idea of how fascinating they will be.

For Ginger there's a street costume in lightweight gray wool with short flared skirt and blue taffeta trimming at the neckline. Over this goes a two-thirds length coat printed in large dots of the blue. All her accessories are of the blue taffeta.

Then there's a perky, young looking cocktail suit in which light blue and navy are combined. A peplum jacket is of the light blue and has sleeves and collar in quilted effect. The skirt is navy with fullness centered at the front below the knees. This, too, is taffeta.

One of the most dramatic of the Lily Pons' costumes is one ensemble in a metalized satin. The dress is softly draped in both skirt and bodice although the general detailing is one of great simplicity. Over this she wears a knee-length cape, fastened at the side with the openings bordered deeply in silver fox, a single jeweled ornament holding the cape together at the neck and shoulder.

I could go on and on, telling you about the new and interesting clothes you will see soon on the screen but this gives you some small idea of what a lavish hand is going into the designing of the stars' picture clothes this season. And too, what original twists the stars themselves give to their off-screen costumes.

I have prepared a new leaflet called "Star Tips to Smartness" which you may have by merely sending a stamped, self-addressed envelope to: Adelia Bird, MODERN SCREEN, 149 Madison Avenue, New York City.

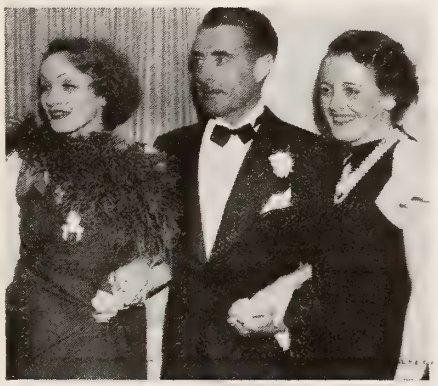
for stamping the seal "team" on any two stars who have made a decided success together in one picture. It isn't a good thing for any man and woman to be co-starred so often that the fans look upon them as a team. Too many things can happen. A new contract for either—and the fans are bound to resent the career-divorce of two stars they have come to look upon as partners. Other screen partnerships have shown how disastrous a split can be for one or the other of a so-called team. Do you remember Janet Gaynor and Charlie Farrell? What I mean is, you still remember Janet Gaynor, don't you?

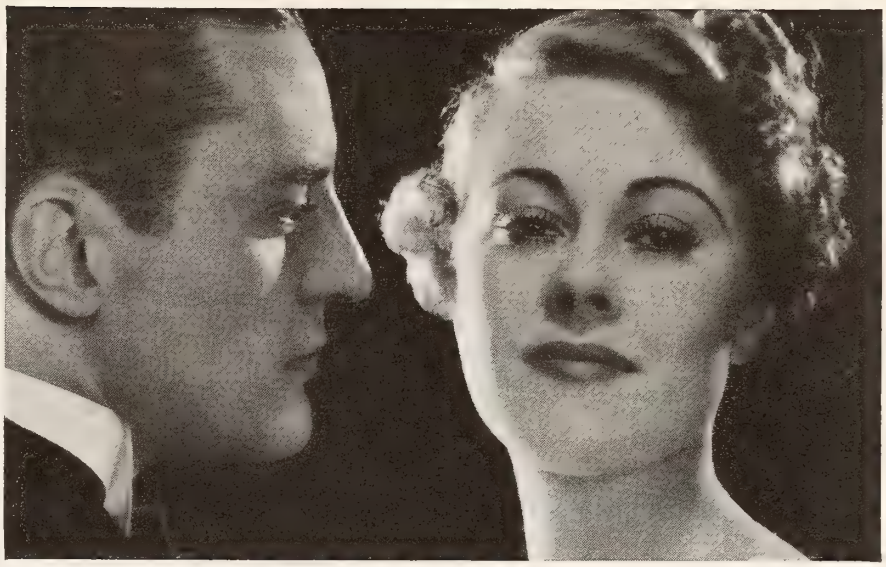
Because a "Thin Man" happens to come along, just as "Seventh Heaven" did years ago, and the man's and woman's parts complement each other so beautifully, there really isn't any reason to condemn two stars to a life of Hollywood service together, is there?

Of course you all know how Myrna started out being the weird exotic that Natacha Rambova saw in her and how her eyes (laughing American eyes they are with incredible lashes and a fascinating quirk at the corners) were elongated into mysterious Oriental ones. And after a few successful roles, a nice kid from Montana was amazed to find herself the Yellow Peril of all good American homes.



In the beginning Myrna took those parts seriously. She was only a kid. She laughed at them. And then suddenly she was determined to get away from them.

It isn't easy getting away from being a type. Myrna Loy discovered that. It was difficult to convince the studios she could play the heroines of "Penthouse" and "The Prizefighter and the Lady." But she did play them and so beautifully that out of them came a new type for Myrna . . . the gallant lady . . . the good sport . . . the ideal wife to lighten a man's dreams.



They've been saying things about Myrna in Hollywood since she took a plane for New York and the boat to and from Europe. That's she's temperamental. That she sulks.

"If it's temperament to stand up for your personal rights, to refuse to see a career you've sunk an awful lot of hard work into, threatened by an utterly unsuitable part, then I'm temperamental," she announced calmly. "But I don't sulk."

You can tell that by looking at her

EYE IDEAS

by Jane Heath

THE NAKED EYE!

To YOUR naked eye, it probably looks as if the country were full of women more beautiful than you, about to steal your best beau! Probably that's the trouble—your naked eye! Try slipping your lashes into KURLASH. Lo! your lashes are curled up in a fascinating sweep like a movie star's, looking twice as long, dark and glamorous. Your eyes sparkle (that's more light entering!), are deeper and more colorful! No heat—no cosmetics! $1, at stores near you.

Sweet Subtlety

Dear Mrs. J. M.—far from being "obvious" eye make-up is extremely subtle. Apply a little SHADETTE—$1—in blue, violet, green or brown to your eyelids, close to the lashes and blend it outward. It defies detection but how your eyes deepen and sparkle!

Tint Technique

Lashes also need never look "made up." Try this Lashtint Compact. The little sponge stays damp for hours—and supplies just the right moisture to insure even applications of the fine mascara. Result: silky, natural looking lashes! $1, in black, blue or brown.

mouth. It's generous, that mouth, and when her face is in repose it quirks up a little bit at the corners, the way her eyes do. No doubt about it, it's a mouth that wouldn't mince words when it had to, a mouth that could be angry. But it wouldn't sulk. You know that.

"I've worked hard all my life. You see, I've always had responsibilities," she went on frankly. "And it's been good for me. It's made me more ambitious than I probably would have been without that pressure.

"People are saying I walked off the set of 'Escapade.' I didn't. I've never taken a run-out powder in my life. But the part made me unhappy from the first.

"My heart sank when I was made up for it. The girl staring back at me from my mirror wasn't the girl in 'Escapade' at all.

"She was an artless girl, an unsophisticated girl with charm enough to win the hero, a jaded artist and man about town. Luise Rainer became that girl when she subsequently played the part."

You knew instinctively what Myrna Loy meant. Regularly chiseled features can be toned down. But Myrna's face is provocative. Her tilted eyes and piquant nose could never suggest the quiet or demure. She has made herself look grotesque at times, she could undoubtedly achieve downright ugliness with tricks of make-up. But it is easy to see how impossible it would be for her ever to look plain or nondescript.

"Miss Rainer made such a grand thing of the part that I felt more than vindicated when I saw her," Myrna said simply. "You see, it was just one of those unpleasant things that so often have a way of turning out for the best for everyone concerned.

"Being unhappy about the way I looked in the picture was the least of it. There was a German version of 'Escapade' and Paula Weselli played the role I was doing. She was grand in it, so absolutely perfect that the studio wanted me to be as much like her as possible.

"For days I went on, so nervous and wrought up by the whole unhappy equation that I couldn't sleep nights. I knew I was being a phoney. Acting coy and demure isn't in my line at all, but if I could have done them as myself I wouldn't have minded so horribly. They might have been poor things, but my own.

"But I couldn't even be myself. I was to imitate another actress. My work is too important to me to endanger it without doing an awful lot of thinking about it. It got to a place where I couldn't stand it any longer and I went to the Powers That Be and thrashed out the whole unhappy situation. No other picture was scheduled for me at the time, so after some discussion I was given a leave of absence. But the studio knew where they could reach me every moment I was away.

"I went home that morning and got my dog and his dog house and moved them over to a friend. I had to get away. Ever since I started in pictures I've never had a real vacation. I was going to have one now. Get away from Hollywood and get a perspective on myself. Be able to laugh at myself again. You see I was beginning to feel sorry for myself and I couldn't stand that.

"'Move over you!' I said to my dog as he sat dolefully in the door of his house looking up at me. He always senses when things are happening. 'I'm in the dog house too.'

"But I didn't crawl into the dog house with him. I went to Europe instead and did all the things I've wanted to do ever since I was a kid and geography was the only subject in school that really interested me."

You can't ride over the Continent in a plane as Myrna did and look down on farms and cities and see them dwindle to pin points on a green terrain without feeling that the things that are happening to you are really unimportant after all.

You can't walk up the Champs Eylsées in Paris and see the naked flame, flaring over the heart of France's unknown soldier and read the simple inscription on that stone slab, without knowing that you have to live your own life as you want to live it. For all these things show how the years go on and how some things live and other things die and a lifetime is only what you make of it yourself.

"Life is leisurely in Europe," Myrna said. "I have friends there and when I saw how they lived it opened my eyes to the way things are done in Hollywood. We rush around and burn ourselves out. Early studio calls in the morning and then, after a gruelling day, we dash about just as madly in search of relaxation. They were so grand those calm, unending days in England and France . . . late breakfasts and after that tennis or golf . . . teas in country gardens and dinners with no one trying to outdo everyone else or racking their brains for smart or witty things to say . . .

"But it was in Paris I saw something that struck me most forcibly of all. It was just before dawn and the farmers' carts were beginning to come in from the country on their way to Les Halles, the market place.

"An old farmer was dozing as his horse shambled slowly down the Champs Elysées, the reins held loosely in his hand and sometimes the horse would stumble and the old fellow would come awake with a jerk and sit very straight for a moment and cluck elaborately at his horse to show he was still master of the situation. Then his head would nod again and the reins slack in his hand and of course that cart got to Les Halles just as surely as though he were cracking a whip over the animal's neck all the way.

"It really was an object lesson. And I determined that from then on I was going to take a page from that old Frenchman's book of life, that I was going to take life and work easier than I ever had before.

"I'm not going to wait until I get in the dog house again before I take a vacation." She smiled ruefully. "I'm going places. Don't think I just want to play. I don't. I couldn't stand being the sort of person whose sole interest in life is to play bridge. Work is too important to me but it isn't the most important thing. Being a human being is. I'm going to take time out to travel and see something of the people and the world as it is lived outside of Hollywood. From now on I'm always going to have a perspective on myself."

There's no doubt about it that time has done things for Myrna Loy, has made her more vital, more knowing, has given her answers she did not know before.

Myrna threatened to desert Hollywood. For when she and M-G-M came to the parting of the ways, those smart producers, Hecht and MacArthur, signed up Myrna for a role in one of their Astoria-made productions. Myrna liked being in New York. She enjoyed the shops, the shows, the flavor of the place and all the other things that the Big City had to offer. But—think of it—a "Thin Man" without Myrna! Without her laugh, and her gallant acceptance of things as they come, without the little moué she made at her screen husband and at herself and at life. Impossible.

As we go to press, the M-G-M-ers and the Loy have patched up their differences and Myrna is in Hollywood waiting to start work in a picture.

SCENE II

Time: Four months later.

Locale: An executive office in the RKO building.

(A press agent shows K. A. and A. W. F. in. His manner combines that odd mixture of deference and patience which press agents keep on tap solely for interviewers.)

P. A.: Mr. Astaire will be here any minute now and I'll bring him in. He's a swell guy. You'll be crazy about him.

K.A.: Will be? (she tilts the little brown sailor number she is wearing at what she trusts is a more beguiling angle. She chooses a deep leather chair in which she scores the advantage of the soft, dark lighting which filters in through the Venetian blinds. And, having made this flattering choice, she smiles sweetly at A. W. F.)

A. W. F. (as the press agent exits she reluctantly takes the executive chair behind a big flat top desk. She applies just a little more lipstick, carefully. She has no intention of looking too executive): You know, they say Fred Astaire won't talk about his personal life. His marriage or anything like that. Perhaps we'd better not ask such questions. I wouldn't like to offend him.

K. A. (every inch the thoroughbred): Why, my dear! I had no idea of asking him anything personal! A gentleman like Fred Astaire! Really! By the way, Pet, isn't that a new dress? A new hat? A new bag?

A. W. F. (more self-conscious than she'd like to think): Yes—er—you know I always buy summer things late in the season. They mark them down so!

K. A. (sweetly): Of course, I didn't dream that you'd bought all those new things for this occasion. I knew you must have some good practical reason, De-ah.

(A commotion is heard off-stage as the press agent with Fred Astaire comes along the hall from the elevator. Doors open so stenographers may peer out. Office boys shuffle along at a respectful distance unmindful of the "rush, special!" interoffice communications in their hands.)

P. A. (entering with Fred Astaire): Miss Albert, Miss Fletcher . . . Mr. Astaire.

(Ad lib greetings as both girls rummage frantically in their bags and at one and the same moment bring forth little blue cards which proclaim their membership in good standing in the Fred Astaire Fan Club.)

K. A. and A. W. F. (in triumphant unison): We belong to your club!

Fred: Swell! (He turns to the P. A. in relief.) Am I delighted! I thought this was going to be an interview.

P. A. and K. A. and A. W. F. But it is an interview.

(Fred Astaire lets out a little groan and, like a man led to the electric chair, prepares himself for the worst. However, he smiles. His hazel eyes are bright, the whites very white. He is nicely tanned. And with all due respect to his tailor, the gray suit he wears is benefited by the fact that he wears it, by the lean, active lines his body lends it. He pulls a huge blue handkerchief from his pocket and mops his face. He looks expectant. As expectant as you look in a dentist's chair. Obviously his reputed dislike of interviews is no pose. You can see he is making a valiant effort to hide his discomfort and appear gracious.)

K. A.: (softly, oh so feminine): You did your first picture with Joan, didn't you? Joan Crawford?

Fred (looking puzzled, not believing that such an innocuous speech could come from the mouth of a dreaded interviewer. He doesn't know these gals): Yes. Say, she's swell. Helped me learn the ropes. That's on the level, in spite of that cute little Hollywood rumor that I was displeased because my role in "Dancing Lady" wasn't big enough. I didn't want it to be any bigger. All I wanted to do was to learn a little bit what Hollywood was all about. You see, some people had sort of liked me on the stage and I figured that if I flopped it would be just too bad for me. (He grins. K. A. and A. W. F.—well, flutter, shall we say?)

Fred (continuing): My arrival in Hollywood is something I shan't forget. Boy, was I in a dither. You see, I'd just been married two days when the bride and I flew out. It was my first flight and I still had the shakes from that. And the studios were so huge, so impregnable with their iron gates. But once I was inside it was different.

A. W. F.: Of course, the thing I've never been able to understand is why the movie producers didn't give you a contract long ago.

Fred (he's interested now and much less nervous): Funny thing about that. Adele (referring to his sister, Lady Cavendish, with whom he danced to fame) and I made a screen test years ago when we were playing in "Funny Face." But they caught us just when the first popularity of musicals was on the wane and nothing came of it.

A. W. F.: What about the rumor that you didn't like "Flying Down to Rio"? We heard you tried to buy up the negative so it would never be released.

Fred (he grins, that grand smile of his): I heard that, too, and boy, was I ever flattered. I went around saying, "Astaire, they must think you're pretty good." First I was pleased that anybody would think I had enough money to buy a film—that would be about a million dollars, wouldn't it? And second that I'd be such a great artist that I'd try to stop something that didn't suit me artistically. As a matter of fact I liked "Flying Down to Rio."

(K. A. just smiles sweetly and snuggles deeper into her leather chair. As she looks at Fred Astaire you expect to hear her purr. But actually there is no sound.)

A. W. F. (carrying on for the two of them. Annoyed that she should thus be forced to seem the aggressive type, she gives K. A. a dirty look, which K. A. ignores): Were there dancers in your family? There must be something to account for you and your sister?

Fred (he doesn't mind talking now): Not a one. My mother is grand looking. Young and slender. But she won't even dance a step with me. There was never anybody about whom I know associated with the theatre. Adele was sent to dancing school when she was six—like most kids in the neighborhood. We lived in Omaha, then. Later, when we moved to New York I was sent to dancing school. I remember just one thing about that first teacher. He used to put his foot on a chair like this (his movements off screen are as graceful as his on-screen dances. There is a flow of motion which seems to have no beginning and no end) and, with a stick, he'd beat time on the slats. But I learned what showmanship I know from a man we met in vaudeville.

K. A. (being helpful about the interview for the first time): You went into vaudeville as kids?

Fred (he smiles, remembering): We needed the dough. My folks had some tough breaks. In spite of this my mother fought against the stage. But my father, feeling we kids had some talent, was all for us. And we were crazy about the theatre. I don't even remember how we got the job. I think my father knew a man who knew a man or something. At any rate, there we were trouping all over the country and learning about routines and arrangements as we went, sopping up theatrical tricks like a couple of small sponges. It was swell.

A. W. F. (taking the interviewing reins into her own hands again as K. A. lapses into the demure little southern belle with soft, big brown eyes): How do you plan your dances?

Fred (both girls realize that he loves to talk about this. And they figure that, if the fans are half as interested in how this master dancer achieves his effects as they are, they'll let him go on. He is now earnest and eager): Want me to start from the beginning? (as K. A. and A. W. F. nod he proceeds): I'm given the music by the composer. Irving Berlin's doing the stuff for "Follow the Fleet." I go to the studio every day and work on routines from ten until six. My assistant and I have an empty stage where they put a piano and full-length mirrors. It's real work. By the time the picture has started I've lost several pounds. I mop those pounds off with my handkerchief.

This assistant of mine is grand. As I'm dancing he sits there and says, "Not so good, Fred," or, "I'd cut that a little, make it quicker."

Then I'll have a tough day. What I want to do then is go home. I want to quit for good. But he won't let me. "Stick around," he'll say, "until you've done your one good deed for the day." That doesn't mean helping an old lady across the street or giving a blind man a nickel. He means for me to get one good step, one good idea.

And it's funny but when one comes another follows. It starts going great and I feel good again. And before we know it we have a routine.

A. W. F.: And how does Ginger Rogers' part work in?

Fred (his admiration for Ginger is unbounded): After the basis for the dance is doped out we work together, plan double tricks. I'd feel like a fool working out a girl's steps. But Ginger's quick. She's swell.

K. A. (smugly): I never see Ginger Rogers. (Fred looks very puzzled. His eyes voice his question. And K. A. positively preens, as she says) I only see you.

Fred (he is really worried now. The blue handkerchief appears and he mops his brow): Gee! Really? Do you mean I do too much, try to steal the spot? Because if that's so I've got to change. Really she's good. And it's the girl your eye should follow. What can I do?

K. A. (not at all embarrassed): It's nothing you can help.

Fred: But, I . . .

A. W. F. (hurrying in with conversational first aid): Katherine means, Mr. Astaire, that if Pavlowa and Nijinsky and Bill Robinson himself were on the floor with you, she'd only see you. And (trying to be shy in a very blonde way) that goes for me, too.

Fred (quickly changing the subject): You mentioned Bill Robinson. Now there's a dancer. He can dance any time, anywhere. It's like breathing to him. He'd walk in this room and if you said, "Rip off a couple of steps, Bill," he'd dance. Just for the joy of it. I can't do that. I've got to have the routine set and the music right. At parties when I'm asked to dance I couldn't get my feet high enough to step over a thread.

A. W. F.: Do you enjoy ballroom dancing?

Fred: No, I don't. I seldom dance at a night club. You see, dancing is work to me. But it's work I love.

A. W. F.: How about the stage? Are you going to do a show this fall?

Fred: I couldn't, you see. I've got to make money. And if I went into a show and it was a success it would run about six months and where would the picture career be by that time? Can't take a chance. Can't go on dancing forever. Gee, audiences are going to get tired of me.

K. A. and A. W. F. (to each other in the well-known unison): Tired of watching him? Tired of watching him did the man say? (They shake their addled heads in confusion): Quite mad!

P. A.: (returning, looking at his watch significantly. K. A. and A. W. F. know the inexorability of this subtle signal. They gather up their belongings as if they were in a daze. Fred starts to go, too, relieved that the interview is over but is stopped by the following speech): Wait a minute, Fred, sixteen more interviewers want to see you. I thought we could clean up about five today.

Fred (he looks like a man in a ship fire, hunting for life boats): Oh, no, say listen, I have to go. I mean, don't let me in for anything like that. Why, I can't think of a thing to say. I'll just be a dud. And honest, they won't like me.

P. A.: And there are some cameramen downstairs waiting to grab some pictures of you. It'll only take a minute.

Fred (mopping his face with the big blue handkerchief): I . . . well, that's swell and awfully nice of them . . . but, you see . . .

(K. A. and A. W. F. tip-toe quietly off stage, leaving Fred and the press agent alone as . . .

(Fade Out on Scene II)

SCENE III

Time: Ten minutes later.

Locale: Same tea-room in Rockefeller Center, New York City. Again the same hubbub as in Scene I. K. A. and A. W. F. enter. If they were not so starry-eyed they'd be thankful that Mary Burgum and Adelia Bird are not alone. The head-waiter slides a discreet glance at them—seemingly attributes the far away look in their eyes to the heat and leads them to a nearby table. They can be led. He flips menus before them. Cocktail menus, luncheon menus. They see neither. They sit down and stare into space. The waiter retreats, defeated, without an order.

A. W. F. (at last): Well, my pet, I must say that you weren't your usual aggressive self this morning. What is it that your husband says about you? "Give her a horse and a sword and she'd be a general." I didn't notice any wonderful generalship during that interview. All you were doing was being the demure little southern girl all over the place.

K. A.: Why, I don't know what you mean.

A. W. F.: I mean that you didn't exactly pin Fred Astaire down with questions! Only with glances!

K. A.: But, Angel, you were having such a wonderful time showing how clever you were. The quick-thinking, trigger-minded modern woman. He must have been so impressed with your savoir faire. I'm sure you wouldn't have wanted me to spoil such an—er—illusion, now would you?

A. W. F.: When you turn Girl Scout, knee deep in good deeds . . .

K. A. (going vague again): Good deeds. Cute, wasn't it, the way he called a dance trick a good deed?

"NO. 8"....

She is easy to identify

ALWAYS HERSELF

She knows how to live . . . how to get through the world . . . the eighth woman who uses Midol.

EIGHT million women have always had to consider the time of month in making their engagements — avoiding any strenuous activities on difficult days when Nature has handicapped them severely.

Today, a million escape this regular martyrdom, thanks to Midol. A tiny tablet, white and tasteless, is the secret of the eighth woman's perfect poise at this time. A merciful special medicine recommended by the specialists for this particular purpose. It can form no habit because it is not a narcotic. And that is all a million women had to know to accept this new comfort and new freedom.

Are you a martyr to "regular" pain? Must you favor yourself, and save yourself, certain days of every month? Midol might change all this. Might have you your confident self, leading your regular life, free from "regular" pain. Even if you didn't receive complete relief from every bit of pain or discomfort, you would be certain of a measure of relief well worth while!

Doesn't the number of those now using Midol mean something? It's the knowing women who have that little aluminum case tucked in their purse. Midol is taken any time, preferably before the time of the expected pain. This precaution often avoids the pain altogether. But Midol is effective even when the pain has caught you unaware and has reached its height. It's effective for hours, so two tablets should see you through your worst day. Get these tablets in any drug store—they're usually right out on the toilet goods counter. Or you may try them free! A card addressed to Midol, 170 Varick St., New York, will bring a plainly wrapped trial box.

A. W. F.: He didn't call it that. His assistant did. Were you at this interview?

K. A. (belligerant): Well, he said it.

A. W. F. (having impressed Fred Astaire with her shrewd interviewing tactics, she now lets down and goes vague): I like his voice. And the way he mops his face when he's embarrassed.

K. A. (more kindly, at once): And he has nice eyes . . . keen, level, you know.

A. W. F.: Yes, I know. I noticed! His grin is nice, too. That's a fine tan he has, isn't it?

Waiter (interrupting and a little frightened): Will mesdames order luncheon now?

K. A. and A. W. F. (as if they have just returned from some far-off place): Luncheon? Luncheon? Oh, yes, to be sure, luncheon.

"Fade Out—none too soon—on Scene III—and two interviewers who aren't what they used to be.)

I WAS determined now that I was an extra I was not going to be an "average" one. I was ambitious. I had said that if I did not become a leading woman in a year I was going back home. So when some of the others who were just in the game to make an easy living would lag at the back of a dancing set so they would not have to work so hard, I'd volunteer to be close to the star. And when the others would ask me to gay parties I would say I was tired and had to go home. I felt this would get me somewhere. It was years ago that I made these resolutions. And I'm still an extra. Sometimes I wonder what's the use. Yet this is the only work I know. It brings me a living on which I can get by and I have the hope that some day, some time I will be "discovered"—that some director will pick me out of the crowd and give me a chance.

And now I must tell you about my life as an extra. I must tell you how we extra girls know the stars. I can't write this in chronological order. I'm just going to jump around and tell you how I see your favorites, because I've been on the set of almost every big star in Hollywood.

Norma Shearer is exceedingly nice on the set. She speaks and bows to everyone when she enters. And will chat with the extra people when they're near her.

You know that laugh of hers on the screen? She has the same laugh in real life. Her manner is easy and nice. But when her husband—and also her producer—Irving Thalberg comes on the set to untangle some difficult scene, she is as nervous and jumpy as a bit player.

They call each other "Miss Shearer" and "Mr. Thalberg" and you'd never dream that they were married. They are star and boss when I see them together.

Norma is very careful about her work and will go to any amount of pains to have everything just right. Some people feel that underneath she is cold and hard, but I have never noticed it.

Marlene Dietrich is the most amazing star I've ever seen. I've tried and tried to make her out but I can't. When you catch her face off guard it is the saddest face in the world and when she is on the set she seems to have eyes for no one but Von Sternberg. I wonder how she is going to behave with other directors now that Von is no longer with her.

He is the boss of the set. He storms and raves and is so sarcastic that everyone trembles. Once I heard him bawl out an old extra woman so mercilessly that she cried. The electricians were planning to beat him up. Really I thought for a minute they were going to kill him, but the old woman begged them not to do anything to get themselves in trouble.

And through all this Marlene sits by and watches as if she did not see. It is as if her mind and heart were thousands of miles away. I watched her for an hour, once, without seeing her expression change.

The only time she is bright and gay and lively is when she is with her little daughter. Apparently that child is the only thing in the world that means a darn to her. And yet she seems to hide her emotion even for her child—hide it by treating her almost as a father treats a son, rather than as a mother treats a daughter. She slaps her on the back and tosses her around and laughs and jokes with her. And when the child is gone, Marlene's face settles down into that world-weary, pitiful masque.

Of course, Carole Lombard is a nut. You can hear her coming five minutes before she arrives. (We extras are always on the set before the principals.) She is usually surrounded by about ten men and they're all laughing and talking—Carole doing most of the talking.

The minute she comes on the set things begin to happen. She always has a million ideas for different scenes. Once she told me she wanted to be a director but I don't know whether she was kidding or not.

Now most stars, when they've finished a scene, go into their portable dressing-rooms and stay there. Not Lombard. She's having too much fun. She clowns around with everybody and they've got to tell her to "shush" a dozen times. I've never seen such energy and vitality. She's a nut—but I like her.

CLARK GABLE is my favorite male actor. And I'm not crazy about him from a romantic standpoint, either, as some of the girls are. I like him because he is a swell, regular guy, a man who does his job without any huff and puff.

He is "all things to all men." With sentimental women stars who like to talk about their "great art" he is sentimental and will talk about art. With he-men he talks of nothing but hunting and fishing and the great outdoors. And, as a result, everybody likes him.

A lot of the stars seem to feel that we extras have no ears and I was once nearby when a couple—both of whom were married, but not to each other—made a date for a meeting at a beach house in Malibu to be quite alone. I've never told anybody about hearing that. But it does hand me a laugh to see the woman photographed with her husband and the man with his wife, going to all the smart places. And it's one movie scandal that has never even been whispered about.

Jean Harlow sews on the set all day long. She is very friendly but it seems to me that she is always trying hard not to appear to be the sort of girl she plays in pictures. I realize that it is a handicap for a star to be habitually cast in tough, hardboiled roles. She must feel it necessary to make an attempt to dispel the illusion that she is tough and hardboiled off screen. But sometimes I think she tries too hard.

I was on the set the day that Harlow came back to work after the suicide of her husband, Paul Bern. I must say she was very brave. We were instructed beforehand that none of us were to extend sympathy or to mention the tragedy at all, for fear it would break her up too much and she would be unable to go on. Although everyone felt terribly, we tried to be as gay and as casual as possible. And, except for the fact that Jean only laughed when she had to do so in a scene, you would never know anything had happened.

I feel very sorry for Mrs. Temple, Shirley's mother. That woman is trying very hard to keep little Shirley from being spoiled. But it's a difficult job. As yet, Shirley is still the same, level-headed kid she's always been, but sometimes it is sickening to see how the actors gush over her.

The men actors are always saying, "Will you marry me, Shirley, when you grow up?" The women are always admiring her curls and her clothes. If Shirley is ever spoiled, her fans won't be to blame. It will be the actors on the set with her who are at fault.

I COULD go on like this for pages, telling you about my impressions of the screen stars but since this is my story as well as a story of Hollywood I want to tell you what personal adventures I had.

You remember the artist, Bradley, who got me on the Garbo set? Well, he was being more than kind to me. And although he argued with me all the time, begging me to give up the idea of being an actress, telling me that I didn't have a chance in a million, I knew he was fond of me.

One night I came home to my little apartment dead tired (I was on a ballroom set and they're the most wearing of all) and found Bradley waiting in the lobby for me.

When we were in my apartment he took me in his arms and said, "You know, darling, I love you."

I laughed. "Well, I don't know."

He was almost gruff about it. "I do," he said.

And I told him he wasn't acting at all like a movie lover.

"It isn't my intention to do so," he said. "I don't like movie lovers and I didn't come here to make love to you. I came to ask you to help a girl out of trouble. I just wanted to tell you I loved you first so you will believe me when I say this girl is merely a friend of mine—nothing more.

"You remember the 'quickie' director you told me about, the one who was rotten to you when you first came to Hollywood?"

I remembered all too well. Bradley continued, "He's pulled the same stunt on another girl. The only difference is that she reported it and now that rotten little director says she is trying to frame him and he never saw her before. If you'll be brave enough to testify that he had also been fresh with you it will help her out tremendously."

I hesitated a moment. This might, I felt, hurt my poor little career. And then I remembered how Joan Crawford had said I could repay her for her kindness by helping another girl who needed help.

"I'll do it," I said.

But I didn't know what I was letting myself in for.

REVIEWS

she has given the rest of Hollywood's young ladies something to shoot at. As the heroine of this romance of a small town girl she has captured all the charm and sympathy that Booth Tarkington originally wrote into the character, and when La Hepburn captures things they're really captured. Her pappy, Fred Stone, has been a clerk all his life, which means that Katie isn't often invited to the parties of the wealthier belles about town. She makes one of them, though, and that's enough for her to meet Fred MacMurray. Her attempts to keep him from knowing her family's financial status furnish a good deal of the picture's entertainment, the highlight being a dinner party serviced by a none-too-graceful daughter of Ethiopia hired for the evening. Hepburn, beautifully photographed, has a swell supporting cast in Fred Stone, Frank Albertson, Charley Grapewin and the aforementioned Mr. MacMurray.

Preview Postscripts

Miss K. Hepburn rivals Miss G. Garbo in managing to get publicity by ostensibly avoiding it. She ducks into corners, hides under benches and climbs trees when a photo-sleuth appears, yet reads all her fan mail sitting on the curb at the studio gate. There's no hokum, though, about keeping her private life really that way. She's famous for securing the quietest divorce ever heard of in Hollywood from her stock-broker husband. And the quietest wedding bells were the ones for her and her manager, Leland Hayward. Booth Tarkington's famous story has long been a rôle that she's tried to convince the studio heads to give her a try at. "Little Women" was another. . . . This marks the début of the head of the house of "Stepping Stones" in films. Fred Stone has long been in demand by the studios, but he was too fond of the footlights to pay much attention. But there was a long time when Mr. Stone wasn't in demand as an actor. Following an airplane smash-up he was told that he would never again walk, let alone dance. But the doctors didn't reckon with their patient. . . . True, he had to walk on crutches for a good many months—but he learned to dance on them, too. . . . Evelyn Venable is married to Hal Mohr, a cameraman, and living high up in the Hollywood hills in a modest house. They put all their money into the view. . . . Hedda Hopper's one of Hollywood's most sought-after ladies. She's a former De Wolfe Hopper wife, but famous in her own right, too.

★★ Dante's Inferno (Fox)

If Signor Dante should happen to drop into a movie theatre one of these days he'd discover that the boys at Fox have taken considerable liberties with his poem. He'd find his Inferno a carnival concession run by Spencer Tracy, who puts Hades over with a bang and builds himself a gigantic amusement park and a colossal gambling ship. We hate to say it, but Spencer uses somewhat shady methods to acquire his holdings, much to the chagrin of his wife (Claire Trevor) and her father (honest Henry B. Walthall). Don't get the idea that these goings-on are a kick in the pants for clean living. On the other hand, Spencer pays and pays. In his amusement park Hell breaks loose and falls on a number of his customers, and on its maiden trip his gambling ship goes up in flames. In between all this you are given a peek at the real Hades and its clients, and it may or may not amuse you to note that there are no blondes down there. At any rate, you'll find Spencer Tracy a lot better than the picture and Claire Trevor neither Garbo nor hard to look at.

★★★ Curly Top (Fox)

The obvious thing to say about a Shirley Temple picture these days is that the burden of keeping things moving rests entirely on the frail shoulders of little Miss T. Nevertheless, it is quite apparent in "Curly Top," as it has been in this young lady's recent releases, that without her presence her vehicles would fall apart before our very eyes. It must be admitted, then, that Shirley's presence is something indeed, for in this case she turns an otherwise dull and dreary picture into an engaging and often sprightly screen play. As sisters in an orphan asylum, Shirley and Rochelle Hudson are adopted by John Boles, a wealthy patron of the place. You can practically guess what happens from there on, which is why we're not going to tell you. At any rate, Shirley sings and dances with her customary charm, John Boles lends his baritone to a couple of pleasant ballads, and Rochelle Hudson is lovely to look at. If you are an admirer of La Belle Temple (and who isn't?), we'd advise you to see it by all means.

Preview Postscripts

Miss Shirley Temple holds the title of Hollywood's most fickle femme. Her current leading man is always this blonde's Big Moment. Among those to succumb to her charms have been Jimmy Dunn, the late Will Rogers, Joel McCrea and Gary Cooper. And now it's John Boles. Though one of the happiest married men in town, rumor has it that many a night he phoned home saying business detained him at the studio while, in reality, he was reading funny-papers to Shirley. She's just returned from a three-weeks' trip to the Hawaiian Islands with her parents. . . . John Boles has two daughters of his own, aged seven and fourteen. Mr. Boles didn't do any leaping into the limelight. He worked for more years than he cares to remember before attaining anything even remotely resembling success. What's more, he claims that whatever credit there is for his fame goes to his wife, Marcellite. . . . Nothing seems to tickle the American fancy quite so much as an absurdly English Englishman. So Arthur Treacher zoomed to fame in this country. Though his family thought he looked serious enough to train for the bar, Arthur thought he looked funny enough to go on the stage. Which he did, but was never appreciated 'til the Shuberts brought him to America. He had the Winter Garden audiences spellbound in no time, and soon had Ethel Barrymore, Mary Ellis and such clamoring for his talents in their plays. . . . Rochelle Hudson is an old-timer in town, having crashed the fillums at the tender age of eleven. She's been working off and on ever since, but finds time to swim, play tennis like an expert and ride a bicycle twenty miles a day. . . . Producer Winfield Sheehan was recently married to Maria Jeritza at the Santa Barbara Mission. Never been married and never been in love 'til he met Jeritza a few weeks before. Mr. Sheehan's life story puts Alger's to shame. Born to poverty-stricken parents, he sold papers, wrote for them, and for many years now has been one of the outstanding leaders of the motion picture industry.

★★★★ The Thirty-nine Steps
(Gaumont-British)

Here, movie-goers, is the answer to the question you've been asking—"When will we see Robert Donat again?" After "The Count of Monte Cristo," as you probably know, Donat returned to England where he did a play—and this picture. It's a grand film and he is grand in it. A fast-moving mystery and plenty of good fun are mixed with the chills. Donat and Madeleine Carroll, who plays opposite him, have many chances to show their skill at the light comedy touch. The plot moves along like greased lightning—and while, like most mystery plots, it isn't noted for strict adherence to realism, it's believable enough. Has to do with a traitorous organization called "The 39 Steps" which is endeavoring to sneak some valuable state secrets out of England. All this leads to much dirty work on the Scottish moors and considerable glib talking and fast action on the part of Donat. The settings and scenery are interesting. There are some excellent bits of acting by lesser characters. The direction is smooth. And Donat—we repeat—is grand. We wish he'd make more pictures.

★★★ Every Night at Eight
(Paramount)

An unpretentious little musical number is this one and we chalk it up on the scoreboard as pleasant and mildly diverting entertainment. Obviously fashioned to catch the fancy of the amateur hour devotees, it has Frances Langford, Alice Faye and Patsy Kelly as three working gals who have a yen to sing. In fact, they have a talent for it, and after an appearance on one of them thar amateur programs they join up with George Raft, who has organized a band and wants to go places. It won't surprise you to learn that success comes along eventually, and with it romance, although everyone in the audience knows that Frances Langford is in love with George Raft about three reels before the news gets home to our hero. Patsy Kelly helps things considerably with her rowdy comedy, and the Langford gal, when she's photographed better, will turn into a good screen bet, for her voice registers well. George Raft is George Raft, and that can mean whatever you want it to mean.

NEW FIGURES FOR OLD QUICK, SAY THOUSANDS

Posed by professional model

GAINS OF 10 TO 25 POUNDS IN A FEW WEEKS REPORTED BY USERS

SKINNY people who never could gain an ounce—many who for years had seen themselves held back by a bony, gawky figure—cannot say enough in praise of this remarkable new discovery that has given them normal curves and natural attractiveness they so long had wished for—in just a few weeks!

Doctors know that the real reason why great numbers of people find it hard to gain weight is they do not get enough Vitamin B and iron in their daily food. Now with this new discovery which combines these two vital elements in little concentrated tablets, hosts of people have put on pounds of firm flesh—in a very short time.

Not only are thousands quickly gaining normal, good-looking pounds, but also naturally clear skin, freedom from indigestion and constipation, new pep.

7 times more powerful

This amazing new product, Ironized Yeast, is made from special cultured ale yeast imported from Europe, the richest known source of Vitamin B. By a new process this yeast is concentrated 7 times—made 7 times more powerful. Then it is ironized with 3 kinds of strengthening iron.

If you, too, are one of the many who simply need Vitamin B and iron to build them up, get these new Ironized Yeast tablets from your druggist at once. Day after day, as you take them, watch skinny limbs and flat chest round out to normal attractiveness. Skin clears to natural beauty, new health comes—you're an entirely new person.

Results guaranteed

No matter how skinny and run-down you may be from lack of enough Vitamin B and iron, this marvelous new Ironized Yeast should build you up in a few short weeks as it has thousands. If you are not delighted with the results of the very first package, your money instantly refunded.

Only don't be deceived by the many cheaply prepared "Yeast and Iron" tablets sold in imitation of Ironized Yeast. These cheap imitations usually contain only the lowest grade of ordinary yeast and iron, and cannot possibly give the same results. Be sure you get genuine Ironized Yeast. Look for "IY" stamped on tablets.

Special FREE offer!

To start you building up your health right away, we make this absolutely FREE offer. Purchase a package of Ironized Yeast tablets at once, cut out the seal on the box and mail it to us with a clipping of this paragraph. We will send you a fascinating new book on health, "New Facts About Your Body." Remember, results guaranteed with the very first package—or money refunded. At all druggists. Ironized Yeast Co., Inc., Dept. 311, Atlanta, Ga.

Langford was wafted to fame on the air waves, after a season or two in the musical comedy racket. On completing this picture she tucked away a nice plump movie contract with her Columbia Broadcast one. Weighs 96 pounds but can beat a half dozen husky gals when it comes to hard work. She's dippy about Dobermann Pincers and chocolate eclairs and is seldom seen without a few of each. . . . Alice Faye, like Miss Langford, is a protégée of Rudy Vallee—and more than that according to the rocking chair brigade. She sported a mammoth star sapphire while at work on this film, but shyly refused to divulge the donor's name. With wealth from the movie coffers, Alice built a palatial Beverly Hills home and recently invited a crowd to help initiate the pool. The fact that at the last minute a pipe broke and there was no water in the pool didn't stop the initiation. The hostess provided roller skates. . . . George Raft is the young man who caused all that fanfare and fan mail as Rudolph Valentino's successor. But in spite of the sweat of his brow and the brilliantine on his pompadour, Mr. Raft hasn't filled the Great Lover's shoes. It wasn't his idea, anyway, as he prefers tougher rôles. George never uses a hanky, just collects them. He has several hundred to date.

★★★ The Gay Deception
(20th Century-Fox)

There's deception in the title, but the picture really is gay. It's all light-hearted and nonsensical with a plot that's conspicuous by its absence. Francis Lederer is irresistible as the happy-go-lucky young prince who decides to do some bell-hopping in New York's most ultra hotel. Either the director forcibly restrained Mr. Lederer from discoursing on his favorite topic, World Peace, or quietly cut any such glum remarks, for the handsome hero seems to have nothing on his mind but Frances Dee. And no wonder—for Miss Dee turns on the charm full force and gives a grand performance of the rich little poor girl splurging on sweepstake returns. Besides which she's prettier than ever. The rest of the cast doesn't let you down, either. Alan Mowbray portrays another super-sophisticate Lord Somebody or Other, while Benita Hume is the girl who shows up the lower nature of society debs. Lionel Stander and Akim Tamiroff raise the artistic standards for gangsters and Luis Alberni and Ferdinand Gottschalk outdo themselves in a couple of comedy scenes. The story is pretty badly tangled up in spots, come to think of it. But you'll enjoy yourself so you won't be thinking anyway.

Preview Postscripts

There should be a law against Mr. Francis Lederer. In spite of the fact that he's the most ardent exponent of the World Peace Movement, Mr. Lederer has caused more discord in happy homes than any other actor. He started by raising the pulses of Czecho-Slovakian ladies in his native country at the age of eighteen. Since that time he's been the matinee idol of London, Paris, New York and points west. Production on this picture had to be held up so that he could address the National Association of University Women who were holding their annual convention in Los Angeles. He was the first actor so honored by the association. Miss Mary Anita Loos, it is rumored, may take him out of circulation one of these days. . . . Frances Dee is one of those young ladies who announced that she would never marry an actor, then turned around and became Mrs. Joel McCrea. However, she's the only one to become Mrs. J. McC. They're strong advocates of the simple life and savings banks. Most of their money is put into the soil—some several thousand acres of it in the San Fernando Valley. They're raising thoroughbred horses, prize livestock and a healthy baby. . . . Here's another to add to your collection of "this could only happen in Hollywood." Five years ago Miss Dee appeared as a lowly "extra" in her first picture, with Jack Mulhall the star. In this flicker maybe you saw Jack, but more likely you didn't. He was the teller in the bank for about two minutes. . . . Alan Mowbray and Benita Hume were as chummy off-screen as on. They were great friends back in Merrie Olde England, from where Miss Hume just came for the first time in two years. . . . Mr. Mowbray wouldn't stay away that long, though, having too soft a spot in his heart for this country. He's written several stage hits besides being in plenty of them. Lorraine Carpenter, his wife, has also been with him in many plays. . . . William Wyler, director, is married to Margaret Sullavan. What's more, he intends to stay that way. Those divorce rumors were squelched once and for all when Mr. Wyler had a birthday a few days after starting on this picture. His wife sent her gift over to the set for him. It was a de luxe sport model motorcycle, all done up in pink and blue ribbon. Mr. Wyler promptly put his car in the garage and rides nothing but his bike—even to parties. It was not only a convenient gift, but a sentimental one, for while Mr. W. was courting Mrs. W. over on the Universal lot, the two would steal away at every opportunity and go riding on the cop's motorcycle.

★★★ Here Comes Cookie
(Paramount)

You can bring your paper hat and your confetti to this little opera, for it's the goofiest conglomeration of comedy and celluloid you'll see all season. It's Burns and Allen, and it's their best picture to date. The story has George Barbier as a spluttering old millionaire who wants to prevent one of his daughters (Betty Furness) from marrying a money-seeking foreigner. In order to pretend he's poor he deeds all his money to his other daughter, who happens to be Gracie Allen. Gracie thinks the old gent really wants to get rid of his money, so she opens a spending campaign by filling the house with down-and-out vaudeville acts. There's a seal in every bathtub, an acrobat on every chandelier, and the old family mansion looks like a poor week on the Gus Sun circuit. What goes on from there you can find out for yourself. In a song and dance number called "The Vamp of the Pampus" Gracie proves herself one of the ablest comediennes in the business, and the rest of the cast does excellent stooging for her.

Gracie Allen and George Burns have been in the moom pitchers only about three years, but they've long been popular on the stage and radio. All those laughs are the result of the Burns Bros. brain-waves, for George and his brother, Bill, think them all up. But without Gracie there'd be none, for she's their inspiration and official tryer-outer. The Burns have just completed something that resembles a mansion and a half out Santa Monica way, and call it "The House That Jack Built." But they don't intend to stay there long, having the travel bug and right now planning a jaunt to China with their two children. They've just adopted a little boy now, besides their little daughter, adopted eight months ago. . . . Betty Furness was used to having her picture taken before coming to Hollywood since she was a professional model for a couple years in New York. She's never seen on the set or off without a voluminous knitting bag and has outfitted herself, all her friends, and most of their

★★★ The Irish in Us
(First National)

With such fine Celtic names as O'Brien, Cagney and McHugh attached to a picture bearing this title it will come as no surprise to learn that things concern themselves mainly with the doings of an Irish family—the O'Haras, in fact. Brothers Pat O'Brien and Frank McHugh turn an honest dollar or so with the police and fire departments, but brother Jimmy Cagney's talents run toward managing prize fighters. He finally lands one named Carbarn Hammerschlag (Allen Jenkins), and his activities with this punch-drunk warrior keep the plot rolling. The producers might well be accused of having kissed the blarney stone once or twice too often in the making of this one, but the overdose of sentiment is more than balanced by some good lines and several rip-roaring comedy sequences. Jimmy and Pat are excellent, and Allen Jenkins and Frank McHugh, you may notice, have made definite improvement in their brand of comedy. (A little restraint goes a long way, eh, boys?) Olivia di Havilland playing the love interest, will bear watching.

Pat O'Brien and James Cagney are good friends since Broadway hoofing days, when they lined up in the same act on the five-a-day. At that time they weren't just positive where their next meal was coming from, but it didn't matter so much either. Now they've got large and imposing houses atop Hollywood hills, swimming pools and a Public. And none of this matters so much, either. Pat is married to a girl who's never been on the stage, and they've just adopted a small daughter, Mavourneen, for whom they practically built their whole home, what with nurseries, solariums, gymnasiums, etc. Jimmy's married to a former actress. . . . Olivia di Havilland first came to attention out here in Hollywood when Max Reinhardt took such an interest in her while casting for his great spectacle, "A Midsummer Night's Dream," which was put on in the Bowl. He decided Miss di Havilland had something, and she's now proving it as far as the movies are concerned, too. . . . Mr. Reinhardt also mentioned James Cagney as one of the ten finest actors in Hollywood. . . . Frank McHugh is one of

It was strange that the son of an Admiral and the descendant of generations of Navy men should care nothing about the Navy. But Dick Melville thought he would rather sing than do anything, and he only joined the Service to prove to his father that he could succeed. When it came time for him to leave, however, he found that his heart was bound up with loyalty and love for the Navy and for the girl who showed him the right path to follow.

You'll enjoy reading "SHIPMATES FOREVER," a grand story of life in the Navy, where the highest ideals of loyalty and devotion prevail. The complete story of Warner Brothers' picture, starring Dick Powell and Ruby Keeler, appears in the November issue.

★★ Special Agent
(Warner Brothers)

Someone dug rather deeply into that attic trunk for the script of "Special Agent" and emerged with a gangster tale which registers as a minor item in the month's list of entertainment. The picture starts out to be a second "G-Men," exploiting the accomplishments of Uncle Sam's agents, but after the first reel it reverts to the gangland type of picture prevalent in these parts several seasons ago. The story has George Brent as a special agent posing as a newspaper man in order to get evidence on Ricardo Cortez, the current Public Enemy No. 1. The fact that Cortez permits Brent openly to court Bette Davis, who keeps the gang chief's books, gives the tale a touch of fantasy. In spite of the time-worn plot most of the acting is excellent, particularly that of Ricardo Cortez and Bette Davis, who deserve more important surroundings than these.

★★ Alias Bulldog Drummond
(Gaumont-British)

Do not let the title lead you to think that this British import is in any way like the gay and adventurous Drummond pictures which Ronald Colman has done. Because it isn't. We scrutinized the screen in great puzzlement throughout the preview and finally came to the conclusion that it's all supposed to be a burlesque. We imagine it's supposed to be funny. But English comedy is rarely funny to us, unless Beatrice Lillie is somewhere in the vicinity. Jack Hulbert works himself into a lather, trying to make a go of things. Fay Wray looks lovely, but has little to do. We were sorry to see this actress, who has advanced so noticeably of late, wasted in a mediocre part.

★★ The Girl Friend (Columbia)

We hesitate about speaking our mind on this, since libel suits are such a nuisance. Miss Ann Sothern waves her eyelashes about and Mr. Roger Pryor sports a brave new mustache. The plot is exciting, too, having to do with Mr. Pryor and two starving pals, who pose as a few people they aren't and take advantage of a dear old lady in the country who serves fried chicken three times a day. The D. O. L. has a granddaughter, too—who turns out to be Ann Sothern of all things. Romance bursts into bloom and Ann gets gramma to slap another mortgage on the homestead so that Roger can turn the barn into a Little Theatre. Roger shouldn't be blamed for that idea, though. It's just Columbia's excuse to put on a musical comedy review for several reels. We'll have to admit, though, that they did a good job on the barn, and installed a lighting system that would have done credit to the Met.

Preview Postscripts

Miss Ann Sothern was that attractive brunette in the third row center of Ziegfeld's chorus a few years back, and prior to that a school-girl (still brunette) in Central High, Minneapolis. Then she came to Hollywood, where the California sun bleached her bob and filled her with vim, vigor and voluptuousness enough to become a star. In reel life she's giddy and gaddy, but really Ann's a quiet, serious-minded gal, intensely interested in her career and family—her mother and two almost-as-pretty sisters. . . . In spite of being the son of famous band-master Pryor, Roger Pryor's never so much as tooted a saxophone. His one ambition has been to act. . . . Jack Haley's more familiar with footlights than flickers, having been a musical comedy star for Schwab and Mandel the past few years. He's moved bag, baggage and family to California now and shows all the earmarks of becoming a native. The climate already seems unusual to him. . . . Director Eddie Buzzell is a fiend for work and feels that everyone else should share his enthusiasm. Hence the cast finally had to resort to bribery in order to snatch an occasional sandwich. The only member of the cast who really had Eddie worried, though, was Jack Haley. He appeared every day on the set with a large bottle of bicarbonate of soda, and at frequent intervals all day would take large doses. The terrific overwork, Jack claimed, was lowering his resistance. Everyone but slave-driver Buzzell knew that the bottle contained a mixture of powdered sugar and water.

★★★★★ Broadway Melody of 1936 (M-G-M)

Full of the kind of glitter and sparkle that marks a top-notch New York revue, "Broadway Melody" is far and away the finest screen musical of the year. Its comedy is spontaneous and funny (what with Jack Benny and Sid Silvers at the controls), its sets are gorgeous without going gaudy, its songs and dancing are tops, and—it has Eleanor Powell. For several years the best female tap dancer on Broadway, the lovely Powell gets her first big chance on the screen and runs away with the picture. Not only has she the fanciest dance steps you'll see on any screen, but the gal sings and she can act—she even does a Hepburn impersonation that's a honey. Also in the singing and dancing department you'll find Buddy and Vilma Ebsen, Nick Long, Jr., June Knight and Frances Langford. Robert Taylor has the romantic lead, and there's a swell comedy romance between Sid Silvers and Una Merkel.

★★★★ She Married Her Boss
(Columbia)

It is our suspicion that director Gregory La Cava deserves a major portion of the credit for making a bright and intelligent comedy out of what might have been quite an ordinary bit of domestic trivia. The "La Cava touches," like the "Capra touches," are evident throughout the proceedings and they go a long way toward making "She Married Her Boss" the excellent entertainment that it is. Of course, the fact that Claudette Colbert is around adds greatly to the picture's enjoyment, and you'll find the little lady giving her best performance since "It Happened One Night." To top things off, a new star arrives on the screen in the person of little Edith Fellows, who is probably the meanest, nastiest brat who's ever made faces at a camera. After sitting through reels and reels of sweet little girls it's a relief to encounter one who calls her old man a dumbbell and goes about frightening the family dog. So when Claudette marries her boss (Melvyn Douglas) she meets up with Edith, his daughter by a former marriage, and the fun begins. And we mean fun.

Constructive Criticism

I felt I had to protest against some of the letters published in your grand magazine. (This is not a criticism of your book; by the way, it's tops.) For instance, that letter in a recent issue concerning "nice girls" smoking. After all, isn't that a personal opinion and not interesting or constructive to others? I like best the letter congratulating the deserving players, and the intelligent criticism about them.

Personally, I admire all the actors and actresses—for they are all doing their very best to amuse and entertain us. Who could do more? Naturally I admire some stars more than others, but a really good performance, to me, is more important than an outstanding personality.

One other thing I dislike in some letters is that so many writers discuss the stars' private lives. I'll bet the most malicious writer has the shadiest past.

A good rule is not to let the gossip about the stars bias one's opinion. They give us so much, surely we can concede them a little privacy. My hope is that more fans will praise instead of condemn our hardworking friends of the silver screen.—Audray Sanderson, Vancouver, B. C., Canada.

Paging Nils Asther

Two years ago Nils Asther made "The Bitter Tea of General Yen." It was a grand part for him and he revealed talents nobody had suspected. This success he followed up with a magnificent portrayal in "Storm at Daybreak." His comeback had caused a sensation and he was again acclaimed one of the finest of Hollywood players. But suddenly there was a relapse and he was cast only in lesser productions unworthy of his ability. Yet, even when handicapped by these trivial roles, he upheld his consistently fine standards with beautiful characterizations that invariably saved the picture every time.

And now even that has ended and we don't hear of him at all. We are unwilling to accept that time-worn explanation —"He has died out." For it is impossible that the public can have tired of that different appeal, that romance and princeliness while it continues to put up with these stereotyped sissies who only too often cannot manage the roles that are handed out to them.

Nils Asther has proven himself capable of higher things. What more can the producers want?—Jeannette Lazaroff, New York, N. Y.

Hollywood Tale

"After Office Hours," "Evelyn Prentice" and "Anne of Green Gables" go to a "Carnival" in "Bordertown" where "The Mighty Barnum" considered "A Notorious Gentleman" dances the "Rhumba" "While the Whole Town's Talking." Some say he's "Reckless" but "Father Brown, Detective," thinks he's just "The People's Enemy" and ought to be put on "The Nut Farm" "West of the Pecos" with "Les Miserables" and "Naughty Marietta."—Fannie Fan.

Oriental Preferred

I have seen all of Myrna Loy's pictures during 1934 and 1935 in which she plays the part of a "white woman." These roles are not in the least becoming to her. She goes to extremes in practically everything she does, and is too masculine for the sophisticated characters she plays. In other words, she hasn't got "It."

She is much better in her disguise, playing those exotic roles. They were the ones that won her a name, and the ones that she should stick to. Let's have more Oriental pictures for Myrna!—Helen George, Newark, N. J.

Forgotten Man

Have you ever realized that among your crowd of he-men you have one man a good actor, never sloppy, nice voice, brains and quite easy on the eyes, not a star, but one that stood up to Garbo in her finest picture, suffered under Shirley Temple and survived a De Mille epic? Who has very rarely turned in a bad picture and must have quite a few fans around. Yes, I know he keeps a lingerie shop, but at least he doesn't wear one of those six-aside mustaches, which incidentally cured this female of Gableitis for keeps.

Do you think that sometime, not now, but some time, perhaps when the Lannys cease from Rossing and the Crosbys cease to Bing, you might loosen up and run a photo and maybe a nice remark or two about Hollywood's forgotten man, Charles Bickford? One gets so sick of Powell and ice cream, let's have Irish stew just for a change?—M. S., Bristol, England.

Taking Mrs. Temple To Task

If ever a role was played with perfection it was the part played by Jane Withers in "Bright Eyes." In spite of the fact that she was on the offensive side, with all the odds against her, she most certainly carried off all the honors. After reading the attitude Mrs. Temple has taken in objecting to Shirley appearing in the same picture with Jane, I for one never expect to see a picture in which Shirley Temple takes a part. There are in our schools thousands of curley-headed, lovely children, brilliant, too, who with the same advantages, push and publicity would do as well as Shirley does. It seems incredible to think that any mother could take such a shallow outlook, considering how fortunate her own daughter has been. Perhaps for the sake of Mrs. Temple's inward feelings it would be well to stop the wheels of progress in the movie industry with Shirley the one and only child star.—Helen Lawrence, Denver.

MODERN SCREEN'S DRAMATIC SCHOOL

safest way for an amateur to begin. Choose a sallow color, being sure it doesn't give a white and chalky effect. A shadow with plenty of yellow is the best. Cover the face thoroughly, being sure that it is applied evenly and smoothly.

In choosing a lining color try as much as possible to get the color most nearly matching the shadow colors in the subject's face. Then start applying the shadows exactly as seen on the face that you're copying. Start by moulding in the shadows and contours of an aged face.

"But, by all means, do not start by trying to put in wrinkles! Wrinkles do not age a face. They simply make the character conspicuous.

"Blend these shadows carefully until they become what the name implies, simply a shadow and not a daub of different colored grease paint. For this purpose I recommend brushes and a technique similar to that of an artist painting on canvas.

"After the foundation and the shadows have been carefully applied the face should be highlighted. For this purpose use a grease paint two shades lighter than that of the foundation. This should be placed on parts which should stand out in relief, such as cheek-bones or sagging muscles.

"Make-up of the eyes in a character of this type presents an interesting, if a difficult problem. The small wrinkles about the eyes largely denote the disposition of an elderly character—whether during his life he has been happy and easy-going or grouchy and self-centered.

"In age the eyelid tends to droop over the eye, especially at the outer corners. Since age also weakens the eyes there is a definite tendency to squint, causing lines to form next to the nose and between the eyes on the forehead.

"When a person is habitually mean, this squint becomes a frown causing these small lines to curve downward. In the happy, elderly type these same lines adopt a definite, upward tilt. In drawing in these lines and the lines of the forehead, it is best to have the subject squint his eyes and wrinkle his forehead—and then copy these natural furrows.

"Applying the eye-shadow is not difficult. It should be rather heavy in order to give the sunken appearance, stress being placed on the portion next to the nose. Be sure, however, to blend it carefully with the foundation, so that there is no definite demarcation.

"The age wrinkles should be applied last of all, and should not consist of just a pencil mark. In a natural face a wrinkle consists of a highlight and a shadow. Every wrinkle should be topped with a highlight, the highlight being more important than the shadow. The dark line as well as the light one should be blended with a brush into the foundation color.

"In drawing these lines extreme care should be taken to make them so thin that they might have been drawn with a pin.

"I chose to describe the process of making up an elderly character because so many of the points brought to light in this problem apply to other phases of character make-up."

Thanks, Jack Dawn, that's a swell lesson. If you want to know the colors to use for character make-up, their names and number, write to this department, MODERN SCREEN Dramatic School, 149 Madison Ave., New York, N. Y., and enclose a self-addressed, stamped envelope.

Kola was the sensation of the season at Monte Carlo, with her dancing partner, Toni, whom she loved so much that she was marrying another man to save him!

One evening Toni came into Kola's dressing room after their dance. He was pale and worried, and told her he needed fifty thousand francs to pay a gambling debt. Taking Kola roughly by the shoulders he demanded that she borrow the money from Garet, the rich American who was in love with her, telling her it was the only way to save them from disgrace. Kola was in despair . . . if she could only think of some other way out. . . . She sank down for a moment, holding her pounding head in her hands . . . "I will not ask Garet for money. I cannot," she whispered over and over again. What tragedy threatened these two?

What strange destiny awaited this young American girl, caught in a web of intrigue and desperate love?

OLD MAN COOPER ADVISES MASTER FREDDIE

me for Christmas, but I never did anything with them. How do you think I'm getting along out here, though, Jackie? What do you think I ought to do?

Jackie (chewing a jelly-bean with a considering, sagacious air): I'm not very far along myself. I don't know so terribly much. But if you keep going as you're going now it can't hurt you.

Freddie (as one artist to another): How do you make yourself cry in pictures, Jackie?

Jackie (laughing): I learned how in school! I don't think you have to ask that, though. I saw you in "Copperfield," like I said, and I thought you would kill yourself crying.

Freddie (his gentle courtesy covering a quiet insistence): Oh, thank you so much. But how do you cry?

Jackie: Well, it's this way—y'see, my feelings are very easily hurt. If anyone scolds me I always cry. Can't help it. And the director knows this and he bawls me out whenever he wants me to do a crying scene. 'Course I know that he doesn't really mean it, that he's just doing it on purpose to make me cry. But it hurts my feelings just to hear the old angry words and I just cry, that's all.

Freddie (impressed and respectful): Does music ever help you?

Jackie: Sometimes, if it's saddish. How do you do it?

Freddie: Well, I just—well, Cis helps me a lot We talk about sad things, all sorts of sad things like pets dying and how far away home is and about ships that go down at sea and things like that . . .

Jackie (generously): Yeah, that's a good way, too. You ought to watch Wally Beery though. He can just come into a scene where I am crying and you can see the tears just come into his eyes. They come out of his heart. He doesn't need any tricks. And then we both get crying good and hard. We help each other. And then sometimes I read the script—like in "Skippy"—and I just feel it and start to cry. Ever try that way?

Freddie: I did that way in "David Copperfield." Of course, you have to read very slowly, don't you think so? If you skip, it doesn't make sense or bring any tears. You're apt to think of other things, too, jolly sort of things. Say, do you think being in pictures makes boys conceited, Jackie? Someone asked me that the other day. I thought it very silly.

Jackie (authoritatively): It's up to the boy, I think. If a boy in pictures wants to think he's much bigger than anyone else—well, it might make some boys conceited—but I don't know, I've always gone around with other boys. Wherever we move there's an understanding that all of us kids just play around together. Some boys are jealous. I'm down at the beach, say, and some of the kids start razzing and you ask them if they want to make anything of it and that's all right. They just want to see if you're all right, what kind of a kid you are. Well, we get in fights—we're all the same. I don't know, I just work here at the studio and then I go home and leave the studio right here where it is.

Freddie (laughing): I feel that way, too. Of course, I haven't met many boys over here as yet. Do you get tired of people asking for your autograph?

Jackie: Oh, no. Sometimes, like at football games, it's a nuisance. There'll be a play I want to see and just then some piece of paper will pop up and I'll have to write my autograph and miss part of the game. But you should try to be nice about it at all times, I think.

Freddie (with a little sigh): I know. I went out to luncheon yesterday and I had to wear the same smile—like this—for about two hours until my jaw was stiff. But I think we've got the advantage over other boys at that. Don't you? I mean, other boys might think we don't have any fun because we can't go far away from home alone and things. But I like it. It's good fun . . . excitement . . . previews! Free tickets!

JACKIE: Sure. It's okay. And here's something else—you ought to see all of the pictures you can see. I enjoy pictures anyway. I've always liked Joan Crawford and always shall. Joan and Wally and Richard Dix are my favorites.

Freddie (thoughtfully): I have no real favorites as yet. Perhaps I like Charles Laughton especially well. His work, you know.

Jackie: Sure, he's good, too. You know, it's a funny thing but when I see a picture I forget process shots and the mechanics of things. When I saw "Treasure Island" on the screen those pirates shivered my timbers! I forgot how I'd played checkers with 'em and everything. I think you should be this way, though—if you get to thinking too much about the way pictures are made you are apt to get mechanical yourself.

Freddie (nodding in agreement): So do I get scared. I even got scared when I watched Mr. Rathbone beating me in "David." I forgot it was me. I kept thinking, "Oh, that poor little boy—that poor little boy!"

Jackie: I know, sure. I never go to see myself more than just twice. It's bad to get yourself too much on your own mind. I go to the preview and then I go to see the picture once in a theatre just to get the audience reaction.

Freddie (out of his long, two-picture experience): That's how I do, too. You can tell the signs. Say, Jackie, do you read your fan mail? Do you think I should? And do you have girls proposing to you? Girls who write and say, "I'm ten years old. I've black hair. Will you marry me when you grow up?"

Jackie (laughing rather scornfully): Sure. I answer most of 'em or I send my autographed picture.

Freddie (with dawning skepticism): I often wonder whether those nice letters are just made up so you'll send 'em a picture or whether they are sincere?

Jackie: Oh, the ones from the children are apt to be sincere. Children are real people, you know, that is, as a rule. And you should always answer them, Freddie, no matter how hard it seems.

Freddie: Several blind people have secretaries or friends write me and I always answer those. But it is very hard, sometimes.

Jackie (with a world-weary sigh): I know! I get tired, too. When I was a kid I wanted to be a street-car conductor. Street-car conductors don't have to be polite at all if they don't feel like it.

Freddie: That's funny. I always wanted to be a constable when I was a little boy at home in England. If you're ever in London, Jackie, don't ever call a bobby a bobby—not to his face, you know. They like to be called constables.

Jackie: I know. Same as over here. They don't like you to call 'em cops—they like you to say "officer"!

Freddie: I also wanted to be a guard when I was small. I went to Whitehall one day and saw the guards with their red coats and their white horses and I thought I'd like to be a guard and to marry the Princess Elizabeth when I should be a man. Who do you want to marry?

Jackie (with a wink as of an older man humoring a romantic boy): Oh, the President's mother!

Freddie (gravely): She is very charming. I met her in New York and she was so sweet. She said to me, "You must meet my young son. He's only fifty-two, but I'm sure you'd like him."

Jackie (with a tolerant smile): Yes, you meet all kinds of people. And you should keep on being different people yourself, too, Freddie. That's my advice. I believe in changing my character from time to time. All types of people are popular. If you are bad in one picture, you have to figure out why and sort of change yourself for the next one. I believe in studying music and French and stuff like that.

Freddie (sadly): I studied French last year and I don't know a thing.

Jackie: I've taken French since I was eight and I still don't know a thing. Well, that's that. What star would you like to be like when you grow up?

Freddie (with his little note of firmness under his gently courteous manner): I want to be like myself, always.

Jackie: Sure. That's good, too. That's swell. But sometimes it's good to have a target to aim at even if, you know, even if you never mean to hit it.

Freddie: Well, Fredric March, I think. I do admire him enormously.

JACKIE: Sure. He's good. But if I stay on the screen until I am as old as Wally and if I can be as good as he is I'll be satisfied. You know, you ought to know all about everything in the studio, too, not just the acting part. I'm keen about the sound department. And the way effects are done. Remember in "West Point of the Air"—that crash? Well, that was miniature and it looked very good. It's more wonderful the way they do it, I think.

Freddie: Yes, and in "Copperfield" there was a shot when Mr. Fields is outside and he nearly drops his cane—well, that was miniature. I saw it done.

Jackie (chewing thoughtfully): The most interesting thing is the sound department. It's nice to know a few things, like about not making too much noise under the microphone and what not to touch and all.

Freddie: Speaking of sound, I have a new siren on my bike.

Jackie: Swell! I have a Birmingham Rover, made in England. It's a very fast bike. I'm going to get a speedometer. . . .

Freddie: I know. They're very keen, the Birminghams. When it seems you're going sixty you're really not going more than twenty.

Jackie: I'm awfully glad you're on this lot. Nice to have a boy to talk to. D'you know, I'd like to do a picture with you some time.

Freddie: So would I.

Jackie: Here's how I learn my script if you want to know. I always read my lines just before I go to bed at night. And then I look at it again in the morning. It's my advice not to study it too hard, because if you learn your lines too well you find yourself sort of reciting them, stiff like.

Freddie: That's what I think, too. I just look over my lines at night and then in the morning when my mind is fresh, at about 6.30, right after my shower, I look at them again and I know them. Of course, you've always got rehearsals if you don't know them . .

Jackie (with an air of seasoned experience): It's always best to know them, though. It's part of being what we call a good trouper.

Freddie: Yes, that's what Miss Edna May Oliver told me when she was playing my Aunt Betsy in "Copperfield."

Jackie: 'Course I like the work, but the sooner I get done on the set the happier I am. All morning I'm waiting for lunch and all afternoon I'm waiting for 6 p.m.

Freddie (laughing): I know. I like

The Best GRAY HAIR REMEDY IS MADE AT HOME

YOU can now make at home a better gray hair remedy than you can buy, by following this simple recipe: To half pint of water add one ounce bay rum, a small box of Barbo Compound and one-fourth ounce of glycerine. Any druggist can put this up or you can mix it yourself at very little cost. Apply to the hair twice a week until the desired shade is obtained. Barbo imparts color to streaked, faded or gray hair, makes it soft and glossy and takes years off your looks. It will not color the scalp, is not sticky or greasy and does not rub off. Do not be handicapped by gray hair now when it is so economical and easy to get rid of it in your own home.

to work because once I get started I know I'm on the way to getting through. But the only part I really mind is the waiting around . . .

Jackie: Yeah, when they get tied up. I never know what to do with myself when I'm waiting around and then, just as they get ready to shoot, I find something I want to do. Say, I saw a write-up about you in a magazine last night. Do you read all your write-ups and things the critics say about you? I do.

Freddie (indifferently flipping a coin): I don't.

Jackie: I like to see what the critics say. 'Course I get sore now and then. I try to be as good as possible, but one time they wrote that I sassed reporters and I never sassed anybody that didn't sass me first, but they put that in and from that time I was sorta sore.

FREDDIE (still indifferently): I don't see the sense of them. They're written and forgotten. I make the picture and I do my best and that's all I can do about it no matter what people say. And when you're grown up and are maybe a tramp or maybe a king, what good does it do you then?

Jackie: Well, you could look back and remember what you were doing when you were a kid. If you didn't have the notices to remind you, you might forget! Say, by the way, I don't like motorcycles, do you? They're too big. I like motor-bikes.

Freddie: How fast do you go?

Jackie: About forty—fellow I know has a motor-bike and he rides around Beverly at about fifty miles an hour. He's going to be killed some day.

Freddie (philosophically): It'll be his own fault.

Jackie: Sure. What swimming pool were you at yesterday?

Freddie: At the Garden of Allah. I swam twenty-three lengths of the pool and then we had a water pillow fight and then . . .

. . . And then the two boys shed the bright sheath of their young stardom and were "just boys"—advice and their public and their future forgotten in the immediacy of a present made fascinating by motor-bikes and pillow fights and pools.

THE TRUE LIFE STORY OF NELSON EDDY

him and might open new and lucrative fields to him. It was the new and lucrative fields that prevailed upon Nelson, not the lure of the lights nor the fandango of applause.

They were not destined to be of a very long duration, those first lessons. For scarcely had they got well under way when Mr. Bispham died. And then Nelson tried one teacher and another, learned the operatic roles of "Aida" and "Pagliacci," sang with the Philadelphia Operatic Company, with the Savoy Company, an organization devoted to giving the works of Gilbert & Sullivan. He joined the Plays & Players, a Little Theatre Group, and appeared in two of their plays, singing and dancing. The Plays & Players, by the way, only engaged Nelson after thumbing the pages of the Social Register and finding the Eddy name safely listed among the socially desirable.

HE played in "The Marriage Tax," Mrs. George Dallas Dixon's society musical which was elaborately produced at the Academy of Music in Philadelphia. He said, "I played the part of the King of Greece—and imagine my chagrin when I glanced at the program on opening night to find that I was billed merely as the King of Greece! The next morning my feelings were considerably assuaged when I opened the morning papers to find my first press notice. My anonymity had served me well for it was all very flattering. There was a demand for the real name of the King of Greece."

Nelson's life in those days and in the days to come would sound like a copy and a very detailed one of the Musical Directory if everything he did, every role he sang were to be listed in proper sequence. The sequence is relatively unimportant, perhaps. What is very important is the methodical, block-by-block way in which this young man went about building his career.

It was when he joined the Philadelphia Civic Opera Company under the tutorship, conductorship and boss-almightyness of Alexander Smallens that he made his next great forward stride. "It was," Nelson told me, "the work of Alexander Smallens that moulded me into an opera singer."

In that company Nelson sang twenty-eight roles. And in that company also, was one Edward Lippe, himself a singer of note, later to become a teacher of singing and one of Nelson Eddy's closest and dearest friends. And Edward Lippe listened to the young man with the silver-gold hair and the steady eyes and the quiet smile and knew, as David Bispham had known, that here was a voice in the grand manner. He knew, too, that young Eddy's voice would suffer irreparable damage if he did not learn to conserve it and to conserve himself, did not cease from working in an office, taking correspondence courses, burning the bright candle of his youth at both ends. And both ends work, not play. He knew that he must be made to stop singing in churches, in four-a-day movie houses, wherever and whenever he could command a job.

"You have a very fine voice," he told him. "You won't have it long. You are singing too much. You are wearing it out."

And by that admonitory talk averted a tragedy. For one whole summer Nelson studied with Edward Lippe and then was turned over to William Vilonat who had been Lippe's teacher too.

There had come into Nelson's life, by this time, another influence. . . .

Nelson said to me, "So many people have wondered, have thought it strange that I have never been engaged, nor even rumored to be; have thought it odd that a young man, especially a young man in professional life, has not been seen, here, there, everywhere, with this charming girl or that. Am I a recluse, people have asked? Does my music so enthrall me that the ordinary humanities are unnecessary to me? Am I a woman-hater? What?

THE answer to these queries, curiosities and wonderings is a simple NO. I shall tell you . . . a little. . .

"About the time I first began to study voice I was still attending Sunday School. My teacher there was a charming woman and when I was confirmed she was my godmother. She was very musical, very interested in all things and in all people musical. Her mother and my mother, she and I soon formed a congenial quartette and before very long we shared a home together. All three of these dear women were deeply interested in my career. They listened to me practice for long hours. They helped me with my scores and roles. They followed every part I sang with the flattering interest only loving and affectionate women can give. Then my godmother's mother died. Which left the three of us.

"In the meantime a friendship deep enough, strong enough to be called love had developed between my godmother and me. She gave me so great a devotion, so overwhelming an affection that I felt the need of no other. I can and I do pay her now the affectionate tribute of saying that for anything I am today or may be tomorrow she is in no small way responsible.

"Everything that a woman could do for a man she did for me. She was patient, self-sacrificing, tender. She made, for many years, all other women seem but pale reflections of herself.

"And this is why, this is the real reason why I did not go junketing about with girls of my own age. This is the explanation of why I did not become involved in the customary romances.

"I have left much unsaid. To speak of this at all is like touching something both painful and beautiful on the quick. I can only repeat that this very strange interlude is why I have never gone about as other young men, have never become engaged, have never married."

When William Vilonat spread before Nelson Eddy the map of his life and said to him, "You must do this—go here—go there," a less resourceful young man might have been confounded. New York—Dresden—Paris—how, on his mother's small salary and with no savings garnered from the years of barely making ends meet—how could he?

But Nelson invariably accepts a challenge with his head flung high. He answers the questions of life in the affirmative. He never says "Can't." Besides, now he had faith in his own ability. The faith given him, first by David Bispham, then by Alexander Smallens, Edward Lippe and Vilonat.

Once that faith was established he went to a wealthy Philadelphia banker who had known his family for many years. With the simplicity and directness which characterizes everything he does, he laid his problem and his plan on the banker's table. He explained that there was gold in his throat but that he needed gold in order to mine it. And he came away from that interview with several thousand dollars in his wallet.

Nelson and Vilonat sailed for Europe, for Dresden. But Nelson felt none of the thrill of adventuring abroad.

HE said, "I thought only of the terrific amount of work ahead of me. I felt no more emotion in going to Europe than when I was transferred from one newspaper office to another. I never really 'saw' Europe. Not, certainly, the café and boulevard life of the Europe of pleasure. We lived with a German family in Dresden. Very simply. I studied and practiced for hours every day. I attended opera every night. I learned the great opera roles in four languages. I did exercises and scales and slept, ate, thought and talked work—work—work. I worked all of the time. I subjected my mind and body and the instrument in my throat to the gruelling, unremitting process which is operatic training. I never met a girl. I never had a rendezvous with anyone except," Nelson laughed, "Vilonat."

Which probably accounts in great part for that young and shining quality of untouched youth which is Nelson Eddy's today. He has tapped so few of life's pleasures and pastimes. Young love—gay romancing—casual adventures—the crazy, happy-go-lucky, catch-as-catch-can kaleidoscope of youth are all ahead of him. For he has never known youth.

"And then," Nelson took up the thread, "after I got back, Arthur Judson, one of the biggest concert masters in the world, took me under his management and put me in the 'big time,' touring the country with various orchestras. I began to be an entity in the concert and in the singing world. I had the same sense of achievement and satisfaction that I had had in the Mott Iron Works when I got to know the product I was handling."

Life began to read more than ever like a musical directory decorated with laurel wreaths. One becomes helplessly amazed in the imposing list of orchestras he has sung with—the Philadelphia Orchestra, Detroit Symphony, Los Angeles Philharmonic, San Francisco Symphony, Boston Symphony, Chicago Symphony in Oratorio . . . The conductors he has sung under awe the most ambitious . . . Wassali Leps, Alexander Smallens, Fritz Reiner, Alberto Bimboni, Sylvan Levin, Albert Coates, Pietro Cimini, Sir Hamilton Harty, Alfred Hertz . . . the radio hours he has filled with song include the Hoffman Hour, Newton Hour, Atwater Kent Hour, Maxwell House Show Boat, Ford Motor Program, Columbia Concert Broadcasts, Hollywood On The Air, Philharmonic Orchestra Broadcasts, New York Stadium Oratorio Broadcasts and the Firestone Garden Concerts . . . They stand as the tangible insignia of the work, the indefatigable work which has been the dominant factor in his life.

At about this time, too, William Vilonat passed away and Nelson resumed his studies with Edward Lippe who had definitely abandoned singing for the teaching of singing. Nelson said, "I've been with Lippe ever since, or he's been with me. He's even come to Hollywood, lives here now, and is doing extremely well. He's not only my teacher but one of my closest and dearest friends. That's his picture over there, on my desk. Almost every other night he's apt to drop in on us, stay for dinner, spend the evening messing about with my records and recordings. We have no set schedule for lessons now but whenever I strike a snag I run yowling to him for help. If I have trouble reaching or holding a certain note he helps me.

IT was while I was on tour, while singing at the Los Angeles Philharmonic that the movies came, as it were, into my life. There were, it developed, movie scouts in the Philharmonic audience. I'd never heard of movie scouts! They came to me after one of the performances and asked me to make a screen test. They might as well have asked me to do a little act on the Midway at Venice Pier so foreign was the idea of working in pictures to me. I'd never thought of such a thing. And it came to me as a shock. But there it was—another job! I thought it over, with prayer and fasting. The much-publicized glamor of Hollywood played no part in my decision because, to tell the truth, I don't think I'd ever heard about it. It was a new medium. With one song I could reach most of the world from where I stood rather than having to carry my voice with me from city to city. Then, too, I could have a home. We could have a home at last, my mother and I. As though it were something I had been missing all of my life, a sharp nostalgia for a home woke in me immediately I realized I could have one. I thought of all those migrations of my childhood, from one town to another. I thought of all the touring I had done. Yes, it would be pretty sweet to have our own place, our own things, a garden and flowers and books and dogs . . . to take some sort of root . . .

"And speaking of my childhood reminds me that I've not mentioned my father since we talked of boyhood days. He's remarried. He lives in Jamestown, Rhode Island. I always go to see them when I am anywhere in the vicinity. We are very good friends, my father and I. I have a small eight-year-old half sister, too, Martha Virginia. And Martha Virginia is very musical. She plays and sings with more than average ability. Whenever I am in New England my father brings her to my concerts and we have great times together. Their interest in me is one of the pleasantest things in my life.

"But to go back—it was the thought of a new job to be done, the thought of having a home that finally clinched my decision to try the movies. I rented this house here in Beverly Hills. Mother came out. We engaged servants, bought cars, began to live as we have never been able to live before.

"I've gone at this film work in what might be called the true-to-type way, I suppose. I mean, I've started from the ground floor up. I've tried to learn everything there is to learn about the making of pictures. I started by studying recording and photography. I wanted to know how to photograph properly. I wanted to understand the processes of recording. The words you sing on a concert platform come out very differently on the sound track. I had to make sure what those differences might be. I learned the vagaries of panchromatic make-up. I did a couple of singing 'hits' in pictures. Time dragged. I didn't seem to be getting anywhere. For the first time in my life I knew the flat taste of discouragement. I had concert and radio work, too, of course but I had never tackled anything I hadn't been able to beat—and I certainly didn't want the movies to count me out. Then came 'Naughty Marietta'!"

And by the light in his blue eyes, the smile framing his mouth, I knew the satisfaction he must be feeling . . . the fan mail coming in by the tons, literally. Fan mail he reads himself, every letter of it. His mother culls them over first, separates them into piles giving the most urgent precedence—and then Nelson reads and answers them when answers are especially requested. Satisfaction over a job well done—none of the egotistic inflation which sometimes fevers fame.

PART of Nelson's apparatus for experiments adorns the sumptuous living room of his Beverly Hills home. His mother casts an indulgent but deprecatory eye in the corner where stand the phonograph, the wirings and records and waxes and other paraphernalia of her son's scientific abracadabra. For the outfit resembles a sound laboratory. And with this apparatus Nelson spends the time other stars spend at night clubs, dancing, polo playing or golfing. He can make records in which he sings different choral parts. He then puts them all together and plays off a one-man chorus. He can do all kinds of stunts.

He said, "I read the scenes of my scripts into this phonograph, you see. Then I play back the record and 'act' with the scenes, thus learning my lines in half the time it would take me otherwise. In this way I have a chance to act as my own critic, to correct my mistakes. I must look very funny standing in the room all by myself arguing, making love, singing, fighting or pleading—but it's a perfect way to study dialogue and I'm thinking of working out a portable outfit that any actor can use.

"And so, Hollywood has meant to me much the same as any other job. Hard work. Study. Slow advancement. Tardy recognition. Gorgeous and spontaneous recognition, when it came.

"I go out very little. One week I may go out with a different girl—usually non-professionals—every night in that week. And then, for two and three weeks at a time I go nowhere. I have a few friends of whom I am very fond—W. S. Van Dyke who directed us in 'Naughty Marietta,' Edward Lippe, Jeanette MacDonald, Bob Ritchie, Elsa Lanchester, Frank Morgan, Gene Raymond . . . I'm going to Arrowhead this week-end with Gene. I like him. He's read books. He can talk about a few things other than personalities and local gossip. I read a lot. I'll always read. I'll always go on studying. I play some tennis. I spend a lot of time with my recordings. I practice an hour or so almost every day. Not always. I always run the scales or roll off a bit of a song while I am shaving. I've never done much practicing before a concert or any performance. I believe in saving my vitality and my voice for the performance itself.

"I'm just a hard-working fellow, I guess. I would like to be known as a singer who voices America to the world. That's about the 'Why' of me. "It's a magnificent world and I'm one of the happiest men in it."

GOOD CITIZEN

meeting. He did not remember what he had said—or maybe he did! Anyway, I was scarcely seated before he announced, "What I really want from life is to stay in Hollywood. You don't think New York producers would hold my desire against me if they read that, do you?" He looked anxious. He was not secure enough then in Hollywood to know when he might have to look to Broadway for a living.

"But I believe in being honest. I don't want to have to return to New York. Eating at automats when money is low, splurging at the Ritz when it is good. Living in a hall-bedroom in Brooklyn. Getting home from the show about midnight and leaving at eight in the morning to pose for commercial photographers to make a few extra dollars. Uncertainty. Broadway offers glamor, Hollywood offers contentment. A home, a family with you, an average, everyday healthful existence."

I wrote no story from this interview. Could I say that the man who had played opposite Clara Bow, who was being hailed as the second Jack Gilbert or Barrymore, saw Hollywood as an opportunity for a healthful existence!

TIME went on. I saw him on the set. I saw him here and there, as you do in Hollywood. In fact, I made a study of him. I learned he had a delightful sense of humor—the normal, everyday kind, yours and mine! He became more popular on the screen. "Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde" brought other roles of true depth and unusual interest. He was elected President of The Mayfair, the first actor to be so honored. Other presidents had been producers. He took this social club, which was rocking unsteadily, and made it enormously successful. He, personally, urged his fellow actors to engage tables. He let word reach one famous social clique that another would attend the monthly Mayfair party. He became interested in an organization of actors, coöperating to protect actors' salaries. He made public speeches before professional and non-professional societies. He was becoming a real power in the business. It was then that I requested another interview.

This time, I was determined to get a story which could be written. I was stubborn in my persistence to make him like other Hollywood actors. I had dug up a story about an early romance he had had in New York City. A fascinating yarn. I told him I knew the story; I persuaded him that he needed romantic publicity. He hesitated, then said casually, "I'd better call my wife." He telephoned Florence, then put me on the phone. Florence explained that the girl was still living and perhaps she had truly loved Freddie so I wouldn't want to write a story that might hurt an innocent woman who was not even connected with the acting profession.

The story has never been written.

We searched for another angle. And this is a summary of what he said, "Any actor who is honest and forgets his natural conceit must admit that a very large percentage of his fame and income is due to luck. No matter what our abilities, luck gives us our opportunities to prove them. I am just one example. Mrs. March and I came to Hollywood because of her. She was much more famous than I. Paramount happened to need men. They offered me five hundred dollars a week. We were making one thousand between us on the stage; I asked one thousand and they gave it to me.

"Actors in Hollywood have never had to think. Perhaps we have not wanted to tempt our good luck by too much thinking! No one can blame us. We are the modern Cinderellas and don't wish to wake up and find ourselves drab little boys and girls again. But now, with the threatened salary cut, we are faced with using our brains. Our salaries are the impetus stirring us to serious thinking. Are we worth the so-called fabulous sums we receive?

"I want to say right now, I believe I am. Luck may have started me but I have been paid since then because my pictures have made a profit. What man doesn't think he is worth his income? I believe when anybody says he is not, he is lying. The innate conceit of man forces him to feel, I am worth all I can get!"

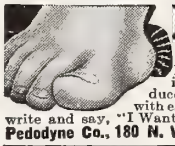
"Over a period of five years in Hollywood, I received $434,500. Out of that, I saved half. The banker's training, you see.

"Therefore, it will take ten years to save a capital of $500,000, from which, at four per cent, I will derive $20,000 a year on which to live. The capital will pass on, of course, to my adopted children.

"I know how many people will feel when I admit I spent $267,250 in five years, but remember I have paid an agent ten per cent or $43,450. I believe every motion picture person supports dependents. I know Mrs. March and I support seven families besides our own. Our income tax is more than $20,000. We pay one half of one per cent of each check to the Motion Picture Relief Fund. We give $1,000 yearly to the Community Chest. If you will deduct all of these set expenses before we begin to live, you will find the reason we live so simply in comparison to many, many Hollywood families with even a lesser income."

AND when I sent this interview to my editor, he did not print it. He said the story sounded as though I had been talking to a banker.

But you see, what the editor missed, was: "I had been talking to a banker! I was talking to a man, grown from the boy who had left Racine, Wisconsin, to become a banker. A boy who became president of his senior class at the University, football manager and Iron Cross man. A boy who was known for his ability to make the most of responsibility and yet maintain a wit and charm, as we all try to maintain it. A boy who won through a scholarship, a bank job in New York City, who saw the long, steep hill to a safe income of $20,000 a year in the banking business and changed his vocation.



I have talked to many in New York who knew Freddie when he was living in that little Brooklyn boarding house, attending classes in acting, fencing, dancing and reading plays just as he read text books in college. Freddie March accepted acting as a career, exactly as he had accepted banking. He studied both as a business. If one could learn to be a banker, one could learn to be an actor.

He didn't like Broadway or stock companies. He wanted Hollywood so he could settle down and become a citizen in a community. If he had remained in Racine he would undoubtedly have become president of the Rotary Club, head of the Chamber of Commerce. He was a power in college. He would have become a power—a youthful, handsome, backbone-of-the-city power—in any community. He would have made speeches. He would have been admired, loved, respected. He would have taken weak social organizations and made them successful! He would have telephoned his wife for advice.

During a recent visit to New York, I kept on digging for information about Freddie. Two little stories:

He was living in his dingy little apartment with Don Cameron, stage actor, now playing with Eva Le Gallienne. Freddie started for rehearsals one evening when he was doing one of his earliest plays. A young girl was crying in front of his apartment house. The cause was four tiny kittens, abandoned in a gutter. Freddie suggested, "You take two home and I'll take two. We'll raise them!"

When Mr. Cameron arrived home, late that night, there sat Freddie, a baby's milk bottle in one hand, a towel in the other. He was softly massaging the kittens with the towel. Someone had told him a mother cat licks her babies, not only from affection but because there is no cat-castor oil on the market.

The next story has just happened. A boy, whom Freddie knew when he was learning to become an actor, was riding his bicycle when a car ran over him. The boy was just one more actor out of work, his friends were in similar conditions. One of the old gang remembered Freddie, out in California. Their call for help reached him on the morning Florence Eldridge recently went to the hospital. But the check was sent that day and it was large enough to see the boy through the hospital and back on his professional feet. Freddie's note said, "Thank you for letting me know about this!"

A man who felt responsibility for kittens stranded in his community; for humans who had once been of his community. I wonder if I'm wrong when I say that Freddie March, the young actor, did only what Freddie March, the young banker, would have done for those kittens—that Freddie March, the great actor did for the boy exactly what Freddie March, the great banker, would have done?

If Rudolph Valentino had become Mayor of Milwaukee, no one would have understood him. Freddie March will always seem equally strange to Hollywood.

It's a nice strangeness. A comfortable one. Something for all of us, in Hollywood, to depend upon when we're in trouble. Something to remind us that our conceit in "glamor" may not be the most important thing in the world.

BEAUTY ADVICE

here about the medium-length bob. It is really the most adaptable haircut you can choose, because it can be worn in so many different ways. You can have the hair brought back on the right side, swirled neatly across the back, and built up high on the left side. Then you can achieve different effects by wearing the left side curls in loose ringlets one day, and in soft puffs the next. This arrangement adapts itself beautifully to the present popular draped-over-the-right-eye beret that leaves the entire left side of the hair uncovered.

The medium-length bob can also be adopted to the time when, as Binnie phrases it, "we wish for long hair and the dignity that goes with it." The addition of a braid can give the illusion of long hair, and the resulting coronet arrangement is especially harmonious with evening gowns. Binnie likes a few soft curls around the face with this type of coiffure and she finds hair ornaments effective, too. For long hair, the classic figure eight coil at the nape of the neck, with the hair drawn softly back from the face, gives a statuesque dignity.

Softness, that is Binnie's preachment! The only times she sponsors a shoulder-length bob is when the hair is drawn severely back behind the ears, but with a few ringlets upward just above the forehead to break the hard line, and with curls clustering at the nape of the neck to insure a softening influence. Pretty ears are essential to this type of hairdress.

THE lovely, soft things that Binnie does with bangs are a lesson to all of you. Remember Binnie as the beauteous Lillian Russell in "Diamond Jim Brady"? With her fluffy bangs and her fluffy parasol? She believes that there is nothing which softens the features of a youthful face more than soft ringlets buoyantly curling upward on the forehead. But she also believes that nothing so succeeds in calling attention to lines and age. She doesn't advise bangs for the person with a plump or square face, or a low forehead, but she does believe that we should all experiment with bangs in one form or another. They can often do so much towards giving us new faces.

After all, there are bangs and bangs, the curly, wispy ones of Jean Parker, the smooth blonde ones of Joan Blondell, the softly curling Colbert bangs, and the half-bangs on the side of the face that can be made to give the illusion of a wave when you're tired of them as bangs. Personally, I think the side bang can be ever so fetching, especially when it swirls down onto the forehead and just brushes the eyebrows.

Of course a permanent, a good permanent, I mean, is the advantageous basis for any type of curled or waved coiffure. But I've often wondered why more girls don't discover how chic and youthful unwaved and well brushed hair can appear. Carole Lombard is one of Hollywood's foremost exponents of the hairbrush, and a type of sleek hairdress that she has worn to the smartest advantage is one in which the hair is worn perfectly straight, but with the ends curled up to detract from the severity of the line, and with a deep fringe of bangs softly curled over the forehead. This is the perfect answer to the girl whose permanent wave has pretty well grown out, and who has been asking, "What CAN I do with my hair?" She can have just the ends permanented again, or she can dampen the ends with a good waving fluid and do them up on curlers.

FOR the young girl with the too high forehead, the hairdress just described is excellent. Do you know how to decide whether you have a high forehead, a normal or a low one? Well, the space from the browline to the hairline should be the width of your first three fingers if your brow is normal. If your hairline is above the first finger, your brow is high and your hair should have bangs or a downward wave to conceal part of the forehead.

If you have an unusually nice natural hairline at the face, do capitalize on it! The most generally becoming coiffure for you is one where the hair is combed smoothly backward with an upward off-the-face trend, with large natural waves ending in loose ringlets, and allowing the tips of the ears to show . . . the "Ginger Rogers" type.

Let's follow the metamorphosis of Ginger Rogers from back when she played in "Change of Heart" with Charlie Farrell to her "tops" roles today as partner of Fred Astaire. You see her first with a semi-long bob with bangs from temple to temple. Then she has a change of heart and chooses a coiffure which shows, rather than conceals, her lovely hairline. In her third hairdress she goes still more glamorous, and wears her hair in an off-the-face arrangement with the curls piled high . . . our idea of the metamorphosis of the college girl into the sophisticate.

You'll find that comparatively few of the stars go in for center-part coiffures. For those who have the oval face of a Julie Haydon or the regular features of a Binnie Barnes, the center part can achieve a sweet and saintly look that is enviable, but for most of us I'm afraid that it achieves only a frank unbecomingness.

IF you want to look what I call "S. S. & G." (Sweet, Simple, and Girlish), Dixie Lee Crosby's coiffure is the one to copy, with maybe a ribbon and a bow. Now if Dixie wanted to look older, perish the thought, she would choose a higher coiffure, one that gets up and away from the neckline. That's one of Hollywood's tricks. When a role calls for youth to graciously assume middle age, up goes the coiffure. Remember Norma Shearer in "Strange Interlude"? When she was a young girl her coiffure was "sweet and low" when she portrayed middle age, up went the hairline and the whole contour of the coiffure.

Now here's our scoop of the year . . . a booklet of coiffures of the stars! Six of your favorite stars illustrate six different hairdress styles created especially for them by Perc Westmore, famous director of Hollywood hair styles. Back, front, and side views are shown! These complete instruction photos will enable any skilled permanent waving artist to reproduce exact copies. You can take the booklet right along with you to the hairdresser's, and have a coiffure styled for you exactly like one of the stars. How is that for the final word in helping you to style coiffures?

Seeing stars . . . that's all I've been doing since writing this coiffure "preview" for you, so I was sort of four-star minded when I went shopping for ideas in the stores and beauty shops. You may want the names of these four-star items that I put down on my shopping list: A permanent waving method that is a favorite with the stars, and that is a safeguard for your own personal hair hygiene; a rinse that is just a tiny tint of colorful highlight; a brush that has its bristles so cleverly arranged that it actually encourages a wave (and encourages more highlights, too); and a shampoo especially designed to encourage waviness. Remember, the quality of your hair plays a very important part in the styling of your coiffure!

THE LAST INTERVIEW

stride.

"As he stepped off the train on this particular day, he noticed the regulation group of welcomers, all ready to go into their routine but also, standing a little to one side and looking as if they felt out of place, a rare assortment of tatterdemalions. The Order of California Hobos had learned that Will Rogers was coming to town!

"There they stood, shifting from one foot to the other, at least one hundred disreputable tramps waiting to say hello to the idol whose words of wisdom they managed to read in papers salvaged, along with cigarette stubs and cigar butts, from wayside ashcans.

"Will took one look, and then, with just a hurried 'Howdy do' to the mayor and members of the Rotary Club, he sauntered over to that group of forgotten men. When we finally tore him away half an hour later, he had disposed of all the cash in his pocket—some $300! He had to borrow pocket money from the supervisor to see him through the trip.

"Again during location work in Sonora, the usual pleas began to pour in for Will to speak before the usual groups of ladies' literary clubs, men's breakfast clubs, and the Junior Sewing Circle. He's the sort of man who accepts four lecture engagements a week, gratis—and pays his own travelling expenses besides. He simply can't say no.

"But this time he compromised. Calling a meeting of the representatives of the various organizations, he told them that, since he couldn't speak to each society separately, he'd put on a show for all of them.

"The get-together was called for eight o'clock at the Town Hall. For three solid hours from that time on, we sat in the wings of that meeting house and watched our star go through a magnificent routine of cowboy stunts (rope tricks that would have set your hair on end), comments on current affairs, wisecracking in the inimitable Rogers manner. And all for nothing—this entertainment which was worth ten dollars to anyone in that audience. It was one of the greatest shows I've ever seen and I'm an old, blasé hand at the game.

"Would any other star have considered wasting his time to entertain a group of small-towners? No. But the biggest box office draw in pictures today actually acted as if it were an honor to give the ladies of the Sonora Sewing Bee a grand time. Why? The answer is: 'Because he's Will Rogers . . . and there aren't any more like him.'" the way to the Battery. "Good Lord," he said, "we'll never get through in time. This dreadful red tape will take hours. I'll never make the boat. I'm sure I won't make the boat. It's dreadful, isn't it? And I must make the boat. You see, I'm meeting my wife in England. I can't stand not making the boat. French boat, too. Good Lord! And I'm worn out." He turned to me. "You'd be worn out, too, if you'd just finished 'Mutiny On The Bounty.'"

CHEERIO, CHARLIE

I said I felt sort of worn out already.

WHAT a picture," Laughton said. "Such work. The location was at Catalina. We climbed up the rigging and sat on guns, and bits of mast kept falling on us. Do you think we'll make the boat?"

Just at that moment I thought we'd never make anything again. There was a sickening crash. Our taxi spun into the middle of the street. I found myself in the middle of Charles Laughton's stomach. The press agent groaned, "See what you've done," he yelled at me. "You bring me bad luck."

We had, it seems, been hit by another taxi. Our cab was damaged. We got out and took another one.

"Well," Laughton said, "that was close." He slumped down in a corner of the cab, rolling those wonderful and expressive eyes heavenwards, as you've seen him do on the screen so many times. "Do you know what I thought? I thought I should never be able to finish the Ring Lardner stories I'm reading. Do you know Lardner's works? I'm reading him for the first time. How wonderful he is. Really a great writer. So much better than O. Henry. Don't you think so?"

I wasn't thinking. I was wishing I hadn't tried to get a "scoop."

Now we were at the barge office. Laughton bustled. The press agent bustled. I tagged along.

And then a grand thing happened. Instead of the elaborate red tape everyone had expected, Laughton was asked only to sign his name twice and was given the passport and the re-entry papers.

When he heard this he let out one of those wonderful whoops. You know, the kind of whoop he gave in "Ruggles of Red Gap."

"Marvelous, marvelous," he shouted, dancing a little jig. "Now we'll make the boat. Oh, wonderful."

The press agent shouted, "Come on."

I said maliciously, "You see, there was time for an interview after all."

And just then the press agent shoved Laughton in a taxi and started out without me. He thought he had ditched me.

But you can't ditch Kitty, the girl reporter. Just like a gangster in a movie I followed them in another cab. And when the press agent and Laughton came puffing into Laughton's state room, I was sitting there.

The press agent gave up. Laughton began to laugh. And from then on we all had the time of our lives.

Laughton snatched the wires and cablegrams from his table and ran through them. "Nothing from my wife," he said, unhappily. "I'm afraid she doesn't know I'm sailing." He turned quickly and espied an enormous box of flowers.

"Looks like a coffin," I said.

"Aren't you a cheery little soul?" Laughton mused. "And right over your head is the life belt." He opened the box and found a card. Relief flooded his face. "Ah," he murmured, "from Elsa."

The ship reporters began to arrive. They surrounded Laughton and fired questions at him. I've never seen a man look so bored. One of the reporters asked him if he had seen a certain famous singer on the coast. "Good Lord, no. Oh heaven's no," said Laughton, "a movie actor mustn't speak to an opera star."

That ended that interview.

Then autograph seekers began pouring in—dozens of boys and girls with books and pictures. Someone asked him to write, "To Mush from Charles Laughton."

NOW I can't do that," he complained. "Really can I write 'To Mush'?—oh, heavens."

Another one asked him to write, "To Sol."

"How very Biblical," Laughton said, and wrote to "Saul." The lad will undoubtedly change his name.

More ship reporters came. Laughton ordered champagne cocktails. The reporters wouldn't have them so Laughton and the press agent and I drank them all.

I heard the reporters asking questions but they didn't seem to make sense. Ships always excite me, I suppose.

They asked him his favorite role.

He said it was "Ruggles."

They asked him about his playing "Cyrano" in England. He said he hadn't decided what sort of a nose to wear, most actors who played it, he said, were very lean, handsome men who stuck on a false nose that looked like an iceberg. He said he didn't want to do that.

As I think back it all makes sense. Funny it didn't make sense then. The reporters all seemed so earnest, too.

When they left Laughton turned to me, "Aren't you an interviewer?" he said. I nodded. "Then why don't you ask questions?"

I said I didn't feel like it.

"That's good," said Laughton. "I hate answering questions. Let me tell you why I don't like it. Once Roland Young and I were having terrible difficulty with a scene. It was very late and we had worked very hard that day. We couldn't remember our lines, nor get them straight. Finally we got the hang of it and were just going into a scene when a newspaper man stepped up to me and said, 'Mr. Laughton, which do you like best—English or American films?' And now I can't for the life of me remember whether I killed him or not.

"Let's go up on deck," he went on, "and wave good-bye. Did you ever hear the story of the man who was always seeing his friends off on boats and then one happy day he was actually going somewhere himself? Imagine his amazement when he discovered himself out on the dock waving goodbye to himself."

Well, even now, that doesn't make any sense. So we went on deck.

The news cameramen espied Laughton. They swooped down on him with their little black boxes. "Stand there," they said. "Take off your hat," they said. "Look this way," they shouted.

Laughton was calm. Very quietly he said, "Now really, can't you say 'Please?'"

Then we walked around the deck with peopled named Mush and Sol or Saul following us asking for autographs. But Laughton was having fun.

If that man is morbid, melancholy and morose then the Four Marx Brothers are tragedians.

Suddenly a bell began to ring. The

THE STARS REVEAL YOUR DESTINY!!

What October holds for each of you, as indicated by your horoscope, is revealed in this new magazine of personal astrology.

Did you know that the secret of your real character is written in the stars? It is! Each birth sign, which is an astrological division of the year corresponding roughly to the calendar months, indicates specific characteristics for the people born in that sign—indicating their vocational bents, their temperamental bents in love and in life.

Also each planet in the heavens exerts its influence on each of you. The changing position of the planets determines the changing influence upon you, day by day and year by year, according to your birth sign. Famous astrologers have combined in this new magazine, YOUR DAILY HOROSCOPE, to reveal to each of you the effect of the planets on your birth sign for the month of October—in general and day-by-day.

Other revelations in this new magazine will show you how to use astrology in your daily life, as a guide and staff of self-reliance. Begin a new life today! Learn what October holds for you, and what this very day holds, by getting the October issue of visitors were getting off the boat. "The bell's ringing," the press agent said.

"The bell's ringing," Laughton said.

"The bell's ringing," I said.

AND we walked around the deck some more. It was very nice because there were so few people on it. And that's how it happened that the press agent and I walked down the gangplank—or rather, were pushed down the gang plank by the Ile de France attendants—just as they were lifting the darn thing up. One more second and we would have sailed to quarantine and come back with the pilot. Or maybe we would have been stowaways and gone to England with Laughton. I would have liked the latter best.

As we were being shoved off the Ile de France Laughton shouted, "Wave to me."

So he stood on deck and we stood on the dock and waved. He shouted, "Give my love to Grandmaw," in a very American accent.

Some people on the dock, waving to friends on the boat, looked bewildered. So a woman on the boat satisfied their curiosity by taking her nice white bag and writing on it with a lipstick, "Charles Laughton." She held this us above Laughton's head. Everyone shouted. Laughton waved some more and just as the boat took off or heaved ahoy or pulled anchor or whatever boats do, he clapped his hands above his head in the position of a diver and for one breathless moment everyone thought he was going to jump overboard.

I was quite weak and had to sit down.

And so I got my story. And so I was the one and only magazine writer in New York to see and interview Charles Laughton.

Now that I come to think of it, maybe I didn't interview him after all.

My life is calm once more. But Laughton has spoiled me for other stars. He's swell. He's a scream. Please don't shoot—but honestly it isn't so much what he says as the way he says it. That clipped British voice. Those sly looks. You have the feeling that—no matter what he says—he is kidding everybody and everything.

Great and versatile actor that he is I now think it might have been a good idea if I had asked him to tell me his theories about acting.

Well, maybe when he comes back from England I can get an interview with Laughton—all I did this time was to be darn near killed, to drink champagne cocktails and to have more laughs than I've had in a year of polite interviewing conversation.

And this—gentle readers—is one girl's two-hour adventure with the greatest actor the screen has ever known.

"STUDY NURSING AT HOME," SAID NANCY

AFTER you're 35 it's hard to have to start job hunting. Especially if you have no training or business experience. I had neither.

"You did a wonderful job of nursing John through his last illness," said Nancy who had stopped in to cheer me up. "Why don't you study nursing at home as I did?"

Then she told me about CHICAGO SCHOOL OF NURSING and how easy it was to follow the interesting home-study lessons whenever you had a spare moment. She began to earn money after the first few lessons, and is always busy.

Well, I sent for the C. S. N. booklet and found it full of interesting facts about the easy-to-understand lessons, monthly tuition payments and nurse's equipment furnished. I was particularly impressed by the testimonies of C. S. N. graduates. Not only are they successful in private practice but as doctors' assistants and as special nurses in hospitals and sanitariums. Some even have their own hospitals and rest homes! I decided to enroll at once and I've never been sorry! Ever since finishing the seventh lesson I've been busy—and my average salary is $32 a week!

THE ROMANCES OF OBERON

and unself-conscious as she is, there is about her an aura of strange fascination.

"My first romance," she said, "was, of course, absolutely different from my dreams. I was at a dinner dance given by some friends in Calcutta. It was almost my first public appearance. During the course of the evening, as I was dancing, I happened to look up just in time to catch a fleeting glance of a tall, fair chap in polo clothes, rather dishevelled. He stood there, glared about him for an instant and disappeared. It never occurred to me that he'd been glaring at me. Why should it? I'd never laid eyes on him before. I forgot all about the incident until, half an hour later, I found myself being introduced to him.

"We went into the garden. An Indian moon was low in the sky. There was that. But certainly," Merle laughed, "there was none of the silent, suffering reticence I've dreamed about. For he said to me instantly, 'I am in love with you. I have been for months. I'm returning to England in a few days. Will you marry me?'

"I thought at first that he was mad. Then I thought that he was fooling me. I looked at his eyes and knew that he was not. He was quite sane. And completely in earnest. I told him that I didn't understand—how could he be in love with me when we'd met less than five minutes ago?

IT appeared that he'd seen me around, here and there. He said that it had been love at first sight. That flattered me! He said he'd been trying everywhere to get an introduction to me. He'd made a practise of doing just what he had done that night—he'd barge in on places, look them over to see if I were there and then vanish. This time he had dashed in, had seen me, had gone home to dress and there he was!"

Merle said, remembering, "I didn't fall in love with him at first sight. It would be more romantic to say that I did but these are my real romances, no fiction allowed! I was startled. I was impressed. But my dreams had not prepared me for anything so masterful, so matter-of-fact. Such, I thought, was not the way of the poets. And then he left for England, all nice and broken-hearted, and then I knew. Immediately he sailed I knew that I was in love with him. In love for the first time. And I had a beautiful time, writing very bad poetry, languishing, suffering exquisitely. And when, a few weeks later, my uncle's leave fell due I begged him to take me home to England with him.

On the trip home, Merle confessed, her dreams of Nicky were slightly involved with her secret ambition to go on the stage. She rather fancied herself as an actress. "On that journey," said Merle, "I spent my time visualizing myself as a sort of composite Shearer and Garbo one moment and as the wife of Nicky, in an English garden, the next.

And then there he was, meeting me. We were both very young and very much in love. I was sixteen. He was twenty-one. And not a shilling between us. Both of our families were very violent, indeed, on the subject of early marriage. It was all very young, and, we thought, so very tragic. There were dozens of desperate farewells-forever and more rushing together again and crying, 'We can't stand this!' Then I began to meet people who said, 'You really should be on the stage, my dear.' And I thought so myself. And so, gradually, painfully, Nicky and I drifted apart."

MERLE remained in London. Her uncle left her there, reluctantly, with a little money and a great deal of independence. She heard that the H. M. V. Film Company of London was holding an audition at the Café de Paris and attended the audition with the hope of being "discovered." She was not discovered. But she did land a job at the Café as one of the hostesses. And there . . .

"Second romance came to me there," said Merle, "he was an older man, a foreigner, of Austrian birth. He was charming, sophisticated, clever, mysterious. He made me feel as I had dreamt I would feel when love should come to me. Sort of sacred and set apart. I knew that I was in love again because I was tragically unhappy when I was not with him and curiously unhappy when I was. With Nicky it had all been clear and plain and evident. I'd known what he was all about. With this man there was something I didn't understand. There were things he didn't say.

Months went by. Merle had begun to work in the studios. One day a friend of hers said to her, casually, "Since when have you taken to going out with married men?"

Merle told me, "I can remember now how my heart stopped beating. I thought, 'He is going to pronounce a sentence of death on love.' I didn't dare ask him whom he meant. I knew. And I didn't want to know.

"And that," said Merle, "was my first contact with disillusionment. It's very hard to bear at seventeen."

"I suppose," said Merle, laughing a little, "fiction writers would call my first romance 'Young Romance' and my second, 'Married-Man Romance.' And now comes one which would be titled, I'm sure, 'The Romantic Friendship.'

BECAUSE," said Merle, "if you have read the daily papers, Miss Hall, you know all about the rumors of an engagement between me and David Niven; I've never made any statement about this. No one has asked me to. But I make one now: There is no engagement. There is no romance in the literal sense of the word. It has been hinted that we are in love, that we may be married any day now and so on. Here is the real truth: I was awfully lonely and homesick when I first came to Hollywood. It was a dream come true, just to be here, but even a dream come true can be a chilly thing when there is no "home" person to share it with you. David is a home person. I'd met him a few times at home in England. Then he came to Hollywood. He's gay and amusing and clever. We speak the same language.

"We are friends, David and I. We are not about to announce our engagement. We've never even discussed the state of marriage.

"I'm not being 'clever' about this. I'm not being cagey and secretive. When, if ever, I fall madly and really in love I shall be the first to announce it to the world. Frankly. Proudly. And I'll give up gladly my work, my career, my entire scheme of living for love and home and marriage. But that day has not yet come. Nor that man. And we have completely jolly and satisfying times together, David and I. But the name we give it is friendship—not love."

If Hepburn and Leland Hayward are married, how come Leland arrived at Katie's "Alice Adams" preview with Margaret Sullavan in tow? And why did he try to duck when the demon Scotty snapped their picture? And after the preview, why did Katie sneak out the side door? It's questions like these that make this goofy town so interesting. Or, if you prefer, they help make this interesting burg so goofy.

Everybody's yelling about a new "discovery" in these parts, so we may as well add our voice to the clamor. She's Edith Fellows, she's nine years old and she practically steals Claudette Colbert's new picture, "She Married Her Boss." Here's how Edith was "discovered": When director Gregory La Cava sent out a call for a youngster, doting mothers appeared at his office with their offsprings, and all of the little darlings were equipped with starched dresses and a prepared speech. Edith appeared sans mother and in everyday clothes, marched into the La Cava presence and said: "I understand you wanted to see me." P. S. She got the job.

Luise Rainer, who scored such a hit with Bill Powell in "Escapade," is hardly what you could call the cameraman's friend. She's always hard to get, but recently at the Café Lamaze with Max Reinhardt, Jr., and two other male friends, the camera boys cornered her. As a gag, the gentlemen refused to pose with her. When they finally consented, La Rainer, continuing the jolly fun, upped and left the table. A few minutes later she returned, making a grand entrance which was marred only by the fact that she slipped and fell flat on the Rainer features—and right in the middle of the dance floor.

Art for art's sake is Hollywood's motto, even though some of the stars will support Art till it kills them, provided it's accompanied by a loud obligato of publicity. Last summer, however, there was evidence of a considerable amount of sincere interest in the Hollywood Bowl concerts. The Bowl, in case you don't know, is a natural amphitheatre in the Hollywood hills, and features during the summer an excellent series of symphonies and light operas. A number of stars purchase boxes for the season, for it's considered quite tony to be listed among the patrons and patronesses of the Bowl. Looking over the list we were pleasantly surprised to find the name of that avid music lover and follower of the arts, Mr. Stepin Fetchit.

Seems like you've got to have a college education to become a western star these days. Paramount started the vogue when they took Randolph Scott out of the University of Alabama and put him on a horse, and now several studios have hard riders with diplomas. John Wayne is a University of Southern California boy who made good on the celluloid plains, and Charles Starrett, who went afoot to Dartmouth, now finds himself in the saddle upholding the honor of the west.

Cary Grant makes faces at Betty Furness and Randolph Scott.

The Nino Martini success story is one of those things you read about. (All right then, come on and read about it.) Back in 1929 Mrs. Jesse Lasky heard Nino singing in a Paris cafe. The Laskys brought him to this country and starred him in a musical short. Those were the days when sound pictures were just beginning to sit up and make noises, and Nino's voice didn't register well so his contract was cancelled. For several years it was tough going for Nino, until suddenly he burst into prominence on the air. Next came a contract with the Metropolitan Opera Company, and now success in his first feature picture, "Here's to Romance," which was produced by Mr. Lasky. A friend of Nino's told us that his income for 1936 will approximate $250,000, which is very nice indeed when you figure that lots of guys who were failures in 1929 aren't doing so well these days, either.

If you're ever looking for some easy money in a hurry, it might be well to follow Peter Lorre's example. Peter, you may remember, wore a shaved pate in "Mad Love." A few weeks later he started work on "Crime and Punishment," and everyone on the set had an uncontrollable desire to rub his stubble of growing hair. So Mr. L. put the thing on a paying basis by charging a nickel a rub. In two days he amassed $2.45, and set up a Lorre lunch fund for studio office boys. Try it some time.

That the wedding bells are imminent for Buddy Rogers and Mary Pickford seems to be a foregone conclusion along the Boulevard, but here's a question some of the natives are asking themselves. Who is the handsome young man who has been piloting a motorcycle to Santa Barbara these last few Sundays with dignified little Mary perched on the seat behind him? The young man is Craig Reynolds, who was Hugh Enfield when he played opposite Mary in her recent stage appearance in "Coquette," and who is now under contract to Warner Brothers. Rumor has it that they are merely friends, but if you've ever ridden on the back seat of a motorcycle—well, it must be love!

Buddy and his band have been playing an engagement at Mr. Wrigley's Catalina Island these past few weeks, and friends insist that when America's Boy Friend returns to the mainland the little lady waiting at the dock will be America's Sweetheart. And they further insist that she won't be coming down to the sea on a motorcycle.

■ ■ ■

Shirley Temple is thinking of hiring the Stanford football squad to accompany her on her evenings out. Shirley isn't looking for gigolos—what she needs is a set of bodyguards to protect her from admiring fans who make a mass attack every time their idol appears in public. Shortly after their return from Honolulu, Shirley and her mama visited Grauman's Chinese to get their first look at "Curly Top." No sooner were they seated than recognized, however, when practically the entire audience from the other side of the house moved over to get a first-hand peek at the picture's title role. No bones were broken in the stampede, and everyone got a look at Shirley, with the possible exception of the little lady herself, who found her immediate vicinity so crowded she couldn't see a thing.

■ ■ ■

You may have seen Lew Ayres on the screen for the last time. No, we don't mean he has decided to stay home and keep house for Ginger; on the other hand, he has just signed a contract to direct. It seems Lew has always harbored a yen for a megaphone. A few months ago he made a home movie, with the cast made up of his movie colony friends. Lew wrote the scenario, built the sets, handled the camera and directed the picture. A few nights ago he showed the results at the Rogers-Ayres abode. Nat Levine of Mascot Pictures, who happened to be present, was so impressed with Lew's work that he immediately signed him to a director's contract.

■ ■ ■

And how about a few better roles for Bette Davis? The little Davis lass, whose Mildred in "Of Human Bondage" was one of the outstanding screen portrayals of last season, actually hasn't had a part worthy of her talents since. In her newest picture, "Special Agent," she has so little to do she could almost as well have stayed home. Aside to the Warner Brothers; how about giving this little girl a great big hand?

Either there's been a decided improvement in the quality of the farewell parties out here, or people actually hate to leave Hollywood. Of late there have been numerous "farewells" for visiting celebrities and locals alike, and as a rule the honor guest likes the party so well he decides to stay around another week or so, perhaps in the hope that a few more kind friends will say it with parties. The latest guest of honor who just couldn't bear to leave was Merle Oberon. After the completion of "Dark Angel," when Merle announced she was about to entrain for England, the Samuel Goldwyns honored her with a very elegant going-away party. Everything was so lovely that the almond-eyed Tasmanian, as her press-agents are wont to describe her, decided to stay. It's getting so "goodbye" doesn't mean a thing around here.

Now that Will Rogers is gone, many wonder what sort of reaction the two pictures unreleased at the time of his death will receive. One of them, "Steamboat 'Round The Bend," opened in Hollywood two days after the funeral. We stood in line half an hour to buy a ticket. Inside, Will's first appearance on the screen was greeted with applause, and throughout the picture there was genuine laughter from people who loved Will so much in life they can still laugh with him on the screen. It was a splendid tribute to a man who is really an American institution. It was conclusive proof that he will never die.

Eddie Robinson doesn't like to complain, but he's willing to bet he receives goofier presents from fans than any other star in the business. While most movie personalities are getting useful things, the Robinson menage is cluttered with Chinese earthenware, strange Aztec objects, totems and several dozen items the identity of which even careful research fails to disclose. A few weeks ago a package arrived containing a strange object about the size of a golf ball. Eddie, who thought it might be something explosive, took it to a policeman, who didn't know what to think. The gift was carted to a chemist, who found it to be a low grade of ambergris, the stuff of which perfumes are made. "It's nice," says Eddie, "but I'll gladly trade it for a pair of socks." Size eleven, in case you're interested.

Hollywood heat wave (as we go to press): The big romance of the month continues to be Cary Grant and Betty Furness. They've been doing the night spots together quite consistently, although we must admit to having seen the young lady on more than one occasion with Cesar Romero . . . Estelle Taylor, who gave Lee Tracy most of her time last month, has swung over to Van Smith, who was reported about to marry Nancy Carroll . . . Nancy's ex, Jack Kirkland, having been recently divorced by Jayne Shadduck, has been giving all of his attention to June Travis, whose pappy owns the Chicago White Sox . . . Irene Hervey continues to decorate the arm of Bob Taylor, and it looks like romance . . . The report that a certain well-known star was seen out dancing with his wife has been vigorously denied by both parties.

It may not make any difference to you that Lillian Bond is married to Sydney Smith, but it meant a lot to a gal in New Zealand. Lil is showing her pals a letter from the young lady which says, "All happiness—for three years I'd been wishing you'd get married. The man I love got a crush on you the first time he saw you on the screen. When he found out you were married, he proposed, and our wedding bells will ring early next year. Thank you very much." And Lil has the letter and Sydney to prove it.

. . . a freshly different, more alluring color that brings to lips the sublime madness of a moon-kissed jungle night

When shapely lips are given this new, sense-stirring jungle red, tempests rage about them . . . and other hearts throb with impatience. "Jungle" is the most vivid shade ever put into lipstick, and the most exotic. It is divinely daring . . . mercilessly teasing . . . dangerously tempting . . . a truly adventurous hue, artfully created to bring rapt attention to the luscious, moist softness this lipstick also gives to lips. And is "Jungle" indelible? So much so, that its intense color becomes an actual part of you . . . clinging to your lips, and YOUR lips alone . . . all day . . . or, all night . . . savagely! See "Jungle" . . . use it, if you are going out to conquer!

THERE are four other SAVAGE shades too: TANGERINE (Orangish) . . . FLAME (Fiery) . . . NATURAL (Blood Color) . . . BLUSH (Changeable)

From 1900 up to 1934 the leaf tobacco used for cigarettes increased from 13,084,037 lbs. to 326,093,357 lbs.;

an increase of 2392%

There is no substitute for mild, ripe tobacco.

During the year ending June 30, 1900, the Government collected from cigarette taxes

$3,969,191

For the year ending June 30, 1934, the same taxes were $350,299,442

an increase of 8725%

—a lot of money.

Cigarettes give a lot of pleasure to a lot of people.

More cigarettes are smoked today because more people know about them—they are better advertised.

But the main reason for the increase is that they are made better—made of better tobaccos; then again the tobaccos are blended—a blend of Domestic and Turkish tobaccos.

Chesterfield is made of mild, ripe tobaccos. Everything that science knows about is used in making it a milder and better-tasting cigarette.

We believe you will enjoy them.
